For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

219676

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/ladieshomejourna77janwyet

IES' ME
JOURNAL
JANUARY
1960 · 35c
DEC 1 9 195
STON DR. E
URLINGAM
THE MAGAZINE
PUBLIC BELIEVE
IN LIB.
21836
Pat Boone Talks
THE BURNING EYE
NDENSED
OMPLETE NOVEL IN THIS ISSUE
How to Lose
25 Pounds and Stay Thin
OVABLE, WONDERFUL DR. SPOCK
Teen Age Report to the Nation
Are They Beat...Boho...or BURLINGAME CALIF
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME PUBLIC

Cannon Combspun Per are so s
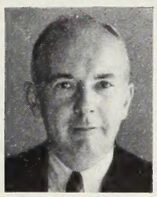
so

Save on white! For pennies more have colors,
New Tempo comes in aqua, yellow, pink, gree

219876



Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXVII NO. 1

January, 1960

JOURNALITIES

William McCleery

Here's a little bit of the secret life of BILL MCCLEERY, JOURNAL associate editor whose main job is to see that the JOURNAL gets "first look" at promising novels and short stories: "As a playwright (I have had two plays on Broadway and several others have been done in summer stock and published for amateur groups), I found myself writing about women a good deal (stars who have appeared in my plays on stage or TV or radio include Helen Hayes, Rosalind Russell, Cornelia Otis Skinner, Nanette Fabray, Sarah Churchill). It finally dawned on me I didn't really know much about women, and I thought working for the JOURNAL might be an excellent way for me to learn something. I have—I think. My wife thinks so too. Actually, I take the view that the JOURNAL is a man's magazine. Who needs to know about women more than men?"

Isak Dinesen

Sometimes we wish ISAK DINESEN were not so great a writer. Her short, short tale about a meddling wife, The Blue Eyes, on page 38 is one we shall never be able to forget. She makes one believe her fiction is truer than any fact. Isak Dinesen, as almost everyone knows, is a baroness who lives in Rungstedlund, Rungsted Kyst, Denmark, and she signs herself, in her most recent letter to us, Tania Blixen. (Dinesen was her maiden name.) A leading candidate for the Nobel prize this year and last, who will no doubt one day receive it, she remarked modestly of her story, "I hope the readers of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL will like it." The baroness comes of an old Danish country family; her father before her made a considerable contribution to Danish literature, but Isak Dinesen, published and appreciated in a dozen languages, belongs to the world.

Victor Canning

VICTOR CANNING (The Burning Eye, page 34) was born in Plymouth, England, in 1911 and began his career in a local government office. For amusement, he began to write boys' adventure stories as a side line. His novels and stories have been widely read throughout Europe and America, and he has become one of the top-ranking writers of adventure and suspense. He travels widely. Such places as Italy, Holland, Yugoslavia, Majorca, North Africa, an island in the South Atlantic have all contributed their special atmospheres to Canning novels. When not personally adventuring, he lives quietly in England with his wife and two daughters. He is an expert and enthusiastic gardener. The Burning Eye will be published this year by William Sloane Associates.

Printed in U.S.A.

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

THE BURNING EYE, Victor Canning . 34

Stories

THE FLUFF, George Bradshaw . 36
THE BLUE EYES, Isak Dinesen . 38
FUEL FOR THE FLAME (Fourth part of five), Alec Waugh . 64

Special Features

DOWN WITH CLOSETS!, Elinor Goulding Smith . 8
ARE WOMEN BAD EMPLOYERS OF OTHER WOMEN?, Dorothy Thompson . 11
TELLING YOUR CHILD ABOUT DEATH, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 14
LEGAL AID WITH A WOMAN'S TOUCH . 17
VOLUNTEERS CAN HELP, Margaret Hickey . 17
TELL ME DOCTOR, Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D. . 26
WHERE AND WHEN DOES DELINQUENCY START? . 40
YOU AND YOUR NEW YEAR, Pat Boone . 42
TEEN-AGE REPORT TO THE NATION . 43
PRINCESS MAY, WHO BECAME QUEEN MARY (Conclusion), James Pope-Hennessy . 62
THE BEAUTY OF THE WORLD, Honor Tracy . 84
HOW AMERICA LIVES: "OUR BABY WAS BORN AT HOME," Joan Younger . 111

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 20
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 30
FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 33
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 101
THIS IS AN OWN-WAY WANTER, Munro Leaf . 130

Fashion and Beauty

YOUNG WOMEN GOING PLACES . . . YOUNG MEN WITH A FUTURE, Wilhela Cushman . 48
DIOR—YOURS FOR THE MAKING, Nora O'Leary . 54
HE LOST 125 POUNDS . . . AND HIS DAUGHTER DIETED TOO, Margaret Oppen . 56
NEW FACES IN LESS THAN A DAY, Dawn Crowell Norman . 58
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 79

Food and Homemaking

CORINNE GRIFFITH'S COOKBOOK, Corinne Griffith . 25
COOKING TO ME IS POETRY, Phyllis McGinley . 66
GALA FOOD AND FESTIVITY . 68
THE HOUSE THAT GREW, H. T. Williams . 90
THE HOUSE THAT GREW, Margaret Davidson . 91
FUN WITH YARN, Lucia Lord . 124

Architecture and Interior Decoration

WINTER FLOWERS, Janet Cottier . 98
COMFORT AND CHARM IN AN AMERICAN MODERN CHALET, John Brenneman . 126

Poems

ALWAYS THE WOMEN, Paul Engle . 18
THIN-ICE SKATING SONG, Elizabeth McFarland . 72
JANUARY NIGHTS, Margaret R. Gould . 77
DOLLARS AND SENSE, Francis O. Walsh . 89
ICE STORM, Louise D. Peck . 105
AULD ACQUAINTANCE, Elizabeth Henley . 107
THE HUMAN MALE, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 120
THE STEEPLE WEATHER VANE, Dionis Coffin Riggs . 122
EXTINGUISHED, Katherine Rochefort . 133

Cover Photograph by Roger Prigent

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1959 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

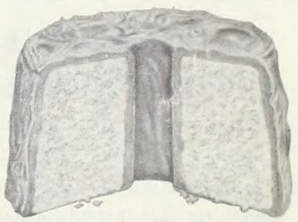
The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Robinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

Picture of



THE SMARTEST WOMAN IN THE WORLD!

She's just made a homemade cake that's "out of this world"... naturally made better with soft, soft Softasilk Cake Flour!

Here's a cake that will show everyone how smart you are:

Betty Crocker's Cake of the Month

BUTTERSCOTCH CHIFFON CAKE

2¼ cups sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour	5 unbeaten egg yolks
3 tsp. baking powder	¾ cup cold water
1 tsp. salt	2 tsp. vanilla
2 cups brown sugar (packed)	1 cup egg whites (7 or 8)
½ cup cooking (salad) oil	½ tsp. cream of tartar

Heat oven to 325°. Sift flour, baking powder, salt into bowl. Add sugar. Make a well; add oil, egg yolks, water, vanilla. Beat until smooth. Beat egg whites and cream of tartar in large mixing bowl until whites form very stiff peaks. (Do not underbeat.) Pour egg yolk mixture gradually over beaten whites, folding just until blended. DO NOT STIR. Pour into ungreased 10" tube pan. Bake 65 to 70 min., or until top springs back when lightly touched. Turn upside down over neck of funnel or bottle. Hang until cold. Loosen from sides and tube with spatula. Turn pan over and hit edge sharply on table to loosen. Frost with your favorite butterscotch frosting or glaze, if desired.

Your secret for baking skill...

SOFTASILK CAKE FLOUR

General Mills

Free! SOFTASILK CAKE COOK BOOK

- thirty-two pages of sure-success baking tips
- fifty-eight famous tested Softasilk recipes:

New Cakes • Traditional Cakes • Cookies
Double-quick Cakes • Sauces and Gravies
Easy Soufflés • Quick Breads • Desserts

Send 1 Softasilk box top to General Mills, Inc., Dept. 210, 623 Marquette Avenue, Minneapolis 2, Minn.

Not even time to take your hat off?
Let 'em eat A.1. pizza

A.1. STEAK SAUCE

quick-cook's secret for hearty homemade pizza in a hurry

Mixing time: five minutes. Tastes like you'd fussed for hours. The secret? A.1.'s savory blend of herbs and spices. Long a favorite pour-on for steaks and chops, famous A.1. Steak Sauce is the quick-cook's best friend for sparking excitement in the quickest, easiest dishes.

A.1. No-Crust Pizza

Mix 1 lb. chopped beef with 1 tsp. salt, ½ tsp. pepper, 2 Tbsps. A.1. Steak Sauce (the touch that makes the difference!). Pack lightly into greased 9-in. cake pan. Pour 8-oz. can tomato sauce over meat, sprinkle with ½ c. finely diced onion, 2 oz. American cheese grated, ½ tsp. powdered Oregano (optional). Bake about 20 mins. 350°. Serves four.

SEND FOR FREE A.1. RECIPE BOOKLET

"Cooking With Your Hat On" for other quick and easy dishes

A.1. SAUCE COMPANY (DIVISION OF HEUBLEIN), HARTFORD, CONN.

OUR READERS WRITE US

Let's Tell the Truth About Dying

Boston, New York

Dear Editors: The epidemic of articles by cancer victims in the last few years leads even the most unscientifically minded observer to conclude there must be some correlation between people dying of cancer and the urge to appear in print.

Without exception the cancer patient is portrayed as a martyr, deeply suffering, but led at last through his troubles to realize the big things in life. All his trivialities are swept away, he appreciates the wonders of nature as never before, a change has come over his character so he is now a reformed person, he has turned again to God, and he keeps his temper.

I think it is time we let down our hair and told the truth. We have the urge to rush into print all right, but we who are dying of cancer are not martyrs or saints or holy folk. Frankly, if the truth were told, we embarrass our friends, and we often bore them.

Our first emotion is that of anger. We go through a "few nights of apprehension and hot weeping," but once over those we are surprised, shocked and angry. That this fate should be meted out to us—Us, of all people—seems hardly fair. We look around at our friends and neighbors and wonder why we have been singled out for this lingering, painful death. "Why me, O Lord, why me?" We forget that for every one of us who suffers others go free; we should be glad they are spared, not angry at our own destiny, deserved or undeserved. After all, why not us, O Lord? We are no martyrs—heavens, no.

Cancer is not a pleasant way to die. It is too endlessly prolonged, too excruciatingly painful. Yet through that last, the pain, we learn we can take more than we ever thought possible. We may rail, in spite of ourselves, when pain mounts; but if it subsides enough to be bearable we feel happy and relieved, like the woman whose girdle felt so comfortable when she took it off. I am not recommending extreme pain as a method of increasing pleasure or making us grateful for small comforts, but it does make us more able to bear the later heights of pain we will have to go through.

We embarrass our friends, for Emily Post has provided no rules for conversation with the dying. We know our friends guard their tongues, and they force us to watch our words even more. Mentioning that we won't be here next year, or even perhaps next month, is not in good taste. We have to talk about "when the children are grown," or "when this house gets too big for just two of us," because the sensibility of our friends to death will not allow them to face what we face each minute: the fact of our dying.

We are quite likely to bore our friends with our preoccupation with illness. We are so wrapped up in ourselves we talk too much. For that reason, I never bring up my illness; but if I am seriously asked about it I am only too glad to talk. It is a great relief to unburden oneself occasionally, to have the fact that one is bearing pain appreciated. One of the kindest acts a friend can do for a dying man is to listen to him.

What do we answer to the casual, "How are you?" For a person who is dying to reply automatically "Fine" is ridiculous. I solved it by saying cheerfully, with a rising inflection, "Pretty good." Now that there is no longer any truthful affirmative answer I reply, as lightheartedly as I know how, "Coming along," and that takes care of that. We have to be particularly careful not to be a specter at the feast, lest we spoil others' pleasure.

I don't suppose I should admit this, but we are not saints. The canker of our death which always eats at us makes us impatient, intolerant of other people's troubles. In great pain, it is hard for us to show sympathy with a bad cold, a hurt finger or a headache. Surprisingly enough, we usually come through well here, but don't be disgusted with us if we can't produce too much emotion over your problem. Yours will go, ours won't.

I'm afraid I have to admit I am often testy, irritated by my children's complaints over trivialities, even sometimes upset by my husband's kindnesses when they are ill-timed. He is, naturally enough, concerned over his dying wife; it is far harder on him than on me. He has to go on living; all I have to do is die, and die as well as I can.

Yet I, too, have cared for me a long time, and I find it extremely hard to face the end of my personality, the complete extinguishing of everything I planned. Thus we are both inwardly upset, and sometimes it shows outwardly. So is it any wonder that life, instead of being the beautiful idyl painted by cancerous writers, sometimes stoops to the petty details of existence?

I've gone through it all: the early times of Hope, the Facing the Truth, the Grin-and-Bear-It stage, then Just Bearing It, and now the End-Is-Just-Around-the-Corner or Final Stage. I'm still angry about it all, for I think no one has ever loved living more or had more fun doing it than I, and I want it to go on. But if it can't, then I must be truthful and say there are a few advantages in living only half a lifetime. Besides the end of good, death also means an end to tribulations—no more holding in the stomach, no more P.T.A., no more putting up the hair in pin curls, no more Cub Scouts, no more growing old.

Sincerely,
CAROL WILLIS

▶ Mrs. Willis died two weeks after writing us. Her husband believes, as we do, that her letter should still be published. ED.

Well, You Know How We Feel About Girls

Elyria, Ohio

Dear Sirs: Having an armful of boys like this, don't you think I should be ashamed of this desire way down inside for a little girl?

The boys.

Your friend,
MRS. HARLAND WILCOX, JR.

Repairmen Have Troubles Too

Somewhere in New York

Dear Mrs. C——: It was nice of you to listen to the kicks of an appliance serviceman the other day, and as you suggested I'll try to write of a few of them in this letter, to be sent to your favorite magazine.

Most of us doing this work do so because we like the work, and most of us really try to do a good job. Those of us who represent one of the major companies expect, as part of our job, to get a hard time once in a while from the owner of one

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

BANANA WAFER PUDDING

with that matchless cooked-in flavor

Prepare pudding as directed on back of package. Chill. Arrange alternate layers of banana slices, vanilla wafers and pudding in a serving dish—finishing with a layer of pudding. Serve with whipped cream. It will be very easy to get the children in for dinner tonight. (And isn't this nice to know: you can create a whole extravaganza of different pies with this extraordinary package, too.)

You did it...

. . . with Jell-O Pudding and Pie Filling—the one dessert that never stops being different.

Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

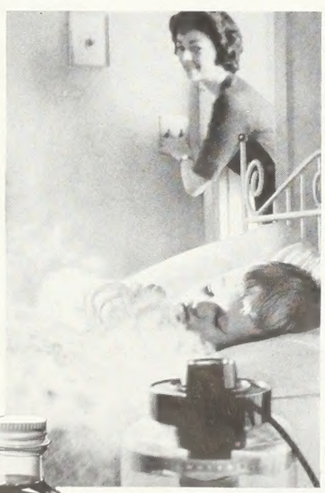
GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Vicks announces new liquid medication

MAKES STEAM FOR COLDS TWICE AS EFFECTIVE

New relief for congestion, croupy coughs . . .
children breathe easier instantly.

Hospital test report: Recently a New York hospital tested a new kind of steam medication called Vicks VapoSteam. An official medical journal reported that nothing else used "including cough syrup, antibiotics, or vaporizers, medicated or not, approached the effectiveness of (VapoSteam)" in relieving the cough.



This new medication helped babies and children suffering with severe nasal stuffiness, croupy coughs and chest congestion "more rapidly and completely than any other therapy used."

VapoSteam is now available at your drug store. Pour it into vaporizer, bowl or wash basin of hot water to make the steam twice as effective in spreading relief – more effective than ordinary steam or any other steam medication you can buy.

Helps your child 2 ways that plain steam can't:

1. Changes the steam itself – makes every relief-giving droplet spread twice as far.

2. Gives your child famous Vicks aromatic medications in intensified form.

Ordinary Steam
vapors are really tiny drops of moisture that can't spread very far.

Vicks VapoSteam
bursts open these drops and spreads their relief twice as effectively.

NEW VICKS
Vapo Steam®
Greaseless Liquid
Steam Medication

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

of the machines that has acted up, more especially if the machine is in the warranty period, but that's part of the job, and we are sort of trained to take it. However, our parent companies could reduce this hazard considerably by the use of better materials and workmanship. Let's take a "fer instance." I have in mind a right nice lady who bought a new automatic washer in June. It arrived with a defective timer which had to be replaced. This wasn't too bad. It could happen in the best of circles. But along about the middle of August, a most frantic call came into the office from her. Her nice new machine was depositing gallons of water on her nice newly tiled floor. Yep, a drain hose rotted, cracked, split wide open. Today that's one of our big complaints: poor rubber. I know that our company does not make the rubber hoses that it uses on the machines, but by golly, if the bigger rubber companies have forgotten how to make rubber, then our appliance manufacturers should find smaller companies that do remember.

We have some machines in the field that have been in service since 1946 with the same drain and inlet hoses, but today the hoses barely last out the warranty period and a fair proportion of them do not even last that one year. This means that the serviceman, the customers' contact with the manufacturer in a lot of cases, gets a real hard time. And deep down in our hearts, we cannot blame the "gal." She can buy a nice long garden hose for not much more than her inlet hoses cost, and she can get a five-year guaranty.

Can you read another kick? Imitation material, I call it. Plastic for steel. I have in mind a nice steel friction wheel used to drive a pump on one of our better-known automatic washers. I can recall having to change only one in some seven years of working on these washers, and that because the set screw had broken and could not be removed. Sure, now we have plastic wheels, and what happens? People go away for a couple of weeks' vacation, the lubricant on the drive shaft sets up a little, and when they return and use the machine, the friction wheel engages, and within a second or two a nice flat spot is worn on the plastic wheel; then the driving wheel, which is rubber-faced, gets flat spots, so not only does a plastic wheel have to be replaced, but also the more expensive rubber-faced wheel. So, because of using poor material, the serviceman gets it from the owner, the company has another customer who certainly can't be called satisfied.

I most readily agree that the plastic wheel costs the company less than the steel wheel, but to me, if it makes the owners of the company's products unhappy, is it cheaper?

Thanks for reading my complaints, as well as for listening to them the other day.

BILL

All in the Game

Chatham, Kent, England

Readers Letters: Are American wives as crafty as English ones? My wife bet me five shillings I couldn't scrub and clean the house in two hours. She lost the bet—or did she?

Sincerely,
L. R. READ

More Psychiatrists Needed

New York City

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: Since my Ten Ways a Child May Tell You He Is Headed for a Troubled Teen Age appeared (March JOURNAL), I have received a great many letters from your readers. It has unfortunately not been possible for me to answer all of them; but it pleased me to note that the article did help many parents to distinguish between serious and trivial troubles of their children—and to find that many troubles were amenable to proper treatment.

The letters have a lot in common. Almost without exception they are written by mothers (where are the fathers?) and they ask specific help for their own child or children. What emerges is the fact that facilities for psychotherapy of children and adolescents are woefully lacking. Some of these mothers have been told by agencies or professional people that their child should take "nerve pills," that "this is just a stage the child is going through," that the child will "snap out of it," that "some children are born that way; make the best of it," that they should let the child "siphon off his aggression" by any anti-social acts he wants to commit, that "it's all your own fault for not loving him enough."

Some children are very difficult to diagnose, to treat, to educate. But most of them can be cured or greatly helped. That can be done, however, only if somebody sits down and listens to the parents (yes, to the father too) and to the child. That takes time.

I don't think we have to teach the public much more about psychiatry. What is needed now is that we make it available to them, including those who cannot afford large fees. The response to my article proves that parents are aware of emotional problems. The tragedy is that they get a runaround when they seek help.

There may be ten ways in which a child may tell you he is headed for a troubled teen age, but there is only one way to do something about it, and that is through easy accessibility of trained and devoted professional people to help them.

Sincerely yours,
FREDRIC WERTHAM, M.D.

New Playpen

Eugene, Oregon

Dear Editors: Little Karen has spent much of her babyhood in this intriguing play cage constructed by her father, a young architect, Willard Martin.

The cage is six feet high from hook to hook and four feet in diameter. Nylon clothesline serves for the "wires" and a doorway is made when four of the ropes are unhooked from the cage floor. Excessive movement is avoided by means of a turnbuckle at the ceiling.

Karen at play.

This is one playpen we can expect to see suspended from the limb of a back-yard tree three or four years from now!

Sincerely,
THYRZA I. ANDERSON

You Can Help Retarded Children

Albuquerque, New Mexico

Dear Editor: "Children in the Dark," by Glenn Matthew White (November JOURNAL), is one of the finest articles about retarded children that have appeared in recent years on the pages of our national magazines.

Our fund drives benefit enormously from such articles, and this means that fewer children must look to a state institution for help and more and more can receive the services they need in their own communities. Readers of your magazine who express willingness to help may send donations directly to the National Association for Retarded Children, 386 Park Avenue South, New York City, or to their local units.

Sincerely,
MRS. MAX J. NIESE,
Member of the Board,
Albuquerque Association for Retarded Children, Inc.

Spectacular 30TH Anniversary Offer

FROM DOUBLEDAY'S FAMOUS DOLLAR BOOK CLUB

any 4 of these big hard-bound best-sellers for only 99¢

when you join and agree to take as few as 6 best-selling novels out of 24 offered within a year

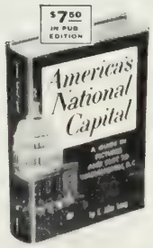
VALUE $10.44 TO $50.00 in publishers' editions

$10.00 IN PUB EDITION

Glamorous Guide to room arrangements, color, furniture, lighting, etc. 293 pictures, 144 in full color!

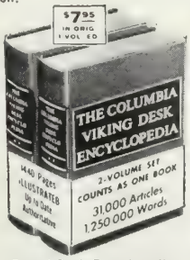
$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

New Best-Seller! A proud Southern beauty trades one night of love for the safety of her plantation!



$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

Big 256-page Atlas! Covers U.S., Canada, all foreign lands. 190 pages of maps. Illus. geography.



$6.50 IN PUB EDITION

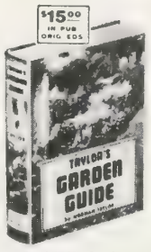
The Story of Jesus reverently told by one of America's great modern spiritual leaders. 473 pgs.

$7.50 IN PUB EDITION

Drama and Excitement of Washington, D.C. in 228 beautiful photographs and fascinating reading!

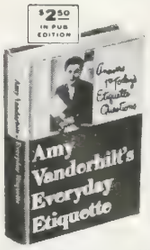
$7.95 IN ORIG. 1-VOL. ED.

Famed Desk Encyclopedia. 2 volumes — 1,250,000 words, 31,000 articles, 1,440 pages. Up-to-date.



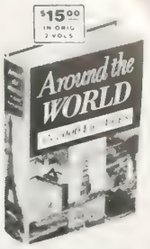
$4.95 IN PUB EDITION

Smash Novel! A young man discovers life and love in a Northern tobacco town. "Has everything!"



$6.80 IN PUB EDS.

Dr. Morris Fishbein's Home Medical Guide, plus new "eat and reduce" book. 2 vols. 620 pages, illus.



$15.00 IN PUB ORIG. EDS.

6 Garden Books in One! Fruit, flowers, herbs, color, etc. Every aspect of gardening! Illustrated.

$2.50 IN PUB EDITION

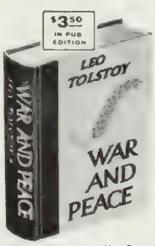
Answers Your Questions about weddings, dining out, dress, entertaining, invitations, tipping, etc.

$15.00 IN ORIG. 2 VOLS.

Visit Rome, Paris, Bali —see wonders of 84 lands in 768 pages of photographs and vivid reading!

$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

A Gay Shipboard Blonde, a lovely Contessa, a young American adventure-bound in Keyes' new best-seller!

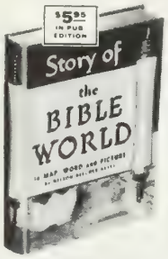


FAMED CHILDREN'S CLASSICS

Famed Children's Classics in 2 volumes, 32 fairy tales plus beloved "Black Beauty." Delightful illus.

$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

Garden Ideas Handbook! How to build walks, terraces, rock gardens, trellises, pools, etc. Illus.



$3.50 IN PUB EDITION

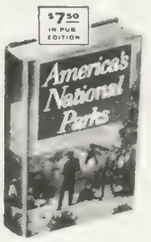
One of the World's Great Novels! Vast panorama of love, adventure, ambition, in the days of Napoleon!

$2.95 IN PUB EDITION

World's Favorite Poems of love, laughter, adventure — complete children's section. 485 pgs.

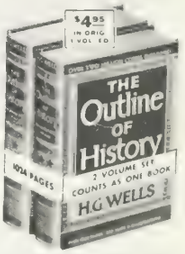
$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

Inspiring Journey into fascinating Bible Lands in thrilling photographs, maps and stories.



$10.00 IN PUB EDITION

Exciting Action Pictures and first-hand news reports portray heroism and struggles of Civil War.

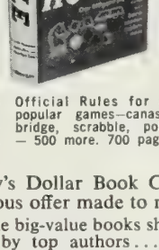


$4.95 IN PUB EDITION

Classics of Suspense by Daphne du Maurier, Agatha Christie, Ellery Queen and 7 others. 640 pages.

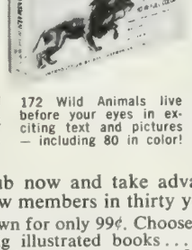
$7.50 IN PUB EDITION

Fabulous Picture Tour! See 29 wonder parks of U.S. and Canada in 527 magnificent photographs.



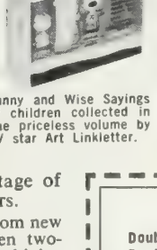
$4.95 IN ORIG. 1-VOL. ED.

Whole Story of Mankind from earliest times to now! 2 vols., 1,024 pgs. Over 200 maps and illus.



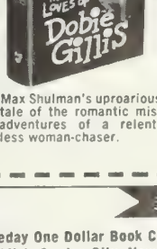
$10.00 IN PUB EDITION

tory of Our Presidents old in 566 paintings, rints, photos and carbons, plus lively facts.



$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

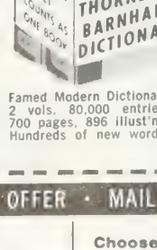
Official Rules for all popular games—canasta, bridge, scrabble, poker — 500 more. 700 pages.



172 Wild Animals live before your eyes in exciting text and pictures — including 80 in color!

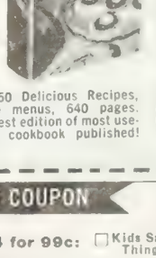
$2.95 IN PUB EDITION

Funny and Wise Sayings of children collected in one priceless volume by TV star Art Linkletter.



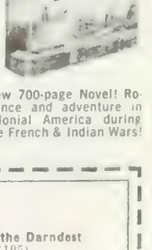
$2.50 IN PUB EDITION

Max Shulman's uproarious tale of the romantic misadventures of a relentless woman-chaser.



$3.95 IN PUB EDITION

Hilarious New Collection of jokes and anecdotes by America's favorite storyteller. 480 pages.



$10.00 IN PUB EDITION

Famed Modern Dictionary 2 vols. 80,000 entries, 700 pages, 896 illust'ns. Hundreds of new words!

$4.95 IN PUB EDITION

1,250 Delicious Recipes, 250 menus, 640 pages. Latest edition of most useful cookbook published!

$5.95 IN PUB EDITION

New 700-page Novel! Romance and adventure in Colonial America during the French & Indian Wars!

JOIN Doubleday's Dollar Book Club now and take advantage of the most generous offer made to new members in thirty years.

Select any 4 of the big-value books shown for only 99¢. Choose from new best-selling novels by top authors . . . big illustrated books . . . even two-volume sets. Many are newly offered for this anniversary event. Just think—a big book package with a total value of $10.44 to $50.00 in publishers' editions—yours for just 99¢, when you join the Club.

Members Save up to 75% on New Best-Sellers!

Imagine — best-seller selections costing up to $3.95 in publishers' editions come to Club members for only $1 each! Over the years the biggest hits by Ernest Hemingway, W. Somerset Maugham, Thomas B. Costain, Daphne du Maurier, Frank Yerby and others have come to Club members at this low $1 price. Occasional extra-big books also are offered at prices slightly above $1. All are new, full-size, full-length, hard-bound volumes.

An exciting new bonus plan offers other big savings too. But you buy only the books you want — and you don't have to take one every month. You may take as few as six $1 selections a year!

Send No Money Now — Just Mail the Coupon

Receive any 4 books in this offer for only 99¢, plus small shipping charge. This is your introductory package as a new member. Thereafter, you will receive the Club's Bulletin, which describes forthcoming $1 selections, and other book bargains for members.

No-Risk Guarantee: If not delighted with your introductory Four-Book bargain package, return all books and membership will be cancelled. Act now to accept this special anniversary offer — just mail the coupon!

Doubleday One Dollar Book Club, Garden City, New York

30th ANNIVERSARY OFFER · MAIL THIS COUPON

Doubleday One Dollar Book Club
Dept. LH-1, Garden City, New York

Send me at once the 4 books checked at the right and bill me only 99¢, plus a small shipping charge. Also enroll me as a Dollar Book Club member.

Include my first issue of The Bulletin describing the new forthcoming one-dollar selections and other bargains for members. I may notify you in advance if I do not wish the following month's selections. I do not have to accept a book every month — only six a year. I pay nothing except $1 for each selection I accept (plus a small shipping charge) unless I choose an extra-value selection at a somewhat higher price.

NO-RISK GUARANTEE: If not delighted, return all books in 7 days and membership will be cancelled.

Print Name .....

Address .....

City & Zone ..... State .....

Offer slightly different in Canada. Address 105 Bond St., Toronto 2
Offer good in Cont. U.S. & Canada only. D-380

Choose Any 4 for 99c:

- ☐ Thorndike-Barnhart Comp. Dictionary—set (9)
- ☐ America's National Capital (10)
- ☐ Taylor's Garden Guide (11)
- ☐ War and Peace (19)
- ☐ Life of Christ (21)
- ☐ Civil War in Pictures (23)
- ☐ Pictorial History of American Presidents (37)
- ☐ Parrish (44)
- ☐ The Laugh's on Me (47)
- ☐ Health Set—2 vols. (50)
- ☐ Columbia-Viking Desk Encyclopedia—set (66)
- ☐ Outline of History—set (82)
- ☐ Around the World in 2000 Pictures (97)
- ☐ The Modern Family Cook Book (74)
- ☐ Amy Vanderbilt's Everyday Etiquette (90)
- ☐ Garden Ideas and Projects (96)
- ☐ Kids Say the Darndest Things (105)
- ☐ Lorena (108)
- ☐ Grimm's Fairy Tales and Black Beauty—2 volumes (111)
- ☐ New Complete Hoyle (117)
- ☐ Family Book of Best Loved Poems (119)
- ☐ Illustrated Book of Wild Animals (125)
- ☐ Story of Bible World (127)
- ☐ Ladies' Home Journal Book of Interior Decoration (138)
- ☐ Station Wagon in Spain (141)
- ☐ Hammond Family Reference World Atlas (155)
- ☐ The Many Loves of Dobie Gillis (163)
- ☐ Ten Great Mysteries (164)
- ☐ The Young Titan (166)
- ☐ America's National Parks (220)

3 times more fresh beef protein

in one can of Red Heart than any dry dog food
...most canned dog foods

Red Heart comes in three tasty varieties: Beef, Beef-plus-Fish, Beef-plus-Liver!

BILL BAILEY

Down with Closets!

By ELINOR GOULDING SMITH

Author of The Complete Book of Absolutely Perfect Housekeeping and The Complete Book of Absolutely Perfect Baby and Child Care

One thing is certain: there are unsuspected depths in almost every closet. One other thing is also certain: more things can be removed from most closets than could ever possibly be put back in them.

No more than one article should ever be removed at one time from a closet, and that one should be replaced at the earliest possible opportunity, as otherwise the gap may close forever.

Some people, when taken by a sudden fit of cleaning or house painting, make the mistake of removing from a closet all its contents at the same time.

When this mistake occurs, several things are revealed to the rash closet cleaner.

The first thing is that for the first time it becomes altogether clear just exactly how deep that closet is. No one had previously suspected that it went back more than four feet, as entry had been possible only on hands and feet in the little space left under the coats. Now, as the things are removed one by one, instead of making a little pile on a bench in the hall as anticipated, they are overflowing into the living room, dining room, and are now slowly flowing up the stairs like a living glacier. This glacierlike flow, though slow, is inexorable and gradually continues up the stairs and encroaches on the bedrooms. It is a good idea to keep the attic door locked while cleaning out any downstairs closets.

When all the boots, rubbers and galoshes have been removed from the closet and the movie projector has been temporarily placed on the living-room couch, a ski suddenly comes into view. Now who in the world could that belong to? No one in this family has ever been near a ski, let alone on one. (I mean, after all, what's the point? We can break arms and collar bones and ankles without going to all that trouble. We do it all the time, right here at home.) And there's something nerve-racking in the discovery of one ski. Where in the world is the other one? Could it be lurking under one of the children's beds? Could it be in a kitchen cabinet? Might it be lying dangerously on a cellar stair? Has the dog eaten it? Is it snuggled under the couch cushions, point up?

Behind the ski there is a roller skate with a broken strap. It could fit only a child of four and there hasn't been a child of four around here for six years.

Behind the roller skate there is a pair of swim fins in excellent condition, and a busted tennis racket. And there's the car back rest! Isn't it too bad we just bought a new one?

I wonder if it's possible that the person cleaning out this closet is not the absolutely world's best housekeeper.

Now it is a simple matter to remove from the closet all the coats hanging there. We can just throw them down on the . . . on the . . . well, all right, take them upstairs and put them on daddy's bed—just for the moment, of course. Here are daddy's overcoats, and here are the boys' coats, and mommy's spring coat, and . . . well, for goodness' sake, look at this blue tweed coat! I lost that one years ago. It still looks pretty good, too, if you don't examine it too closely. It seems to have lost some of its fuzz. I wonder if there could be moths in this closet. There seem to be some dog hairs on it too. I wonder . . . no. She wouldn't do that. Would she? Have made herself a bed in it?

Now, as the front layer of coats is removed, it is gradually revealed to the startled closet cleaner for the first time that there is a second layer. It had long since been forgotten that there was a second clothes rod behind the first, and once—years, maybe even decades ago—someone (could it have been me?) neatly tucked away the winter clothing in the summer, or maybe the summer clothing in the winter. It's hard to tell now.

Somewhere along the line, in school maybe, you were taught that matter (and/or energy) can be neither created nor destroyed. Well, any closet cleaner can tell you that it's not true. Matter gets created all the time. How else, then, did that bird cage get in there? I did not put it there. I never saw it before in my life. I never even had a bird, let alone a bird cage to put it in. Oh. You mean that bird. That parakeet. We gave that one away. They brought back the cage when the bird died? Who put it in the hall closet, and why?

Now let's shut all the closet doors and KEEP THEM SHUT.

What is the purpose of life? END

THE WORLD'S LARGEST RECORD CLUB celebrates its 5th ANNIVERSARY with the greatest offer in its history

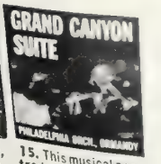
Limited time only!

8. Also: Let It Rain, Stairway to the Sea, Flame of Love, etc.

4. A Night on Bald Mountain, Steppes of Central Asia, etc.

2. Bess, You is My Woman Now; It Ain't Necessarily So; etc.

1. Also: Everybody Loves a Lover, Love Me or Leave Me, etc.



7. 1001 hi-fi delights. "...top-notch sound" — Billboard

38. Complete score of this Rodgers and Hammerstein hit

30. But Not for Me, Fascinatin' Rhythm, Man I Love, 9 more

15. This musical portrait is a beloved American classic

12. A brilliant new performance of this popular concerto

11. Also: Donkey Serenade, Don't Blame Me, etc.

13. "Musical excitement that's hard to beat" — Variety

45. A musical landscape..."spacious, noble"—High Fidelity

60. Malaguena, Fire Dance, Golliwog's Cake Walk, 10 more

21. "No symphony like it . . . incomparable"—Olin Downes

17. Pacific Sunset, Stella by Starlight, Yesterdays, 9 more

5. Tales from the Vienna Woods, Blue Danube, 8 others

16. "Hilarious . . . truly priceless comedy"—L.A. Examiner

20. Sweet Adeline, For Me and My Gal, Pretty Baby, 13 more

18. Also: Blessed Are They That Mourn, Come Ye Saints, etc.

6. Blue Moon, Fools Rush In, Don't Worry 'bout Me, 9 more

59. Where or When, April in Paris, Red Top, 8 others

41. Also songs by Price, Walker, Hart, Morgan, Frizzell, etc.

57. 12 hymns: Walk Over God's Heaven, Didn't It Rain, etc.

27. Complete score. "...practically flawless" — New Yorker

3. You Do Something to Me, When You're Smiling, 10 others

14. Rain in Spain, I Could Have Danced All Night, etc.

36. Superbly played by one of Europe's finest orchestras

37. Ebb Tide, If I Loved You, Unchained Melody, 9 others

9. Wild Man Blues, Fine and Mellow, I Left My Baby, 5 more

10. "Sure-fire Puccini . . . fine cast" — New York Times

50. All the fire and dash of this ever-popular ballet score

48. Tico-Tico, My Shawl, Besame Mucho, 9 others

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB offers new members of these $3.98 and $4.98 high-fidelity 12" long-playing records

ANY FIVE

FOR ONLY $1.97

RETAIL VALUE up to $24.90

if you join the Club now and agree to purchase as few as 5 selections from the more than 200 to be made available during the coming 12 months

40. One Kiss, Will You Remember, Song of Love, 9 more

52. Remember, Sweet and Lovely, No Greater Love, 9 more

62. Rags to Riches, Because of You, Sing You Sinners, 9 more

29. A superb recording of this enchanting dance drama

51. The Man I Love, Blue Room, Stardust, Am I Blue, 11 more

63. A thrilling performance of 4 sparkling folk melodies

35. Also: Please, Mr. Sun; Just Walkin' in the Rain; etc.

43. Solitude, Where or When, Dancing in the Dark, 6 more

32. Also: That's My Desire; Rose, Rose I Love You; etc.

34. Three of Beethoven's most popular piano sonatas

56. No, Not Much!; Moments to Remember; Istanbul; 9 more

58. Rodgers & Hammerstein's fabulous Broadway musical

47. Arioso, Air for the G String, Come Sweet Death, 5 more

39. The great Metropolitan tenor sings 12 Italian favorites

19. Autumn Leaves, April in Paris, La Vie en Rose, 13 more

24. Seven brilliant selections played by a great young pianist

Records for every musical taste!

CLASSICAL!
POPULAR!
DANCE MUSIC!
JAZZ!
BROADWAY HITS!

...a convenient method of acquiring, systematically and with expert guidance, a record library of the music you enjoy most — at truly tremendous savings!

To celebrate its 5th Anniversary, the Columbia Record Club now makes the most extraordinary offer in its history. As a new member, you may have ANY 5 of these high-fidelity records — up to a $24.90 retail value — ALL 5 for only $1.97.

And what a tremendous selection you have to choose from — 48 records in all! Whether you prefer classical or popular music, Broadway hit shows or jazz — you're sure to find five records to suit your musical taste.

TO RECEIVE YOUR 5 RECORDS FOR ONLY $1.97 — fill in and mail the coupon now. Be sure to indicate which one of the Club's four musical Divisions you wish to join: Classical; Listening and Dancing; Broadway, Movies, Television and Musical Comedies; Jazz.

HOW THE CLUB OPERATES: Each month the Club's staff of music experts selects outstanding recordings for all four Divisions. These selections are fully described in the Club's entertaining Music Magazine, which you receive free each month.

You may accept the monthly selection for your Division . . . take any of the wide variety of other records offered in all Divisions . . . or take NO record in any particular month.

Your only obligation as a member is to purchase five selections from the more than 200 Columbia and Epic records to be offered in the coming 12 months . . . and you may discontinue your membership at any time thereafter.

The records you want are mailed and billed to you at the regular list price of $3.98 (Classical and Original Cast selections, $4.98), plus a small mailing and handling charge.

FREE BONUS RECORDS GIVEN REGULARLY: If you wish to continue as a member after purchasing five records, you will receive a Columbia or Epic Bonus record of your choice free for every two selections you buy — a 50% dividend.

THIS SPECIAL 5th ANNIVERSARY OFFER may never be repeated! So act now — mail the coupon today!

SEND NO MONEY — Mail coupon to receive 5 records for $1.97

COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB, Dept. 203-2
Terre Haute, Indiana

I accept your special 5th Anniversary Offer and have circled at the right the numbers of the five records I wish to receive for $1.97, plus small mailing and handling charge. Enroll me in the following Division of the Club:

(check one box only)

☐ Classical ☐ Listening and Dancing ☐ Jazz
☐ Broadway, Movies, Television and Musical Comedies

I agree to purchase five selections from the more than 200 to be offered during the coming 12 months, at regular list price plus small mailing and handling charge. For every two additional selections I accept, I am to receive a 12" Columbia or Epic Bonus record of my choice FREE.

Name.....
(Please Print)

Address.....

City.....ZONE....State.....

ALASKA and HAWAII: write for special membership plan
CANADA: prices slightly higher; address 1111 Leslie St., Don Mills, Ont.
If you wish to have this membership credited to an established Columbia or Epic record dealer, authorized to accept subscriptions, fill in below:

Dealer's Name.....

Dealer's Address.....27

CIRCLE 5 NUMBERS:

1	13	30	47
2	14	32	48
3	15	34	50
4	16	35	51
5	17	36	52
6	18	37	56
7	19	38	57
8	20	39	58
9	21	40	59
10	24	41	60
11	27	43	62
12	29	45	63

Q-AC

® "Columbia," (P), "Epic," ® Marcas Reg. © Columbia Records Sales Corp., 1960

MORE THAN 1,000,000 FAMILIES NOW ENJOY THE MUSIC PROGRAM OF COLUMBIA RECORD CLUB, TERRE HAUTE, IND.

They're floppy--they're fabulous. They're ragged and soft and old-fashioned. That's Freestones for you. And these, dear reader, are some of the greatest Freestones you'll ever eat. For when it comes to peaches, Freestone fans and Del Monte see eye to eye:

we both put flavor first. We select Del Monte Freestones for their taste, not their looks. We choose syrup that brings out natural fruit flavor, instead of drowning it in sugary-sweetness. We honestly feel these Freestones are the closest thing yet to orchard-fresh peaches. Next time, take home Del Monte® Brand, for real Freestone flavor.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

MADONNA WITH FISH.
Marc Chagall's tender print of the innocent Mother and Child nuzzled by a petlike fish shows the combination of fantasy and insight that characterized the Expressionists' human approach to Biblical subjects.

ARE WOMEN BAD EMPLOYERS OF OTHER WOMEN?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

This question was suggested by responses I received from readers to an article that appeared in these pages in the September issue, entitled "The Remarkable Inefficiency of Efficiency."

In it I referred to the practical impossibility of obtaining full-time domestic help at a price that even a relatively well-to-do family can afford to pay; remarked that a "live-in" maid, counting together wages and living expenses, was better paid than many a college professor; and suggested that it is the snobbish social obloquy that attaches to domestic service that makes most girls and women shun it in America.

The article brought me numerous letters from women who are, or who have been, "live-in" maids, or otherwise engaged in domestic service. All, without exception, agreed that one of the most discouraging aspects of the life of a "maid" was the mere word describing her occupation. "It makes one a pariah," one woman wrote. Another told me that she had held for several years a position as a domestic in which she was very happy. She had been widowed, left with a small daughter, stayed with one family for several years, was well treated and appreciated, and was able to have her child with her. But when a man, a worker at that, asked her to marry him, he insisted that she give up that job and take another, because "I won't have my wife working in another woman's kitchen." The upshot was—since both needed to work—that she got a job in a grocery store and was separated from her child, though she could have continued by the day in her old position and kept her child with her.

A woman of admirable character who was housekeeper to a busy professional woman married a man from a small middle-class family, who wanted her to continue to work by the day to increase the family income. But her husband's family looked down upon her because, instead of working in a shop, she worked in a household, and they humiliated and depressed her. And it was the women among her in-laws who so humiliated her.

If an occupation is despised, those who practice it try to compensate in every other way for its disadvantages. They seek very high wages, want hours that are incompatible with the job; aware of the shortages caused by the low social status of the occupation, they exploit the fact and often feel no responsibility toward their employers; and so they make their own contributions to the so-called "servant problem."

I realize that the vast majority of American wives and mothers don't have domestic help. Yet nearly every middle-class family with children in the older civilized countries does have household help without problems like ours attending it. We would be a happier society if a larger proportion of our women could have part of their household burdens taken off their shoulders by another woman. Therefore, for those of us who have household help and for those who wish they could, it is worth while to consider some of the reasons why women, eminently fitted for it, prefer to do almost any other kind of work in this country.

Plainly, European women are more at home with servants and know better how to treat them. A greater clarity prevails about their tasks, and a warmer mutual feeling exists.

With the arrival of American Army families in Europe, thousands of American women had servants who had never had them before. Their European neighbors were shocked at the way they treated servants. Either they were too intimate or too demandingly rude—and often both. And there is, unhappily, an American tendency to believe that anything can be compensated for by sufficient money. According to the testimony of Europeans, many American women overpaid but greatly undervalued their employees, humanly speaking.

To what have those who have written me objected, apart from their social status and uneasy relationships?

Where they live in, they protest about their living quarters, and this is particularly true in big cities. "Anything is good enough for a maid's room," one woman writes. "Even in luxurious houses or apartments no attempt is made to make it comfortable or attractive."

"A catchall for the discarded furniture from the rest of the house." . . . "I had to make the curtains for my own room if I was to have any." . . . "A cubicle, not large enough for a regular-sized bed; one must

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Associate Editors: Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood, William McCleery, John H. Brenneman, Jean Todd Freeman, Nelle Keys Bell, Betty Coe Spicer, Neal Gilkyson Stuart
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Laura Lou Brookman, Hugh MacNair Kahler, Bernardine Kielty, Margaret Hickey, Gladys Denny Shultz, Barbara Benson
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Eileen Sharpe, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Elizabeth Hart, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, Liane Waite, Abbot Mills
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Dorothy Markinko, Jean Anderson, Joan Huse Cornog
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Hazel Owen, Helen Olchvary, Sally Platt, Mary Jane Engel, Grant Harris, Frances Johansson, Mary Lee Jones, Janet M. Boe, Kathleen McDonald, Jean McClory, Judith Harkison, Ann Blackmar

NOW-
TOTAL RELIEF FROM PERIODIC DISTRESS

Hospital-tested, prescription-type formula provides total treatment in a single tablet

ACTS INSTANTLY TO

- STOP CRAMPS
- ELIMINATE ACHES & PAINS
- CALM JUMPY NERVES
- OVERCOME DEPRESSION
- COMBAT PUFFINESS

NEW FEMICIN®
TABLETS

Worked even when others failed!

Now, through a revolutionary discovery of medical science, a new, prescription-type tablet provides total relief from periodic complaints. When cramps and pains strike, FEMICIN's exclusive ingredients act instantly to end your suffering and give you back a sense of well-being. If taken before pain starts—at those first signs of heaviness and distress—further discomforts may never develop. No simple aspirin compound can give you this complete relief. Get FEMICIN at your drugstore today! It must give you greater relief than you have ever experienced or your purchase price will be refunded.

For samples and informative booklet, "What You Should Know About Yourself As a Woman!", send 10¢ for postage and handling. Box 225, Dept. LH3, Church St. Sta., N.Y. 8, N.Y.

So effective—
yet no prescription needed!

THAYER

THROUGH RESEARCH . . . A BETTER PRODUCT

sleep on a day bed." . . . "If the living quarters are presentable, they are usually in a house out of town and no provision is made for the maid to get into town oftener than once a week. She is housebound and lonely. I was stuck in the house six nights a week."

These criticisms of living quarters are, in my personal experience, true. And I think it is a great failure of women that they have done nothing about it. Women join all sorts of uplift movements, but do not manage to find a solution for their own problems.

In New York City I have occupied, at various times of my life, three apartments. All were spacious, but in all of them one was supposed to house a domestic worker in what amounted to a cell. Just why, if floor space includes a living room 32′ long, a dining room 20′ square, and master bedrooms as large as the dining room, is a maid supposed to be accommodated in an area 7′x9′?

In my own case, in each of these apartments I had to rebuild the maid's room. To make two without closets habitable, I had to have closets custom-made to fit the space; in one case I had a carpenter make me a tall, narrow chest of drawers; lighting was a naked bulb from a ceiling cord, no outlet for a bedside lamp, rooms with little outside light; in one I could get in a writing surface only by installing a wide shelf under the window.

Three feet more added to these spaces would have made cubicles into rooms, and made it possible to furnish them with pretty department-store furniture instead of highly expensive built-in equipment.

Quarters for domestic help are usually ill placed for quiet. Almost invariably they open from pantry or kitchen, so that if a member of the family goes to get a snack at night he wakes up the occupant. And the live-in maid has nowhere to receive a caller except in the kitchen or one of these tiny rooms. Only the most luxurious apartments have sitting rooms for domestics.

There are thus hundreds of apartment houses where the builders have assumed that the tenants or owners would have live-in domestic help without making anything like civilized provisions for housing such help. It appears that such help is not respected by the architects, builders or owners. A part of a floor could be set aside for such a purpose, where employers could rent rooms, the help have one or two sitting rooms, and a kitchenette to brew up a cup of coffee if they pleased. There they could, at least, enjoy the companionship of other people.

For this is another thing that domestic help complains of: "We have no life of our own. We take a job, thinking that we can plan our work and hours, but it does not turn out that way. Madam expects us to be continually on call. She does not define our duties at the outset. We understand we are to keep a dwelling clean and in order, cook at least two meals a day and wash up afterward. Then we find that we are also supposed to do the shopping, and do it in person at the supermarket. Often madam has no idea about prices and complains if we spend too much. Yet she orders the meals. We are held responsible without being given responsibility. We are continually asked to do what requires the kind of organization and intelligence a woman uses in managing her own household and doing its work, but at the same time we are treated as though we did not have a brain in our heads."

In my article I had remarked the financial advantages of receiving a good wage together with untaxed room, food and utilities. One maid challenged the food. "I rarely get a decent meal. Madam diets and expects me to diet right along with her. Actually, she diets at home and goes out often for lunch, or with her husband for dinner. You would be surprised to know how many families save on food at home in order to have money to spend in more ostentatious ways."

Live-in maids complain that when a woman has only one maid she doesn't expect to share the work with her; she expects the maid to do everything that she would find altogether too much to do herself. If there are children, the maid is expected to do all the housework and look after the children as well. "I wouldn't live in again for any money," one woman writes.

Of course there are two sides to this story. A few years ago I was compelled to look for a new housekeeper-maid because one who had worked for me for nearly twenty years wished to retire.

Several agencies sent me applicants, and a great many more came in answer to an advertisement. I must have interviewed forty women and I would not have employed a single one of them.

I was seeking an employee to clean seven rooms on four floors in a New York house, and to wash in a modern laundry dish and bath towels that needed no ironing. No cooking was required.

Nearly half the applicants immediately said they wouldn't work in a house with stairs, though there were broom closets on every floor, an intercom telephone system and no need for climbing the stairs more than once or twice a day.

One applicant wanted it clear what she was to have for lunch: "Chicken one day, lamb chops, steak on others." I explained that my husband and I did not confine our meals to the most expensive meats and that she would have what we did; if she wanted to pick her own menus, the place was not for her.

The vulgarity and impertinence of most of these applicants were appalling.

But if so many inferior girls and women choose domestic service, is it not due to the fact that many who can do anything else prefer another occupation? And if this is true, is it not the fault, by and large, of the women who employ them?

Domestic workers have told me that they greatly prefer to work for professional women: "They have their own work, and give a domestic much more leeway to work out her own schedules and routines." . . . "In general, they are better employers. They know what it is to work for other people; they have more respect for work of any kind than women do who have never, themselves, worked for a living."

The women who induce hostile attitudes in their employees appear to despise housework as menial and low. Despite the fact that well over 90 per cent of all American women do all or most of the housework in their own homes, it is apparent that a large proportion of them have no respect for the tasks. How, then, can they respect those who perform them for their living?

I venture the suggestion that perhaps women still do not really like themselves and their status; that there exists in their subconsciouses, at least, a feeling of inferiority with its roots in the long centuries during which their marital and social position was, very definitely, inferior to that of men, and that this influences their attitudes toward other women.

Women today occupy positions of the highest importance and esteem and are to be found in every profession and branch of learning; but this is all a fairly recent development. It is only a little over a hundred years since women were admitted to any university; not fifty years have passed since they were granted the national vote—emancipated male Negro slaves had it before they did—and control over their own property also dates from modern times.

In many ways the transition from an agricultural to an industrial-technological society has borne adversely on women from the viewpoint of their status, and, I suspect, their happiness. When half of our people lived on largely self-sufficient farms, there was a natural division of labor between men and women, and in her own realm mother was a queen. The home was a beehive of industries that have now left it; households were large, usually with a grandmother, maiden or widowed aunt or sister to help; all meals were eaten together, the father and husband coming in from the fields, and life was not divided and compartmentalized as it is now.

In such communities women's work was where her children were; today the woman who works has to leave them to someone else—and has increasing difficulty finding anyone else with whom she feels they will be safe.

What the eventual solution will be is not difficult to guess. We shall probably move in the direction of public nurseries for even small infants. But perhaps the strongest single impression that I brought away from Russia three years ago was that Russian women, especially, were not very happy. Women are biologically and temperamentally less fitted than men for a completely collectivized society. It is alien to their natures.

For the avoidance of which they should, I think, be kinder and more considerate of one another, whatever the relationship may be.

END

"Alice, aren't you dressed yet?"

Sweet blooming "Night Blossoms"

another fabulous Wamsutta® exclusive!

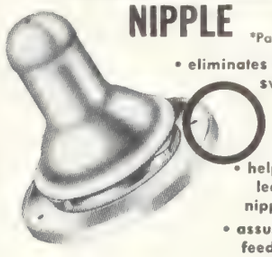
WAMSUTTA SUPERCALE® rains delicate night blossoms over the borders of this enchanting new fashion . . . a fitting complement for the sumptuous luxury of Supercale's super-silken finish. And now, during January, you can enjoy Supercale sheets in white, candy stripes and "Blossom Tones" at fabulous White Sale reductions.



WAMSUTTA DEBUCALE®. . . glamorous sister sheet to Supercale, high-count Debucale gives you famed Wamsutta luxury at a modest price . . . and during the January White Sales, you'll find wonderful reductions on whites and flattering "Complexion Tones."

WAMSUTTA MILLS, division of M. Lowenstein & Sons, Inc., 1430 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y., Also look for Wamsutta Heritage Towels, Babycale Crib Sheets, Blankets, Automatic Blankets, Mattress Pads and Covers, Pillows and Fashion Fabrics for Men, Women and Children.

NEW from evenflo

PERFECTED SURE SEAL* TWIN AIR VALVE NIPPLE

*Patent Pending

- eliminates excess air swallowing
- helps prevent leakage and nipple pullout
- assures perfect feeding action

Unique new Sure Seal feature makes this the greatest nipple advance in years! Raised-rim design locks nipple into place . . . helps prevent leakage . . . and assures perfect action of famous Twin Air Valves.

As a result, formula feeds continuously without spurts or stops . . . nipple collapse and excess air swallowing are eliminated . . . baby nurses with ease.

Only 10¢ at baby counters everywhere

Send for free Formula Preparation Booklet

All-New Evenflo Nurser 25¢ Complete. (With Nipple Cover 35¢) Also available in Super Plastic (44¢ with cover)

evenflo® RAVENNA, OHIO

More mothers use Evenflo than all other brands combined . . . according to independent surveys.

AWAIting a bundle of joy?

Keep Tums handy for those difficult days! When you're bothered by acid indigestion or heartburn, Tums bring fast relief. And Tums are high in calcium, too. Keep Tums handy – and keep smiling!

ECONOMICAL

get Tums
3-roll economy pack

Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAIN

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all – results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a world-famous research institute.

This substance is now available in suppository or ointment form under the name Preparation H®. Ask for it at all drug counters – money back guarantee.

"Some parents, including myself, have tried to make death seem not so threatening by saying that it is 'just like going to sleep.' This is risky, because a child may develop a dread of falling asleep, for fear he'll never wake."

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

Telling your child about death

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

SUZANNE SZASZ

Around the age of three or four, new fears begin to crop up. Fear of the dark, of fire engines, of dogs, of death.

"How do you explain death to a young child?" A number of mothers have asked this. Sometimes the occasion is the death of a distant grandparent or an acquaintance of the family. Or the question may come up when the child observes a funeral procession or a cemetery, or experiences the death of a pet.

I have never heard of an answer myself that could be relied on to prevent anxiety and misunderstanding.

Many religious parents are inclined to say, "He has gone to heaven," or "God has taken him away." Such answers may be satisfactory to a child of school age, who has heard enough about God and heaven on many occasions to have a fairly pleasant picture in his mind of a Good Man and a Nice Place. And by six years of age he is likely to have some philosophical acceptance of the inevitability of death and, at the same time, knowledge that it does not often carry away young people like himself.

But the child between two and five has, on the one hand, feelings that are quite easily disturbed and, on the other hand, little grasp of the everyday realities that would reassure the older child. You'll know what I mean if you've ever worried yourself sick in the middle of the night about some sin of your own or some danger to another person. Yet in the light of day you promptly lose 95 per cent of your fear and wonder how you could ever have become so foolishly panicky.

Young children are always in the dark in the sense that their inexperience, ignorance, lack of a sharp sense of what is real leave them at the mercy of their immediate feelings. Two-year-olds and three-year-olds and four-year-olds are curious, sensitive, imaginative. They feel strongly their dependence on their parents and are easily threatened by any danger of separation from them. The thought of going far away for good, or of being bodily taken away by angels or God—no matter how kindly these people are said to be—can be quite disturbing.

Though I started on the subject of explaining to a small child the death of another person, I've been talking as if it were the child's own death which was the issue. I didn't get sidetracked through absent-mindedness. The point is that a three- or four-year-old is at a stage of emotional development when he applies everything to himself, whether it's pleasant or unpleasant. When he sees a man driving a bus he forgets about the man and immediately imagines how it would feel to drive himself. He begins to act it out. When he sees a cripple he is promptly upset because he automatically identifies himself with the cripple. When he asks what a graveyard is for, and gets his first explanation of death, his next sentence is apt to be the frightened question, "Do I have to die?"

That's why it's so hard to explain to a young child about the death of someone else. As far as he is concerned, it's his death which is being discussed. Since he has a strong desire to remain alive, and to stay near his parents, it is impossible to describe death in such a way as to leave him entirely unperturbed.

Some parents, including myself, have tried to make death seem not threatening by explaining that very old people become so tired that they are glad to lie down and die peacefully, "just like going to sleep." This is partly futile, because a child can't possibly imagine being that tired. And it's a risky analogy because sometimes an anxious type of child will develop a dread of falling asleep, for fear he'll never wake up.

Isn't there any solution? Not, I think, in trying to find some neat or magical combination of words. But this is no cause for dismay in most cases. Everyday experience tells us that a majority of children have learned something about death by the time they are four or five, without appearing to be more than mildly and temporarily upset. They seem to make some kind of adjustment to the idea. This is partly accomplished by the processes of suppression or denial. You can see a child first asking worried questions. Then abruptly he becomes interested in something pleasant and his facial expression cheers up. The rest of the day he may seem unconcerned. Then, perhaps at bedtime, he suddenly declares, "I'm never going to die"—pretending that he can banish the danger with his resolution—or else he comes back to more of the anxious questions. Even in adulthood we try by the same methods to master or stave off what threatens to overwhelm us, though we usually aren't as successful in this as the small child. At any age, when a danger is too great to face the mind attempts to forget it for a while, but then comes back to it when reminded, and tries to master it, a bit at a time. This may happen during the day, but it's also the explanation of many nightmares.

The child who is intensely disturbed when he first learns about death, and who can't get it out of his mind for long, is the exception. Probably he has been an overly sensitive, overly dependent child from an earlier age. Perhaps he became chronically anxious back at the age of two, when his mother had to leave him suddenly for the first time for a couple of weeks and he despaired of ever seeing her again. Or perhaps his mother has always been a worrier about his safety and he has absorbed some of her anxiety—especially in regard to anything that might separate him from her. The child who does develop a phobia or obsession about death needs professional help, to untangle the background factors that have made him so susceptible to fears. In the course of investigation and treatment it often turns out that one of the main reasons why he worries so about his own safety is that he feels excessively guilty about his occasional angry feelings toward other members of the family and expects awful punishment for this.

The same thing applies to the child who has heard about a disease such as polio and develops a persistent dread of it. It's not that the disease was described to him in a mistaken way, but that he has a store of anxiety and guiltiness in his mind which happens to attach itself to a disease. This child with such a severe dread needs child-guidance help too.

So far I've been making the point that the exact manner in which death is explained is usually less important than the

CONTINUED ON PAGE 77

Fight Tooth Decay with Colgate Stop Bad Breath All Day!

. . I wouldn't deny my family Colgate with Gardol and its protection against tooth decay! HERE'S WHY...

Brushing with Colgate helps give you the surest protection in toothpaste history! Because of all leading toothpastes, only Colgate contains Gardol!

Colgate Dental Cream is backed by more research on tooth decay than any other toothpaste. Actual clinical research shows: In one year, those who used ordinary toothpaste averaged more than twice as many new cavities as those who used Colgate Dental Cream. 4 out of 5 who used Colgate Dental Cream developed no new cavities at all! Only Colgate, of all leading toothpastes, contains Gardol to form an invisible, protective shield around your teeth, to fight tooth decay all day.

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol stops mouth odor instantly, for most people. It cleans your breath while it cleans your teeth.

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol FIGHTS TOOTH DECAY ALL DAY!

NEVER GO TO BED WITH A COLD

...without Vicks VapoRub

Only the VapoRub way gives 10-hour "sleep-thru" relief in nose, throat, chest...works more than twice as long as aspirin or cold tablets

Don't wait for that sick cry in the night when your child has a cold. Make sure he gets all-night relief . . . not just the four-hour action of tablets.

Rub your child's chest, throat, neck and back with warming Vicks VapoRub at bedtime. Starts easing muscular soreness and chest tightness instantly. And for 10 full hours, penetrating vapor medications go straight inside stuffy head passages, inside sore throat, deep inside congested bronchial areas.

All night long, VapoRub works to clear away mucus, break up bronchial congestion, calm coughing . . . makes breathing easier. Helps your child sleep the night through and wake up feeling so much better next morning.

So for every cold . . . for every member of the family . . . never go to bed with a cold without . . .

Medicates cold-congested nose, throat, chest all at once...all night long. VapoRub's deep penetrating vapor medications start relieving in 7 seconds, keep on relieving for 10 full hours. And there's no internal dosing . . . no stomach or emotional upsets.

VICKS VAPORUB®
VAPORIZING OINTMENT

World's most widely used colds medication . . . use as a rub, in steam, in the nose.

LEGAL AID WITH A WOMAN'S TOUCH IN LOS ANGELES

For many a legal-aid client, the cost of a baby sitter can be almost as far out of reach as a lawyer's fee. In Los Angeles, Lawyers' Wives have provided a room where little ones can play and rest while mothers wait for an interview.

VOLUNTEERS CAN HELP

By MARGARET HICKEY

Every year thousands of men and women in this country need the help of a lawyer, but are unable to pay for it. Where can they turn?

Only those charged with crimes are likely to receive court-appointed attorneys (and this is uniform throughout the country only for crimes punishable by death.) But in civil cases there is no such provision. What happens to the wage earner hopelessly in debt following a period of illness, the mother seeking support for children of a disrupted home, the family facing eviction?

Perhaps the best source of help for people like these caught in a crisis is the legal-aid office. Often financed by united drives or voluntary gifts, these community organizations need the understanding and support of all citizens—not just of the lawyers. Legal aid becomes the organized effort of the community to provide legal counsel for people who, so often because of illness or unemployment, cannot employ an attorney.

Because of growing citizen concern (only 306 communities have legal-aid or defender offices, and 128 have committees of volunteer lawyers) groups such as the Los Angeles women whose work is described this month help in a number of cities.

In Oakland, California, another group of Lawyers' Wives brought about a survey of legal-aid needs in Alameda County which has led to greater financial support from lawyers and the community and an office staff increased from two part-time to three full-time lawyers. Wives paid for remodeled quarters so that clients no longer wait in a crowded hall, and the women help every day in the office. Last year some 1200 volunteers from all kinds of community groups—teachers, legal secretaries, business and professional women—worked indirectly but no less effectively for Legal Aid Society through a moneymaking Christmas Cargoes fair.

In New York City, volunteer service has come one step closer to the courtroom. In response to a request from Presiding Justice John Warren Hill, Red Cross trained volunteers help in the Children's Court. While parents wait for their cases to be called, children of all ages—unhappy, sometimes delinquent, often neglected—fill a crowded playroom. For some of them it is a stopover on the way to placement in schools or foster homes. A volunteer who speaks Spanish fluently helps probation officers take case histories; others help with the applications for assistance. But the job most sought is in the playroom where volunteers feed, diaper, rock, console and, most important of all, give tender loving care when children need it most. END

Doris Waters' face is still soft with youth, but there is a discouraged droop to her mouth. From her dark hair, clean but uncurled, to her small feet in inexpensive, high-heeled white sandals, Doris is weary. But it is not just the fatigue of a young mother tired out by three lively youngsters.

For four months Doris Waters has had no word from her divorced husband, now living out of the state, and no money. Without the child-support payments ordered by the court, she has fallen behind in the rent and the grocery bill. Her only belongings are the pieces of furniture, valued at $75, in her two-room flat. She is unable to provide proper care for the children. Is there any way, she wonders desperately, that their father can be made to help?

Now, in the blue-walled playroom of the Legal Aid Foundation of Los Angeles, Doris feels an unfamiliar rush of hope. Handing her chubby three-year-old a toy, Doris leads five-year-old David toward a blackboard, holds her youngest in her arms. Only this morning a neighbor told her about Legal Aid, suggested she come here for help. Not quite believing the hope, but not disbelieving it either, Doris looks over the filled waiting room, listening for her name to be called.

For Doris Waters is just one of thousands of Los Angeles men and women for whom the specialized advice and service of a lawyer would be completely out of reach if there were no Legal Aid. In this law office (supported by Welfare Federation funds) a client's eligibility depends on his inability to pay for legal assistance, as well as on the urgency and nature of his problem. Although not all can be accepted as clients (divorce suits, for instance, are taken only after very careful consideration, and needy criminal cases belong in the Public Defender's office), everyone who comes is seen at least once by a lawyer.

And come they do. From before nine until after four, five days a week, the foundation's waiting room—plain, high-ceilinged, rimmed with straight wooden chairs—is never empty. Referred by social agencies, lawyers, friends, employers, police, county welfare and probation workers, close to 90 people daily, as many as 125 on a Monday, wait here (some of them for four or five hours) for their chance to talk to an attorney.

With a paid staff of only six or seven lawyers and four office workers, the Legal Aid Foundation is hard-pressed to provide the service these people seek. Women volunteers, who type, file, register, man the switchboard and reception desk, know that if a single one of them fails to show up the whole process of legal aid will be slowed. Even with their assistance and the work of law students (who receive school credit), every day at Legal Aid is a busy day.

And in that unavoidable busyness (16,000 clients last year, many requiring more than one interview) the half-hoping people like Doris Waters can sometimes feel they have lost their way. Although the volunteers—most of them from Lawyers' Wives of Los Angeles, at least one from Junior League—are not often familiar with the full details of individual cases, they know that these men and women, requiring legal assistance primarily, need plain kindness and sympathy too. They see that as part of their job.

Perhaps the Legal Aid playroom best shows the women's gift of feminine warmth and insight. The outgrowth of Mrs. Milton A. Krug's dismay that youngsters had to wait long hours with their parents and hear the details of their problems, it provides a pleasant place where children can play while the mother or father is with a lawyer.

"They don't always stay there," Martha Krug, a former Legal Aid chairman for Lawyers' Wives, admits. "Some parents won't leave their children. But we don't try to force them to. Many of these are very insecure, mixed-up people who don't want to be told what to do or be pushed around."

Lawyers' Wives do not question the value of this room when they think of the mother whose four youngsters all needed fresh diapers, the tiny babes in arms whose milk can now be heated in the bottle warmer; when they see the bassinet, the high chair, the rocking horse in daily use.

As much as humanly possible, the women show that they care through courtesy and smiles and patience in all their dealings with the clients. It is not always easy. Switchboard another Mayflower customer reports:

"All settled the very next day . . ."

". . . Everything came through in such wonderful shape on our move from Knoxville, Illinois to Long Beach, California! If we were moving again we would certainly call Mayflower."

Your new home is quickly livable when you move the Mayflower way. Courteous, thorough, accredited Mayflower movers lay rugs, assemble beds, lamps, unpack your dishes if you wish—put everything in place, just the way you want it!

You can rely on Mayflower, too, for the finest protection for all your goods . . . even the most fragile. Mayflower movers are trained and equipped for damage-proof packing, handling and loading. For prompt pick-up, delivery, and safe, trouble-free moving—just call your local Mayflower warehouse agent!

AERO MAYFLOWER TRANSIT COMPANY, INC., INDIANAPOLIS

America's Most Recommended Mover

Your Mayflower agent is a leading warehouseman in your city. He explains service, estimates costs, makes all arrangements. Find him under "Moving."

world-wide service

In all 50 states and Canada . . . overseas by ship or plane . . . our responsibility all the way!

new, higher standard of service

Only Mayflower men are "accredited"—qualified and kept up-to-date by special study, training, and tests.

exclusive, "packed with pride" service

Safeguards all your items, even the most fragile, with special Mayflower methods and materials.

operators—careful never to cut off a caller because "it may be literally his last dime"—must pacify the impatient seeking to have "just one little question" answered. "Well, look," a caller may insist, "all I wanta know is why they're suing me. They took back the car and took the furniture. How come they're after me?" Martha Krug remembers the man, dissatisfied with the only information volunteers may give—the address and hours—who growled, "You can be replaced, you know," and slammed down the receiver.

Receptionists, their desk set in the waiting room, must soothe the angry and troubled who say they cannot wait any longer, cope with those who forget their identification cards or, out of confusion or design, use different names on each visit.

Often, however, the hardest task is to face a client's despair. Registrars, who collect the registration fee—$1.00 for those able to pay—and type up docket cards, find that the question "Why are you here?" may release a heartbreaking flow of words and emotion. Volunteer Ann Baranger, tall, attractive young mother of two, says, "I sit there and pray, 'Please don't cry, please don't cry.'" But it is to the registrar—"the first listener"—that the thin, drooping woman repeats the words she cannot believe: "Get out or I'll throw you out." It is to the registrar that the nineteen-year-old, her fingers bare of rings, her eyes ablink with starting tears, says, "It's about an annulment . . . I—I don't know where he is."

With a quiet voice, an understanding look, a proffered box of tissues, the registrar calms her, tactfully points out that private details should be saved for an attorney.

The Wives convey their concern in other ways too: through the magazines they bring to the waiting room; through the games, candy, toys they keep on hand for children. Their small emergency fund has provided meals and carfare for a mother and five children who hitchhiked all night to reach the Legal Aid office. Pleasanter surroundings and speedier office procedures have been made possible by fresh paint, lighting fixtures, new desks and chairs, duplicating machines, the switchboard purchased with the $11,454 they have given. They have placed $9,823 in a building fund for future use.

Most basic evidence of the Wives' feelings are the more than 25,000 hours of volunteer work given since 1952—a contribution which allowed Legal Aid to handle a case-load increase of 25 to 30 per cent in those years, at a time when Welfare Federation allotments were unable to keep up with the needs of a booming population.

Current Legal Aid chairman Mrs. A. J. Bernhardt speaks for the corps of 75 active workers when she insists, "We get far more out of volunteering than it costs us." A handsome woman of thirty-nine, her short-cut black hair barely salted with gray, Lorraine Bernhardt laughs with delight as she remembers Mrs. L____, a plump little widow, caring for three youngsters on $62 a week, who bounced up and down with excitement when told that the suit against her had been settled in her favor. "She kept hitting her hands against the edge of the desk, saying, 'You mean we won? We won?' . . . By working here," Lorraine continues, "we come much closer to understanding law and lawyers—including our husbands—and how demanding a client can be."

Most important of all, the women learn that protecting the rights of the individual is not just airy idealism. In practice, it means dealing with very real, pressing and even sordid human problems, which often cannot be fully solved by legal remedy. It can be frustrating work.

Yet the call to ensure the rights of "people—just people" is so compelling that there are lawyers, volunteers and judges who worry deeply because the foundation can meet only 50 to 60 per cent of the need. With the continued help of Lawyers' Wives, and with a steadily growing public understanding of legal aid which they are fostering, Chief Counsel Edwin F. Franke looks hopefully to the day when "we can fulfill our debt to the community by seeing that all needy people have legal representation when they stand before the Bar of Justice." END

ALWAYS THE WOMEN

By PAUL ENGLE

There were the admirals who sailed,
The booted cavalry who yelled,
Crooks and thieves the country jailed
(Their mugs and morals smelled);

The bum, the handsome buck, the bold
Wandered the land, and cussed and prayed,
Rode in the sun, trudged in the cold.
Always the women stayed:

Ladies who sewed a dainty stitch
And bore their child by the wolf's howl,
Some wild ones, too, who scratched their itch
And talked with the wild owl;

The scared who screamed in the log hut
When twigs broke under the brown deer,
But dyed their skirt with butternut
And bore the barbarous fear;

All those whose summer-haunted cries
Were the hysteria of glad,
For when the white snow beat their eyes,
Their minds went white and mad;

Those who, hearing the red night make
The whoop of horror, still could shake
The heavy-sleeping child awake
With courage like an ache,

Could stand with husband at the door
Holding all night the heavy gun,
Until there slashed across the floor
The scalping knife of sun;

From wild grape climbing on the oak
They made the jelly, blue and tart,
Boiled maple sap above its smoke,
And broiled the elk's broad heart;

Now some were sharp of nose and tongue,
Some solid as a walnut stump,
Some narrow as a ladder rung,
And some were pumpkin-plump.

Whatever natural shape and sound
Combined to make each one a woman,
They walked across this savage ground
And made old nature human.

Always the women could persuade
Bears from a tree, men from damnation;
In deerskin, gingham or brocade
Gave a new house its consecration;

By calloused finger gently laid
Over the fevered eye's dilation,
By being women here, they made
A child-delighting nation.

Always these Western landscapes wore
Women around them like a dress.
Always these Western women bore
The touch of earth like a caress.
Always they move on to explore
Love's fearful wilderness.

Homemade Coffee Cake. Marvelous texture! And the delicious cinnamon topping comes right in the package!

Perfect Corn Bread. This is the tender, non-crumbly kind. Never dry, never sticks to the pan!

Spicy Oatmeal Bread. For variety add fruits or nuts—make Date Bread, Nut Bread, and other delicious party loaves.

WE PAY YOU $1.00

Just to try these wonderfully different

3 NEW MIXES!

Until you've enjoyed the fun, the freedom from muss and work these mixes bring you, you can't know how much better they are than ordinary mixes.

So we make this unusual offer: Try all three new Easy-Mixes, then mail us the 3 labels with your name and address, and we'll mail you $1.00!

Address Gift Dollar, Dept. A-150, Box 6015, Chicago 80. Offer expires March 30, 1960. Void where restricted, prohibited or taxed.

MIXED IN SECONDS...
no bowls or pans to wash!

Each mix carries its own mixing bag and baking pan so that you don't even wash a bowl or a pan! Each mixes in seconds. Each gives picture-pretty results—spicy oatmeal bread . . . homemade cinnamon coffee cake . . . perfect corn bread. Try all three and mail in the labels for your Gift Dollar soon.

Aunt Jemima Easy-Mixes

FLYING TO EUROPE IN 1960? "Start planning now! TWA can help with all your exciting preparations for your wonderful Jet flight abroad," says Mary Gordon, TWA Travel Advisor

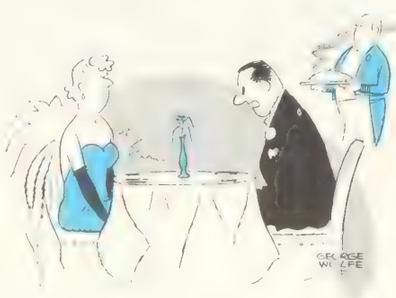
This is the year to fly to Europe! Now the swift TWA Intercontinental Boeing 707 Jetliner whisks you nonstop from New York to historic London in just 6 hours and 25 minutes. To exciting Frankfurt, captivating Paris, or romantic Rome in just a little longer. You spend less time in the air, have more time over there! What's more, you enjoy low, low TWA Economy Fares and you can take months to pay with the TWA Time Pay Plan.

So don't wait—set a date! Early planning assures you of Jet reservations and your choice of the finest accommodations abroad. And besides—part of the fun of your great adventure in Jet Age travel is getting ready for it! So why not see your travel agent or write your nearest TWA office now? And for scores of helpful travel hints, mail this coupon today!

FLY TWA
USA · EUROPE · AFRICA · ASIA

Mary Gordon—Dept. L 1-60
TWA Travel Advisor
Trans World Airlines
380 Madison Ave., N.Y. 17



☐ Basic Travel Wardrobes
☐ Skyliner Tours of Europe
☐ Shopping Abroad

Please send me FREE the folders checked.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Two forks! This is going to cost money!"

Our family discovers that a meal in front of the fireplace is the wintertime equivalent of a picnic in the patio in the summertime: but cozier, and also mosquito-free.

Our neighbor next door who used to complain that his college sons wore all his clothes now confides that he's glad to wear theirs on gala occasions.

My Dream Girl got a bit moist-eyed when we went to a campus beauty's wedding at the state university. Her sorority sisters sang on the front lawn as she brought her bridegroom from the church for the reception. I blinked myself.

"As long as women insist on wearing open-toed and open-heeled shoes on a slushy day like this," argues our lunch-table sage, taking off his rubbers, "they can't expect to elect a female President."

Our town's stingiest millionaire complains that his wife hides the daily grocery bills in kitchen drawers. "She doesn't want me," he grumbles, "to see what the meat costs."

"If Walter Lippmann and Marquis Childs can have cork-lined soundproof rooms," meditates the young father of five across the road, "then I need one also."

At the bridge table, our wives assert that husbands who help wash the dishes live longer. "It's so relaxing for a man," they argue. All I can say in rebuttal is that to watch your wife washing 'em is even more relaxing.

Our youngest cherishes, as the finest memento of his visit to the Brussels Fair last year, the Praeger volume of 337 pictures of the paintings there exhibited. Especially because Praeger once worked at an oil station in our town.

I gave my Glamour Girl an exotic Christmas present: a gigantic tridacna shell, from the Marshall Islands via Honolulu, to use as a birdbath in our patio. (My brother-in-law bought a smaller one for a salad bowl!)

How do the phone companies teach their operators to speak so seductively? A plain girl's quickest path to enchantment is a voice like a blend of lullaby, flute and hypnosis; it beautifies.

One of our town's tenderer husbands says he often loves his wife strongest during one of their semiweekly quarrels. "She seems so angry and pathetic," he says, "she tugs at my heartstrings."

We shook hands with the Khrushchevs during their visit, and reached two conclusions: that (1) he hasn't chopped much wood lately, and (2) she does far more to disarm suspicion than he does.

On the assumption that feminine curiosity knows no limits, our town's do-gooders are scheming for a winter tour of twelve select kitchens and bathrooms, at $1.25 or $2 a ticket.

Brooding over last summer's mosquitoes, we've hit on a bright idea: a squirt pistol for each picnicker or patio guest, loaded with bug spray, so they can spray each other. Who doesn't love to squirt a pistol?

One of our deep masculine thinkers has it figured out that a girl ought to weigh two pounds for each inch of height: six-footer, 144 pounds. "Do you mean I should weigh one hundred and twenty pounds?" cried a five-foot girl indignantly. "Never!"

I've never been able to relinquish my old neckties until my wife began to give 'em to church bazaars to auction off. Now I can rid myself of even the most sentimental mementos of girls of long ago.

My Glamour Girl has sicked two London and Dublin tailors on me; they want to make me suits. But I'm not too sure Englishmen are the world's best-dressed men. Their clothes often seem tight, short and skimpy, as if inherited from a somewhat smaller relative.

We visited the newest brave-new-world supermarket in our town, and a chill wind seemed to blow out of the gigantic future. Yet two things cheered me: doughnuts with potato flour, and onion-flavored bread.

I've received a letter adorned with a sticker: "Honor Grandmotherhood!" Yeah. But can't it be shortened to "Honor Gram!"? (And they mustn't forget gramp either.)

Teachers and professors continue to assure me that few students with straight A grades drive their own cars to high school or college. Maybe the A students will acquire their sports cars later?

You can't find real folksy folks anywhere except on farms and in villages, argues Roswell Garst, the wealthy farmer, host to Kh. I'd like to argue that with him; town and city folks can (I'm sure) be just as folksy.

We were honored one day by a surprise visit from Adlai Stevenson at our old homestead. But a career gal monopolized the talk and lectured him on politics. (I must study a technique for rudeness to such people.)

I'm glad they've quit paddling the freshmen pledges at dorms and fraternity houses. An equally drastic punishment would be to force 'em to hang up their clothes, and even the clothes of the upperclassmen.

How must one handle the problem of a barking dog, which wakes you at midnight and 6 A.M.? If you phone the owner he resents it. His children hate you. His wife scowls. Sometimes it seems simpler to shoot the dog.

Ah, a minor triumph! I've contended that bits of toast spread with peanut butter might make good appetizers with cocktails. But my Dream Girl scoffed at my plebeianism. And then we encountered peanut-butter hors d'oeuvres at a fancy cocktail party.

. . . When our oldest grandchild's promoted to kindergarten and becomes a team man,

. . . Or Harlan III climbs a tree at 2½ and tells a baby sitter to go home,

. . . And our daughter-in-law reveals she's learned 100 words of Japanese,

. . Or our son-in-law praises my twenty-year-old tweed jacket,

Then I'm glad I never followed my bachelor whim to emigrate to Turkey and acquire a harem.

Steak-and-Potato Supper

Pour on Hunt's Tomato Sauce, pop it in the oven . . . here's "meat-and-potatoes" a delicious new way

This hearty dish tastes as good as it sounds!

Juicy, browned pieces of round steak, appetizing casserole-roasted potatoes. And extra flavor goodness that comes from a rich red glaze of Hunt's Tomato Sauce.

Hunt's is what makes this a brand new dish, even though it's fixed with familiar meat and potatoes. Its special spicy character blends and betters the meaty flavor. Gives it color and appetizing aroma, too.

Hunt's Tomato Sauce works like this in your cooking because it's all tomato. No fillers to block the flavor. And just the right spices and seasonings added.

Hunt's comes already kettle-simmered to a rich sauce consistency—a natural for making hamburgers, fish, pot roasts, or even leftovers taste extra good.

Try it! And for your next "meat-and-potatoes" meal, serve your family Steak-and-Potato Supper. Easy to make—with Hunt's Tomato Sauce.

1½ lbs. round steak, cut into serving-size pieces
⅓ cup flour 4 tablesp. fat
4-6 small potatoes, peeled;
or 2 to 3 larger potatoes, cut in half 1 small onion, chopped
2 tablesp. chopped parsley
½ teasp. salt ⅛ teasp. pepper
2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce

Dredge steak in flour. Brown well on both sides in hot fat. Place meat in a 1½-quart casserole. Pour off excess fat. Scrape up browned drippings left in pan and add to meat. Arrange potatoes with meat. Sprinkle onion, parsley, salt and pepper over all and add Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Cover and bake in moderate oven (350°F.) for 1½ hours. Makes 4 generous servings.

Hunt-for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "Easy One-Dish Meals." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-1, P.O. Box 5, Fullerton, California. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ont.

New
Betty Crocker
Country Kitchen Recipe
Cake Mixes
8 delicious flavo
NEW Country Kitchen Recipe
Betty Crocker
Devils Food
NEW Country Kitchen Recipe
Betty Crocker
Black Walnut
NEW Country Kitchen Recipe
Betty Crocker
Marble Cak

A NEW MOISTURE SECRET makes our Country Kitchen Recipe Cakes taste as fresh and moist tomorrow as the day you bake!

We've found a new softer flour, a new finer sugar, a new rich, creamy shortening . . . and a new way to pre-cream all these good ingredients. It all makes our new cake mix bake up into a just plain good country kitchen kind of cake . . . a cake as rich and moist as grandmother's best butter cake!

And it's one-step-easy. You pour everything into the bowl at once—your cake mix, eggs and water. The batter fluffs up thick and rich in just four minutes—ready to bake up a richer, moister, more tender cake than ever before. Bake one for your family tonight, why don't you?

Good cooks say:

"Never thought a cake mix could taste so good . . . and stay so fresh!"

"My neighbor couldn't believe I'd baked yesterday morning—the cake tasted that fresh and moist!"

"My husband says now my cakes taste even better than his mother's homemade cakes!"

As rich and moist as homemade butter cake . . . tastes as fresh and moist tomorrow as the day you bake! That's our Country Kitchen Cake—we guarantee it on every package!

Betty Crocker

PRIZE RECIPES

3 new ideas for different stews

1. BEEF STEW BOURBONNAIS 2. LAMB CURRY 3. SUEY SUPREME

Stew is stew in any language . . . and wonderful, too! To the French, it's "ragout." Hungarians call their veal-and-vegetable medley "guylas," and the Irish love their "Mulligan." In fact, every country has its own version. Here are three terrific ones, for which Heinz chefs have already done much of the work.

• Wonderful new Heinz Concentrated Tomato Juice, tender-pressed from choice California tomatoes, furnishes the base for Lamb Curry (India's favorite). Beef Stew Bourbonnais, laced with wine and subtly tinged with herbs, gets a savory boost from rosy, flavorful Heinz Ketchup. And creamy, expertly seasoned Heinz Cream of Mushroom Soup blends its richness with the bamboo shoots, bean sprouts and other good things in a Suey Supreme that's as Chinese as chopsticks.

BEEF STEW BOURBONNAIS

—Mrs. Frank Ellis, Northampton, Mass.

Brown 1½ lbs. beef chuck, cut in 1-inch cubes, in 1 Tbs. shortening. Add 1 clove garlic, minced, and 1 medium onion, chopped. Sauté until onion is transparent. Add ½ tsp. salt and ⅛ tsp. pepper. Stir in 1 can Heinz Tomato Soup, undiluted, ¾ cup dry red wine and ¼ cup water. Cover; simmer 30 min. Add ¼ tsp. each basil and thyme, ½ cup thick, wonder-working Heinz Ketchup. Arrange 3 medium carrots, cut in ½-inch pieces, 1½ cups celery, cut in 1-inch pieces, and 4 medium potatoes, pared and quartered, on top. Cover; simmer 1½ to 2 hours. (Makes 6 servings.)

LAMB CURRY

—Mrs. Arleen Kauffman, San Lorenzo, Calif.

In a stew pan combine 2 lbs. cubed lamb shoulder, 1 cup water, ½ cup Heinz Ketchup, a 6¼-oz. can new, fresh-tasting Heinz Concentrated Tomato Juice, undiluted, 1 medium orange, thinly sliced, 1 clove garlic, minced, 1 medium onion, sliced, 1 tsp. salt, 2 chicken bouillon cubes, ½ cup seedless raisins, 2 pared, cored apples, sliced, ½ tsp. powdered ginger, 2 tsp. curry powder, 2 Tbs. brown sugar. Cover. Simmer 2 hrs., stirring occasionally. Serve over rice. (Makes 6 to 8 servings.)

SUEY SUPREME

—Mrs. Loren Herman, Rochester, N.Y.

Brown 1 lb. round steak, cut in 2-inch strips, in 1 Tbs. shortening. Add a 5-oz. can diced bamboo shoots, drained, 1 medium onion, chopped. Sauté until onion is transparent. Stir in 1 can Heinz Cream of Mushroom Soup, undiluted, 1 chicken bouillon cube, dissolved in ¾ cup hot water, 2 tsp. perky, flavor-boosting Heinz Worcestershire Sauce, 2 tsp. sugar, 1 cup celery, cut in 1-inch pieces. Simmer, covered, 45 min. Add ½ cup drained bean sprouts, 1 cup shredded fresh spinach. Simmer 10 min., uncovered. Serve with crisp noodles. (Makes 5 servings.)

Liven cold-weather vegetable dishes (canned or frozen spinach or peas, for instance) with this Spring Vegetable Sauce: in top of double boiler combine 1 cup grated process American cheese, ⅓ cup milk, 1 tsp. rich, zesty Heinz 57 Sauce. Heat, stirring occasionally, until cheese melts. Serve over cooked vegetables. (Makes ⅔ cup of delicious sauce.)

Meat balls are extra tempting fixed this way: combine 1 lb. ground beef, 1 tsp. salt, ½ cup Heinz Hamburger Relish (peppy blend of chopped pickles in tomato sauce). Form into 16 meat balls. Brown in skillet. (Makes 4 to 5 servings.)

$100 for recipes. Send us your recipe using any Heinz product. If we use it in our advertising, we'll pay you $100. All recipes become property of H. J. Heinz Co. None can be returned. In case of duplicate recipes, only the first one received will be considered. Send to H. J. Heinz Co., Box 23, D-LHJ-10, Pittsburgh 30, Pa.

You know it's good because it's

Heinz 57

©1959, Dorothy Gray, Ltd.

Look younger in 60 seconds–years younger in 3 weeks with Satura!

Instantly, your skin feels softer, fresher—with fabulous Satura. And when you've used it for just 3 weeks, at night and under make-up, you can see positive, cumulative results. Satura is rich in revitalizing elements known to reduce the signs of aging. It contains an amazing 10,000 Int. units per ounce of estrogenic hormones to plump up your skin for that firmer, younger look... Vitamin A to guard against flaking and dryness... and special emollients for dewy softness. Start today with Satura and see the younger difference! Cream $3.50 & $5. Lotion $3. & $5.

Dorothy Gray

TO MAKE EVERY BEAUTY AID MORE EFFECTIVE, CLEANSE NIGHT AND DAY WITH DOROTHY GRAY SALON COLD CREAM

IS HIS JOB YOUR RIVAL?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

HE'S MARRIED TO HIS WORK!

"How much loyalty does a man owe to his company, and how much to his wife and family? Doesn't a wife ever have first claim on her husband's time, or must she always put aside her own plans if the company beckons? My husband is an engineer with a research firm, a junior executive earning a lot more money than we expected at this age. (He's thirty-two.) Naturally I'm proud of his success, but I'm not sure it's worth it.

"Rush jobs are the usual thing, and when one comes along Howard takes it for granted that his evenings and weekends belong to the company. I wouldn't complain—I hope!—about an occasional late-afternoon call saying we'd have to cancel a casual movie date, but what about elaborate plans made long in advance, and involving other people?

"Last week brought the biggest disappointment yet. More than a month ahead, we'd made arrangements with another couple to celebrate my thirtieth birthday with an evening out—dinner and a show, a dress-up affair. Baby sitters were engaged, everything was set. That morning Howard said he might be tied up with a rush job, and I'd better break our engagement. But I just passed it off, saying he couldn't stand me up this time. Just about when he should have been coming in that night, he called to say he had to work, but for me to go ahead and have a good time.

"I went, but of course I didn't have a good time. Howard wasn't even home when I came in, and I cried myself to sleep. I was more hurt than angry. Next day he said he'd hated to disappoint me, but it seemed better than holding up half a dozen other people on the job. He promised it wouldn't happen again, but I know the next time a rush job comes along, he'll be right in there pitching.

"Let's face it. The real question is whether his job is more important to him than his wife and family. He's a good husband and father, and I know he loves me, but his job is my rival."

This wife's situation is not uncommon. Many wives must put up with long, lonely evenings while their husbands work late at factory or office, or are away from home on business trips. But the understanding wife recognizes that her husband's long hours are a hardship for him as well as for her. He is not seeking personal pleasure or gratifying a selfish whim. His working hours are regulated by inherent requirements of his profession or business, as in the case of a doctor or traveling salesman; by the demands of his employer or customers; and by his own conscience, self-respect and natural desire to get ahead.

The real question is not whether a husband's job or his home and family are more important to him, but how the separate and sometimes conflicting needs of both can be met without undue cost to either. The wife must remember that her husband's job maintains their home, provides for the family and made the marriage possible; it behooves her as well as him to recognize the company's claims.

At the same time the considerate husband will do his utmost to prevent his job from interfering with the needs and reasonable wishes of his wife. For instance, when plans are made for an important family event, the wise husband will explain the situation to his superior in advance, and will ask to be excused from special assignments on that date. Almost certainly his request will be granted. No doubt Howard had this approach in mind when he assured his wife that a similar disappointment would not occur again.

If you feel that your husband's work interferes unduly with your family life, the first step toward improvement is to talk it over with him, calmly and cheerfully but freely and frankly. Perhaps he hasn't been aware of the depth of your disappointment. Perhaps you haven't understood the justification for the company's demands on him.

Every self-respecting man wants to make a creditable record in his chosen field. Every conscientious wife wants to help him achieve that record. She cannot do it by resisting, resenting, and complaining about his devotion to his job.

Ask his co-operation in devising ways to share himself more fully with you and the family. If he doesn't respond, or if you still aren't satisfied, analyze your personal relationship to see what is wrong. Is your attitude realistic? Do you keep him under pressure financially? Are you thoroughly familiar with the nature of his responsibilities? The key to your problem and its solution may lie within you rather than in your husband's job.

WHAT WOMEN WANT FROM MEN

It was a wintry day when this young wife came in. She glanced out the window and said, "I feel as dreary as the weather. And after only eleven months, our marriage is just as dreary. Jim is intelligent and conscientious, and I hope I am, and we both want our marriage to succeed. But as of now, we're disappointed and not too hopeful. It's not that we have big problems; it's more as if we weren't temperamentally suited to each other or maybe to marriage. What are the personal qualities that make a happy marriage? It can't all be luck. Maybe if we knew what to work for, the future wouldn't look so dark."

There is ample reason to hope that this young woman's future will be brighter, because she is not putting all the blame on her husband, and is willing to work for improvement. In answer to her question, we can cite some of the major personality traits and attitudes which research shows to be associated with married happiness. You will notice that they are not identical for men and women. The traits that typify the man who makes a happy marriage are:

Emotional maturity. The emotionally mature individual is stable, responsible, willing to face facts, able to maintain self-control under stress. The most favorable environment for developing emotional maturity is a happy home under the guidance of affectionate parents.

Fair-mindedness includes tolerance, honesty, understanding of the principle of give and take; it is fortified by a sincere belief in the values of marriage.

Companionability means the capacity to share ideas, thoughts and particularly feelings. It is not found in individuals who are selfish, irritable, hypersensitive or asocial.

Considerateness, regarded by many wives as the most desirable trait in a husband, is expressed by kindness, co-operativeness and affection; it reflects mutual understanding.

Sociability is reflected by ease in meeting people and making friends, willingness to participate in social and community activities. However, even a sociable husband wants his wife to take some of the responsibility for their social life.

Integrity reflects sincere devotion to a code of ethics, values and ideals. The man of integrity governs his actions by his code, rather than by impulse, personal preference or expediency.

These are the outstanding characteristics of husbands who have achieved happy marriages. Below we list the comparable and complementary qualities that distinguish the happy and successful wife.

Role acceptance. No matter how career-minded she may be, the happy wife is a woman who voluntarily and by preference makes her first objective being a good wife. Other commitments, inclinations and achievements are secondary; husband, home and family are her first concern. This purposeful point of view is not accidental; most often it was acquired from her mother.

Emotional responsiveness means her capacity to share the feelings of others—her husband's anxiety, her child's discomfort, a friend's grief. Her reaction is to try to relieve the difficulty, by direct action if possible, but in any case by the comfort of her understanding and affection. Her responsiveness, like her husband's emotional maturity, reflects the influence of her parents' marriage.

Objectivity is akin to fair-mindedness, and depends on role acceptance. The objective wife sees herself, not only as a particular individual but also as a wife with responsibilities and obligations in common with other wives. She can identify herself with other family members and see a situation from their point of view as well as her own.

Compliance is one of her major virtues. She accepts her husband's wishes as her own. If he dislikes her smoking, she gives it up, not out of fear or subservience but because it will please him; she wants above all to please him and make him happy.

Patience (hers) makes the difference between a harmonious atmosphere and a discordant one. She supervises her children's table manners, but doesn't expect them to achieve perfection in a single lesson. She wishes her husband would remember to empty the trash basket, but doesn't nag when he forgets. She accepts disappointments gracefully, offers to postpone some purchase because the car needs new tires.

If your marriage is drab and unrewarding, take stock of your qualifications as a wife. If you can improve them, your marriage will inevitably become more satisfactory. Your example may inspire your husband to greater effort. The new year can bring new and greater happiness to you both.

DO YOU AGREE?

My daughter, seventeen, insists that going steady means informal engagement. I disagree. Who's right?

The term is subject to wide interpretation, but the usual order is from going steady to informal engagement ("engaged to be engaged") and announced engagement.

ASK YOURSELF:

Are We Companionable?

The essence of happy marriage is the companionship and sharing between husband and wife. This identification, based on common interests and feelings, should increase steadily from the wedding day on. The following questions may help you evaluate the companionship in your marriage.

Do you and your husband share:

1. Some amusements like playing bridge?
2. A constructive hobby or recreation?
3. A deep interest like music or reading?
4. Each other's friends?
5. Home-improvement projects?
6. Quiet evenings alone together?

Do you:

7. Respect your husband as a man?
8. Place full confidence in him?
9. Discuss your problems with him?
10. Usually follow his suggestions?
11. Try to understand his "quirks"?
12. Sense when he is troubled or upset?
13. Really do your best to please him?
14. Always kiss him good night?

Add your "Yes" responses. If your total is 11 to 13, you are in good company, since 12 is the average for happy wives married five to eight years. But with a lower score, try to correct the situation revealed by "No" answers to questions 7–14. Then you may be able to answer "Yes" to more of questions 1–6.

Now! A better-fitting napkin you can wear and forget!

You're confident . . . carefree . . . ready for after-theater fun. At long last, here's a feminine napkin you can wear and forget!

Fems feminine napkins fit better and absorb better. Long enough to fit securely—yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

Now your napkin stays put even under stress, thanks to the extra length of the tab ends. What a feeling of security!

Forget about stains. Wear your nicest things, knowing there's a protective safety-cushion to prevent accidents, whether you're seated or moving about.

Forget about shifting and binding. Better-fitting Fems feminine napkins are made to adjust to your body without discomfort—no matter how active you may be.

Forget about chafing. Touch the chafe-free covering to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive. No wonder Fems bring welcome relief from chafing.

Fems absorb quickly. That's another protection against chafing. And both the covering and inner materials are designed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest flow.

Would you pay a few cents more for all this extra comfort and confidence? Of course you would! So next time wear Fems—and learn how freedom feels!

FEMS is a trademark of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

NEW

REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF NOT AS ADVERTISED HEREIN
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

LIVELIER CHICKEN TASTE

New enriched egg noodles

Better than ever. Richer, livelier, more home-cooked-tasting than ever—we've doubled the chicken flavor. Impossible? Try it and see!

New, enriched egg noodles that always cook up tender yet firm. Yea, every ingredient in Lipton Chicken Noodle Soup is truly superb.

Heartwarming nourishment in every fragrant spoonful of this livelier tasting soup. Enjoy it soon! While you're at it, try 'em all!

Home-cooked taste—the new mix way!

WERNER WOLFF FROM BLACK STAR

Journal about town

DAWN OF A NEW YEAR: HAPPY 1960.

WHAT WE DO
WHERE WE GO
WHOM WE MEET EDITED BY EILEEN SHARPE

50 years ago in the Journal

Oh, Marie!" was the hit tune of January, 1910, when trained nurses worked twelve hours a day and more for $25 a week. The whole state of Tennessee went dry, Madame Melba had the most glorious voice in America, milk cost six cents a quart, and daylight saving was first proposed.

"Are the only clever women in the world in Paris?" challenges Editor Bok in the January, 1910, JOURNAL. "We believe the American woman can create her own pretty things to wear. We need your ideas for our new American Fashions department. If you shun such publicity, your name need never be published."

In "My Quarrel with Women's Clubs" Editor Bok takes them to task for ignoring what he considers the crucial issues of 1910: the fearful increase of The Black Plague (venereal disease); the needless blindness in one third of all babies born blind (from gonorrhea); the dangers of the public drinking cup, in use everywhere; "quack" medicines and harmful "beauty" remedies for the skin and hair; and the annual slaughter of children from firecrackers. "All the clubwoman seems to be interested in," complains Editor Bok, "is self-culture."

"When a man takes a girl sleigh riding should he leave the horse to help her in and out of the sleigh?" asks Henry. "Stay in the driver's seat. Safety comes before politeness," rules social arbiter Mrs. Burton Kingsland.

"My baby is six months old now and seems to need something besides her milk. Do you approve of potatoes and gravy?" asks a mother. Answer: "Not until she is two years old. Give her one tablespoon of orange juice in the midmorning and one tablespoon of beef juice in the afternoon."

"High Tea: Jellied or fried chicken is often served with tea, coffee and chocolate. Hot buttered rolls, waffles and thin bread and butter are brought in constantly from the kitchen. The sweets are usually homemade and served with heavy cream and sponge-cake."

As New Year's Eve approaches, most editors agree the unexpected witching hours have been best. Mary Bass's favorite New Year's Eve was on a trip to Bermuda when she went to a party in horse and buggy on a moonlit road by the ocean on her honeymoon. Nelle Bell remembers swimming and singing "Auld Lang Syne" under stars in Hawaii. Bill McCleery remembers it as the night his first play opened—"Hope for the Best," with Franchot Tone—and when a review said it had "warmth, wit and a static quality" he reached for the icebag, but it went on to be a Broadway hit. Glenn White's was in a hospital after he bailed out of a plane and a beautiful nurse called "Princess" cooked eggs for him. The unpredictable can spark the year to remember.

How do you get five bachelors to say yes? Wilhela Cushman did by inviting them to join L.H.J.'s famed fashions and models on location. Actor Gardner McKay, writer David Loovis, investment banker John Shaw, advertising executive John Rathbone, all gave us notes on the ideal girl. She must be lovely, intelligent, sweet, romantic, dazzling, loyal and obedient.

To a reader who asked "What is the ideal figure?" The female form has upped and downed so that even Miss Americas run from oblongish 30–25–32 to hourglass 34–24–35. Helen of Troy was never measured. Venus de Milo is 48–38–51. Lillian Russell weighed 165 pounds. Audrey Hepburn weighs 110. No anthropologist measured screen actresses until the 1930's, when it took everybody's mind off the stock market. One scholar told us figures don't change as much as posture—"subdued when women had little orange juice," joyous in 1900, changed in 1920 when women competed and thought flat, while 1947 brought the New Look and Jane Russell, and women today try for "a tall pioneer look" working alongside husbands. A famed New York store won't give measurements but will say, "As a husband brings home more money it settles in the region around his wife's hips."

DI PIETRO

Tape test: Staffers check for perfect figure and see new one made of foam.

Nora O'Leary invited us to see a new dress form in her Pattern Department and meet its inventor, Grace Hiscock. It seems there's a liquid foam used to seal submarines. Miss Hiscock uses it to make dress forms—never underestimate. Her customers include careerists, homemakers, Mrs. Perry Como, all busy women who like to sew. "The advantage," said the inventor, "is total accuracy. If a woman gains weight, the form can be built up. If she loses weight, we can just snip off some foam."

Novelist Ray Doliner adds two extra qualifications—she must be willing to squeeze innumerable fresh oranges for him and never put celery in his egg salad.

"Ben-Hur," the giant movie, may make the book a best seller for the fourth time. Ruth Matthews pointed out to us that the writer who began it all, Civil War Gen. Lew Wallace, used to write for the* JOURNAL. *So did his wife, Susan. As a matter of fact, he wooed her by promising to write a best seller and did. A romantic with humor, Wallace might be just as stunned by the current $15,000,000 mounting as by the first stage hit that ran for twenty-one years. His awed explosion: "My God! Did I set all this in motion?"

The same day we discovered an inventor right on our own premises. Homemaking's Vicki Harris showed us patent papers for a mixing-stirring tool that took her four years to perfect and promises a whole nation smooth gravies. It also beats, blends, folds, and adjusts to shape of bowl or pan. "I didn't want to make the mistake my great-great-grandfather did," said Vicki. "He invented a reaper, but was still pottering when Cyrus McCormick's came out. So I checked facts, found that what I wanted didn't exist, took a course in patent law, and invented it." Motivation? "The same as any inventor's—I just wanted to make my work easier."

Decorating editor Cynthia Wheatland has been telling us that Cardinal Spellman collects stamps, Raymond Massey woodworks, Margaret Sullavan makes jewelry, Katharine Cornell looms rugs, Patrice Munsel sculpts, Hermione Gingold is a glass and china connoisseur, and hobbyists all over town are looking for ideas on how to display old collections in new ways. You'll find some answers soon in the pages of the JOURNAL. Hobbyist Anne Fuller of our architecture staff turned out to be a bank collector. "Because my husband's an architect," she told us, "we collect toy banks with handsome doors and windows and authentic detail. I'm so used to our model of Independence Hall that once when I looked out the JOURNAL Philadelphia window at the real one I felt something was missing—and realized there wasn't a slot in the top for pennies."

Joan Younger and Joe Di Pietro were kept waiting by a baby for this month's How America Lives story. Joan helped ease waiting time by teaching father-to-be Gene Nissen to play chess; he taught her to speak Greek. Nobody placed bets on what the baby would be. "A girl, I know," said Joan, "because four of my five are girls." "A girl," photographer Joe assured the unnerved father, "because girls—including girl triplets—have been born on all baby stories I've covered." It was a girl, named Patty, and our staff not only took her picture for page 114 but took care of her the first day of her life.

No betting: Gene Nissen and Joan Younger at games.

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT G. HARRIS

Too late he knew that his own lack of faith had put them all in deadly jeopardy.

And he knew, too, that their only chance to live depended on him.

The Burning Eye

By VICTOR CANNING

Wellard said to the ship's captain, "What do you want me to tell the passengers, sir?"

"Anything you like. Now get out of here—and watch yourself across the deck. I'm not heaving to to pick up a pill peddler. Not in this."

Wellard winked at the wheelsman and eased himself out through the bridge door, forcing it against the pressure of the wind. A great race of water slammed along the Cambria's deck, creaming and foaming over the rails and swirling up around his trouser legs. He took it all automatically. Standing outside the door of the main saloon, awaiting his moment to swing the door open against the permanent list of the Cambria, he thought that he wouldn't care if he never saw the sea again, never saw another ship or gull or coast. . . . Give me ten thousand pounds, he thought, to carry me for a few years, and I'll happily put my feet up ashore tomorrow. A small house in a country town, a decent car and a brass plate—Christopher Wellard, F.R.C.S.

He pushed the door open and went in. Juliet Barclay was wedged into a corner of one of the leather divans. The hem of her green silk skirt swung with the movement of the Cambria. She looked up at him: fair hair, the same kind of face almost as the woman who lived still in his memory; they were the same kind—too much money, too much time on their hands, too much attraction.

From the other end of the divan Howard Fisher said, "Well, doctor, when are we due to sink?"

Wellard said, "We're not."

Fisher was a painter with a growing reputation. The type of man, Wellard thought, who knew exactly what he wanted; talkative and careless of other people's feelings, but likable.

"There's no need for any alarm," Wellard said, looking at the others—Royce, Blaikie and Lily Pincott, who gave him a smile and a wink. "We're having a little trouble with the cargo and the captain has asked me to explain the position to you. Nothing whatsoever to worry about."

As he finished the Cambria took a wave up forward with an ugly jolt and shudder through her plates. The saloon floor sloped steeply under his feet and some loose magazines slithered across the boards and hit the far wall with a flutter of half-open pages.

"Nothing whatsoever to worry about," said Juliet Barclay. She had a light American voice, the accent Europeanized with the rub of travel.

"We've had three days of bad weather," Wellard said. "In that time some of our cargo has shifted. It was badly stowed in Bombay. That's why we've got a slight list to starboard now."

"Slight, old man?" Royce cocked an eyebrow at Wellard.

"I've known worse. The captain doesn't think it advisable to go on to Aden for a restow of the cargo. That's a three-day run. He's putting into a small port, Sugulli, on the Italian Somaliland coast."

The Reverend Henry Blaikie said informatively, "Ex-Italian Somaliland, doctor. It is now a United Nations trusteeship."

"Well, whatever it is, the Italians still run it. We can get the cargo shifted there. While this is being done the captain thinks it advisable for all passengers to be quartered

CONTINUED ON PAGE 92

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE

THE BURNING EYE
is soon to be published in book form by William Sloane Associates, Inc.

What you did was wrong," Juliet said, "but whatever you did, you did for me. I can't forget that. . . . Oh, Chris, you fool."

The Fluff

Handsome and competent,
Ace could carpenter, paint,
lay tile or sprackle.
"Just call me the Universal Man,"
he said.

Sometimes a handsome man . . . and a few well-chosen words . . . can bring a girl to the edge of ruin.

By GEORGE BRADSHAW

Sara Dana was twenty-six, long-legged, size ten; she had brown hair, gray eyes and a jaw that was, oh, maybe just a shade too competent. At the moment she was lying across the bed in her not yet finished bedroom, crying.

All this will have to go, she cried: this beautiful big bed, my dear lamps, those louvered panels, those darling mirrors that have not been put up yet, my beautiful twelve-dollar-a-square-yard all-wool white carpet, the white marble table; all, all must go. And I must go back to that dreary bedroom in the Girls Hotel.

The telephone rang. Sara picked it up. There could not be worse news.

It was Eleanor. They exchanged hellos.

"What's the matter with you," Eleanor said, "are you crying?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"I'm being sued."

"What?"

Sara took a breath. "For eight hundred thousand dollars."

There was a pause. Then Eleanor said, "But that's absurd. You haven't got eight hundred thousand dollars."

"I haven't got eight hundred," Sara said.

"Well," Eleanor said in her most common-sense voice, "then don't worry."

"Don't worry," Sara said. "It means my job, my future, the whole rest of my life."

"Are you serious?"

Sara said, "Did you see the show Monday night?"

Eleanor hesitated, and then began to talk very rapidly. "Listen, that's really what I called you up about. Monday we had to have one of Jack's most important clients and his wife for dinner. There was nothing I could do about it. They're from Philadelphia. She came in a gray chiffon dress—but the wrong gray, of course—and she had naturally blond hair she told me and all I can say is it looked it—and—well—they spent half an hour at dinner saying how they loathed television and wouldn't have one in the house, and wouldn't let their children watch it, and, darling, when your show came on at ten they were still there and I just couldn't ——"

"All right, all right, all right," Sara said.

"You are upset," Eleanor said.

"That I am," Sara said.

"I'll come right over," Eleanor said. "I couldn't understand a lawsuit on the telephone anyway. You mustn't cry."

"Yes I must."

"No, dear. Listen, is Ace there?"

"No."

"He doesn't answer his telephone and Jack's mother wants some shelves put up in her bathroom and I thought ——"

"Ace isn't here and I don't know where he is and I don't care. He's turned out just as badly as everything else."

"I am sorry. I'll be there in ten minutes."

Everything up to now had gone so well, so smoothly well, for Sara. Was that maybe the trouble? Was it that she was not used, since she came to New York, to anything but success and more success?

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

"A man...in particular a sailor...has a big, rough heart," said Petrina's husband. "He may well carry two lov

A hundred years ago there lived in Elsinore a young skipper who was much in love with his beautiful young wife. By the time when, with skill, hard work and good luck, he got his own ship, he named it after her: Pretty Petrina; and he had a figurehead made for it in her likeness, in pink and blue, like that Sunday gown of hers which he had once brought her from Madeira, and with that long hair which his wife hid demurely underneath a small white cap, floating behind her as if blown backward by the wind, and painted a bright yellow.

He was very proud of and pleased with his figurehead. "Is she not lovely?" he asked his wife. "Ever in front of me, leading me on, she treads the high waves as in a dance. She braves the gales and the blizzards, and laughs into the salt foam. The wild sea birds are her playmates, and I have seen her with a kittiwake on the top of her head."

But his wife was jealous of his figurehead. "That is what a man is like," she said. "The woman who turns her back to him, and runs away from him, her he will love and run after. But the faithful wife who waits for him in his house, keeps his home fire burning and darns his socks, her he will never understand."

"Sweetheart, what would I do," he answered her, "with a wife whom I understood? I love her because she is like you, and I love you because you are like her! A man—and in particular a sailor—has got a big rough heart, as he has got a big rough fist; he may well carry two lovely women in it at a time. But I am happy to know that you, my pretty pretty pretty Petrina, have got such a tiny, dainty, wee little heart that you will never find room in it for more than one man, and not even for the whole of him, but that some part of him will be sticking out, and you will think, 'I wish he had not got that to him.' All the same, my grave-eyed pet, you are well aware that when I want a kiss I come back to Elsinore. And so tell me now, as we are talking about these things, whether you like to be kissed or not."

"What a question to ask one's wife," said she, "and you have never, never understood me!"

Now it so happened that when the skipper was trading to the East Indies he had the good luck to help, with much courage and perseverance, an old king of an Indian island to flee from treacherous and rebellious subjects and to bring him safely to the citadel of his daughter and son-in-law in another island kingdom. When the frail old man once more found himself among loving friends and loyal servants, with the tears running down his cheeks he made his rescuer a present of two highly precious sapphires, of a blue as clear and deep as that of the sea. These the sailor of Elsinore had set into the face of his figurehead, like a pair of eyes to it.

"O you fine and proud thing," he said to her, "now you are the perfect pretty Petrina. So bring me safely and quickly home to Elsinore." And indeed he made the journey home more quickly than he had ever done before.

He showed his wife how well the jewels looked in their place. "Now," he said, "you see that she has got your blue eyes. And she never closes them; on our way home she will have seen the flying fish leap from the water at only a few feet's distance, and the stars shooting over the night sky."

"It is an exceedingly silly thing," she said, "to put a pair of precious stones into the wooden face of a figurehead, and you would have done better in giving me those two stones for a pair of earrings. Then all the other skippers' wives of Elsinore would be envious of me."

"I cannot do that," he said to her, "my little soft-downed chick. I cannot possibly do that, and you ought not to ask me."

"Oh, well," she said, "if you choose not to understand me."

Now during all the time while he was home she thought of the blue stones in the figurehead's eye sockets, and in her heart she called herself an unhappily married woman. But it came about that the night before her husband was setting to sea again, the skippers' corporation of Elsinore gave a big carouse for him. While he was here making merry with his friends, Petrina had the glazier of Elsinore steal down to the harbor with her, and there herself held the lamp for him while he took out the two clear blue stones from the eyes of the figurehead and put in two bits of flat blue glass, as close to the color of them as he could manage to find. The sapphires themselves she put into a little box and hid them in the pocket of her gown.

Her husband did not notice the change; he innocently and tenderly kissed his wife good-by and sailed off to the Gold Coast. And the day after his departure his wife took the sapphires to the goldsmith and had them set into a pair of earrings.

But after some time the young woman found that her eyesight was failing. Dark spots and clots swam before her eyes like big and small fish in the sea, and soon she could not see to thread her needle. As she grew anxious about it she looked up an old Finnish woman, who had sat in Elsinore for a hundred years—for the Finns are strange people and will live till the age of several hundred years—since the time when, on the day of his coronation, King Frederick IV had wished to see his subjects from all parts of his kingdom, also from the country of the midnight sun, and had had them brought before him. The old woman's father, like many Finns, was skilled in witchcraft and sold wind in bags to sailors: if you undid one knot of the bag you would get a fine fresh breeze to run you along; if you loosened two knots you would get a strong wind to blow you forth; and if you loosened three you would get a fierce gale that would sweep you, amongst the foam of high billows, through the Skagerrak and the Kattegat past the gray old castle of Elsinore down into the Sound. Old Sunniva herself knew about medicines and applied eye waters and ointments to the eyes of the young woman, but none of these did her any good. In the end the old hag shook her head and said to the skipper's wife, "The forces that I have called upon to come to our assistance will not come forth. They tell me that they know of this case, and that they side with the forces that are against us. An injustice, they tell me, has been done, and must be righted. And I cannot see but that your disease is incurable, and that you must go blind."

The fair young girl now wrung her hands, tears ran from her half-blind eyes, and she cried out, "O God, that the Pretty Petrina was back in the harbor of Elsinore, and that I could have the glass taken out and the precious stones set back where they belong." She seized the old woman's hand, clung to it and begged her, "Sunniva, lead me down to the end of the pier, and tell me that you see on the horizon that great and blessed thing, a sail, and my lord coming back to me. I shall tell him then that he is free to fill up his big heart as he fills up his big glass!"

But the ship did not come back. Instead of that, a letter came from the consul of Porto in Portugal, to inform the people of Elsinore that she had been wrecked and had gone to the bottom of the sea with all hands.

And it was a strange thing and a terrible thing, the consul wrote, that in broad daylight, the sun high in the sky, she had run straight into a tall steep rock rising out of the sea. END omen in it at a time." Others besides sailors' wives may find a personal warning in what happened.

"That is what a man is like,"
Petrina said jealously.
"The woman who turns her back on him
he will love and run after. . . .
But the faithful wife
he will never understand."

BLUE EYES

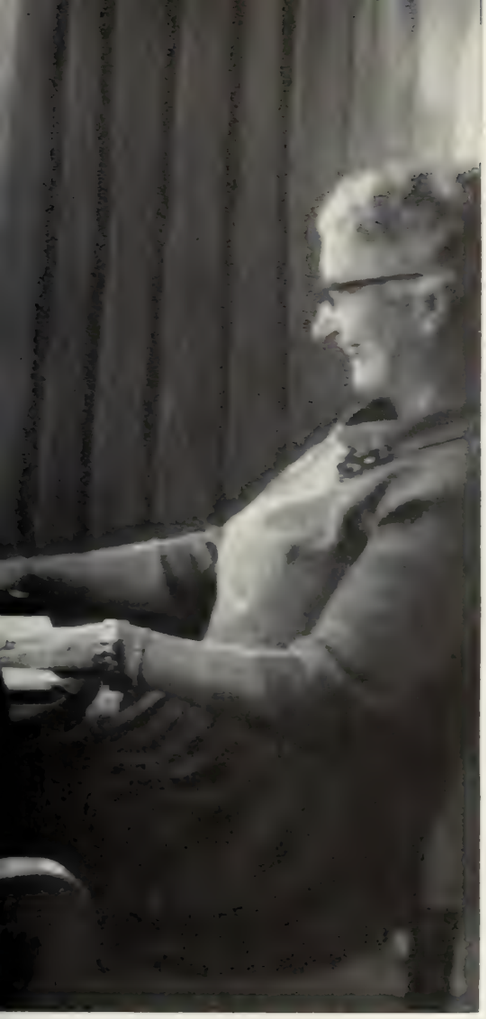
BY ISAK DINESEN

ILLUSTRATED BY JACK POTTER

"We need to stop delinquency before it starts. We need programs that seek out the endangered boy before he gets into trouble. We need to help him before he is delinquent. Later on is usually too late—for him and for society."—NELSON ROCKEFELLER

WHERE AND WHEN does DELINQUENCY

THEODORE HOUSER



MISS MARGARET HICKEY: We have invited you here, Governor Rockefeller, and you, Mr. Houser, to help us bring to our readers a new understanding and a fresh approach to the problem of juvenile delinquency, if possible before it happens. Every community and every neighborhood in the nation is concerned about the tragic weakness of efforts so far to prevent this wastage of young lives, as well as money and property, that we call juvenile delinquency.

GOV. NELSON ROCKEFELLER: And let's face it: This problem concerns all of us. Close to three per cent of our young people are involved—and that's far too many. Youthful crime and violence have increased in alarming proportions in recent years. It's not something that involves just certain sections of our country, certain cities or neighborhoods. You know, one of my sons was beaten up three times on his way home from school here in New York a few years ago. In fact, eighty-two boys in his school were attacked and beaten.

MRS. BEATRICE GOULD: What age were they?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: They were twelve, fourteen. The police caught the boys who were doing

CONTINUED ON PAGE 79

The editors of the JOURNAL invited Nelson Rockefeller, governor of the state of New York, and Theodore Houser, formerly president of the Chicago Metropolitan Y.M.C.A., to discuss the causes of juvenile delinquency and the feasibility of various action programs to combat youthful violence.
Participants for the JOURNAL were Margaret Hickey, Public Affairs Editor, who moderated the forum; the editors, Bruce and Beatrice Gould, and Glenn White, editorial co-ordinator.

PHOTOGRAPH BY DANIEL J. RANSOHOFF
FROM THE BOOK "PICTURES TELL YOUR STORY"

WRITE CONGRESS YOUR OPINION

This month (January) the House of Representatives will vote on a companion bill to the Youth Conservation Act (S 812) approved last year by the Senate.

The bill provides for the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps under the administration of the Department of Labor. The corps would be composed of young men of good character between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one who would work on conservation projects in national or state parks and preserves. The program would start with an enrollment of 50,000 the first year; 100,000 the second year; and a maximum thereafter of 150,000 yearly. The enrollees would be paid $60 a month for the first enrollment of six months, with an additional $5 per month for enrollment beyond that period, and $10 a month additional for those with leadership responsibilities.

Federal costs are estimated at $125,000,000 the first year; $250,000,000 for the second; and $375,000,000 annually thereafter. States participating in the program would be required to match Federal funds.

If the bill passes the House, it is, of course, subject to the President's veto.

—THE EDITORS

start ?

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEEN-AGERS

YOU AND YOUR NEW YEAR

By PAT BOONE

JOE COVELLO

Pat chats with Memphis Pat Boone Club teen-ager Sally Boswell about his own early marriage—Sally is wondering whether she should marry now or wait. Pat tells Sally how he and Shirley started, as a New Year's custom, the Happy Home Corporation Inventory, and how it works for them.

I met my lovely wife-to-be just before the holiday season in our junior year of high school, and by New Year's Day it was June in January for us. We celebrated by tramping out in the country in as timely a snowfall as Nashville, Tennessee, ever provided, and at about noon we ran smack into a sour old farmer from New England who was to influence our future New Year's procedure.

He was resting in the middle of a fence-repair job, blowing on his bare knuckles, and when Shirley and I called out "Happy New Year," he said, "I doubt it. I didn't have nothin' when I come here five years ago, and I ain't got nothin' now." Then he looked around a minute and seemed to brighten. "Anyhow, I'm holding my own." We barely got out of sight before we fell into a snowbank doubled up with laughter.

Shirley and I spent two more courtin' New Year's and then a married one, bogged down with time-money-job-college problems (built-in hazards for most student-bride-groom combos). That year I worked right through the magical midnight at my panel in station WSIX pushing buttons, studying, and wishing it were June in January again. The next New Year's we celebrated in Denton, Texas, with a brand-new daughter, a new radio job, a new college—and the same old problems. At midnight, with tiny Cherry bedded down for the night (we hoped), I gave my wife a very romantic kiss over a pile of diapers she was folding and said softly, "Happy New Year!"

And Shirley, with a quick grin, said, "I doubt it. We didn't have nothin' when we come here, and we ain't got nothin' now—but we're holding our own!" We laughed a minute and then we stopped and looked at each other.

I said, "I wonder if that's true. If it is, it's not good enough. It's never good enough just to stand still."

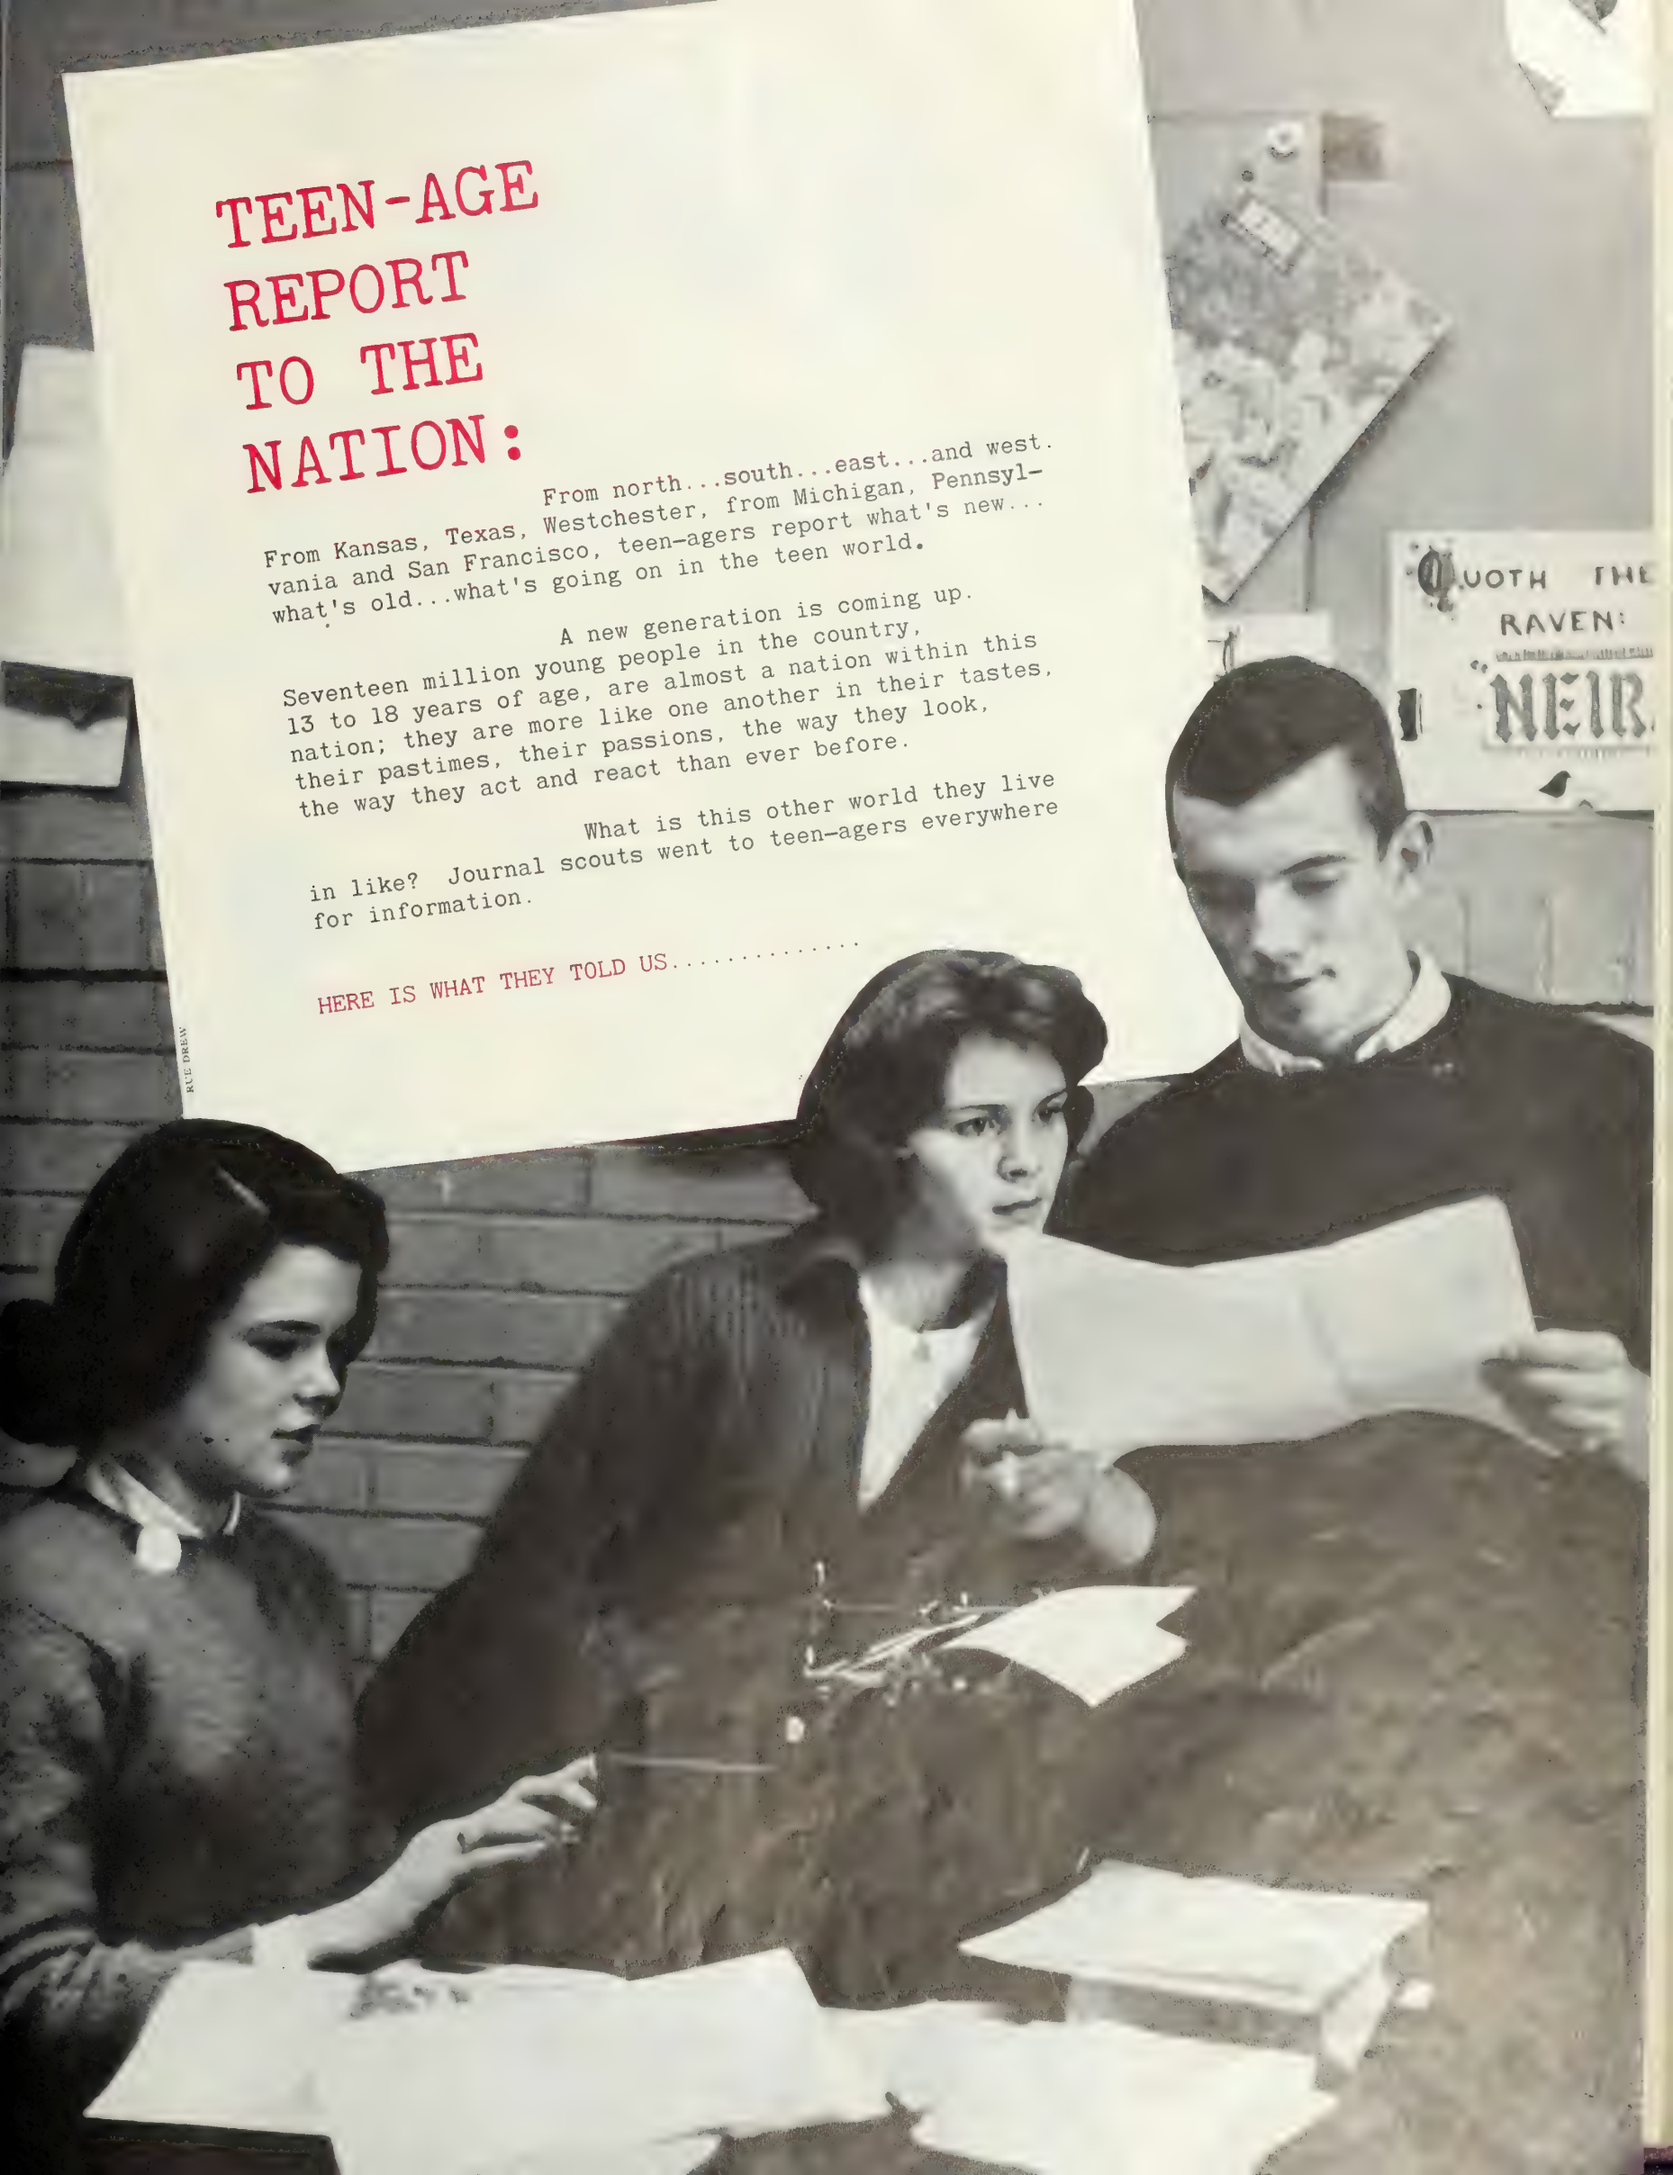
"Well, of course we've got Cherry," said my wife.

"And I've got another year of education," I said.

"And I'm a better cook ——"

"And I'm a champion diaper washer ——"

And that was the beginning of our Happy Home Corporation Inventory and Blueprints New Year's System. We sat right CONTINUED ON PAGE 88



TEEN-AGE REPORT TO THE NATION:

From north...south...east...and west. From Kansas, Texas, Westchester, from Michigan, Pennsylvania and San Francisco, teen-agers report what's new... what's old...what's going on in the teen world.

A new generation is coming up. Seventeen million young people in the country, 13 to 18 years of age, are almost a nation within this nation; they are more like one another in their tastes, their pastimes, their passions, the way they look, the way they act and react than ever before.

What is this other world they live in like? Journal scouts went to teen-agers everywhere for information.

HERE IS WHAT THEY TOLD US.....

RUE DREW

NO MORE JIVE - IT'S OUT OF ORBIT

"PLAYING IT COOL," IN THE WORDS OF TODAY'S TEEN-AGER, MEANS CONTROLLED CASUALNESS-- A NEAT, WELL-GROOMED APPEARANCE AND A MORE MATURE APPROACH TO LIFE AND ITS PROBLEMS.

It's funny, but adults seem to have their own ideas on how teen-agers talk and act, and that's it! Maybe they get it from movies and TV--sometimes even we have to laugh at the things we're supposed to say and the way we're expected to look. I guess everybody exaggerates--adults as well as teens. At any rate, just to set the record straight, we think that when you're a teen-ager it's time you grew up. The idea now is to be a little polished, to play it casual, not to seem to be trying too hard, to seem as though you don't care. We do, of course, about our appearance and all, but we don't want to make a big production out of it. We don't want people to feel sorry for us, or look down on us, or treat us as if we were specimens under glass. It's our world and we like it, neither Beat nor Boho (translation: Bohemian) and we're not going out of our way to prove anything--we just want to live and have fun like everyone else.

WE DON'T DENY THAT WE HAVE OUR OWN CUSTOMS, BUT PLEASE DON'T CALL THEM FADS.

The world changes and so do we; things that were "in" yesterday (to use an expression adults seem to like) are "out" today. Of course we may differ slightly from state to state, but the word today is "smooth, cool," sophisticated. Who remembers "sloppy joes" any more? They are definitely out--except for some Beatniks who never change their clothes and probably have a thing on bathtubs. In most places "Beats" have had it. No one tries to copy them or adapt their special brand of flavor. Girls don't like to wear leotards any more, let alone hair streaming down their backs, because they're so closely identified with "Beats." They may have a little more influence in San Francisco or Santa Barbara, but it's passing out. The same is true of the hoods with their black leather jackets, motorcycle boots, long hair and sideburns. Only one north-central area reports any "glamour" for this group, but most schools have outlawed this kind of thing and nobody minds. Oddballs just don't fit in any more. Today we admire the neat, fresh look--girls who are pretty and feminine, boys who are well groomed and conservative. All over the country, from Westport, Conn., to San Francisco, teens realize you can't be smooth and sloppy at the same time. But we can do without the really obvious bit--set-looking hair, gobs of make-up, too-precise detail--that makes you seem as if you spent hours before a mirror getting dressed, or long sessions at the beauty parlor. There's something phony about it which just doesn't appeal to us. But before we get to that, let me give you some idea on how teens talk, and about the way we act.

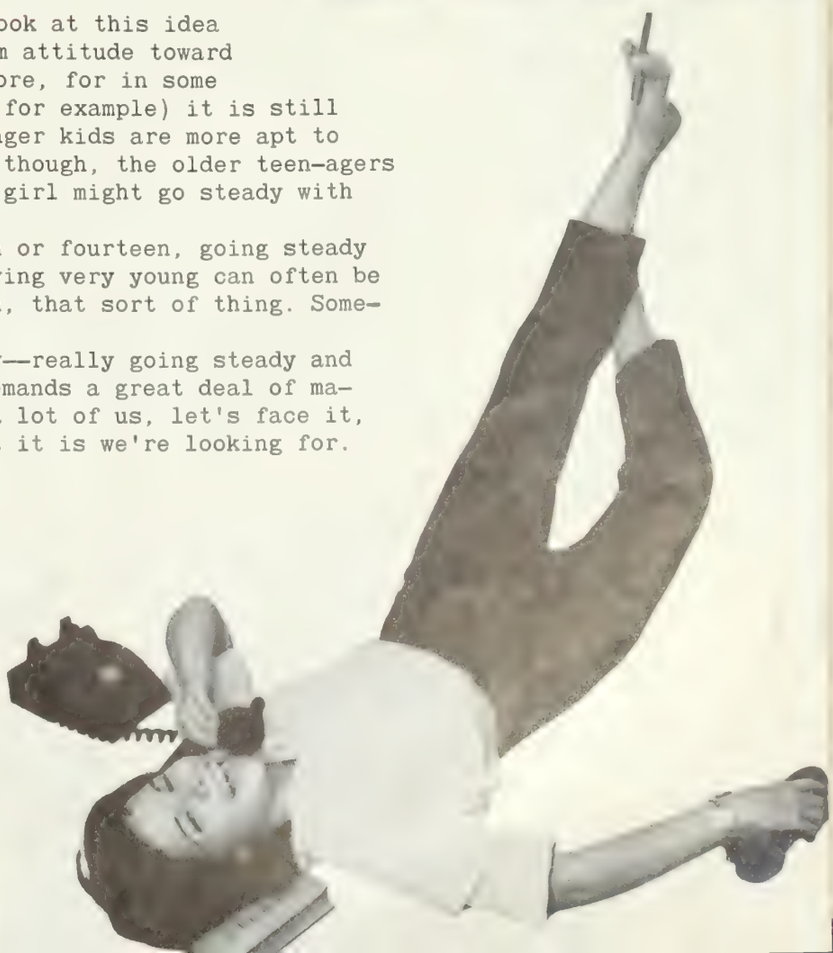
"SQUARES" HAVE BECOME "SQUIRRELS." "SEND ME" IS AS ANCIENT AS "OH YOU KID"; AND NOBODY'S EVEN HEARD OF A "SLICK CHICK."

PHOTOGRAPHS BY DREW—PRIGENT—COVELLO—ORNIZ

Maybe we do have a language all our own, but then so does the Army. And advertising. There's nothing wrong in it; if you understand what it means it can be kind of fun. But today we don't go in for the real cat talk--the hot jive that most people associate with us. That's as cold as last week's pizza. If anybody said "hep" or "daddy-o" or "crazy, man" or "drip" they'd really be dated! That stuff went out with swooning over Sinatra. Today we use words like "blast," meaning a ball, a terrific time. Or "out to lunch," which is not with it, for the birds. A boy's a "stud who is cool" in Santa Barbara; in Westport, "take size" means go away and don't bother to come back, while "rank" means cut down to size. Except in Port Huron, Michigan, and Atwood, Kansas, "square" has almost vanished from the face of the earth. Media, Pennsylvania, teen-agers say "that's close," meaning completely wrong, or stupid. Phrases such as "that was a real snow job," or "did he snow her!" (meaning "impress") have caught on practically everywhere. "In orbit" means the same as an older expression, "on the ball"; "making out" is necking; a "drag" is a drip, someone who slows everything down; "very nice" is an understatement for "wow!"

Most of us feel that very "hip" talk is dated and unnatural, and we'd like to keep our language on the conservative side. Oh, sure, we'll always have some colorful expressions--but then everybody does. What fun is it to use the same words all the time, without any variety? But as far as real bebop talk is concerned, we're just not interested.

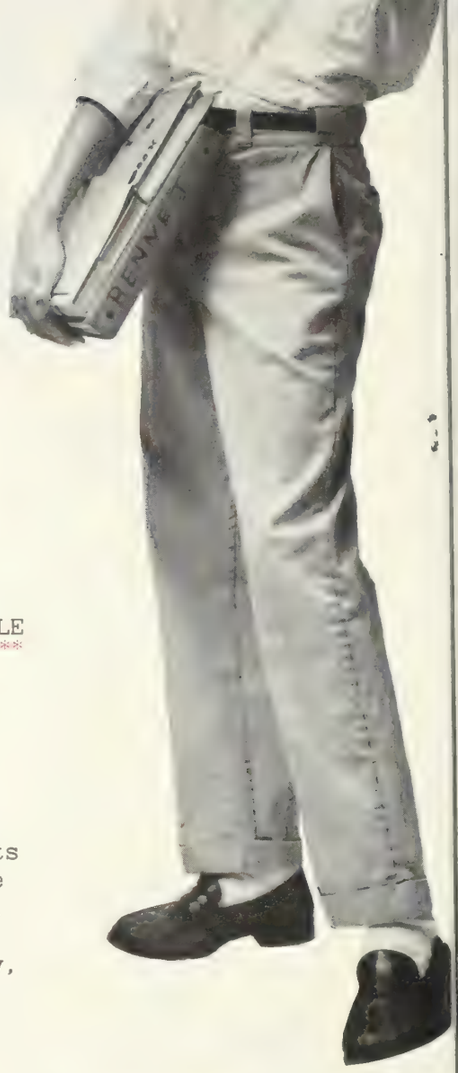
IN SOME PLACES, GOING STEADY IS ON THE WAY OUT--
****
FEW TEENS ARE BUYING THAT ANY MORE.
****



Most of us seem to have taken a good long look at this idea of going steady, and have come up up with a lukewarm attitude toward it. This doesn't mean that nobody does it any more, for in some places (the south and southwest, for example) it is still going strong. Nowadays, the younger kids are more apt to practice it. For the most part, though, the older teen-agers prefer to "play the field." Or a girl might go steady with four or five boys a year.

Starting to date at thirteen or fourteen, going steady all through high school and marrying very young can often be stifling--no basis for comparison, that sort of thing. Sometimes it works--often it doesn't.

We realize that going steady--really going steady and knowing exactly what you want--demands a great deal of maturity and responsibility. And a lot of us, let's face it, are still trying to find out what it is we're looking for.



BEFORE A BOY GETS HIS DRIVER'S LICENSE, THERE ISN'T MUCH SINGLE DATING, BUT AFTER THAT, IF YOU HAVEN'T GOT A HEAP YOU'VE HAD IT.

Theoretically, most kids start to date in the eighth grade. But in most states you can't get a driver's license until the age of fifteen or sixteen, sometimes seventeen. So until then, there really isn't much to do. Oh sure, there are lots of group parties and all, but who wants chaperons all the time? Nobody wants parents tagging along either, and that's the only way you can get somewhere if you don't have a license. And around the age of fourteen or so, girls start dating older boys who do have cars. So if a boy wants to have some fun socially, he has to have a license and, preferably, his own "rod" (though kids often borrow the family car for dates).

Most of the heaps are old ones which have been souped up. There is a current rage for real oldies, like Model T's. They're painted wild colors—or red and black—with fancy designs and usually a name splashed across them like "The Toad" or "My Blue Heaven." Some of them are pretty terrific. Often kids get together and just cruise around on Saturday nights, going slowly up and down the main streets from one end of town to the other. The younger ones do this on motor bikes, which are also very popular.

Some parents help pay for their kids' cars, but generally the boys are responsible for their upkeep. They work after school to earn money. It's just not considered right for a boy to depend financially upon his parents.

There isn't as much "dragging" and crazy driving nowadays. There are clubs and special places for that, but usually boys are careful when on dates. Maybe we're just getting more sensible about these things, but we'd rather leave the real "hot-rodding" to the hoods.

"NO PLACE TO GO" IS A COMPLAINT JUST ABOUT EVERYWHERE.

For younger kids, almost all the dating is restricted to group parties: school-sponsored activities, football games, church socials, private parties—all chaperoned. But in many places, even when kids are old enough to have cars, there isn't much single dating—"doubles" are very big. You can go to movies and a dairy bar afterward for a milk shake. Bowling is popular, and, in summer, frequent beach picnics and outdoor barbecues. There are youth centers, but generally they're not too popular. In lots of towns there are special Friday and Saturday night dances held for teen-agers, most of them informal. By the time you reach the age of fourteen, you can dance fairly well. Steps learned from friends, older sisters, dancing classes—even watching the Bandstand programs on TV—can teach you a lot.

Noon dances, in places like Cleveland, are frequently held in high schools and there are teen canteens which have dances several times a week. Of course there are the school proms. But when it comes right down to it, a lot of teens feel the need for a place to go—their own hangout—where they can dance and won't have to be under constant adult supervision. Jukeboxes in pizzerias are terrific, but you can hardly ever dance—no room. Night clubs are for the older set, too expensive anyway. This problem is often solved by private "blasts" at home, with records or an amateur band (piano, guitar, bass, maybe a trumpet).

Ice skating, tennis, skiing, hay rides are all a lot of fun. We're not very highly organized. Everybody's relaxed. Sometimes there isn't much to do—but then there's always the drive-in movie.

WHEN YOU'RE TWELVE AND ABOUT TO BE A TEEN-AGER, IT SEEMS PRETTY WONDERFUL AND EXCITING, LIKE STARTING ON AN ADVENTURE, AND MAYBE A LITTLE FRIGHTENING. BUT I THOUGHT OF WHIRLING DERVISHES TOO, WITH NO DIRECTION. I DON'T WANT TO BE LIKE THAT. I DON'T THINK MOST OF US ARE.

Nowadays you have to study, and the competition is keen. College, if you want to go, is expensive, and even if you get a scholarship, you will have to work to keep it.

Hardly anyone depends on allowances from home any more. We prefer to work for our money, independent of parents (boys often start as young as 12, to earn a little money of their own). There is work after school, doing odd jobs in drug and grocery stores, garages, or working as ushers in movies.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 132

PHOTOGRAPHS BY DREW—MILLS—KUHNER—COVELLO

Young women going places...

The weskit dress in flower-printed cotton with huge pleats, by Emilio Pucci— Simone D'Aillencourt, French mannequin, wears it for practically any daytime hour.

Brigette Schilling, aboard the SS Brasil, wears a red-ribbed wool jersey travel coat by Nat Bader over a tropical white pleated silk dress. She is in conversation with Loren J. Ellis, officer of the ship.

Fashions that go south now come back for summer

We see: the contrast of black and white—the white coat and the ink-black, barebacked bathing suit . . . the return of greatly loved palest beige jerseys and tweeds, especially in the travel-itself costume . . . then the sharp pinks, corals and yellows and crayon blues. We see: dresses with the fitted cummerbund and the small sashed waistline, pleated sheaths and pleated skirts . . . straight little jackets bound at the edges. It is the year for the splinter-slim sleeveless dress, huge pockets, unheard-of colors put together—magenta and turquoise, flame and lime yellow.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN
BRACELET BY BARRA

Who is the girl in the softly sashed golden surah silk? It's Berenice Campbell. Young man asking: writer Roy Doliner; first novel, Young Man Willing. Dress by Larry Aldrich.

Young men with a future

Young women going places...

Young men with a future

And who is wearing these fashions in the sunshine orbit? Young women from offices, labs, designing rooms and college campuses, young marrieds from little city apartments and fresh-built suburban houses . . . women of all ages taking time off from careers and domesticity. Who else is taking part and looking on? Young men of the hour and the future, bachelors with a potential—writers, brokers, actors, advertising men, fliers, students and . . . Mr. X. X. Average, who also likes his girls beautiful.

White is forever . . . . white is all things to all women. Girl who loves it chooses a slim linen with an inch wide capeskin sash by Mollie Parnis.

You simply can't go without jersey. The pocket dress in blue-violet cotton jersey by Jean Campbell is a good traveler.

TOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

The no-back,
inky-black swimsuit
of elasticized, knitted nylon,
like a second skin.
Exciting idea for blondes;
brunettes can have white ones.
Young man is John Shaw, investment banker.

Young woman from any part of the U.S.A. flies away south in a pale beige tweed suit
by David Kidd of Arthur Jablow; tweed
topcoat in the same color.
Also southbound—
John Rathbone, young advertising executive.

Any Southern or summer night—dance in this coral ombré chiffon
by Ceil Chapman.
Packs easily and weightlessly.

ft: The shirt on your back—lipstick-pink Dacron and cotton, about
.00, by John Netzky. Wear it with ite Arnel-shantung slacks, $15.00.

It must be love. Berenice Campbell finds perfect casual fashion by Alvin Handmacher. Two-piece, white Arnel sharkskin with a pleated skirt and blue cardigan. The young man in the picture is David Loovis, author of Try for Elegance.

Young women going places...

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELM CUSHMAN

A shirtwaist dress, in Brigitte's opinion, goes on every trip. This one is a two-piece pink printed cotton with a belt by Hannah Troy.

Half and half— dress like a jockey's shirt in white-and-gold Arnel-and-rayon shantung by Gregg Draddy. Girls like its simplicity and coolness.

Angela Howard likes to dress for a patio party in a long white Arnel shantung skirt and a printed silk shirt by Kenn Barr. The brown-and-white combination has news and distinction.

TRIP ESSENTIALS:

Red travel coat

Beige tweed suit with a silk blouse

A white dress, silk or linen

A jersey dress, wool or cotton

A pretty cotton

A chiffon evening dress

Casual dress for sight-seeing

A bathing suit

Pair of slacks and overblouse

Numerous packable scarves, colorful slippers and favorite jewelry

EXTRAS TO ADORE:

Beautiful white coat that goes over everything from tennis shorts to evening dress

A second bathing suit

A second dance dress

Pretty printed silk, additional sight-seeing dress

Long skirt or patio fashion

Beach or play dress

Shorts and shirt or a second slacks outfit

Young and affordable—black-and-white checked cotton, by Irwin Smoler, $6.95; to wear with a big necklace and bracelet, patent-leather belt and white shoes.

Sand-and-sea suits in the same cotton print will be seen on many beaches, now and next summer. Interested young man is David Loovis.

Young men with a future

PHOTOGRAPH BY JOHN ENGSTEAD

The year's new pink in satin-bound rayon separates by Hannah Troy, a girl who loves the new color and a young man who likes both—Gardner McKay, starring in Adventures in Paradise.

and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Christian Dior YOURS

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LUOMBRUNO-BODI

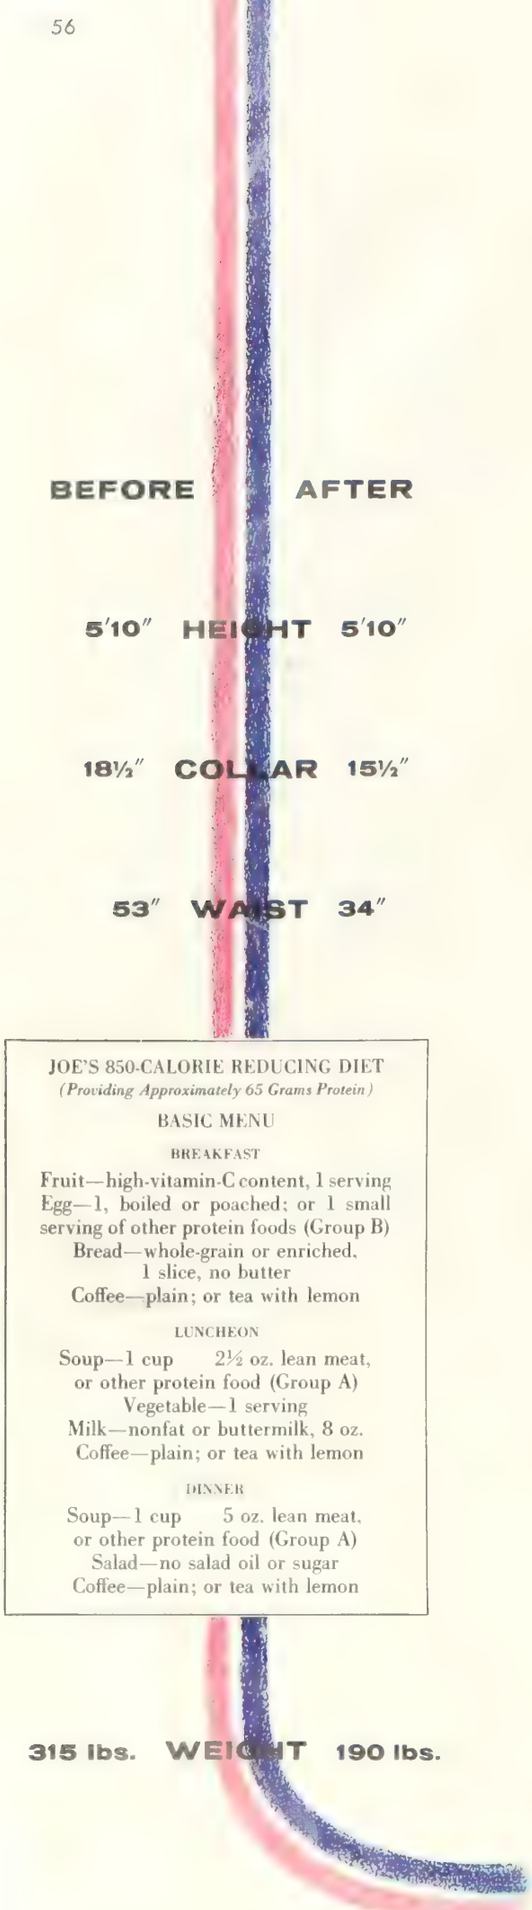
This beautiful beige tweed "greatcoat" is double-breasted and fits easily over a suit. The pockets are in the side seams, which are hand-stitched for added detail. The suit, in a lighter-weight tweed, has a slim skirt and a double-breasted jacket with a matching tuck-in scarf. Both coat and suit are Vogue Paris Original Design No. 1472. Wear with all-beige accessories. Above: bag by Lucille; shoes by Newton Elkin: Left: bag by Gucci

FOR THE MAKING

THE JOURNAL IS PROUD TO PRESENT THREE CHRISTIAN DIOR DESIGNS MADE AVAILABLE THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY BY VOGUE PATTERNS.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

Dior's famous "hobble" skirt makes charming midseason costume. The dress has a becoming open neckline and a short sleeve. The waist-length jacket is finished with a self belt and bow. The pattern also includes details on how to make the dress without the band at the bottom of the skirt for less extreme effect. Vogue Paris Original Design No. 1470. Above: hat by Maria Pia; left: hat by Vincent-Harmik; necklace by Sandor Goldberger.



This charming mauve wool dress and jacket will go prettily into the spring without a coat. The dress has a deep V neckline accented with a stitching detail in a deeper shade. The skirt has easy fullness that is becoming to most figures. The double-breasted jacket has self-covered buttons and the same stitching detail as the dress. Vogue Paris Original No. 1471. Wear with violets. Above: shoes by Roger Vivier; left: hat by John Frederics; bracelet and ring by Seaman Schepps.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 92.
Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered.

© Vogue

JOE'S 850-CALORIE REDUCING DIET
(Providing Approximately 65 Grams Protein)

BASIC MENU

BREAKFAST

Fruit—high-vitamin-C content, 1 serving
Egg—1, boiled or poached; or 1 small serving of other protein foods (Group B)
Bread—whole-grain or enriched, 1 slice, no butter
Coffee—plain; or tea with lemon

LUNCHEON

Soup—1 cup 2½ oz. lean meat, or other protein food (Group A)
Vegetable—1 serving
Milk—nonfat or buttermilk, 8 oz.
Coffee—plain; or tea with lemon

DINNER

Soup—1 cup 5 oz. lean meat, or other protein food (Group A)
Salad—no salad oil or sugar
Coffee—plain; or tea with lemon

He lost 125 pounds—

Fat people, usually miserable, often feel handicapped in business, romantically and socially. At 315 pounds, Joe Girard was miserable. But not for any of the usual reasons. At 27 he owned a successful supermarket. His trim, attractive wife, Martha, was devoted to him. They had many friends among the young Iowa Falls, Iowa, couples.

But Joe's feet hurt. He felt miserable, yet he had to be actively on his feet from 6 A.M. to 9 P.M.

To get relief, he went to a doctor who, instead of treating his feet, treated his fat. He put Joe on a strict diet. His feet, he said, wouldn't hurt him when they had less weight on them.

Six months later Joe had scaled down to 190 pounds, an ideal weight for his 5′10″ height and bone structure. His feet no longer hurt. He had abundant energy. He wasn't tired even after a fifteen-hour day. And there were "bonus" advantages from losing weight

Before he started counting calories, he had paid out $115 for jumbo-size specially tailored suits. Normal-size suits cost less.

The Girards' four-year-old daughter, Yettee, a chubby kewpie doll, looked like big daddy. Fat seemed to be a family trait—several of the Girard family are large. Before Joe dieted, everyone accepted the fact that Yettee would naturally be fat. When the diet became standard fare at the table, Yettee also grew slimmer. This father-daughter act has shown the Girards that having a tendency to be fat doesn't mean that they have to be fat. Knowing how to prevent it, they won't let Yettee grow up a fatty.

After he lost 100 pounds, Joe could buy life insurance for the first time since he came out of the Navy at 19. Insurance companies take a dim view of 315-pound policyholders, even when they're only 27 years old. Fatties are so much more susceptible to heart attacks, diabetes, high blood pressure, gall-bladder disease, arthritis and risk in major surgery that it is too hazardous to insure them.

When his weight went down, Joe bought a large "ordinary-life" policy. Even so, he pays a high premium for having been so huge. His first year's premium was $753. The company will reduce that premium to $520 at the end of the year when and if Joe's weight remains down. That $233-a-year savings will amount to over $5000 by the time Joe is 50. When he is 60 he will have saved $7456—and his life expectancy is now 42.8 more years. Fat, he would have been lucky to see his fiftieth birthday. His father, also overweight, died of a heart attack in his forties.

Fat cooks and fat grocers are supposed to be good for business—walking advertisements. Joe had used his size in ads for a "Fat Man's Special." It's doubtful, however, if slogans like "Big bargains at Big Joe's" or "Get the biggest values in town from the biggest grocer in town" actually attracted any additional customers.

The diet, however, definitely boosted business. Local newspapers featured Joe's amazing metamorphosis. CONTINUED ON PAGE 84

Joe's preliminary 1300-calorie diet and food groups, with calorie counts, are on pages 84, 86.

Weighing 315 pounds, Joe Girard could buy no insurance. Suits cost $115. Besides [illegible]

W. R. WILSON

After 6 months, Joe lost 125 pounds. Yettee lost 7, grew several inches. Yettee at 4½ weighed 85, measured 34″ around the waist. Clothes had to be made to measure.

Growing fast. Yettee's height will soon balance her weight. Father and daughter both watch diets.

and his daughter dieted too!

By MARGARET OPPEN [illegible]

PHOTOGRAPHS BY ROGER PRIGENT

New Faces

9 A.M.

in less than a day

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

"I don't think we can do very much with her," Dottie Robinson said about Babette Dorfman, pictured on these pages. "She's a sweet girl," Barbara Burke of our staff added, "but I can't see many possibilities either."

It was on the strength of our last March's New Faces in Less Than a Day that Babette, a sophomore at Vassar College, had written to us for beauty advice. She wrote, "My father saw your pages and said, 'See if the Journal can help you.'"

Now Babette was in the reception room eagerly awaiting the help we promised, and the two-girl consensus was not very encouraging.

"We're going to try, anyway," I told the girls. "I'm convinced there's no such thing as a 'hopeless' beauty problem."

Babette was photographed (above) as she looked on arrival and—four hours later—looking as she does on the opposite page.

Solutions: A really short hairdo, purposely designed to frame her face prettily, make her neck seem longer, add height—she's only 5′2″ tall. Babette's hair was cut in layers and set on rollers to achieve the becoming fullness. Thrilled, Babette later had a soft permanent to help maintain its curl and fullness.

With a lipstick brush, Babette learned how to follow the line of her upper lip, extending it slightly for more flattering fullness.

Babette complained: "My nose shines with or without powder." Solution: a light film of creamy make-up—untinted for day; tinted in a rosy beige for evening—to act as a base to hold powder. Next, note the improvement in the eyebrow line, in Babette's "after" picture, now that it is prettily arched and lightly penciled.

Babette's dress (before) is in a dreamy color, but see how blousy it looks, and how it hid a divine figure. More becoming lines and better fit will enable her to look inches slimmer—as well as inches taller.

for more New Faces turn the page

P.M.

New Faces

10 A.M. 2 P.M.

ROGER PRIGENT

When we first met Mrs. W. T. Gaddis, housewife and mother of two young children, she struck us as a classic example of a blonde who needed bringing out by brightening up. Pat's pale skin, pale lipstick, pale hair worn too severely, even her choice of a pale dress color, created an uninteresting monotone look.

Here's how Pat was turned into the real standout you see at the right. A new hairdo makes the most of her beautiful blondness, and also camouflages her unusually high forehead.

A creamy-base make-up with pink undertone, pink cream rouge gently blended, and a fluff of pink-toned powder all add needed complexion color. The make-up base doubles as a softener for her dry skin. Stray eyebrow hairs were plucked away and a light brown pencil was used to stroke on warm color. Dark brown mascara and misty green eye shadow emphasize her eyes. For lips and finger tips, a vivid coral-pink color.

In clothes, see how the chiffon and pearls at the neck maintain her softly feminine look, while the electric blue and brilliant red add needed dash.

Beguilingly feminine hairdo, make-up and clothes give Pat Gaddis, housewife and mother, a radiantly enchanting look-alive look.

1 P.M. 4 P.M

ROGER PRIGENT

9 A.M. 1 P.M.

The first step in Betty Lee's do-over was to revise her negative attitude. Any young girl who falls into thinking "I haven't the time to bother about my appearance" has fallen into a rut. In such cases, a fresh new outlook is as much in order as a gay new lipstick.

Betty's skinned-back hairdo has been traded in for a softly flattering arrangement to emphasize her blond delicacy while it camouflages her high forehead and strong jaw line. Newly arched eyebrows, penciled lightly, eliminate a frowning expression. Her overly casual dash of lipstick gave a pinched look to her lips. By applying a glowing pink color with a lipstick brush, Betty now follows and slightly exaggerates the pretty curve of her lips. Black mascara for her naturally pale eyelashes and sea-green shadow for eyelids make her eyes much more fascinating. By paying more attention to clothes colors that will enrich her own coloring, Betty takes a final and rewarding step toward beauty.

"Elegant! Aristocratic! Divine!" were the exclamations of praise as Betty Lee emerged from her fadeaway look into real beauty.

FRANCES PELLEGRINI

Mrs. Rodman Wilson's Beauty Workshop do-over transformed her appearance from "careworn" to "carefree." Biggest change: a new color for her hair, which is graying prematurely. Marion's black rinse covers a lot of the gray, can be applied at home after her weekly shampoo, washes out with the next shampoo. Minor changes in hair style—fringe bangs, soft fullness at sides—pack a pretty wallop.

For her dry skin, Marion now uses a tinted, moisturized make-up base. A creamy lipstick in a gayer red prevents lips from drying and chapping, while it brightens her over-all look. Eyebrows, grown shaggy with lack of attention, take on nicer proportions once they are plucked from underneath to create a pleasant arch and enriched with a warm brown color. Eyes become more brilliant with mascara (black for Marion) and blue-green eye shadow.

An everyday glamorizer: house dresses in becoming styles and colors. Marion's "shirtwaists"—neat but too tailored for her—have been replaced by gayer cottons with more flattering necklines. The cost remains the same—but the effect is younger, prettier.

At no extra cost, and only a few extra minutes, Marion Wilson, housewife and mother of four little children, discovers how to be glamorous inside the house as well as out!

With her son, now King George VI, in crown and coronation ermine, Queen Mary acknowledged the cheers of the crowds outside Buckingham Palace with thoughts, perhaps, of her first son, "darling David," who had abdicated the throne for "the woman I love."

"My feeling as your mother remains the same," wrote Queen Mary to oldest son after his abdication "Our being parted—and the cause of it—grieves me beyond words."

PRINCESS May

CONCLUSION

The first months of the new reign and of her widowhood made little outward change in the circumstances or the order of Queen Mary's daily life. She was no longer queen consort, but, since the king was a bachelor, she was not queen dowager either. She continued living in Buckingham Palace, where the king set up a small office for transacting business, retaining New York House as his temporary home. Queen Mary occupied herself in the sad task of sorting her late husband's papers and possessions. She also embarked on the redecoration of Marlborough House, where she was henceforth going to live.

On July 30, 1936, Queen Mary left Buckingham Palace, where her own rooms were about to be dismantled, and drove to Sandringham. On arriving at Sandringham she wrote a letter to the king, for she felt—as she had so often felt with her own husband—that she had not been very successful in expressing her thanks to him by the spoken word:

"I fear I was very quiet today when you came to see me but I feel sure you realised that I felt very very sad at leaving those lovely comfortable rooms which have been my happy Home for 25 years, & that I was terribly afraid of breaking down—It was dear of you to come & see me off & I thank you with all my heart. . . . It is very nice here & peaceful & I am sure I shall like it, but I miss dearest Papa quite dreadfully, even more than in London & his rooms look so empty and deserted without him; I forced myself to go in & look round but felt very sad. Papa adored this place & I love it, it is full of so many happy memories of my whole married life, tho' of course Papa & I went through sad times too—especially when poor Grannie became so frail those last two years."

That summer, breaking with his father's tradition of spending August on the grouse moors, King Edward VIII had chartered a yacht, the Nahlin, in which, escorted by two destroyers, he proposed to cruise with a small staff and a few of his personal friends off the Adriatic coast.

To the world at large, and specifically to the public of the United States of America, the short cruise of the Nahlin was the subject of violent curiosity and loud conjecture, for it was known that among the guests aboard the yacht was a married lady from Baltimore, Mrs. Wallis Warfield Simpson; and to everyone but the readers of the discreet and loyal British press it was equally known that the bachelor King Edward VIII and Mrs. Simpson were in love. Dogged by reporters, photographers and tourists wherever they landed, the party found their only true privacy aboard the yacht.

On September fourteenth King Edward got back to London. He went that night to dine with his mother at Buckingham Palace. "Greeting her," he writes, "I wondered how much she knew about the stories appearing in the American press. But her conversation told me nothing." Queen Mary asked him whether he had enjoyed the cruise of the Nahlin. "Didn't you find it terribly warm in the Adriatic?" she inquired. "Her curiosity about the simple details of the voyage," the Duke of Windsor recalls, "reminded me of how she used to talk to us when we returned from school."

Queen Mary, who had spent most of the day arranging furniture at Marlborough House, was feeling tired. "David got back from abroad looking very well," she noted in her diary, "—and came to dine with me & we had a nice talk."

To her "darling Lilibet," as bride, Queen Mary gave jewels from her own wedding. After party for the newlyweds she wrote, "I stood from 9:30 to 12:15 a.m.!!! Not bad for 80."

The final emotional shock Queen Mary withstood was the death of son, George VI. At the funeral she walked with young Elizabeth II and the queen mother. "I suppose one must force oneself to go on," wrote the dowager queen to a lifelong friend—and only a month later she died.

WHO BECAME QUEEN MARY

JAMES POPE-HENNESSY

Although Queen Mary had been subterraneously are for many, many months of King Edward II's love for Mrs. Simpson, she had never dis-sed the matter with him, hoping that with time strength of the emotion might evaporate. She d, however, consulted one or two extraneous per-ns in her anxiety and she had even urged the Cab-t to take some sort of "action" before Mrs. mpson's divorce case came up for hearing. Queen ry's anxiety arose, as is well known, from the t that Mrs. Simpson, who was born of a good nily in Maryland, had already divorced one hus-nd and was on the verge of divorcing the second. een Mary's views on divorce were clear and ict: one divorce could seldom or never be justi-d; and to divorce twice, on any grounds whatever, s unthinkable. The possibility of a lady "with o husbands living" marrying her eldest son and coming queen consort was out of all question.

The sequence of events of the winter of 1936 owed that Queen Mary's standpoint was one that s shared by the British Cabinet, and by the ad-nistrations of the dominions, as well as by large tions of British and imperial public opinion.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, first discussed the matter with King Edward VIII at Fort Belvedere on October twentieth. A week later the king saw Mr. Mackenzie King of Canada on the same subject, and on November thirteenth, the king's private secretary, Maj. Alexander Hardinge, wrote the king a letter apprising him that the British press was about to break the long silence it had hitherto preserved about himself and Mrs. Simpson, whose decree nisi had been granted on October twenty-seventh. On November sixteenth King Edward VIII again saw Mr. Baldwin, declaring that he intended to marry Mrs. Simpson and would, if necessary, abdicate the throne.

On the evening of this day the king dined with his mother at Marlborough House. The king's sister, the princess royal, was also present. When, sitting in Queen Mary's boudoir after dinner, the king broached the subject of his feeling for Mrs. Simpson, he found his mother and sister sympathetic; but when they learned that he was prepared to give up the throne in order to marry her, they were astounded and shocked. "To my Mother," writes the Duke of Windsor, "the Monarchy was something sacred and the Sovereign a personage apart. The word 'duty' fell between us. But there could be no question of my shirking my duty." The longer they talked, the more apparent became the divergence of their views.

To Queen Mary her son had two alternatives, two choices which he could make: to give up marrying Mrs. Simpson or to give up the throne. To the king these choices did not seem to exist: he was convinced that he could not endure his present life unless he was married to Mrs. Simpson, that he could no longer carry on as king without her "help and support," and that therefore, in the last resort, he must go. In this sense it seemed to the king that his duty was to leave the throne, while to Queen Mary it seemed equally plain that it was his duty to stay on it.

Not surprisingly, the discussion resulted in a deadlock. Queen Mary's arguments, which have not hitherto been published, were enumerated in a letter which she wrote to the Duke of Windsor eighteen months subsequently—that is to say, in July, 1938:

"You ask me in your letter of the 23rd of June to write to you frankly about my true feelings with regard to you and the

To be published in book form as QUEEN MARY, 1867–1953, by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

"A couple are separated for two months," Rhya said, "and when they meet again they have to behave as strangers."

PART IV The following Sunday, Basil and Julia drove out for a picnic. "Let's have one day together, just ourselves," he said. On the previous afternoon the Indian would have received his message. Early next week he would receive the answer. He had tried to reassure himself. What could the Indian do? He had been imprudent, but he had done nothing wrong. He could not get into any trouble. So he argued, but he was apprehensive. He had the sense of standing on a brink, on a crumbling ledge. For the moment he was safe, but in Kuala Prang that Indian was preparing his reply. At any rate, they had this day.

It could not have been a lovelier day. They drove northward along the main canal. The rice fields on either side were bright with growing plants; water buffaloes wallowed in the mud—some of them had small boys straddling on their heads; an elementary type of windmill, a bare cross of wood on a seven-foot stake, slowly revolved, drawing up water from the canal. The houses were built on stilts. Before each house was a large fishing net, operated on the system of a seesaw. The net was supported by a wide bamboo cross; at the other end of the net was a ladder; when the ladder was released, the net sank into the canal; after a period of immersion, a boy walked down the ladder, lifting the net with his weight. The small fish flashed and glittered in the sunlight as they cavorted in the bottom of the net. Long low canoes were propelled along the canal by a man or a woman standing in the bows.

Basil swung his car away from the canal toward the beach. In a clearing of the bush, boys were playing at cricket with dried palm fronds cut into bats, and a small grapefruit as a ball. "They probably get just as much out of it as the big boys do at Lord's," he said.

"Looking at us they think 'He's getting as much of a kick out of her as Aly Khan got out of Rita Hayworth.'"

Basil put his arm round Julia's shoulders. "You're much more glamorous than Rita Hayworth," he said, "a great deal more."

She smiled at him tenderly. "Please go on thinking that."

They lunched on a lonely stretch of beach. They had brought out a vacuum bottle of rum punch. They swam and came back to their picnic basket.

"Back in England," he asked, "did you ever go punting on the river?"

"Never."

"I'm glad you didn't. I'd have felt jealous if you had."

"You turned up before I'd had time to do anything. I wasn't even a debutante."

"Don't you feel cheated sometimes?"

"Cheated?"

"Perhaps I read too many novels where girls play around, then say to the man they marry, 'I'm glad I've had a bachelor girl's life. Now I shan't feel inquisitive.'"

"Darling, that's defense mechanism. There are a terrible lot of girls who'd give their souls to be able to say, 'The first man who really made love to me is the man I married,' the way I can."

After lunch they drowsed. He rested against a palm tree, his face toward the sea. Julia was curled up on a rug, the picnic basket as a pillow. It was cool and tranquil. He had never felt more at peace.

Next morning there lay on his desk an envelope addressed in the familiar typewriting. He pulled open a drawer and tossed the letter to the back of it. He would look at it after lunch. But the knowledge that the letter was there broke his concentration. He thought, I've got to know.

He began to set out the pieces. He took out his key. "Supermarket Wednesday ten." He swept the pieces back into the box. I won't go, he thought. Nobody can make me. I won't go.

But ten o'clock on Wednesday found him at the supermarket. He was nervous, angry. "Now listen, I'm through with this," he said. "You must understand ——"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

© 1959 by Alec Waugh

FUEL FOR THE FLAME

BY ALEC WAUGH

JON ABBOT

I love to cook—mostly, I suppose, because it's the one truly creative thing about housework.

Cooking to me is poetry

By PHYLLIS McGINLEY

Cooking to me is the poetry of the domestic arts. Moreover, good cooking requires pretty much the same talents as writing good verse—taste, imagination and the patience to take pains.

I speak from the heart. For although I have been writing poetry for more years than it is kind to count, cooking is a recently acquired skill. It's a skill I'm proud of, but I don't recommend anyone's learning it as late in life as I. I had always talked a good meal; but that, I discovered, wasn't the same as assembling one all by myself.

Fortunately, everyone in our house likes to eat, and that, plus what I like to think are certain native abilities, has sustained me. I am apt, however, to serve company a dish that hasn't been family-tested. I recall the day I made a piecrust for the first time, nudged into the venture by a beautiful magazine article. The pastry shell came from the oven looking exactly like the photographs, flaky, light, faintly golden—and just in time for dinner. The only drawback was that it was a shell. I hadn't provided a filling.

However, for buffet dinners (my favorite way of entertaining), I usually cling to the safe and proved: Poulet Marengo, spinach with curried eggs, strawberry mousse. For intimate meals I do braised veal or Russian borsch.

Basically I'm an old-fashioned cook. I love making all-day soups. I even bake my own éclairs. And I concentrate on such simple skills as maintaining a dexterous hand with mashed potatoes and a light one with fried eggs. I would ask any cook to pass those two primary tests. Her potatoes should be fluffy, lumpless and the color of cream, her eggs cooked slowly, slowly, to a perfection of formed white and gently quivering yolk. If she could serve those correctly, then and only then might I trust her with hollandaise sauce.

It is the homely food which most requires a touch of the poet.

Light as down, wondrously fragrant and not too sweet, this strawberry mousse is the perfect way to end an elegant meal.

My favorite company dish is Poulet Marengo—mostly because it looks so luscious, with its pink-and-white nuggets of lobster, red tomato wedges and golden breasts of chicken.

I love a soup whose broth is rich from hours of slow simmering. This borsch takes two days to make, but it's the best I've eaten.

BRAISED VEAL

For this you'll need 2 pounds veal cut for scaloppine. Melt 3 tablespoons butter in a large skillet and begin browning the veal. Sprinkle the meat with salt and pepper, and as the pieces are browned transfer them to a shallow baking dish 8½″ square. When all the veal is browned, melt 2 more tablespoons butter in the same skillet and sauté ½ pound mushrooms, sliced, and 1 Bermuda onion, sliced thin, until tender. Season with 1 clove garlic, crushed, ½ bay leaf crushed, 1 tablespoon tomato paste, ½ teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon each orégano and powdered savory, and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Now blend in 1 teaspoon flour. Finally, add ¾ cup chicken stock and, if you like, 2 tablespoons Marsala or dry red wine. Simmer all together slowly for 5 minutes, then pour over the browned veal. Sprinkle 2 tablespoons finely chopped parsley over all, cover the dish with aluminum foil, and bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F., for 30 minutes. Makes 4–6 servings.

POULET MARENGO

Have your butcher skin and split 4 chicken breasts. Salt and pepper each piece. Heat ¼ cup butter in a large skillet until it begins to foam. Add the chicken breasts and brown them (they'll really be more golden than brown). Now, if you like, spoon 2 tablespoons sherry over the chicken. Remove chicken from skillet, place in a shallow baking dish, cover with aluminum foil and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., 25–30 minutes or until tender. To the skillet add ½ pound mushrooms, sliced, and sauté until tender. You may have to add a little more butter. Now blend in 2 tablespoons flour, add 1½ cups chicken stock and simmer, stirring constantly, until thickened. Season with 1 tablespoon tomato paste, 1 bay leaf, crushed, 2 tablespoons fresh chopped chives (or 1 teaspoon of the dried), ½ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Simmer slowly for 15 minutes. Meanwhile, cook two 10-ounce packages frozen lobster tails by package directions. Remove meat from shell and cut into bite-sized pieces. Add the lobster meat to the sauce along with 3 ripe tomatoes, cored and quartered (you can ripen these unrefrigerated in your own kitchen). Simmer the sauce 5–8 minutes more—until tomatoes and lobster are just heated through. Serve chicken breasts on a large platter topped with the sauce, arranging tomatoes and lobster meat attractively to double as a garnish. Makes 6–8 servings.

CHOCOLATE ÉCLAIRS

For the pastry: Heat together in a small saucepan ½ cup milk and ¼ cup butter until mixture begins to boil. Rapidly stir in ½ cup flour and ⅛ teaspoon salt. Stir and heat until batter leaves sides of the pan and rolls into a ball. Remove from heat and cool slightly. Now quickly beat in, one at a time, 2 eggs, so that the batter is smooth. Cool batter and chill in the refrigerator for about 1 hour. Shape chilled batter into six 2″ rounds on a well-greased baking sheet, allowing 2″ between rounds. Arrange each so that the batter peaks in the center. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for ½ hour. Reduce temperature to moderate, 350° F., and bake for 5 minutes more. Remove puffs from sheet and cool on a wire rack. For the filling: Make up 1 package vanilla-pudding mix according to package directions, but substituting light cream for milk. When the pudding is done, remove from heat and flavor with 1 teaspoon each butter and rum extract and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Cool and then chill well. To make éclairs, cut off the tops of the puffs, fill the bottoms with the pudding, then replace tops. Frost the éclairs with ¼ pound sweet German chocolate which has been melted over boiling water. Makes 6 éclairs. Serve these immediately.

RUSSIAN BORSCH

This is a two-day soup, rich, red and sparkling. Cut as much meat from a 2½-pound beef shin as possible. In a large kettle, melt ¼ cup butter and brown the meat. Now add the bone, 3 carrots, peeled and sliced thin, 3 stalks celery (leaves and all), 3 yellow onions, peeled and sliced, and 2 potatoes, peeled and cut in half. Brown the vegetables slightly in butter. Add 1 quart undiluted beef consommé and simmer, covered, for 1 hour. Now add 4 beets, peeled and sliced, one 1-pound-13-ounce can tomatoes, 1 bay leaf, 2 cloves garlic, sliced, 2 teaspoons salt and, if you like, ½ cup sherry. Turn heat very low and simmer for 4 hours. Cool soup, cover, and refrigerate overnight. In the morning, skim off fat, remove meat and vegetables and strain soup. (By now their goodness has cooked into the broth.) Place the soup stock in a kettle, add 4 beets, peeled and sliced, 2⅔ cups undiluted beef consommé, a few sprigs parsley, 1 onion, peeled and sliced, and 1 tablespoon sugar. Simmer slowly for about 2 hours. Strain again and skim off fat. Serve hot topped with sour cream and chopped fresh dill. Makes about 6 servings. Don't make the portions large, the soup is very rich.

STRAWBERRY MOUSSE

Set two 10-ounce packages frozen strawberries out to thaw. Meanwhile, heat together 2 cups milk, 2½ envelopes unflavored gelatin and ¼ cup sugar, stirring constantly, until sugar and gelatin are dissolved. Remove from heat and cool. Now purée the partially thawed frozen strawberries (or buzz them in a blender) and strain the purée to remove seeds. When the milk mixture is cool, slowly stir in the strawberry purée. Flavor with the juice of 1 lemon and 1 teaspoon orange extract. Chill gelatin mixture until it becomes very thick and syrupy. Then beat until fluffy. Fold in 1½ cups cream, whipped, and chill until mixture begins to thicken, stirring occasionally. Now pour into a 2-quart mold and chill until firm. To serve, unmold on a dessert platter and top with thawed frozen strawberries or raspberries. Makes 8–10 servings.

Tender French pancakes, rolled around a succulent filling of chicken, spinach and sausage, are baked in a creamy, piquant cheese sauce. There are two salads—a ruby jewel of madrilène vegetable aspic, and spiced peaches filled with fruit! It's a party supper to celebrate the beginning of a wonderful, shining New Year!

GALA FOOD AND FESTIVITY

MENU
CREPES SUPREME
COLD HAM SWEDISH LIVER LOAF
SPICED-PEACH SALAD CUPS
JELLIED MADRILÈNE SALAD
EGG SALAD DRESSING
CELERY-OLIVE-AND-RADISH BOWL
WALNUT TORTE COFFEE
PLANNED FOR 6 OR 12

"The New Year, like an Infant Heir to the whole world, was waited for with welcomes, presents, and rejoicings!" It is the gayest, happiest time of the year, when all over the country people join hands and hearts to celebrate with those they love best. Everywhere are good will and good cheer; candles are lighted; there's a mouth-watering array of delicious food with family and close friends to share the gala.

These days, it is a growing part of New Year's tradition to give a joint party. The hostess prepares one main hot dish—in this case, delectable French pancakes stuffed with a luscious chicken, sausage and spinach filling, and bathed in a savory cheese sauce. (Pancakes, sauce and filling may be prepared ahead of time and frozen separately.) The rest of the menu is portable. One guest might bring the big cold Virginia ham, to be sliced on arrival. Or the smooth Swedish liver loaf, also chilled and ready to serve when sliced. There are two salads, a shimmering vegetable-aspic madrilène and a spiced fruit salad (which could serve as dessert for calorie watchers in the party). Walnut torte, layered with whipped cream, regal with its ruby crown of raspberry jelly, is the perfect climax for a really superb supper! In a season of joy and high expectations, this is an evening to look forward to, and to look back upon with pleasure!

SWEDISH LIVER LOAF

Wash 1½ pounds calf's liver. Soak in milk to cover for several hours. Wipe dry. Remove bits of membrane. Cut into pieces and put through the grinder four times with ¾ pound pork fat, 1 medium onion, peeled, and 8 anchovy fillets. Add 3 egg yolks, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Stir in 1 cup heavy cream. Season with 3 teaspoons salt, ¾ teaspoon pepper, ⅛ teaspoon ginger and a pinch of allspice. Stir well. Blend in 3 egg whites that have been beaten into soft peaks. Grease a 7½″x3½″x2½″ loaf pan. Line with paper, and grease that also. Pack in the liver mixture. Cover with greased paper. Bake in a pan of hot water in a slow oven, 300° F., until done—1 to 1½ hours. Cool and chill overnight. Makes 10–12 slices. Plan on 2 loaves for a party of 12, to allow for seconds.

SPICED-PEACH SALAD CUPS

Drain the syrup from a 1-pound-14-ounce can large cling-peach halves, setting the peaches aside for later use. Measure ½ cup syrup into a saucepan. Add 1 cup cider vinegar, ¼ cup sugar, 1 stick cinnamon and 1 teaspoon whole allspice. Mix well. Bring to a boil and simmer gently for 10 minutes. Remove from heat. Add the peach halves and cool. Pour into bowl. Cover with saran and chill overnight, to give peaches time to "spice." To serve, arrange the peach halves hollow side up in individual lettuce cups. Fill peaches with pitted green and red grapes and some mandarin-orange sections. Sprinkle with chopped preserved ginger (about 2 tablespoons). Pass honey French dressing, made by mixing ¼ cup of your favorite French dressing with 2 tablespoons honey and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. The salad and dressing make 6 servings. Double quantities for party of 12.

FROM YOUR HOUSE TO OURS

GALA FOOD AND FESTIVITY

STUART TOWLER

Time to cut the glamorous walnut torte resplendently waiting on the coffee table in the living room. Time, too, for good talk over coffee.

FROM YOUR HOUSE TO OURS

CREPES SUPREME

Crepes: Beat 2 eggs until light and frothy. Stir in ⅔ teaspoon salt and 2 tablespoons melted butter. Mix well and add ⅔ cup flour alternately with 1⅓ cups milk. Beat until smooth. A wire whisk is good for this. Heat ½ teaspoon salad oil in a small skillet (about 5½″ in diameter). Test with a drop of water as you do a pancake griddle. When the water sizzles, pour in a scant ¼ cup batter and turn the skillet quickly to cover the bottom of the pan evenly with batter. If any holes form, cover with a little extra batter. Brown the crepe evenly on both sides and set aside while finishing all the batter. You should have 12–13 crepes (plan on 2 apiece). Fill each crepe with the following filling. Then roll up crepes around the filling and place in a baking dish. Cover with cheese sauce and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., until bubbling, about 30 minutes. Crepes, filling and sauce may be made a day ahead, but should not be combined until the party evening. Serve garnished with sautéed mushroom caps and tomato wedges.

Filling: Remove the casing from a 5-ounce hot Italian sausage and sauté the meat until golden brown, breaking it up with a fork while it is cooking. Drain off all the fat and stir in 1 small clove garlic, peeled and crushed. Cook 1½ packages chopped frozen spinach according to package directions. Press out all liquid and add to the sausage along with 1 cup chopped cooked or canned chicken, ¾ cup grated Parmesan cheese and a dash of onion salt. Mix well, remove from heat and allow to cool. Divide evenly among the 12 crepes.

Cheese Sauce: Melt 6 tablespoons butter and blend in 6 tablespoons flour until a smooth paste is formed. Add 3 cups light cream; heat and stir until thickened. Then add 2 cups grated Parmesan cheese, ½ teaspoon onion juice and a scant ¼ teaspoon curry powder. Continue heating and stirring until cheese melts and flavors are blended. Double the entire recipe for party of 12.

JELLIED MADRILÈNE SALAD

Heat 3 cups canned consommé madrilène with ½ teaspoon each basil and thyme. Meanwhile, soften 2 envelopes unflavored gelatin in ½ cup tomato juice. Add to hot madrilène along with ⅓ cup finely minced onions. Remove from heat. Season with ½ teaspoon seasoned salt, ¼ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon monosodium glutamate, and a dash of pepper. Stir in a few drops liquid pepper seasoning and 2 tablespoons lemon juice. Chill mixture until it begins to thicken. Fold in 1½ cups finely diced cucumber and ¼ cup each diced green pepper and water chestnuts. Turn into a 6-cup mold and chill several hours until firm. To serve, unmold on large platter. Garnish with sliced cucumbers, water cress and lemon wedges. Serve with Egg Salad Dressing. Makes 6 servings. Double recipe for 12, using a large mold or two 6-cup size. Make salad the day before.

EGG SALAD DRESSING

Hard-cook 2 eggs. Cool, peel and finely chop. Slowly add ¼ cup vinegar to ¼ cup salad or olive oil; stir in ½ cup mayonnaise and blend well. Season with ¼ teaspoon each salt and powdered garlic and 1½ teaspoons prepared mustard. Add the chopped eggs along with 3 tablespoons chopped chives and mix well. Chill thoroughly before serving. Makes about 1½ cups salad dressing. Double for party of 12.

WALNUT TORTE

Mix together 3 cups finely chopped walnuts, 1 cup fine commercial toasted bread crumbs and ¼ teaspoon salt. Beat 9 egg yolks until very thick and lemon-colored, gradually adding 1 cup plus 2 tablespoons sugar. This is an important step. Blend in ¾ cup orange juice and 1½ teaspoons grated orange rind. Beat 9 egg whites until stiff but not dry, gradually adding 6 tablespoons sugar, a spoonful at a time, beating well after each addition. Fold the nut-and-crumb mixture into the egg yolks, alternately with the meringue—ending with the meringue. Divide into 2 greased 9″ layer pans lined with waxed paper. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 30 to 35 minutes. Turn out on racks to cool. Whip 2 cups heavy cream and sweeten with ¼ cup confectioners' sugar. Sieve one 12-ounce jar raspberry jam to remove seeds, or break up an equal amount of raspberry jelly with a fork. Put layers of torte together with whipped cream and jam or jelly. Spread top with whipped cream and over this a layer of raspberry jelly or jam. Decorate with more whipped cream, fresh or frozen raspberries and sprigs of mint. Torte layers may be made the day before, but for easy transportation take jelly or jam and cream with you to the party and combine there If you are serving this at home, it may be put together several hours before serving and stored in refrigerator. Makes 12 servings.

3 SOUPER WAYS WITH PORK!

Pork's plentiful! Make it extra-delicious with tangy Campbell's Tomato Soup or smooth 'n wonderful Campbell's Cream Soups. Millions of women know what good things begin to happen whenever you cook with Campbell's Soup! Good flavor – from the just-right seasoning. Good nutrition from wholesome ingredients. Good 'n easy cooking – because soup makes the gravy while it cooks! Make your next pork dinner Sunday-special with Campbell's Soup!

Good 'n easy! Good 'n thrifty!

BARBECUED PORK LOIN. Place 3- to 5-lb. shoulder or loin of pork in shallow pan; roast at 325°F. about 45 min. per lb. One hour before meat is done, pour off drippings. Combine 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup; ⅓ cup each chopped onion and celery; 1 clove garlic (minced); 2 tbsp. each brown sugar, Worcestershire sauce and lemon juice; 2 tsp. prepared mustard; 4 drops Tabasco. Pour over meat. Continue roasting; spoon sauce over meat often.

COUNTRY SKILLET SUPPER. Delicious new way to use weekend leftovers! In skillet, lightly brown 1 med. onion (thinly sliced) in 2 tbsp. shortening. Blend in 1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup, ½ cup milk, 1 tsp. Worcestershire sauce. Add 1 cup cubed cooked pork, 1 cup cubed cooked potatoes, ½ cup cooked peas, dash pepper. Cook over low heat about 10 min.; stir now and then. 3 to 4 servings.

PORK CHOPS 'n STUFFING. Brown 4 pork chops (about 1 lb.) on both sides in oven-proof skillet; pour off drippings. Lightly mix 3 cups soft bread cubes, 2 tbsp. chopped onion, ¼ cup melted butter, ¼ cup water, ¼ tsp. poultry seasoning. Place a mound of stuffing on each chop. Blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup with ⅓ cup water; pour over. Bake at 350°F. about 1 hr. 4 servings – for hearty appetites.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's Soup

PRINCESS MAY, WHO BECAME QUEEN MARY

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

present position and this I will do now. You will remember how miserable I was when you informed me of your intended marriage and abdication and how I implored you not to do so for our sake and for the sake of the country You did not seem able to take in any point of view but your own. . . . I do not think you have ever realised the shock, which the attitude you took up caused your family and the whole Nation. It seemed inconceivable to those who had made such sacrifices during the war that you, as their King, refused a lesser sacrifice. . . . My feelings for you as your Mother remain the same, and our being parted and the cause of it. grieve me beyond words. After all, all my life I have put my Country before everything else, and I simply cannot change now."

On the morning after this harrowing talk at Marlborough House—which had ended with Queen Mary's refusal of her son's suggestion that she should herself see Mrs. Simpson—Queen Mary sent the king a sorrowful, maternal little note: "As your mother," she wrote, "I must send you a line of true sympathy in the difficult position in which you are placed—I have been thinking of you all day, hoping you are making a wise decision for your future—I fear your visit to Wales will be trying in more ways than one, with this momentous action hanging over your head."

That same day Queen Mary received the Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin. During the night the queen's bewilderment and shock had crystallized into a positive exasperation. To give vent to her feelings she reverted, suddenly and unexpectedly, to a Cockney-slang expression of her youth. "Well, Mr. Baldwin," Queen Mary exclaimed, stepping briskly into the room, hands held before her in a gesture of despair, "this is a pretty kettle of fish!"

For Queen Mary these anxious winter days of 1936 were terrible and bleak. In common with a great many other people in positions of responsibility, the queen had very natural fears of what damaging effect an abdication might have upon the position of the monarchy and its influence on the British Empire. All that she valued and admired in life seemed threatened. That a King of England should resign the crown for an overpowering emotion was not a situation for which there had been either precedent or parallel. Queen Mary was heard to remark bitterly, "Really! This might be Rumania!"

All through these days Queen Mary did her utmost to help her two elder sons—the actual king, Edward VIII, and the king of the future, who was still the Duke of York. King Edward came to tea at Marlborough House; after this talk which, like the first one, made no headway, Queen Mary did not see the king for another ten days, since, anxious to avoid public demonstrations, he withdrew to Fort Belvedere. Queen Mary did, however, have news of the king from the Duke of York, who, like the Duchess of York, was dreading his possible accession to the throne. Determined to maintain at least an outward appearance of calm, Queen Mary spent the last week of November doing Christmas shopping, visiting exhibitions and going to look at the London Museum.

It was on December third that the news of the constitutional crisis over the king's wish to marry Mrs. Simpson appeared in all the London papers. The Duke of York, who had been to Edinburgh for two days, has recorded the shock he experienced on reaching Euston Station that morning. "At Euston," he wrote, "I was both surprised & horrified to see that the posters of the Daily Press had the following as their headlines in block letters 'The King's Marriage.'"

Down at Fort Belvedere, where Mrs. Simpson, with her aunt Mrs. Merriman as chaperon, had taken refuge from a curious public, King Edward and his future bride were, as they have told us in their memoirs, equally astounded by the tone of the press.

At Marlborough House, Queen Mary likewise was aghast. "Darling David," Queen Mary wrote at 2:30 P.M. to King Edward, "This news in the papers is very upsetting, especially as I have not seen you for 10 days—I would much like to see you, won't you look in some time today? I shall only be out from 3 to 5—Ever yr loving Mama, Mary."

On receiving Queen Mary's note that afternoon King Edward, exhausted as he was, drove late at night to Marlborough House, where he found the Duke and Duchess of York, who had been dining there. The king explained to his mother that he had refrained from seeing her during the preceding days as he had been anxious to avoid giving her pain. "As simply as I could," he writes, "I explained the reasons for my apparent aloofness. 'I have no desire to bring you and the family into all this. This is something I must handle alone.'

THIN-ICE SKATING SONG

(To the tune of "Hearts in the Snow")

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

Hearts in the snow
Merrily go,
Not a care in the world—
Then let's sing!
Jing-jing

Hearts debonair,
Anything's fair,
Just a game called sweet-hearts-
On-a-string!
Ting-ting

Eyes strangely bright—
Cold wind tonight!
A tear's like a di-Amond ring!
Ring-ring

Hearts come and go,
Hearts in the snow,
But oh, how the wind
Can sting!
Sting-sting
Oh, how the wind can sting!

If she had hoped to learn from me that I had changed my mind, she gave no sign. I left Marlborough House sorry to disappoint her."

"David said to Queen Mary," the Duke of York recorded, "that he could not live alone as King & must marry Mrs. —— When David left after making this dreadful announcement to his mother he told me to come & see him at the Fort next morning."

The king did not, in fact, receive the Duke of York until three days later. On the morning of the eighth the duke called at Marlborough House, and on the following day the queen drove down with her daughter to the Royal Lodge at Windsor, the home of the Duke and Duchess of York. There, in the drawing room of Royal, as the winter afternoon shortened to twilight, Queen Mary heard of her eldest son's irrevocable decision to leave the throne.

"She was already waiting in the drawing-room when I arrived," writes the Duke of Windsor. "I gave her a full account of all that had passed between Mr. Baldwin and myself during the six days since our last meeting on the Thursday before. She still disapproved of and was bewildered by my action, but now that it was all over her heart went out to her hard-pressed son, prompting her to say with tenderness: 'And to me, the worst thing is that you won't be able to see her for so long.'"

Queen Mary's own diary account of this momentous interview is laconic. "Rather foggy day," she wrote. "At 1.30 with Mary to meet David (on business) at the Royal Lodge—Back before 5—Georgie & Marina dined." After dinner, the Duke of York arrived at Marlborough House and with Queen Mary looked at the draft Instrument of Abdication, a document which he himself regarded with revulsion and his mother read with incredulity. "I went to see Queen Mary," the duke recorded, "& when I told her what had happened I broke down & sobbed like a child."

Unlike her mother, the Duchess of Teck, and unlike her mother-in-law, Queen Alexandra, Queen Mary had never been given to an excessive use of exclamation marks. Hardly ever does this useful form of punctuation interrupt or emphasize passages in her diary. In her account of the Duke of York's visit that night the queen did, however, have recourse to the exclamation mark:

"Bertie arrived very late from Fort Belvedere and Mr. W. Monckton brought him & me the paper drawn up for David's abdication of the Throne of this Empire because he wishes to marry Mrs. Simpson!!!!! The whole affair has lasted since Novr. 16th and has been very painful—It is a terrible blow to us all & particularly to poor Bertie."

The following day, King Edward VIII signed the Instrument of Abdication in the presence of his brothers. King George VI succeeded to the throne. "Dark gloomy day," Queen Mary recorded. "I saw Ld Salisbury & the PM—At 3 to Piccadilly to see Elizabeth who was in bed with a cold, too unlucky. The PM made his announcement in the house about David's final decision—which was received in silence & with real regret—The more one thinks of this affair the more regrettable it becomes."

On surrendering the crown, King Edward VIII automatically reverted to the status of a Prince of the Blood Royal and became H.R.H. Prince Edward of Windsor. He had arranged to leave England the night following the public announcement that he was no longer king. Prince Edward therefore asked some of his family to meet him for dinner at Royal Lodge, before he made a farewell broadcast to his former subjects from nearby Windsor Castle.

Sending the prince a note to say how much her thoughts had been constantly with him, Queen Mary commented also upon the "wonderfully dignified manner" in which the Prime Minister had made the abdication announcement in the House of Commons. The queen went on to try to dissuade Prince Edward from making his broadcast: "Don't you think that as he [the Prime Minister] has said everything that could be said," she wrote, ". . . it will now not be necessary for you to broadcast this evening, you are very tired after all the strain you have been & are going through, and surely you might spare yourself this extra strain and emotion—Do please take my advice—Bertie tells me you wish us to meet you at dinner at Royal Lodge this evening, I hope there will not be any fog."

Prince Edward attached the highest importance to this broadcast, which would give him his first opportunity to speak out candidly to the nation and to explain personally and publicly the reasons for his action: "I have made this, the most serious decision of my life," ran one part of his text, "upon a single thought of what would in the end be best for all." He thus kept to his plan and, leaving the new king, his mother, his sister and his two other brothers as well as his uncle, Lord Athlone, and his aunt, Princess Alice, at Royal Lodge after dinner, he drove up to Windsor Castle, where he delivered the broadcast.

"After dinner," Queen Mary recorded, "David made his private broadcast to the Nation which was good & dignified, he did it at the Castle, we listened to it at Royal Lodge." In his broadcast, which concluded with the words: "God bless you all. God save the king!" Prince Edward had paid a tribute to the comfort he had received "during these hard days" from his mother and his family.

When he got back to Royal Lodge t prince relates that he "had the feeling th what I had said had to some extent eased t tension between us." It was by then getti late, and fog still shrouded the Thames valle Queen Mary and the Marlborough Hou party began to think of their drive back London. "And then," wrote Queen Mar "came the dreadful good bye as he was lea ing that evening for Austria. The whole thi was too pathetic for words."

Prince Edward of Windsor took leave of h younger brother the King of England at mi night, on December 11, 1936, and dro through the murk to Portsmouth across t Hartford Bridge Flats. At Portsmouth found the destroyer Fury waiting to carry hi over the Channel. After one of the most dr matic renunciations in history he thus left th shores of the country over which he had rule for a period of just over 300 days.

At his Accession Council next mornin King George VI announced that the first a of his reign would be to confer upon h brother a dukedom, and that he propose the novel title Windsor, which, although had since 1917 been the family name of th reigning house of Great Britain, had nev been a royal dukedom. The Duke of Windso who thus changed his name for the seven time in his life, settled upon the shores of a Austrian lake, there to await the declaratio of the decree absolute of Mrs. Simpson divorce, which would give them liberty marry.

For many months after his departure fro England, Queen Mary's relations with h eldest son were not harmonious; for althoug it was he who had won in that conflict, h mother could never conclude that he had bee right. They kept up a somewhat sporadic co respondence; she would write to say she su posed he must be very lonely in Austria an to assure him "that we are all out to help yo in every way we can." That the abdication wa now an accomplished fact was, to Quee Mary, in itself a reason for not discussing on paper any more. She would send her so small items of personal news such as:

"I went to 2 premières last week in aid c charities & have also been to 2 plays—It wa rather an effort at first as you can imagine no having been out for a year, but I had such charming welcome from the crowds that felt quite encouraged."

Or she would make some noncommitta comment on his activities: "I was intereste in reading you drove through Gmunden where in 1884 my parents Alge & I spent months with the Cumberlands who later bui a big Schloss there. . . . The country all roun is pretty as far as I remember & I did go t Ischyl once."

"We all felt miserable," Queen Mary note in her diary on the day of her second son' Proclamation at St. James's Palace, whic she, the king and his two daughters watche from the Wardrobe Room at Marlboroug House, "at the same time there was a sense o relief that all was settled."

The plain fact was that, as well as feelin miserable, Queen Mary was likewise feelin angry. "H M is still angry with the Duke, & really think that helps her to bear what sh called 'the humiliation' of it all," wrote a old friend with whom the queen dowage "talked hard about the Duke of Windsor an all her troubles" in March, 1937. But, sorrow ful and indignant, Queen Mary had rise magnificently to meet this crisis. The new kin and queen, and indeed the whole of the roya family, recognized how much the smoot transition from one monarch to another owe to Queen Mary's wisdom and popularity "Thank God we have all got you as a centra point, because without it [the family] migh easily disintegrate," one of the family wrote t her at this time.

As might have been expected, now that th intense strain of the abdication crisis was over Queen Mary suffered a physical reaction. Sh became so unwell that she spent Christma hich is Aunt Jemima day at your house?

CONTINUED ON PAGE 74

Could be any day! Aunt Jemimas are drenched with butter and syrup and gobbled up more often than any other pancakes in the world. And now they're so fast to make the easy shaker way shown on every Aunt Jemima package.

Look what you can do that's new: BACON STRIP PANCAKES

Cook strips of hickory-sweet Rath Bacon nice and crisp. Shake up Aunt Jemima Buttermilk batter, pour it over bacon strips on griddle. Bake golden brown on both sides and serve with hot butter and syrup. Great way to say "Good morning!"

If you like pancakes... sure as shakin' they're Aunt Jemimas!

Day and most of that week in her room, although not in bed. On Thursday, December thirty-first, she was able to dine downstairs again and later saw "an amusing Film. Thank God," she wrote on the last day of 1936, "this sad year is over."

In December, 1936, the preparations for the coronation of the bachelor King Edward VIII were well under way, and accordingly the date fixed for this ceremony was kept for the coronation of the new king and queen. "The whole of London is full of stands for the Coronation," Queen Mary wrote to the Duke of Windsor, whose diamond Garter Star she wished to borrow so that she might wear it at his brother's crowning.

By a tradition said to date back to the days of the Plantagenet sovereigns, no British queen dowager had ever attended the coronation of her husband's successor on the throne. Torn between her inborn respect for historical tradition and her inevitable wish to watch a son of hers being crowned as King of England, Queen Mary decided that she would for once herself make a constitutional innovation, and ask the king if she might not witness the Abbey ceremony and take her own part in the coronation procession through London. This decision of Queen Mary's added to the sense of solidarity with which the whole royal family was facing the new reign. It was amply rewarded by wild demonstrations of affection from the crowd: as the procession wound past Marble Arch, for instance, "the cheering redoubled, took on a deeper note, and after the splendid figure of the Blues came a glass coach bearing Queen Mary who never looked happier or more regal. Obviously deeply touched, she smiled and waved her acknowledgments again and again."

Fourteen days after the coronation Queen Mary celebrated her seventieth birthday with a luncheon party at Marlborough House. The third of June was for Queen Mary another, but sad, anniversary, for it had been the birthday of her dead husband, King George V. It was also, that Coronation Year of 1937, the day on which the Duke of Windsor attained his heart's desire: on that morning at the Château de Cande, near Monts in France, he was married to Mrs. Wallis Warfield. Queen Mary had not reconciled herself to her eldest son's marriage to a divorced lady: "Alas! the wedding day in France of David & Mrs. Warfield. . . . We all telegraphed to him," she noted in her diary.

Altogether, it may be said that Queen Mary thoroughly enjoyed the glorious summer of King George VI's coronation. She attended every court function and festivity, went to the Derby, saw the Aldershot Tattoo, took her part as a Dame of the Garter in the Garter Service at Windsor and, later in the same month, wearing academic robes, laid the foundation stone of the new Bodleian Library annex at Oxford.

In August, Queen Mary retired to Sandringham, and in September she stayed for varying lengths of time in four different country houses. While at Sandringham she went to a ball—described in her diary as "a most enjoyable entertainment. I actually took 2 or 3 turns in valses," wrote Queen Mary with legitimate satisfaction, for she was now seventy years of age.

The opening days of 1939 found the royal family as usual at Sandringham. It was a snowy January, but the weeks passed happily enough for Queen Mary, who made an expedition to Lynn to buy snow boots for her brother, visited one or two neighbors, and went to help Miss von Hanno, the devoted lady in waiting of the late Queen Maud of Norway, who was packing up Queen Maud's house, Appleton. Films were now shown regularly after dinner at Sandringham House; Queen Mary, who had the most positive views upon what she liked in the cinema, enjoyed, for instance, the film of Dr. Cronin's novel The Citadel, but found Alexander's Ragtime Band "very vulgar . . . horrid music or not what I call music." On other evenings charades were acted, in all of which Queen Mary took part, and on one occasion she wrote that "We ladies put on funny hats for dinner which was amusing." This holiday atmosphere was a last respite from the somber anxiety which the international situation was once more causing.

On March fifteenth Hitler seized Czechoslovakia. Two days later Mr. Chamberlain denounced him as a perjurer in a famous speech at Birmingham. This was the signal for the commencement of that diplomatic revolution by which Great Britain abandoned "splendid isolation" for a system of guaranties offered to threatened European nations.

A visit to Canada and to the United States had been arranged for King George VI and Queen Elizabeth for that May of 1939. In spite of the now self-evident fact that there was likely to be a European war, the king felt in duty bound to fulfill this obligation. Queen Mary and other members of the family, including the two little princesses, went down to Portsmouth to see the king and queen off. Queen Mary went on board the Empress of Australia and examined the royal cabins with her careful eye for the details of comfort; she judged the cabins "very nice. We then took a tender farewell of them both & landed—The ship left punctually at 3—it was a fine sight from the jetty—& we waved handkerchiefs. Margaret said 'I have my handkerchief' and Lilibet ansd. 'To wave, not to cry'—which I thought charming. We all returned to London by train arriving at 5."

While they were in Canada, the king and queen heard of Queen Mary's motorcar accident, which might well have converted the farewell at Portsmouth into a final one.

By an odd coincidence, the accident occurred seventy years almost to the day after that in which her grandmother, Augusta, Duchess of Cambridge, had been almost killed in May, 1869. In each case these ladies were seventy-one, and in each the royal vehicle was overturned; but, whereas the Duchess of Cambridge's brougham was hit by a hansom cab, modern progress had provided that Queen Mary's maroon-colored Daimler limousine should be hit by a heavy lorry carrying a load of steel tubing. In the accident to Queen Mary's car no one was killed. Traveling with her were Lord Claud Hamilton, her comptroller, and Lady Constance Milnes Gaskell, her Woman of the Bedchamber. The queen was just pointing out to Lord Claud that he had a caterpillar on his trouser leg when there was a thunderous crash of crunching metal, and the queen, Lord Claud and Lady Constance found themselves lying in a heap against the broken windows of the overturned Daimler. "It was a wonder we 5 occupants were not killed," wrote Queen Mary. "I was much bruised & suffered from shock, Claud had a bruised shoulder & Constance a black eye."

Queen Mary's behavior on this occasion won the wholehearted admiration of the London public, as well as of her fellow victims in the motorcar. "She joked with one of the workmen who helped her, and bent to adjust her dress before she was taken into a nearby house while doctors were informed by telephone," wrote a witness. "She had not Her hat or one curl out of place. . . . The only outward sign of disorder was a broken hat pin and Her umbrella broken in half."

On her return to Marlborough House, Queen Mary was found to be not only very severely bruised and shaken, but to have an injury to her left eye from a piece of glass which had, in her own words, "brushed off the film of the eye, a lucky escape." To her diary she admitted that her back "hurt abominably," but she refused to remain in bed longer than ten days; and although she had always been "rather an apprehensive passenger" in a car, she absolutely refused to make any change in her motoring habits, or to allow the world to know how very close she had been to death.

The outbreak of war on September 3, 1939, found Queen Mary at Sandringham. She listened to Mr. Neville Chamberlain's solemn statement that Sunday morning in the little Norfolk church of St. Mary Magdalene, for the rector, Mr. Fuller, had installed his wireless in the nave. "Everyone was silent but it was a tense moment & one could only pray and hope." Like many other worshipers on that fell Sunday, Queen Mary was interrupted at her devotions by the test air-raid alarm which was sounded throughout England at about 11:30.

On September fourth she noted that "an air raid signal at 2.45 drove us from our beds. I dressed hurriedly & descended with the help of Green [detective] to basement. The children were there & behaved beautifully. At 3.30 we heard 'All clear' so I returned to bed but not to sleep!" Later that morning Queen Mary left Sandringham, which she did not see again until 1945, for Badminton House, Gloucestershire, her home for the next five years.

At first Queen Mary was frankly restless at Badminton. She felt isolated from her immediate family—from the king and queen, from her other children and from her grandchildren. She felt cut off from London and from news of what was afoot. King George VI, who suspected that his mother might be feeling out of touch with events, gave instructions that Foreign Office news summaries should be sent down to Queen Mary in an official red leather dispatch box of which she kept the key.

Within the shortest possible time she was hard at work—visiting evacuee children, neighboring factories and workshops, canteens and hospitals. Another aspect of local war work in which Queen Mary became strongly interested was the salvage campaign. Already in the First World War she had inspired the schoolchildren round Sandringham to collect empty bottles. Now that the need was urgent, and the call for salvage was being made upon a national scale, she set to with a will.

"Very cold dull day," Queen Mary noted in her diary for December 19, 1939. "We began the Salvage, namely we searched round the walls of the Vicarage Walk and Kennel Drive, for old bottles, old tins, & scrap iron, we were most successful & filled over a wheelbarrow full—We are doing this at the request of the Ministry of Supply—& I hope to start it in all the villages in the neighbourhood." . . . "Some of the [Birmingham evacuee] children came to help," she recorded of another salvage operation, "& we salvaged old bones, tins, etc., evidently an old rubbish heap—while others cut down elders—I raked away a lot of rubbish."

Queen Mary contrived a busy, useful life herself at Badminton House. Her interes all local happenings, her patent enjoymen the simplest country pastimes, her consid ation for others endeared her to all on Badminton estate. It compensated for mu that she had lost by leaving London.

The pattern of Queen Mary's daily life Badminton was now set. It was altered only bad weather or by her hay fever or occasio colds in the head. Even bad weather was i permitted to deprive the queen of exercise, which she firmly believed. "Rained all day top of slushy snow," she recorded in Janua 1941. "Dick & I walked on a sanded path I h had made between the 2 conservatories, walked like 2 caged lions or bears for nea an hour! The air was good & it was not ve cold."

In the year 1942, that of her seventy-fif birthday, Queen Mary had arranged to p a couple of visits to Windsor Castle—t first, in March, for the confirmation of Pri cess Elizabeth (who her grandmother thoug "looked so nice in white with a small veil was quite composed"), the second for t christening on August fourth of the Duke a Duchess of Kent's third child and second so Prince Michael, who had been born that Jul

Nine days after the christening, Queen Ma motored to Coppins, the former home of h sister-in-law, Princess Victoria, who had le the house to the Duke of Kent in her wi This was a particularly satisfactory visit: "Th baby is sweet—Had luncheon & tea there Walked in the garden—Georgie showed n some of his interesting things." The happ cultivated family life of the Duke and Duche of Kent gave Queen Mary especial pleasur "he looked so happy with his lovely wife the dear baby," she wrote of that day with he youngest son.

The morning of August twenty-fifth, a Tues day of heavy and continuous rain, Quee Mary went over to Lord Methuen's house t listen to a lecture given in the great pictur gallery there in connection with the Nationa Association of Girls' Training Corps. Th queen afterward looked at the pictures in th gallery, returning to Badminton for luncheon The long, wet afternoon was spent arrangin photographs in Queen Mary's huge scarle folio albums. After dinner a telephone mes sage came from Balmoral to tell Queen Mar that the Duke of Kent was dead.

The Duke of Kent, who was thirty-nine had been killed instantaneously when the air plane in which he was traveling to inspec RAF establishments in Iceland had smashe into a hillside at Morven. Once Queen Mary had recovered from the first shock—"I felt so stunned by the shock I could not believe it," she wrote—her immediate thought was for her daughter-in-law, and so she set off the next morning for Coppins to try to comfort the Duchess of Kent. The duke's funeral took place in St. George's Chapel on August twenty-ninth; to attend this Queen Mary spent her first night away from Badminton since the war began.

Never, perhaps, in her whole life did Queen Mary display more Christian fortitude or a greater power of self-control than over the death of the Duke of Kent. All her thoughts were concentrated on her son's widow and his children. On the way back to Badminton from the funeral the queen gave a lift in her limousine to "a charming young American parachutist, most friendly," and to "a nice Sergeant Observer (Air Force) who had taken part in the raid on Dieppe last week," and succeeded in talking to both of them in her natural, amiable way.

This lift in her motorcar was not a solitary occurrence. As soon as she had grasped the idea that she could thus help members of the forces whom her motor passed trudging along the roads, Queen Mary had given orders to her chauffeur that they were to stop and invite any pedestrian soldier, sailor or airman into her car. She felt that she was in this way being of practical use; but these chance encounters had another, unexpected, result: they taught Queen Mary much that she had never had an opportunity of learning about the average life of the average young. Members

CONTINUED ON PAGE 76

ONE OF THE MOST EXCITING WOMEN IN THE WORLD: LONDON

ENID BOULTING, glamorous, chic—and on-the-go every minute. The mother of 3 lively boys, she is also a talented dress designer, a serious painter and a noted hostess for her famous film-producer husband. . . ."I often have frantic days but my face never shows it." She uses Pond's Cold Cream to deep-cleanse—to moisturize and ease away tension lines . . ."My skin stays beautifully soft and smooth."

She's busy... yet she's beautiful... she uses Pond's

ENID BOULTING says: "Pond's beautifies as it cleanses!" Yes, with this one cream you need never be too busy to be beautiful. This fabulous cream deep-moisturizes as it cleanses and freshens every tiny pore. And this richer cream goes on moisturizing long after you tissue it off. "Plumps up" the skin cells so tired lines can smooth out. Your skin will stay soft and smooth. See it come alive and glow with an exciting new beauty—like Enid Boulting's. Use Pond's Cold Cream to beauty-cleanse at night, to moisturize under make-up all day.

NOW! POND'S COLD CREAM IN STUNNING NEW DESIGNER JAR!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 74

of her household agree that during the Badminton period Queen Mary became more democratic than ever before, and that she benefited enormously by her glimpses of the ordinary, everyday life of England.

Queen Mary stayed on at Badminton until the Allied victory was complete, returning to Marlborough House on June 11, 1945. Before leaving, Queen Mary gave separate audiences to the nine heads of departments on the Duke of Beaufort's estate. Tears streaming down her face, she handed to each a carefully selected present. "Oh I have been happy here!" she said. "Here I've been anybody to everybody, and back in London I shall have to begin being Queen Mary all over again."

In the great ground-floor reception rooms at Marlborough House, which had been damaged by blast, ceilings were down, doors blown from their hinges and most of the windows were boarded up and had no glass. Nonetheless, Queen Mary had made a series of expeditions to her house that spring to assess which parts of it could most swiftly be made habitable. By May thirty-first she found that her own suite of rooms on the first floor was "beginning to look quite nice" again. "It is such a joy to be at 'home' again at last," Queen Mary wrote to Sir Owen Morshead when she had been settled back at Marlborough House a week. "I am gradually unpacking all my things, but cannot arrange them, as all the windows in my drawing rooms library and dining room are still out with little hope of their being mended yet."

Distinguished foreign visitors began to call at Marlborough House almost as soon as the queen dowager's personal standard was broken from the rooftop; the first of these was General Eisenhower, who was received in audience on the very day following that of Queen Mary's return: "such a nice man, he came over here to receive the Freedom of the City."

It was on Friday, October 5, 1945, that Queen Mary at length saw her eldest son again. "Lovely day," she recorded. "Lunched with Bertie who arrived this morning from Balmoral. At 4 David arrived by plane from Paris on a visit to me—I had not seen him for nearly 9 years! it was a great joy meeting again, he looked very well—Bertie came to dinner to meet him."

With her customary unswerving consistency of mind, Queen Mary would never go so far as to meet her eldest son's wife, but when the duchess was ill in New York in February, 1951, the queen wrote to the duke: "I feel so sorry for your great anxiety about your wife, and am thankful that so far you are able to send a fair account so we must hope the improvement will continue. Do write me a short account of what has really happened."

On May 26, 1947, Queen Mary realized with something of a shock that she was eighty years old. The eulogies of herself in the newspapers, a special film of her career, a program devoted to her favorite airs on the BBC all pleased her, but combined to bring home to Queen Mary that her expectation of life was on the wane. She stoutly resented the onset of old age: "so tiresome getting old!!!" she wrote, and "It is a great bore getting old!!!"

The engagement, in July, 1947, of Princess Elizabeth to Prince Philip of Greece pleased Queen Mary. "Heard with great pleasure of darling Lilibet's engagement to Philip Mountbatten," she wrote on July tenth. "They both came to see me after luncheon looking radiant." She gave her granddaughter the jewelery which had comprised her own chief wedding present. Queen Mary thoroughly enjoyed her granddaughter's wedding. On November eighteenth she went to an evening party at Buckingham Palace: "Saw many old friends, I stood from 9.30 till 12.15 a.m.!!! not bad for 80."

The birth of Prince Charles in November, 1948, gave Queen Mary a fresh interest: "I am delighted at being a great grandmother!" On December fifteenth she attended the child's christening in the Music Room at Buckingham Palace. "I gave the baby a silver gilt cup & cover which George II had given to a godson in 1780," she recorded, "—so that I gave a present from my gt grandfather, to my great grandson 168 years later—"

Excitement over the birth and christening of Prince Charles was, however, modified by anxiety about the health of his grandfather, King George VI, who was suffering from a thrombosis in the leg, in consequence of which the family's Christmas could not be celebrated at Sandringham. The court remained in London. In March of the new year, 1949, an operation on the king's leg was performed, with seeming success.

Queen Mary had now begun to find, to her deep chagrin, that walking tired her, and she reluctantly resigned herself to the intermittent use of a wheel chair. In the winter of 1949–50 she was attacked by sciatica, which did not relinquish its grip until the summer.

The queen's vitality was unimpaired, but she could no longer take part in many public functions, and when the president of the French Republic, M. Vincent Auriol, and his wife came to London on a state visit in March, 1950, Queen Mary confined herself to waving to them from the little balcony outside her sitting room, as they passed by in procession up the Mall. In June, 1950, the sale of the carpet which she had worked, and which had been sent on a dollar-raising tour to the United States and Canada, delighted Queen Mary: "Saw Dow. Ly Reading who told me my Carpet had been bought for Canada by the 'Im. Daughters of the Empire' for £35,000 to which may be added more money by degrees—This is my gift towards the National Debt—!!"

Neither exhaustion nor a public appearance in a wheel chair could deflect Queen Mary from her determination to attend the service at St. Paul's Cathedral in May, 1951, at which King George VI initiated the Festival of Britain, held to commemorate the centenary of the Great Exhibition which Queen Victoria had opened in May, 1851. "A hundred years ago today," Queen Mary reflected, "my mother was present at the Opening of the

Now! Change your colors as easily as you change your mind!

Rit lets your washer do the work!

Rit Royal Blue did the trick here.

Just push the button on your washer ...RIT COLOR will do the rest!

Draperies and bedspread dyed with Rit Fuchsia.

Rit Yellow brightened this spread and drapes.

Rit is designed for washer dyeing. So safe, so sure, it's recommended by leading washer manufacturers!

Bored with your bedroom? It's easy to color it "new" again with Rit and your washing machine. For everything from a bedspread to lingerie, Rit will give you the smoothest, evenest, most luscious colors. And only Rit, with its exclusive formula for washer dyeing, can give you such rich tones of black, navy and other dark colors in your washer!

No boiling, no stirring—your washer does the work. And on any fabric, too. If your machine can wash it, your machine can dye it. (Of course, glass and mineral fibres are out.) Rit works wonders for washbasin items, too . . . and so-o-o easily!

We're so sure you're going to love Rit we make this promise: If you follow directions and you're not delighted with the results you get, send us the article and we'll re-dye it at our own expense.

Rit is made of the world's finest dyes—so it gives you the world's finest home dyeing. Take your pick of 35 heavenly colors, plus hundreds of wonderful color recipes. And try Rit Color Remover, to go from dark colors to light.

You're so Bright when you use RIT® COLOR

51—when she was 17—& now I her daughter was present at this opening at the age of arly 84—Lovely service—most impressive, rtie's speech on the steps of St. Paul's was y good—At 4 o'clock I went for a drive to the decorations in the streets which were tty."

For Queen Mary, in her eighty-fifth year, still held anguish in store. In September ile he was at Balmoral, the king developed at seemed to be a heavy cold on the chest. turning to London, he underwent a bronoscopy which showed, although His Majy did not himself know it, that he had deoped cancer of the left lung. On Sunday, ptember twenty-third, an operation, made the more hazardous by the probability that might give rise to a coronary thrombosis, s performed. Queen Mary spent "a dread- morning of anxiety" at Marlborough ouse, while reports were telephoned to her om the palace. The reports were only "fairly isfactory": "there must be great anxiety for veral days," Queen Mary wrote. She had en to see the king three days before the eration and had found him "very thin but ry plucky & reasonable," but when she ally saw him after the operation she thought n "looking wonderful after his dreadful deal—he was sitting in the room beyond his iting room—we had a nice talk."

The king was well enough to go with his mily to Sandringham for Christmas where ueen Mary busied herself, as usual, arrang- g Christmas presents in the ballroom, and s able, each evening, to dine downstairs. Norfolk in midwinter did not provide an al climate for an octogenarian lady suffer- g from rheumatism, and Queen Mary acrdingly left Sandringham House on the teenth of January. She had left the king an optimistic mood about his health: "I am eing all my doctors next Tuesday morning, I hope they will be pleased with my progss," he wrote to his mother. At this examinon, the doctors expressed themselves deghted with King George VI's condition.

The next day, Princess Elizabeth and the uke of Edinburgh went to Marlborough ouse, to take leave of Queen Mary before eir departure for a five months' tour of frica, Ceylon, Australia and New Zealand. felt," Queen Mary wrote, "very sad at hav- g to take leave for such a long time." The llowing morning Queen Mary watched her anddaughter's standard being hauled down om the roof of Clarence House, and listened n the wireless to the account of the farewell enes at London Airport, where the king, atless and in a high wind, was waving his aughter good-by.

The days following Princess Elizabeth's drture for Nairobi were busy ones at Marlborough House. Queen Mary received Prince Xavier of Bourbon-Parma. She went to tea with the princess royal, drove in Richmond Park, and visited the Royal School of Needlework to arrange about the finishing of a new carpet she had started to make the year before.

At 9:30 A.M. on Wednesday, February sixth, Queen Mary was, as was usual at that hour, working in her sitting room when her Woman of the Bedchamber, Lady Cynthia Colville, asked to see her. Looking steadily at Lady Cynthia as she came through the door, Queen Mary asked, "Is it the king?" Lady Cynthia answered that a telephone message had just come from Sandringham to say that King George VI had been found dead by the valet who had gone to call him that morning.

From this, the last great emotional shock of her life, Queen Mary did not recover. Her household noticed that from now on the old queen aged rapidly. Even so, she did not give in. To a lifelong friend, Lady Shaftesbury, Queen Mary made one of her rare references to the likelihood of her own death. "I suppose," she said suddenly, "one must force oneself to go on until the end?"

"I am sure," replied Lady Shaftesbury, "that Your Majesty will."

Many foreign relatives had come over for the funeral, and Queen Mary saw several of these in the days that followed. She also, with characteristic vigor, set about making a new will, and sorting out her possessions. There was no morbidity in these proceedings, which were merely sensible measures based on recognition that she could not live forever.

The new year, 1953, was that of the coronation of Queen Elizabeth II. Queen Mary, who drove out in Hyde Park in February to look at the stands being erected along the processional route, let it be known at Buckingham Palace that, should she no longer be there to attend the coronation, this solemnity must on no account of mourning be postponed.

On February ninth, a "horrid & cold" day, Queen Mary drove for the last time through the London in which she had been born and which she loved. She did not go out again. As an icy February gave way to an overcast and wind-swept March, it was clear to those around her that Queen Mary was dying. Yet, on the very threshold of the grave, the queen retained her interest in all that she had most liked in life. On the night before she died, she asked to have a book about India read aloud to her, and the last letter Queen Mary wrote concerned a work of art. Dated March eighteenth and addressed to a friend who had sent her a catalogue of the Goya Exhibition at Basel, this letter reads:

"I feel weary and unwell but your charming catalogue of the Goya pictures has given me great pleasure. I particularly like the portrait of Marianito Goya with the silk hat—as one sees it was painted with great love."

During the evening of March 24, 1953, Queen Mary died.

On a lowering day in March, to the roll of funeral drums and the military sound of marching feet, the body of Queen Mary was borne slowly and majestically through the London streets, held empty of traffic by lofty barriers painted, in mourning, royal purple.

On the thronged pavements Londoners stood silent and bareheaded. Most of those in that crowd could scarcely recall a period in which Queen Mary had not seemed an essential part of life in London, personifying for them all that was noblest in their country's tradition. They were conscious—some sharply, others dimly—that on that chilling afternoon they were mourning the unique.

For it was Queen Mary's crowning reward, as it is the fundamental lesson to be drawn from any contemplation of her life, that, by undeviating service to her own highest ideals, she had ended by becoming, for millions, an ideal in herself.

JANUARY NIGHTS

By MARGARET R. GOULD

The winter night is cold,
The snow is deep and bare;
Nothing breathes or moves
Under Orion's stare.

The Dog Star bays the sky:
The Hunter sees his prey
Escape across the dark
And vanish into day.

All night the silent chase
Crosses the snowbound sky;
Only the creaking elm
Sees the wild hunt go by.

Warm-hunched, the children sleep,
Each bed a quiet mound;
But in their dreams they sense
Orion and his hound.

TELLING YOUR CHILD ABOUT DEATH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

egree of worrisomeness that is already a part the child's personality when he first hears out death.

Another factor that is highly significant is e parent's basic attitude toward death. The erson who dreads it, either openly or secretly, ill have a hard time presenting it philosophilly to his child. Usually a child's first questons come unexpectedly, giving the parent no me to compose the ideal explanation. The other who is unworried about anything (who oesn't fear or even think about her own emise, who is not apprehensive about whether e might upset her child with an unskillful exanation) will in general be able to use words nd exhibit a manner which imply that death pretty remote and really not worth bother- g about now. The parent who takes death ore solemnly, but who has a strong religious ith that to return to God—when the proper me comes—will mean the ultimate happiness, ill communicate her serenity to her child, hether or not he catches the exact meaning her words.

A mother who regards the viewing of the ead at a funeral as a morbid and barbaric stom would not let her child see the body of deceased relative, and if she saw an accident the street when she was with her child she'd make every effort to detour around it and distract his attention. She would be very right to protect him so, because he would probably absorb the full impact of her own horror.

Another mother, brought up to consider a wake one of the fundamental ceremonies of human existence, might consider it quite proper to let her child see the body of a relative. And her feeling of familiarity with death would make the experience for the child quite different from what it would otherwise be. I am not trying to judge whether one or the other of these opposite parental attitudes is the more wholesome. In either case the specific impact on the child will also depend on his individual personality make-up.

Though the basic personalities, philosophies and adjustments of child and of parent are of the greatest importance in how any child accepts the idea of death, this doesn't mean that the form of the explanation is of no consequence.

Needless to say, I would avoid, in a religious discussion of death with a young child, any reference to hell-fire, or to the possibility that he might not please God or reach heaven. Knowing that for him going to God, no matter how beautifully described, would be no compensation for being separated from his parents, I would picture our whole family as eventually growing old, dying and going to live together in heaven, ignoring the age difference for the time being, until the child is at a more independent and understanding stage. For a nonreligious explanation, I myself would point out that death won't come for many years, until we are all old and tired. And then—I would say—we'll just stop breathing and moving and feeling (without drawing any comparison with sleep). If the occasion of the talk were the death of a child whom my child knew, I'd admit that once in a great while a child gets very sick or has an accident and dies, but I'd also explain (without getting so tense about it that my reassurance sounded forced) that most people don't die until they are very, very old. Then I'd grin and hug my child and tell him that we're all going to live together for a long, long, long time.

Another time I'll discuss the much more complicated as well as tragic situation when a member of the immediate family dies. What we have learned about this throws light on children's reactions to other, more ordinary happenings.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

Corn, Callous Bunion Pain Stops Fast!

No other method like Dr. Scholl's!

Shape for Corns and Sore Toes.

No waiting for action when you use soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. Just the pads alone on corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes stop pain almost instantly . . . ease new or tight shoes . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop.

Heart shape for Callouses, Pain, Burning here.

Special shape for Bunions, Enlarged Joints.

Special shape for Corns Between Toes.

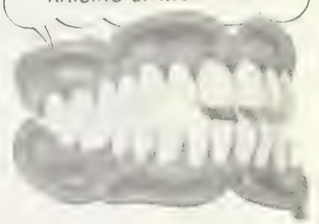
Remove Corns, Callouses

Used with the separate Medications included in every box, Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads remove corns, callouses one of the fastest ways known to medical science! Get a box today. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. and 5-10¢ Stores everywhere.

For FREE Sample Packet of all sizes and Foot Care booklet, write Dr. Scholl's, Dept. Z-6, Chicago 10, Ill.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

PUT A STOP TO



"CONSTIPATION MISERY"!

Millions of people have found it is quite unnecessary to suffer cramps, headachy digestive upset and other miserable results of taking a laxative. At the same time they get prompter, more dependable results than from other laxatives.

They use Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets, the pure vegetable "prescription" containing the ingredient "of greatest value" for relieving intestinal overtenseness present in most constipation. Another ingredient promotes flow of intestinal lubricant to soften dry, hardened wastes. No griping. No stomach distress because it works in bowel lower down.

Proved 58% more effective than 6 other laxatives in hospital test. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets at any drug store.

NOW! EAT BETTER, FASTER, MORE COMFORTABLY WITH FALSE TEETH BY RAISING BITING POWER!

When false teeth get on your nerves many dentists give special FASTEETH powder. It helps hold teeth in place—helps keep them from slipping or dropping down when you talk—makes you feel more secure. FASTEETH cushions tender gums so you can bite harder and eat easier, faster with greater comfort. FASTEETH helps you laugh and speak more clearly without embarrassment. FASTEETH is alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). At drug counters everywhere.

Now, pearls are a girl's best friend

Tussy Liquid Pearl, that is!

The precious, pearly cleanser that treasures your complexion

Meet the cleanser that has "it"—just what a girl needs to keep her complexion in a state of perfection. It's Tussy Liquid Pearl—with two wonderfully persuasive ways no ordinary cleanser possesses!

First, this precious, pearly lotion vamps away all the paint and powder—quickly and surely—leaving your face deep-down clean.

Then, creamy Liquid Pearl pours on the flattery of dew-fresh moisture . . . makes your skin feel soft and young—never, ever dry and dreary!

And imagine, this treasure costs just $1.00, plus tax. No wonder this pearl is any girl's best friend!

TUSSY cares for you

© 1959 TUSSY, 445 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK

WHERE AND WHEN DOES DELINQUENCY START?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

beating. It was an organized gang. Juvenile inquency isn't some abstract problem of a oup of unfortunate people remote from us. is right here. It affects all children and all nilies directly and indirectly.

MR. BRUCE GOULD: And the boy who gets aten by young gangsters is likely to find a y to do a little beating himself—or he may come an intimidated citizen the rest of his . Many businessmen cave in when the gang-rs come around. When one person, or one oup, gives way to even small corrup-n —

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Fear is a very de-uctive force. You are touching on some-ng I feel is basic to any consideration of the havior of youth. Those of us in government d those in business have a responsibility to nduct our affairs in a way that sets stand-ds of honesty. I think we all must examine r own activities to see if we are in any way ing down a shady road—or condoning or ven tolerating those who do. Example is, ter all, the great teacher.

MISS HICKEY: We are impressed by the im-ediate and practical steps you are taking to em the tide of juvenile crime in New York tate. We are especially impressed by your un-erstanding of the need to prevent the young-ers from taking the road to violence in the rst place.

MRS. GOULD: There are two phases of the roblem that interest me deeply. One is the evelopment of programs throughout this na-on for youth who are unable to do well in igh school and for whom school is a frustra-on and opportunities for employment almost onexistent. The other is, what can be done t the very earliest age to improve their home nvironment? Many have no real homes, ractically from birth.

CHILDREN NOBODY LOVES

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Let's start at the arliest possible age, which is where the family, there is one, ought to start. This is the area f the most tragic failure one sees—young peo-le growing up without love, without a sense f being wanted, without security, without xample or standards of any kind or any form f discipline. Such conditions leave a child ery little with which to face the world. If uvenile delinquency is to be prevented, the ommunity must find a way to reinforce such amilies and provide ways for these very young children to get some of the things they do not get at home. They must be given love and some sense of belonging.

Next to one's own family, or a foster family, the church is most important for instilling moral and spiritual values and setting standards for the young. I have a daughter whose husband is a minister. For a time they worked in an area of the Bronx where less than twenty-five per cent of the group attending church came from united families.

MR. THEODORE HOUSER: My experience, of course, has been entirely in Chicago. We find that when people of standards and substance move out of a deteriorating neighborhood to the outskirts or to the suburbs, their church moves with them, and no other church replaces it. In one area in Chicago the number of churches has declined from twenty-six to five.

While I fully agree with the importance of churches, there is a need for an agency of some kind to supply what ought to be the church's influence when the church is just not there. I have said this to church groups in Chicago many times, and it is one of their big problems. Who is going to better a town if not its churches?

MRS. GOULD: But isn't it true that a rather high percentage of children called delinquent come from homes where the church isn't welcomed? They are not exposed to religious influences. I am concerned about those young children who literally have no home—and there are many of them. And it is almost impossible for anyone to adopt them. I was told of one such sorry situation only recently. The mother has been married three times and has lived with other men between marriages; she has three children; she has been in prison twice (one of her husbands committed armed

PARTICIPANTS IN THE JUVENILE-DELINQUENCY FORUM

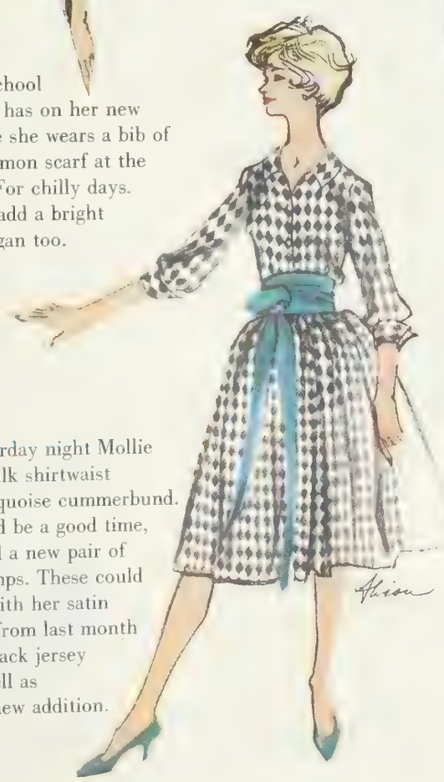
ELSON ROCKEFELLER, Governor of the ate of New York, previously served the Fed-al Government as Co-ordinator of Inter-merican Affairs, as Under Secretary of ealth, Education, and Welfare, and as a spe-al presidential adviser to President Eisen-ower. Elected governor of New York in 58, he has applied himself with energy and umen to state problems and taken out-anding leadership in efforts to combat juve-le delinquency.

HEODORE HOUSER, retired chairman the board of Sears, Roebuck and Co., a member and former vice chairman of the usiness Advisory Council to the U.S. Secre-ry of Commerce and chairman of the Re-arch and Policy Committee of the Commit-e for Economic Development. He relin-uished the presidency of the Chicago Metro-olitan Y.M.C.A. and soon was named vol-nteer national chairman for funds and mem-ers for the 1960 Red Cross campaign. hrough his Y.M.C.A. experience he became oroughly familiar with the problems of deal-g with youth gangs in Chicago and has a eep personal interest in seeking causes of venile crime and cures for young offenders.

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

The Seasonless Dress

Barbara J. thinks now is the perfect time to take stock of her wardrobe and to start thinking about additions for a brand-new season ahead. Meanwhile, for a midwinter lift to a midwinter mood, she looks for something bright and gay that won't dip too deeply into future fashion $'s.



Mollie Farnham, our Barbara J., makes her one investment, a silk-print shirtwaist dress, and adds bright accessories already in her wardrobe. The dress will go well under her winter coat, alone it will be perfect for spring and . . . for that matter, it will be pretty any season! By BET HART

PHOTOGRAPH BY PAUL HIMMEL DRESS BY MARY HERRICK

Mollie's first investment for the New Year is a print in a black-and-white harlequin design. The shirtwaist top has three-quarter sleeves, the skirt is full and can be billowed out prettily with a petticoat. The fabric is pure silk. The price, $17.95, takes only a small dip into future spring-fashion $'s.

A day in school and Mollie has on her new dress. Here she wears a bib of pearls, a lemon scarf at the waistline. For chilly days she might add a bright wool cardigan too.

Mollie has a tiny waistline and accents it here with a bright red belt. A crisp white dickey fills the neckline.

For a Saturday night Mollie likes the silk shirtwaist with a turquoise cummerbund. Now would be a good time, too, to add a new pair of bright pumps. These could be worn with her satin separates from last month and her black jersey suit, as well as with her new addition.

Spring may be only a thought for the future, but Mollie pretends it's already here. She fills the neckline of the dress this time with a white scarf and adds a pink flower.

robbery and she assisted), and yet she will not release her children for adoption. Isn't it time that the state or society consider providing substitute homes for children who do not, in any true sense of the word, have a home?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: This raises a question about the Federal Government program on aid to dependent children. This assistance is available only if there is no father in the home. The law, therefore, unwittingly encourages illegitimacy and even desertion of a family. If a father is out of a job, our experts tell me, the only way the children can get this aid is for the father to leave the family.

The state and the local community, as well as the Federal Government, do assume a financial responsibility for dependent children—it is a fast-growing item on both state and Federal budgets. But, you might say, we are assuming a financial responsibility without a full social, or human, responsibility. I find this a very challenging proposition. Through aid to dependent children we do have direct ties with these people. I certainly feel a broader approach is needed in this area. Of course I am sure our volunteer social agencies do know about many of these families, but they do not have the power, without a court order, to take children out of bad home environments and get them into new environments where they can be given security and develop characters.

MR. HOUSER: I have faced this problem through my connection as president of the Metropolitan Y in Chicago. We had many branch Y.M.C.A.'s in deteriorating or slum areas. Should we close them up and build Y's in the suburbs? We said no; if the Y.M.C.A. is to have the support of the business and civic leaders, it must play a vital part in meeting this great social problem. First of all, we rehabilitated and made more attractive the Y's in declining neighborhoods—and we faced the fact that the rougher sort of youngster will not come into a Y.M.C.A. He thinks it is a sissy sort of thing.

We started what we called a detached-worker program with the approval of the police department. Each detached worker became a sort of unofficial sponsor of a given gang. He dealt with its members through persuasion and protected them from the consequences of their acts on some occasions.

The hard core of these gangs are boys not only from broken homes, but from places where there is no home life, literally no home life at all. They are pushed out into the street. They had to join a gang for self-protection. We started with one as an experiment, rapidly expanded the plan and will soon have twelve to fifteen in operation.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: For self-realization too. They are worse than homeless, in some respects, because they are subject to negative influences.

MR. HOUSER: We talked to corporation executives who recognized that somebody had to tackle the job. They agreed to make eve effort to hire these boys if they were willing work. The gang worker gradually broug them into Y activities by saying, "Well, it's awfully hot day—why don't you go over the Y and take a swim? I can fix it up so y won't have to pay anything." And also one one he began to influence them to try to g jobs. In this way one of the most vicio gangs in Chicago was reduced from arou seventy to a very innocuous group of twelve fifteen. Chicago could use seventy or eigh such gang workers.

MISS HICKEY: This is the kind of practic plan we want to get; but let us get back preschool children for a moment—very you children with unfit homes. How do we rea these?

MRS. GOULD: I read about children bei put in jail because they are abandoned. Th are put in jail because there is no other pla for them, in many instances.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Of course th isn't a state-level operation. Each communi must provide day centers, neighborhoo homes and satisfactory places for neglected abandoned children—places they can get ca and love and decent food.

MRS. GOULD: Is there an adequate pr gram for those children?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I think there a good examples, but not adequate facilities t take care of all who need them.

MR. HOUSER: Slum clearance and bett housing, while it may not rehabilitate the kin of parents who abandon their children, m prevent a family from losing all sense of d cency. Families decay at least partly becau they are crowded into one or two ding rooms.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Some of the fi est leaders in this country have come from th slums. Their families were able to overcom the lack of decent housing by less tangible a sets—love, character, initiative, work. On th other hand, some of the worst juveniles hav come from the suburbs. Juvenile delinquenc doesn't develop because of economic status o deprivation alone. More importantly, it i what the family does or doesn't do that create delinquents.

MR. HOUSER: Certainly, in many cases. On shouldn't minimize the importance of a mini mum standard of housing.

MR. GOULD: If we had methods of investi gation that would prove a family has com pletely disintegrated, has the government right, or should it have a right, to find a sub stitute home for the children? Common sens tells us that if the state had somebody to ob serve and then had the power to act——

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: The social inves tigators of the public-welfare agencies in th communities often do observe these condi tions. Government provides aid to dependen children or, in some situations, home relief

"Just like mommie says—if you catch a cold and get a fever, go to bed and she'll call our doctor to come see you"

WINTER WARNING! A cold with fever is a danger signal . . . often a warning of pneumonia or other serious complications. Never take chances with a "feverish" cold. Call your doctor . . . don't depend on home remedies. His treatment, to be most effective, must be started promptly.

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY©

A MUTUAL COMPANY

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTCARD

Metropolitan Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10, N.Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "Help Yourself to Health," 1-60-J.

Name _____ PLEASE PRINT

Street _____

City & Zone _____ State _____

". . . the same clothes he wore yesterday . . . don't ask him, make him . . . what? . . . he's old enough to make his own bed! . . . well, you tell junior . . ."

T children usually stay where they are—in th home.

MRS. GOULD: When it is recognized that the h ne situation endangers the child, are there a quate alternatives?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: The objective is t reinforce the family. There is certainly a n d for something more when the family is v ually nonexistent. I suppose that adoption, wn parental consent, is one alternative when c ldren do not have a proper home—and it's very carefully handled.

MISS HICKEY: Haven't we become a little it fferent to the mistreated and the neglected c ld?

MRS. GOULD: That is, must the state con- er the home, even if it is not a home, so red that the mother, even if she is not h ther by any definition, must be allowed to k p her children?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I personally uld rather see the church and the social ncies take the leadership in meeting these blems. You get into some fundamental man rights here.

MR. HOUSER: It would be a terrible respon- sility of judgment to decide when and if a ld should be removed from a parent.

MRS. GOULD: There are some circum- nces when the court can render judgment d place children elsewhere—if the father is using his child, if one parent is dead and the her incompetent, ill or imprisoned, when re are no relatives to take the child, and so . But there are many borderline cases. Obvi- isly, none of us wishes to take the child away m the home if it could be rehabilitated, but ien it is quite evident that rehabilitation of home is impossible, is there a way that a ild can be taken from it and placed in a bet- environment?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Without parental nsent, and in the absence of mistreatment d other conditions similar to those you ntion, the answer is no. I don't believe we ow enough about how to take care of chil- en who don't have a good home environ- nt either. There are, of course, some very od child-care facilities, but by no means ough of them. These projects also run into great deal of money.

Our approach to the problem of juvenile de- quency in this state is to spot youngsters o are getting off the track and showing signs aggressiveness before they engage in other ert acts which result in arrest. They are und through the school, social agencies or e church and then helped to the extent they n be helped with existing facilities. We in- nd to improve and expand facilities, but to ove to assist every youngster caught in de- onstrably poor home environment is a big der.

It would be a tremendous number of chil- en, unfortunately, in this state. I am afraid at there would be some irresponsible par- ts who would take advantage of this pro- am and simply hand over their children. ou raise a very interesting and a deeply im- rtant human question, but it would have to explored and discussed with the greatest re and sensitivity before state action could en be considered.

MISS HICKEY: You think it is important to scuss the question?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I do indeed. hat is my point—it is getting at the very ots.

The public should sit in on some of the emency hearings that I hold in Albany. A ondemned man has the right to a clemency earing before the governor prior to electro- ution. Reviewing the records of these people the most tragic experience any governor as. These records are complete, including en the history of the condemned man's par- nts. They are heart-rending. Some of those eople might have been saved if they were ealt with at the early age you suggest.

MR. GOULD: One hears that in Switzerland ere is no juvenile delinquency. I can't help inking there is a force of public opinion ere that helps prevent it. Here it seems we nd to feel everyone is entitled to do what he ants to do, even when he is imposing upon e community.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: If Switzerland oesn't have juvenile delinquency, it is one of the few countries in the world that don't. It is a world-wide problem.

WHAT SCHOOLS CAN DO

MISS HICKEY: May I take the governor and Mr. Houser now to the next area of influence, which is the school? Do we get youngsters into school early enough and into classes small enough so that some of their problems can be spotted and corrective steps taken?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Of course you are accepting the fact that the state through the schools has to assume the responsibility of the parent who hasn't met it.

Well, almost all children are in school at the regular school age of six. Those who don't learn to read are a source of trouble, and they can be spotted. Ability to read is of crucial importance. It is reading that gives children a chance to become a part of the school life and to develop intellectually. If they don't learn to read they are disinterested, frustrated, apart, and that is a sure sign of trouble ahead. Children who have difficulty learning should be given special care. If they are unable to make a go of the academic school, I feel that work schools should be developed under the local board of education.

MRS. GOULD: I am delighted to hear that you emphasize reading. I, too, feel it is very important and that corrective measures might be taken much earlier. Many schools do not begin remedial reading until perhaps the eighth grade, and by this time the slow readers are already far behind. Reading difficulties become evident in the third or fourth grade. A really concentrated effort in the earlier grades might save as many as fifty per cent of these children from failure in other subjects. I think the first-grade teacher is the most important teacher a child has.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Remedial reading should be a major effort. It is expensive and that is why many of our schools do not provide it.

MISS HICKEY: It is always expensive to do a good job, but doing it will save other costs.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER. Absolutely. Prevention is far cheaper than correction. School people are aware of this and I think they are pushing improved reading programs. New York City also has special schools—the so-called Six Hundred Schools—for youngsters who do not fit into a regular school program.

I think in addition there should be work-study programs in which nonacademic boys and girls can receive training for various kinds of occupations. Here one begins to run into some problems with the unions, who are justifiably concerned about preparation of people for the various trades. They want the best, the most able people they can get, and rightly so. Here in New York State we are working with both labor and industry to develop training programs and employment opportunities for these young people who just do not adjust to regular schooling.

MISS HICKEY: This is for out-of-school youngsters?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: For the sixteen-to-eighteen-year-olds, the problem is different from that of the younger group. We are also reviewing the employment laws as they pertain to fourteen-to-sixteen-year-olds. It is tough for most of them to find any sort of job. While we want to protect them in every way from exploitation, we don't want to make it so difficult that a young person who cannot study cannot get work either. We have also so-called continuation schools for those who obtain working papers and leave regular school to go to work. Unfortunately, the programs of these schools, which are held in daytime hours, do not appear to meet the problem. Many who leave school early don't have the capacity to study because they have never learned to read.

MISS HICKEY: And they often lack work habits.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: That is the truth. They have no discipline. They have no standards. They don't feel that they belong. They are not loved. They are not wanted. You wonder that so many of these young people are as wonderful as they are when you consider the rejections they must endure.

MR. HOUSER: In Chicago we have found it is the most difficult thing in the world to get some of these boys to engage in competitive sports. They are afraid they might be beaten. They might lose face in any kind of competitive sport.

When members of a gang begin to see the value of individual development, through individual competition, the gang attitude disappears. The gang attitude is not to attack unless there are ten boys against one. Competitive sport is one alternative to gang-type activity.

MR. GOULD: Do you feel new attitudes can be taught?

MR. HOUSER: They can be taught, definitely. There is no question about it.

HONEST LABOR

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Work school looks as though it offers a similar possibility to certain young people. They have to go to school like any other youngster, but they go to a special school which gives them an opportunity to perform a job that will lead to a productive life.

MRS. GOULD: In the past, such schools have not won the co-operation of the youngters or their parents because they feel these schools are less desirable than regular academic schools. In fact, such schools are often called "dumping grounds"—even by some teachers and administrators.

Réloms®

Luxurious rayons with a linen look . . . crisply tailored to take you everywhere in style. Machine washable, crease resistant.

LEFT: Navy, toast or black.
RIGHT: Toast, blue or lilac.
Both in sizes 12 to 20, 12½ to 22½.

At better stores everywhere
Slightly higher on the West Coast you'll love these other basic NECESSITY OF LIFE FASHIONS®

bea young
Bea Active
Pirates
Lenbarry
bea comfy

SMOLER BROS., INC., CHICAGO 47

How can a program for nonacademic youth be set up that does not have that stigma? Would not actual work for which they are paid give them more status?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: We have got to work with the labor leaders and industrial leaders, and there are some laws we must try to get changed. As they stand now, a boy between the ages of fourteen and sixteen must get a permit for each job he takes. Such laws were enacted to stop exploitation of child labor—and certainly we do not want to turn back the clock. The situation now confronting us, however, is one wherein certain features of these laws and regulations, rather than protecting him, stand in the way of our giving the youngster the kind of work experience and practical education which can best equip him for life. There is also the possibility of camps for older boys who can't do schoolwork and can't find jobs. Such camps would give a boy a chance to get out of a bad environment and into a new environment where he will have a chance to develop as a person.

MRS. GOULD: Isn't it true that there is a great deal of conservation work that needs to be done in many parts of this country?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Yes, there is. In New York State we have thousands of acres of conservation land. This is also work accepted by labor groups. If an attempt were made to compete with regular labor, the problems are evident. We must also remember that about one hundred thousand young people are graduated from school and college each year in New York State. These young people want jobs too.

MISS HICKEY: Governor, would you recommend government-sponsored projects for youths who cannot compete in the market?

WHAT YOUTH CAMPS CAN DO

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I have already committed myself to such a program in the state of New York. We are in the process of developing camps right now The one I visited today is constructing a campsite, swimming pond and picnic grounds. They are building the tables and chairs and fireplaces—all these things. It is wonderful.

MR. GOULD: What is their spirit in doing that?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I talked to a couple of dozen of these boys today and asked them. Some of them have been there as long as nine months and some of them have been there only one day, but they were unanimous in their feeling that the camp was far better than the institutions from which they had come. There was less tension, they said. It was calmer and more relaxed, and they were learning to do real work. Some of them are extremely fine-looking young persons.

MR. GOULD: These are so-called delinquents?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: These are. Some of them not for the first time either.

MISS HICKEY: Is this type of training camp also possible for the boys who can't get along in school and can't find employment?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I think very definitely. The boys I saw today were learning discipline. They were learning how to work. They were learning how to cut down a tree faster than the other fellow—and this is a real outlet for energy and aggression, believe me. When a boy works seven hours in the outdoors, he is soon in good shape—mentally as well as physically. They have an incentive system—they are permitted to stay up later or have an extra amount of ice cream and cake or something if they do especially good work.

MISS HICKEY: How can the Federal Government help the state to form youth work camps?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: We have asked the Federal Government to let us use certain Federal property. It is surplus. If we can get some Federal land, buildings, and equipment and supplies, that is all we need from them.

MRS. GOULD: The term "delinquent camps" or "predelinquent camps" has been used to describe such youth camps. We surely do not want to call them permanently by such a name.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: It is a popular descriptive term, but it shouldn't be used. I agree completely. Let's call them opportunity camps or just youth camps—something that puts no stigma on the boy who has been in one.

MISS HICKEY: Do you see such camps replacing the old-time corrective institutions?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: No, I don't see them replacing them for all, or even most, delinquents. There are many boys the authorities don't dare place in such camps, which are completely open. In the camp I visited today fifty boys may be in a dormitory with only one man supervising them. They have good relations with the community and the community has accepted them, but these boys were carefully selected.

We are short of institutions too. Some judges are having to parole young offenders because they haven't places to put them. Often they are paroled to the same parents who helped to cause the trouble. We plan, also, to accelerate the training of probation and parole officers so we can give much better guidance to young offenders.

MRS. GOULD: It is true, isn't it, that good parole systems and adequately trained parole officers can do a great deal for them?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Yes, it certainly is.

WHAT CITIZENS CAN DO

MISS HICKEY: What success have you had, governor, in getting responsible citizens aroused to take action in their own communities?

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: We have had meetings with representatives of key groups in various communities. I think New York State is aroused as never before. We are trying to work with all private agencies—to help them and to encourage them—for I don't think it should be a governmental activity entirely. We must not lose the care and the concern of the individual citizen. There is room for everybody to help.

The community near the camp I visited today is very friendly to the project. People in the town help to arrange parties for the boys. They send out presents. Local baseball teams include the camp team on their schedule. There is a good community relationship. Before a camp is established in any area, community leaders should be completely informed and helped to understand what a youth camp is. They should be assured that care will be taken to ensure their protection. Their interest and leadership should be invited and encouraged. With this type of preparation, I feel youth camps can be established almost anywhere and have a good relationship with local people.

MRS. GOULD: I must return to the earli years, for I believe very deeply in their in portance. Perhaps we need to do more wo before the age of eight.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: I think your en phasis on the early age is very constructi and farsighted. The possibilities of a broad approach to delinquency problems at a ve early age gives me a lot to think about. I sha certainly look into the work that is being don and the studies undertaken, with very youn children in need of help.

MRS. GOULD: This, too, is something th volunteer worker can help in. Some voluntee committees are already helping such so-calle problem children in public elementary school They also get acquainted with the home an they are able to call to the attention of th proper authorities those children who are be ing neglected. There is a great opportunity fo service in this field for the volunteer workers o some of our great organizations. Churc groups could do much here too.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Of course one o the reasons we have been concentrating on ac tion programs is to eliminate the immediat problems as soon as possible. But I think th long-range approach is of tremendous im portance.

Of course each child must be judged and as sisted as an individual. Each one has a specia situation. What is his background? What ar his potentialities? What are his handicaps How can we give him a better chance? Is i possible to improve his home environment And what is the cost? This isn't an overnigh operation. It's a long, slow process, and i will take everybody's understanding and par ticipation.

But I think we can do a tremendous amount—and we must not underestimate the wonderful work that has been done, and is be ing done. There are many people who have given generously of their time and energy, their very lives, to help solve the problem. We would be in a lot worse situation now if it hadn't been for them.

MISS HICKEY: Certainly one of the most important efforts is to give young people an opportunity for work experience

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: Yes, that is what will give them a sense of belonging to this world—a feeling of usefulness and an outlet for energies.

MRS. GOULD: That is the goal—a sense of usefulness, a sense of really sharing in our society.

MR. HOUSER: I would be the last to pose as an expert in this most difficult field. As a businessman, used to dealing in a practical way with specific problems, I see the need for providing wholesome leadership to these gangs. We have proved they are not hard to reach. They respond to leadership which they respect. Knowing no other standards, they will respond to leadership of a criminal type. On the other hand, they can be taught a different set of standards with properly trained leaders. Somewhere in the picture, the desirability of steady employment must enter, and possibly we must face the fact that in our complex society there is a fringe of beings who will not respond to educational standards and who need some type of job at a relatively early age.

MR. GOULD: We are very grateful to you, Governor Rockefeller, and to Mr. Houser, for spending this time with us. We know how busy you are.

GOVERNOR ROCKEFELLER: There is hardly anything more important than thought and action to solve this problem of our society. Education perhaps is the number-one effort in the United States; this is number two, in my opinion.

I am grateful to you for letting me come here. It is through publications such as yours that the public can come to have a real understanding of the basic forces which create the problem and learn what can be done to help solve them. Youthful crime and juvenile delinquency must be dealt with in a constructive way, both to protect innocent citizens who are the victims and to help those unfortunate young people who are the offenders. Too often the case is that they have never had a chance to become useful citizens. We must find ways to give them that chance. END

NEXT MONTH

DREAM HOUSE IN THE WOODS

Bring the children (there are three bedrooms) and live happily ever after just where you always longed to be—high among the treetops, with the wind like a harp in leafy summer, and the sun a warm blanket when leaves fall. The JOURNAL's newest Portfolio House provides you with a terrace and lawny area on the lower level, a dining terrace on the main floor, a laundry and superbathroom on sleeping level—most practical! That fireplace in the bedroom is for the poet in you.

FOR ADULTS ONLY

A sudden question opened Beth's eyes to the way in which she was failing Lance and little Susie: "Do you want to be your mother's baby or the mother of your baby?" For marriage, as the counselor pointed out, is a grown-up thing, though nowadays a frightening number of teen-agers are giving it a try. "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"

WHAT CAN YOU DO TO SAVE YOUR CHILD?

The corruption of the innocent through heartless and immoral barrages of violence on TV is changing your child and the world he must live in. The evidence against these "children's" programs is overwhelming. In "How Movie and TV Violence Affects Children," Dr. Fredric Wertham refutes every argument commonly used to excuse sadistic shows—and tells what you can do to have them stopped.

"AFTER TWO NORMAL BIRTHS, WHY SHOULD I HAVE A CAESAREAN FOR MY THIRD BABY?

I can't understand it—does my doctor just like to cut? I know that Caesareans are more profitable for him!" But there was a good reason for the out-of-town doctor's diagnosis, and Dr. Schauffler was glad to explain it. "Tell Me Doctor."

Also, "The Nixons At Home," a How America Lives visit; "Dr. Spock Talks With Mothers"; delicious, spring-quickened recipes; eight pages of exciting fashion news; Dawn Norman's expert beauty advice; decorating projects; stories; poems; and everything that helps a woman to be womanly

IN THE FEBRUARY JOURNAL

THIS MAY WELL BE THE

MOST IMPORTANT BEAUTY ANNOUNCEMENT YOU WILL EVER READ

Now—you don't have to let skin trouble-makers damage the fresh, clear look of your complexion!

Now—your simple, every-day cleansing care can actually help purify your skin!

Now—in a beauty soap famous for its unusual mildness, you get for the first time this extraordinary beauty benefit: a new cream-enriched lather that actually helps purify your skin! New-formula Lux lather that cream-softens your skin . . . and purifies away complexion trouble-makers.

This is the beauty of new Lux! Every time you use wonder-working new Lux, you're actually washing your way to a smoother complexion . . . a more beautifully clear complexion!

"I'm really excited about new Lux! It's the loveliest way I know to keep my complexion soft, smooth—and beautifully clear!" Janet Leigh.

Try this exciting new Lux purifying lather yourself. You will see why 9 out of 10 Hollywood stars use—and love—this wonderful new Lux!

NEW CREAM-ENRICHED LUX WITH PURIFYING LATHER

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll be delighted with new Lux—or you'll be repaid every penny you spent!

THE Beauty of the World

Untroubled by modesty, man through the ages has acknowledged his merits. Is he his own best critic?

By HONOR TRACY

It has never been the practice of the female sex to air its views on the other sex—not, that is to say, in writing. To our way of thinking, this results in a notable gap in literature. Almost every male writer has at some time felt the need to communicate his ideas on the other sex, as well as his own. The masculine concept of man has never perhaps been formulated more economically than by Hamlet. "How noble in reason!" he exclaims, with the quiet modesty which is a distinguishing trait. "How infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world!"

The qualities short-listed here are never seen to happier advantage than in man's dealing with woman, in love or in war, as we now in a spirit of due reverence shall seek to establish. His infinite faculties shine nothing like so brilliantly when he is surrounded by other men, as of course all their faculties are infinite too. He needs as a foil what Aristotle termed the "monstrous aberration of Nature"; in other words, us.

Let us consider man as he sets about the choice of the beloved. Thanks to his godlike apprehension, he really believes he is choosing her, and not the other way round. Once he has found her, his infinite faculties enable him to see her not as she is—which might be dull—but as Cleopatra, Mme. de Maintenon, Audrey Hepburn or his dear old Irish nurse, whichever way his temperament inclines him. The girl, with her limited mind, may be a little puzzled by the fact that, having fallen in love with her—as she thinks—he should at once demand radical changes in her appearance, pastimes, conversation and point of view. But if she knows what is good for her, she will ably impersonate the character desired, at least till the gold is safe on her finger. At the same time she must be prepared, having entirely recast her personality to suit his convenience, to find him peering haggardly at her and mumbling, "You've changed!"

The infinite faculties of man work even more powerfully in regard to himself. In theory, of course, the woman is perfection, a goddess, and would never look at a chap like him, but in practice this is all bunk. Exactly how the dear fellow sees himself we can never hope to divine, but it is clear that his vision works independently of externals. This happy state of affairs was brought home to us once in the course of an evening in Budapest, when we sat by a café window and watched the Hungarian lovelies strolling past. It seemed to us that each was prettier than the other, but the men were more discerning. It was a real education to listen to them.

"Beautiful face, but too short in the neck," they would say and, looking again, we saw they were right.

"Too much bosom for the undercarriage," they justly complained.

"Glorious figure—but look at the ankles," they cried reproachfully, and with reason.

"Oh, no!" they chorused once, as a plain, dowdy girl went by.

One of our connoisseurs was bald, except at the tip of his nose, and his teeth spread out like a hand of cards. The other squinted and had a dear little potbelly that leaped up and down whenever he laughed.

"I wouldn't give a thank-you for that," they would growl of some passing Juno.

Or take the following advertisement which it was once our happiness to find in a local newspaper: "Widower, 66, wooden leg, wishes meet attractive woman, 25–35, own house and/or 2000 pounds in bank, view matrimony; essential send photograph; serious." What female could ever arrive at such perfect confidence?

Asked at what age men were at their most attractive, a male friend of ours, who will never see fifty-four again, replied with tranquil certainty that it was fifty-five. In this particular field we have often speculated as to the point where a man considers himself definitely out of the running, and incline on the whole to believe it is just after breath has left the body.

Let us assume that in spite of all this the beloved remains impervious to his charm and deaf to his cajoling. In life there is no such thing as a "rejected male" in the sense of his being found inadequate. Any disappointments in this direction arise from some grave flaw in the beloved herself. Either her head is stuffed with romantic nonsense, or she is her own worst enemy. Or else she will be psychologically maladjusted, if not queer. And looking back on the affair in years to come, the Beauty of the World will say, "We would never have done for each other. Thank goodness I saw it in time."

But what if all goes according to plan and the beloved has the wit to discern the merits? He is the happiest man alive and she is pretty well satisfied too. Yet still there are breakers ahead, he being what he is and she being ordinary flesh and blood. Endless patience will be called for if this unnatural yoking is not to be irksome, and the noble reason will often have to work full out.

Suppose that on the way home after a party she were to remark, as even the best

CONTINUED ON PAGE 131

HE LOST 125 POUNDS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 56

People went to see for themselves, and whatever brings people into a grocery store is good for business. Joe welcomed customers come to see the man who was no longer a freak.

Losing weight made Joe look so much younger that people who hadn't seen him for a while sometimes failed to recognize him. "You must be Joe's little brother," one lady insisted.

From childhood Joe seemed destined to be a fat grocer. As a chubby junior-high student, he worked in his father's store. By the time he entered high school, weighing 205, he was an accomplished meat cutter.

Like most teen-age boys, Joe had an enormous appetite, and he was a hefty 225 pounds in his senior year, despite football and hard work.

After high school he spent a year and a half in the Navy, losing a few pounds in boot camp. But they soon came back.

Out of the Navy, Joe went into business in Woodward. At 19 he had his own grocery store.

During the Korean crisis, called back into the Navy, he served two years as a fireman with the 6th Fleet. When his father's death brought him home, Joe took over the store. Working from early morning until late at night, he had little time for any recreation but eating. Heavy food for his stomach seemed to help him forget the weighty problems on his mind.

Soon after Yettee was born, Joe bought a new store in Iowa Falls. For a time he drove back and forth every day and one morning fell asleep driving to work. His car a total wreck, Joe escaped with minor injuries—was hospitalized for only five days.

"The doctor said it was his fat that saved him," says Martha. "I resolved right then that I would never urge him to diet. I'd rather have him alive and fat than thin and dead."

In Iowa Falls the Girards soon made friends. Evening feeds frequently became parties. Wherever the gathering occurred, the refreshments were calorie-rich. Ice cream, pizza, potato chips with lots of dip—these were favorite "snacks" for Joe.

He gained steadily—far more than either he or Martha realized. Family movies of Joe running with a kite shocked them both. "He looked just like a big bouncing ball," says Martha. They couldn't believe he was that fat.

But it wasn't his wife's insisting, lack of friends, nor business that brought Joe to the doctor, and to the diet. It was his feet. They hurt. Unbearable pain made him want nothing so much as relief—not even food.

Their son, Hamilton Eugene, was just one month old. The girls, Yettee and Stephanie, were four and three years old. Martha had enough to do without changing her entire cooking routine, so the whole family (except the baby, of course) ate the diet the doctor ordered. Joe and Yettee grew slim together.

At the beginning the diet called for 1300 calories a day, for three meals. There were no "snacks," no parties. Just 1300 calories a day. The doctor prescribed medication to curb Joe's appetite, geared to larger helpings and frequent snacking. Even so, Martha had to get out the diet chart several times to prove she wasn't trying to starve him.

"At first it didn't seem like enough food for a bird," says Joe.

Some dieters complain of nervousness during the early stages of dieting. Joe's sunny disposition didn't change. "If anything, he's more jovial now than he was before," said a friend.

It took will power to avoid eating after work. Long habit had left him with a craving for food in the evening. So he was allowed only one glass of milk but all the black coffee he wanted—no more.

Both Joe and Martha found it hard to refuse little Yettee food. She loves sweets. To deny her the cookies and desserts she craved seemed cruel. Much as it hurt, they firmly refused to indulge her.

For the first three months Joe lost about a pound a day. After 90 pounds were gone, his weight leveled off. Then the doctor cut him down to 850 calories a day. In another month he had trimmed off a total of 102 pounds. Still Joe and the doctor and Martha kept at it until he reached his goal of weighing only 190 pounds. Because of his active work schedule, no special exercise was needed.

Losing 125 pounds changed his collar size from 18½″ to 15½″. That immense 53″ waist was slimmed to 34″.

During the transition he wore his old shirts to work, including the white ones, with belted wash pants. When his goal was reached, he happily discarded them all for attractive new garments in normal sizes.

Joe still keeps his diet handy, but most of the time he eats normally. He enjoys having a crowd in for pizza—but if the pizza puts on pounds, back to calorie counting.

Instead of coming home too tired for anything but eating, Joe has pep that's amazing. They've joined the country club and Joe can now dance for hours—on the feet that were once so painful he could hardly walk.

Playing with the children is fun, and Joe is looking forward to going swimming with the family. He can walk into any clothing store, buy a swim suit—and wear it in public!

JOE GIRARD'S REDUCING DIET

Joe followed his diet exactly as prescribed except for the meat. Grocers usually take home whatever meat they are "long" on at the store. Usually that is steak. Joe ate beef, usually broiled steak, throughout the dieting period.

After three months of his "1300-Calorie Diet," Joe reached a plateau, where his weight remained the same despite his faithfulness to this regimen, so his doctor put him on 850 calories a day. Both basic diets are given—the 850-Calorie Diet on page 56. Here is Joe's 1300-Calorie Diet:

1300-CALORIE REDUCING DIET

(Providing Approximately 90 to 100 Grams Protein)

BASIC MENU

BREAKFAST

Fruit—high-vitamin-C content, 1 serving
Egg—1; or 1 small serving of other protein foods (Group B)
Bread—whole-grain or enriched, 1 slice, and 1 level tsp. butter or margarine
Coffee or tea—2 tbsp. nonfat milk if desired

LUNCHEON

Soup—1 cup
3½ oz. lean meat, or other protein food (Group A)
Vegetable—1 serving
Salad—no salad oil or sugar
Milk—nonfat or buttermilk, 8 oz.
Coffee or tea—2 tbsp. nonfat milk if desired

DINNER

Soup—1 cup
3½ oz. lean meat, or other protein food (Group A)
Vegetable—1 serving
Salad—no salad oil or sugar
Bread—whole-grain or enriched, 1 slice, or 1 medium potato
Butter or margarine—1 level tsp.
Milk—nonfat or buttermilk, 8 oz.
Fruit—1 serving
Coffee or tea—2 tbsp. nonfat milk if desired

LATE-EVENING

Milk—nonfat, or buttermilk, 8 oz.

Food groups, with calorie counts, appear on pages 86 and 87.

Considerable variety in meals is possible by substituting foods within the same food groups. In this way, the person on a reducing diet can eat many of the foods frequently prepared for the rest of the family. Naturally, the dieter's foods should be simply prepared, and served without additional butter, sauces, gravies, sweetenings, and so on.

The JOURNAL advises all prospective dieters to check first with their own doctor before beginning.

FOOD GROUPS FOR DIETERS ON PAGE 86

© 1960 by Hunt Foods, Inc.

SUDDENLY...
YOU'RE CAREFREE!

Just like that, you step into a new Shelton Stroller® and you feel like a new woman. Magic? No, just the unmistakable influence of this one graceful little dress. For your personal demonstration, stop into the leading store in your city and ask for the Stroller by Shelton. You'll see a beautiful print of fresh-cut flowers, "planted" in jersey of DuPont nylon. You'll find even the thread of the Stroller seams are nylon, so you know it washes, drip-dries, and never needs ironing. You'll meet the fashion-favorite of your wardrobe, the dress that knows no limit to the times and places you'll wear it. Tomorrow . . . go carefree in a

Shelton Stroller®
THE CAREFREE FASHION

Sizes 10 to 20, 12½ to 22½. At fine stores everywhere, about $14.
For name of nearest store and illustrated folio, write: Dept. J. Shelton CASUALS, 1350 Broadway, N.Y. 18

FOOD LISTS FOR DIETERS

Even with foods allowed on diets, calorie counts vary widely, particularly with meats, soups and cheeses. If you plan to try the 850-calorie-a-day diet, you naturally must select from foods containing fewer calories; 1300-calorie dieters will have a wider choice.

FRUITS

FRESH FRUITS	CALORIES (Approx.)
Apple (small)	50
Banana (½ medium)	50
Blackberries (½ cup)	30
Blueberries (½ cup)	40
*Cantaloupe (¼ wedge, 5″ diameter)	25
*Grapefruit (½ small)	50
*Grapefruit juice (4 oz.)	45
Honeydew melon (2″ sector)	50
Muskmelon (¼ wedge, 5″ melon)	35
Peach (medium)	50
Pear (medium)	50
Pineapple (½ cup, diced)	35
Plums (2 medium)	20
*Orange (small)	50
*Orange juice (4 oz.)	60
Raspberries (½ cup)	35
*Strawberries (1 cup)	45

*These fruits are rich in vitamin C. At least one serving should be taken each day.

CANNED WATER-PACK FRUITS
Applesauce (½ cup)	50
Apricots (½ cup)	35
Cherries (½ cup)	40
Grapefruit sections (½ cup)	35
Peaches (2 halves)	30
Pears (3 halves)	40
Pineapple (1 slice)	35
Plums (3)	20
Prunes (3)	30
Raspberries (½ cup)	50

Frozen fruits have the same calorie count as fresh fruits, unless packed in syrup or otherwise sweetened.

VEGETABLES

	CALORIES
Asparagus (6 stalks, fresh)	15
Asparagus (6 stalks, green, canned)	15
Beans, string (½ cup)	20
Beets (½ cup, diced)	35
*Broccoli (½ cup)	15
Brussels sprouts (½ cup)	15
Cabbage (½ cup)	10
*Carrots (½ cup)	15
Cauliflower (½ cup)	10
*Chard (½ cup, leaves only)	10
Collards (½ cup)	40
*Kale (½ cup)	25
Kohlrabi (½ cup)	20
Onions (5 small)	10
Parsnips (½ cup)	40
Peas (½ cup, green)	55
Potato (medium)	100
Pumpkin (½ cup, canned)	40
Rutabaga (½ cup)	25
Sauerkraut (½ cup, canned)	20
*Spinach (½ cup)	15
Squash (½ cup, summer)	20
*Squash (½ cup, winter)	40
Tomatoes (½ cup, canned)	25
Tomato juice (4 oz., canned)	25
Turnips (½ cup, white)	25

*These vegetables have high vitamin-A value. At least one serving should be included in the diet each day.

RAW VEGETABLES FOR SALADS

	CALORIES
Cabbage (½ cup, shredded)	5
Carrots (½ cup, shredded)	15
Celery (3 small stalks)	5
Chicory or endive (¼ small head)	5
Cress, garden (½ cup)	10
Cress, water (½ cup)	5
Cucumber (½ medium)	5
Escarole (⅓ heart)	5
Kale (½ cup)	25
Lettuce (2 large leaves)	5
Pepper (1 shell, green)	20
Pickles (1 large dill, cucumber)	5
Pimientos (1 tsp., canned)	5
Radishes (3 small red)	5
Romaine (1 large leaf)	2
Tomato (1 small)	25

LEAN MEAT AND OTHER PROTEIN FOODS (GROUP A)

	2½ oz.* FOR 850-CALORIE DIETERS	3½ oz. FOR 1300-CALORIE DIETERS
Roast beef	115	160
Beef, round, lean meat	110	155
Beef, shank	120	170
Lamb, leg, roasted	135	195
Roast veal, leg or shoulder	110	150
Chicken, canned	125	175
Chicken, stewed or roasted	90	125
Roast turkey, white meat	110	155
Clams, 6 little neck	55	75
Cod steak, baked	60	80
Flounder or sole, baked	45	65
Haddock	75	105
Halibut steak	90	125
Lobster, canned	60	85
Mackerel, canned	140	195
Salmon, canned	120	170
Shrimp, canned	60	80

*2½-oz. portion is for luncheon. Remember to double portion (and calories) for dinner.

PROTEIN FOODS (GROUP B)

	CALORIES
Egg	75
Edam cheese (1 oz.)	85
Cottage cheese (½ cup, skim milk)	100
Bacon (3 strips, lean, crisp)	100
Swiss cheese (1 oz.)	115
Cheddar cheese (1 oz.)	145

SOUPS

(Canned, diluted with water)

	CALORIES FOR 1 CUP SERVING
Consommé	20
Bouillon	20
Chicken rice	40
Celery, clear	70
Chicken noodle	70
Chicken gumbo	75
Tomato soup, clear	80
Beef	85
Beef noodle	95
Beef with vegetables	100
*Clam chowder	100
Vegetable beef	105
Vegetable	110

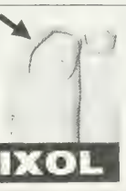
*The calorie counts for Clam Chowder vary widely according to brand. The calorie count given here is approximate.

MISCELLANEOUS

	CALORIES
Bread (whole grain or enriched, 1 slice)	65
Butter (1 tsp.)	35
Buttermilk, skim	85
Nonfat milk	90
Margarine (1 tsp.)	40

A NEW KIND OF STEAM VAPORIZER

when colds strike,



your child will sleep and so will you . . . if you use Steam-Dial . . . the new vaporizer that regulates steam volume for fast relief. Steam-Dial raises humidity . . . breaks up congestion, makes breathing easier. Ask your local druggist. DeVilbiss Steam-Dial—$9.95 . . . steams 'round the clock.

Since 1888 Physicians have used and prescribed DeVilbiss

THE DEVILBISS COMPANY, SOMERSET, PA. • BARRIE, ONT.

Ingrown NAIL

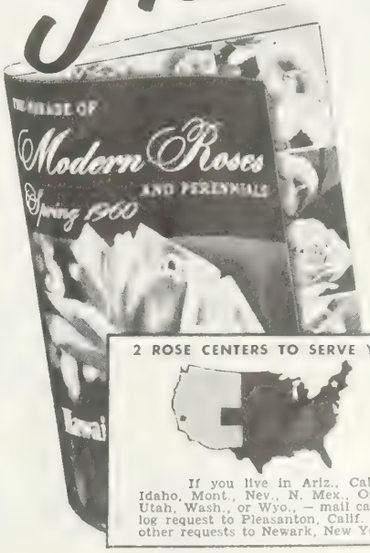
Just a few drops of soothing Dr. Scholl's ONIXOL in nail groove relieve soreness and pain, soften embedded part of nail for easy removal. Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's ONIXOL

EXTRA INCOME?

OF COURSE! Write to the address below and we'll send you details about a money-making offer. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
915 Independence Square Phila. 5, Pa.



Live a "regular" life without laxatives

Now, stop fighting constipation with laxatives or "bulks" that work unnaturally, uncomfortably! Stay "regular" with REGUTOL. It's not a laxative, yet it restores regularity as no laxative can. REGUTOL simply makes the moisture in your colon keep waste soft for easy, normal elimination. Hospital-proved...safe, not habit-forming. 30 tablets, $1.00. Try it.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

FREE

JACKSON & PERKINS
BRAND-NEW SPRING 1960
Catalog of Roses and Perennials

THE most beautiful catalog in our 88 years of rose-growing leadership! Within its 50 full-color pages you'll discover many new J&P varieties like HAWAII – the glorious new Orange-Coral Hybrid Tea that was overwhelmingly selected by 10,000 home gardeners as "The Rose of the Year" – plus many, many others. And you'll see dozens of other prized roses – Hybrid Teas, Floribundas, Climbers, Miniatures, Grandifloras!

There's also a wide selection of hardy J&P Perennials, plus planting hints, money-saving offers. All plants guaranteed to live and bloom. Mail coupon today!

2 ROSE CENTERS TO SERVE YOU

If you live in Ariz., Calif., Idaho, Mont., Nev., N. Mex., Ore., Utah, Wash., or Wyo., – mail catalog request to Pleasanton, Calif. All other requests to Newark, New York

MAIL COUPON TO NEAREST SHIPPING OFFICE

JACKSON & PERKINS CO.
245 Rose Lane
Newark, NEW YORK

OR

JACKSON & PERKINS CO.
245 Rose Lane
Pleasanton, Calif.

Please send me a FREE copy of your big new Spring 1960 Rose Catalog.

NAME....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....ZONE...STATE.....

This offer good in U.S.A. only

YOU AND YOUR NEW YEAR

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 42

there and folded diapers (actually, Shirley folded; I stacked) and as honestly as possible took stock of our progress during the year we were leaving and listed our serious aims for the year ahead.

THE BACKWARD-FORWARD LOOK

I've let you in on an intimate family scene, first because I think of you as family friends, and second because your letters about this time every year ask holiday questions—How do I, personally, keep New Year's? Do I go to parties? What kind of resolutions do I make? Can I advise you about your parties? About your resolutions?—and I want you to know I've given those questions a lot of thought in my own life. Though I'm not an expert, three more babies and five more happy New Year's have built up my experience; and since I'm an odd sort who likes to collect facts and elder-statesman wisdom, I've come across some guideposts that I'd enjoy passing along to you.

When Shirley and I decided to approach each New Year's with an honest "where-have-I-been-where-am-I-now-where-would-I-like-to-be" attitude. I discovered this was an old Roman custom Julius Caesar's reformation calendar established January first as the beginning of the new year and that day, as well as the whole month, was dedicated to the god Janus, who was supposed to preside over doors. His name comes from the Latin janua, a door. Janus was represented with two faces, one looking forward, the other looking backward. The Romans were very careful (before partying kind of ran away with 'em later on) to regulate their conduct on the first day of this month so that every word and act should be happy example for the next 364. (And thou I feel some very modern Americans desi their New Year's resolutions to last just abo one day, I'm against it, myself. If it's a one-d deal, it's superstition. If it's a year-long cha lenge, it can change your life.)

Later, in the England of Queen Elizabeth the British tailored the Open Door policy wi the general custom of unbarring the hou door with great formality to "let out the o and let in the new."

So Shirley and I try symbolically to stand that door on New Year's and get a backwar forward perspective—the good as well as t bad. Believe me, if we counted up only shor comings, or how far we miss our highest mar we'd get plenty discouraged. But what we d mand of ourselves is growth, not perfectio (as, for instance, if I could be only ten minu late for all my appointments next year instea of half an hour, why, maybe the year after th I could be almost on time!), but we do ai high because I agree wholeheartedly with or bit of borrowed wisdom that comes in hand around our house. It was James Russell Lov ell who said, "Not failure, but low aim, crime." So we're out for a moon shoot ea year—but we'll settle for an orbit round th earth, if that's the best we can do.

INGREDIENTS FOR MAKING DREAMS A REALITY

In talking over your resolutions, I can't ve well be specific—because maybe you're nev late, maybe you don't take on more than yo can do (like me), maybe your specific fault laziness, mental or physical . . . or selfis ness, or . . . well, here is a list of virtues I four listed by another elder statesman, Benjami Franklin: temperance, silence, order, resol tion, frugality, industry, sincerity, justice, mo eration, cleanliness, tranquillity (and if yo haven't met that one, it's worth looking up- it's on my current list), chastity. You ca check your own specific defects against th list, I found, and come up with your mo noticeable character flaws.

But here are four questions I use when I t to measure my growth toward successf living:

First: Have I gained a more mature attitu toward life and my responsibilities? I know th sounds frighteningly dull and maybe pompou or out of reach—but it isn't any of the things. I've found it a terrific method for ge ting farther and farther from the playpen an closer and closer to the thing I truly want. An even preteens stumble on it now and the Take the six-year-old daughter of a clergyma who was sick and put to bed early by he mother. Twice she asked to "say good nigh to papa" and twice her mother replied tha papa was busy and couldn't be disturbed. N one to give up so easily the sly little tyke size up the situation and put it another way "Mamma, I am a sick woman and I want t see my minister." You know the ending.

Second: Have I enlarged my vision? Are m dreams bigger? Do I look around me with mo eagerness, more wonder, more imagination?

This is very important because until we d we'll live in a duller world of limited oppo tunities. The great English poet, Williar Blake, once said, "When I look at the sun, yo say to me, 'What do you see? Do you not see yellow disk the size of a guinea?'" and he re plies, "No! No!" Yet until I, P. Boone, wa able to imagine a little bit, to use vision, thought it was an oversized orange and that rose on one side of Nashville, about over th movie house, to set behind Mr. Morehead barn. A small world indeed!

And when I was ten I thought I knew ou cow, Rosemary, whom I milked daily, prett well—yet all I saw was an embarrassing co named Rosemary. Galileo, they say, saw th lenses in the eye of an ox—and copied ther into his telescope.

Third: Do I think? Do I use all the know edge I have on hand and strive for more?

It's handy stuff, this knowledge, and th ability to think pays off. An eminent painte was once asked what he mixed his colors wit in order to produce so extraordinary an effec "I mix them with brains sir," was his answe

You need these finer spices and seasonings to give flavor magic to your meals

Try New, Delicious McCormick-Schilling Spaghetti Sauce Mix!

Spaghetti Sauce Mix is a new product from the House of Flavor. It saves hours of simmering: it has the true Italian taste. You'll be genuinely delighted with its convenience and its special goodness!

To get the best from the Italian dishes you prepare you'll also want to have on hand: McCormick Italian Seasoning, a wonderful blend of spices for piquant sauces to go with meat, poultry, fish, spaghetti, macaroni. McCormick Minced Onion — all the fresh onion flavor with none of the work of peeling and chopping. Oregano, Crushed Red Pepper and Garlic Powder, for that full flavor, fine flavor which make your foods tastier.

Buy them the next time you shop.

McCORMICK
Schilling
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM—TWO GREAT BRANDS

McCormick
Seasoning of the Month

OREGANO

Oregano, a delightful herb, used much in Italian cookery, comes from Italy and Mexico. It is similar in flavor to marjoram but stronger, fuller-bodied. It is an excellent seasoning for pork dishes; fine for beef stews, gravies, omelettes, boiled eggs. A favorite use is in meat sauces for spaghetti.

©1959 McCormick & Co., Inc.

McCORMICK . . . The House of Flavor . . . SCHILLING

ourth: Do I believe that I can succeed and l willing to work toward my goal?

amma is a great persuader. Back home, e wanted to change our point of view in a y there was always the spanking, but as I older she found other ways. I remember : when she felt I was slouching my home-k she brought me these lines from Jerome Jerome's Three Men in a Boat: "I like k; it fascinates me. I can sit and look at it ours. I love to keep it by me: the idea of ng rid of it nearly breaks my heart."
hough her reproof didn't break my heart,
l get the idea—and she kept impressing me. "Believe you can do it—then do it.
is success." Even Charlie Weaver's mom dn't have put it better.
was interested to read in the autobiogra-of Conrad Hilton, a most successful man, he agrees with mamma. "It has been my erience," he writes, "that the way most ple court failure is by misjudging their ities, belittling their worth and value. Did ever think what can happen to a plain bar on worth $5.00? The same iron made into seshoes is worth $10.50. If made into nee-, it is worth $3,250.85, and if turned into ance springs for watches its value jumps to 0,000.00."
he worth of the same amount of material talent) increases as it's used by (1) the most ure and responsible individual, (2) the one the biggest vision or dream, (3) the one knows the most and thinks the most rly, and (4) the one who believes he can ceed and then gets in there and starts gin'.
Boy or girl, man or woman, whether the aim make the most out of a bar of iron, to be rofessional football player, get a scholar-
, go into business, be a homemaker (espely a homemaker, says my wife) or a singer ecially a singer, says my wife's husband), se are the four general lines along which 'll need to grow from one New Year's to next if you want to be successful.

PARTIES WITH A PURPOSE

Y'ever hear of a First-Footer? Well, in otland's tradition the First-Footer is the st important person at any New Year's ty. He (or she) is the first one who steps r the threshold after the clock strikes lve. And it's very important for the luck of family that he doesn't come empty-handed.
's got to be totin' cake or bread or some d offering and enough for each guest to are. He'd have to have a real armload at our use!
In Scotch tradition, deciding to be a Firstoter and whose threshold you wish to cross hether alone or in a group) is a gay but defiely meaningful idea, 'cause you might choose ur best friend—or your worst enemy. The rpose is to take your first step into the New ar with a gesture of love and good will to-rd your fellow man.

lot long ago, I heard of a couple, teen-age adies at a big-city high school, who really rked at this idea. They were voted Mr. and iss Popularity in their senior year, and it sn't hard to understand why. On New ar's Eve they'd get together for a big party the girl's home, and they made sure to ine any of their friends who were carrying on ds or nursing grudges. Cupcakes were proded and half an hour before twelve the guests parated into small groups (each containing e of the soreheads) to First-Foot at the use of the "enemy." Even if the "enemy" sn't home, they were honor bound to cross threshold and leave the cake. You can agine how feuds faded and fences were nded by one footstep and one small New ar's cupcake. At least it was a step in the ht direction!
Mr. and Miss Popularity took it on them-ves to cross the threshold of some of the re shy class members, the ones they knew uld be at home—alone.
Now, this is my idea of a fine New Year's rty—and I don't think the pagan revel can mpete with it in adventure or fun or the orning after" waking up on that important t day of a New Year with a good feeling.
d I'll admit right now that I like to feel od.

From old Dutch times to the middle of the nineteenth century in ol' New York, New Year's Day itself was devoted to that same idea—love and good will toward the next fella. Every door was thrown wide open. It was a real goof to omit any relative or friend in these annual calls when old acquaintances were renewed and family differences peacefully settled. Now, being a friendly soul right down to my white bootees, I like this idea too (although I haven't yet figured out how they avoided being out calling on you when you came to call on them).

Tyrone Power had in his library a diary kept by another Tyrone Power in 1834, in which he described his first New Year's in New York. In it he explained "the strict observance of this day." After recounting a delightful series of calls he concluded: "I then returned to my hotel to think over the many beneficial effects likely to grow out of such a charitable custom which makes even the stranger sensible of the benevolent influence of this kindly day and to wish for its continued observance."

Here's what I think. No matter what we actually do to celebrate—whether we party, or go First-Footing, or go to a football game, or call on friends and relatives—we can make any activity a Party With a Purpose if we get a good grip on that one idea: This Kindly Day, this opportunity to set our personal relations straight and start the brand-new cycle without an "enemy," or a feud, or a resentment, a neglected friend or a broken fence in our friendship circle. Make sense?

DOLLARS AND SENSE

By FRANCIS O. WALSH

Wages are up,
And prices are steeper.
Money still talks,
But talk's getting cheaper.

INTERNATIONAL NEW YEAR'S PUNCH

New Year's punch, for many adults, is a "pepper-upper" designed to inject gaiety into the holiday celebrations. The way I see it, too often the gaiety is artificial and the punch leaves 'em flattened on This Kindly Day.

For myself, I'd like a pepper-upper more substantial and more lasting and so, from all over the world, Shirley and I have scrambled together the ingredients for our own concoction.

As you can see, the ancient Romans, the English, the Scotch and the Dutch have contributed so far. Now from old China comes our first pepping-up ingredient. Out of what was once the most gracious culture in the world comes the idea of filling the year with joy and happiness.

"I humbly wish you joy," said the mandarin to everyone he met. "May joy be yours." And we say, "Happy New Year."

When I say this to you, I mean it!

Do you know the definition of an optimist? An optimist is A hope addict.

And as I wish you happiness, I wish you optimism and hope. I salute you in the old middle English Waes Haeil, or as we say, wassail, which means "to your health." And I challenge you to be happy and healthy all year long.

You know, we're always as happy as we permit ourselves to be. I remember drooping home one evening when I was a freshman in high school and my dad taking a long look at me and saying, "How are you tonight?"

"Oh, I'm fine," I said.

"Then why," he suggested, "don't you notify your face?"

A man named Anthony Euwer who knew there's no pepper-upper like a smile put it thus:

No matter how grouchy you're feeling,
You'll find a smile more or less healing,
It grows in a wreath
All around the front teeth,
Thus preserving the face from congealing.

The next ingredient comes from Mobile, Alabama, U.S.A., and may seem to some of the old grumps an odd recommendation—but they have to remember that I'm a singer and I know the value of noise (?) or, to be more dignified, "expressing your feelings in sound."

I recommend singing, cheering, hearty laughter (screaming and giggling, who needs it?), handclapping, drum beating, piano playing, trumpets, flutes, rooting sections—well, you get the idea.

The tradition of New Year's noisemakers originated, as far as I can discover, in 1831, in Mobile, when one Michael Kraft and some friends dined on New Year's Eve at a Creole restaurant. On the way home they passed a hardware store belonging to one of the group. Rakes, scythes, gongs, cowbells, the lids to pails were hanging outside to indicate what was for sale within. In a burst of joy and good spirits the merry men latched on to these instruments and went through the city serenading sleeping citizens. If a bewildered householder appeared, he was shanghaied into the group. The last house visited belonged to the mayor, who asked 'em in for breakfast. This evening became tradition and grew into the Mobile Carnival—and we in the other states inherited the cymbals, the cowbells, the gongs.

Now, because I know how valuable is this form of self-expression, because I have sat in a barn and sung to a cow when I should have been milking the poor ol' heap, I only add that you should guard and never abuse this privilege! Don't harass the neighbors. Don't terrify your parents. I wouldn't advise serenading the mayor either! Remember, on This Kindly Day the appropriate noise is still Auld Lang Syne. Pick your spot, pick your company, pick appropriate horns and shakers—but don't forget song and laughter and cheers are great and they're the best stimulants of all. That goes for the whole year.

One last ingredient, the most important, comes from Europe (all points) and is called "dipping." This time-honored custom calls for the head of the house (or any individual), as soon as he wakes on New Year's Day, to pull from under his pillow the Bible he has placed there the night before. With closed eyes he opens it and puts his finger on a page. Then he opens his eyes and reads aloud to his family. He continues "dipping" in the Bible until he feels he has gained direction and strength for the coming year. As a regular thing, this "dipping" would be much more valuable when it's practiced in a more systematic way. But you get the idea.

To me, both the happiness and the heart full of song and laughter that I fervently wish you all through the new year are possible only if the Lord puts them there, and so I would recommend, as the most lasting, most substantial picker-upper I know, daily dipping into the Bible this coming year for direction, strength, comfort, and the kind of joy that has staying power.

Under "New Year's" in my scrapbook is a poem called "My Creed," by Harold Arnold Walter. I think, this year and most years, it comes closest to setting forth my personal goals. I've been creeping up on 'em a long time. This is my own special moon shoot. So far I'm still just orbiting around the earth. But I offer it to you as one of the aims I cherish most—and perhaps you'll want to adopt some of it as your own:

I would be true, for there are those that trust me;
I would be pure, for there are those who care;
I would be strong, for there is much to suffer;
I would be brave, for there is much to dare.
I would be friend of all—the foe—the friendless;
I would be giving, and forget the gift;
I would be humble, for I know my weakness;
I would look up—and laugh—and love—and lift.

HAPPY NEW YEAR!

Clearly your best moisturizer

When your hands are rough, red and dry, dermatologists say they lack moisture, not natural oils. Chamberlain's clear Golden Touch Hand Lotion contains not one but two of the most effective humectants known to science. Humectants are amazing clear fluids which control the delicate moisture balance of your skin by preventing the evaporation of vital skin moisture.

The secret of soft, smooth, lovely hands is moisture balance. Get clear, moisturizing Chamberlain's Hand Lotion today. At all toiletry counters.

CHAMBERLAIN'S
Clearly your best hand lotion

PUT YOURSELF IN THIS HAPPY PICTURE IN CAPE CORAL FLORIDA

It's peaceful, yet adventuresome. It's different from anything you've ever known, yet it's what you have always dreamed about. It's an exciting new waterfront community; ready now, not promised for tomorrow. An endless variety of beautiful homes; miles and miles of landscaped streets and wide waterways — boating, fishing, bathing — all in a luxurious Country Club setting — with much, much more to come! Mail the coupon TODAY and become part of the wonderful CAPE CORAL picture tomorrow!

$20 DOWN, PER MONTH!

Send for the most exciting book of its kind ever written — "THE CAPE CORAL STORY"

It's yours for the asking
ABSOLUTELY FREE
Send no money, please

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE MEMBER

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY!

Gulf Guaranty Land & Title Co., Dept. W48
1771 ... Tamiami Trail, Fort Myers, Florida
Please rush my FREE copy of "The Cape Coral Story" in full color.

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... State .....

A-REFRIGERATOR • B-TABLE • C-DISHWASHER (UNDER COUNTER)
D-FOLD-DOWN COOKING UNIT • E-SINK • F-PASS-THROUGH

By adding two rooms to left side of house, much was gained in not extravagant space. New part fits beautifully, complements the kitchen, spares main areas.

THE HOUSE THAT

The house shown here was beautifully tailored for a small family; but as families do, this one grew. Bedrooms upstairs allowed for expansion. The crying need was for eating space, one room where the whole family could gather at least once, usually twice, for family meals—a table standing ready to seat six and expansible to eight so there would always be room for guests.

This room, in the new-old way of dining rooms, must also serve for children's games and study, sewing and accessory tasks. Needed, too (because the perfect small kitchen originally planned had no such area), was an adequate and informal snack space.

By H. T. WILLIAMS

Doors here fold back to open the room into a summer porch, can be shadowed with split-bamboo shades. Café curtains wash. Floor is mellow brick. Ceiling is stenciled (could be papered).

Walls are white-painted plank. Pass-through over cherry buffet is painted to resemble tray. Table is white ash on walnut base, has two extra leaves and can seat eight. The chairs are cushioned in linen and sailcloth to resist weather and wear.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY GUERRERO

All was solved by building on the dining room and large pantry you see on the pages here: a pantry with an eating table for four—more shelf and equipment space—and the plus bonus of a cooking center, apart from the kitchen, where soup can be heated, tea and coffee made and even the children can indulge their fancy for frying eggs or making fudge or fixing sandwiches without colliding with crucial activities.

All secondary considerations were met too: more storage space, more refrigerator space and frozen-food space and a dishwasher, not considered so essential when the family was small.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

GREW

The dining room is gala now with painted chairs, disk table, family mementos, hardy floor, white walls . . .

The serving pantry with kitchen facilities; it has snack bar, extra storage, power to run appliances, easy pass-through.

A tabletop (see last picture below) becomes a counter by lifting two drop leaves on the wall. Freezer-refrigerator never needs defrosting, has a freezer section below plus ten cubic feet for fresh food.

Pantry counter and the dining-room server in next room are built to same height—a pass-through joins them. Vinyl floor was put down with special adhesive over the on-grade cement floor. The multicolor terrazzolike pattern is practical against footprints. Plan, as you see, stays clutter-free.

Two electric units fold down from wall when there is cooking to do. Other times, counter is free. Below it is dishwasher that also helps warm plates for meals.

When foursomes gather, counter leaves go down, leaving a table in place. A power unit in wall is backed by heavy three-wire circuit—runs toaster, coffeepot, electric frypan and all.

THE BURNING EYE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 35

ashore. We should make Sugulli by first light tomorrow morning."

Howard Fisher came awkwardly across the saloon. "Just what is our cargo?"

"Rice and hides." Wellard spoke casually. In his mind he could see the afterhold. Rice would swell, so would hides; awkward cargo in a bad sea, and the bags of rice would split. If the Cambria was taking water—and he knew she was—the pumps would be going; there would be loose rice everywhere, blocking valves and choking the pipes. If they didn't make Sugulli by morning he was sure they would go down.

The Reverend Henry Blaikie had decided that he would not go in to dinner. He lay on his bunk, wedged in with pillows, and with each roll of the Cambria the wardrobe door swung open and then crashed back. The sea was like something living, angry, trying to smash its way into the cabin.

He lifted the Bible and opened it in the hope of comfort—but not now. He had sinned; and although he knew that the Lord would forgive, he knew, too, that he had been left to find his own way back to grace, had been left perhaps to find his own punishment.

He stirred uncomfortably at the thought of going ashore at Sugulli. He didn't want to see colored people again.

There was a knock on the door and Royce came in. "Are you all right, padre?" he asked.

"Yes, thank you. What can I do for you?" Blaikie disapproved of this man. The day after the Cambria had left Bombay the captain had been advised by radio to hold him on fraud charges and to hand him over to the protectorate police at Aden. "I imagine," said Blaikie, "that you didn't come here for spiritual advice?"

Royce smiled. "Padre, you know these parts. I just wanted to find out what kind of place this Sugulli was."

"You'll see it tomorrow."

"That's true, but I like to know where I'm going."

"I should think that in the past a lot of other people would have liked to know that too."

Royce laughed. "Well, I'm going to pay for it. Ten years in Dartmoor. Not pleasant, but I'm not squealing. Anyway, there's no harm in wanting to know about this Sugulli."

"No, I suppose not. Sugulli is on the Gulf of Aden coast of Somaliland. It's about eighty miles due west of the Horn of Africa."

"Is there any big town near it?"

"Not really big. There's Kandala, another hundred or so miles to the west. Beyond Kandala there's British Somaliland and beyond that French Somaliland. Six or seven hundred miles of coast line."

"But Sugulli's Italian, isn't it?"

"In a way. Somalia used to be an Italian possession—the old African empireof Il Duce. He built roads, poured money into it and tried to settle his people, but the only thing he ever got out of it was the almost universal hatred of every Somali for the Italians. . . . Why this sudden interest?"

"Oh, I just like to have a general picture."

"After the war the United Nations gave the trusteeship of Somalia to the Italians. The whole thing was disgraceful. They're due to hand over their trusteeship to the Somalis sometime in 1960, and personally ——" Blaikie broke off suddenly. "Well, that should give you what you call a general picture." And then, cocking a dark eyebrow at Royce, he said, "I'm afraid I can't tell you whether the Italian trusteeship authorities have any form of extradition agreement with the United Kingdom."

Royce grinned. "I'm not interested, padre. But thank you very much. Kandala, eh?"

"That's right. But it's a long journey. It's not yet the end of the rainy season in this part. Even if you could manage a mule or a camel, I wouldn't advise it."

"The thought never entered my head, padre," said Royce easily.

Wellard felt tired. The crew working in the afterhold had been thrown all over the place and he'd had cuts and bruises, a concussion and one man with a broken leg to look after. He knocked on the door of Lily Pincott's cabin and heard her call. A large whisky and a few minutes' chat would do him good. It was easy to relax with Lily.

Lily, a loose wrapper around her, was sitting on the edge of her bunk holding a hand mirror. "Take a pew, ducks. I'll be with you in a sec."

He dropped into a cane chair and watched her as she finished her eyebrows. On the table was a large wicker hamper. A slatted door had been pushed aside and six white doves were perched on top. As Lily reached for glasses two of the doves flew up and settled, one on each shoulder.

"Look," she said. "They want to go into the routine. You'd think they'd be seasick."

"How long does it take you to train them?" he asked.

"About a year. Bags of patience. How long do you think it'll take me to make you feed out of my hand?"

He smiled at her. "Old man albatross I am. Always on the wing."

She put her hand on his hair and shook his head, making a mock angry sound. "You're a hard nut," she said. "But I like you. That's the trouble with me. When I like someone, I like them too much. You think this tub will make Sugulli?"

"Easily."

"I don't envy you being stuck on her."

"I'm leaving at Naples. Another ship. I shan't be sorry."

"Naples, eh? That's my next booking. You ought to come and see my act. I come on in silver tights and masses of flimsy stuff. Very artistic, and covered in blasted pigeons. Drums rolling and sexy music. It's about as vulgar as can be. Standing there with the doves undoing little knots, and things falling off me." She laughed.

He stood up. "You ought to chuck it. Go home and settle down."

"Maybe—but who with?"

"Some nice guy who wants to settle too."

She looked at him, smiling. "You ever tried waiting for an albatross to settle?"

They made Sugulli by early morning. The Cambria came in under the lee of the easterly horn of the little bay, where the seas were calmer, and her chain went out. Wellard listened to it running for a long time and knew there was deep water here, probably right up to the beach. The Cambria had a list on her now that had taken her rail down to within twelve feet of the water.

They put over a small boat for him. With rain driving at his back, he sat in the stern, swaying to the movement of the boat as the seamen pulled toward the beach.

There were five or six men squatting under the palms. He stopped in front of the group and said, "Anyone here speak English?" They looked at him with a mild curiosity. He felt irritated. This was really the purser's job, but then the purser with all the other officers was hard at work on the cargo. So the doctor got it. "Parla Italiano? Italiano? Ufficiale Italiano. Carabiniere!"

An old man stood up and made a gesture for Wellard to follow him. They went along the row of palms, passing five or six houses, and then were on a rough road, the potholes overrunning with water. To their right Wellard saw flat patches of cultivated land, the tall green of maize and a few sheds roofed with corrugated iron. The road after about half a mile dipped and met a small stone causeway that jutted some way out into the lagoon, where it ended in a flat island with a block of buildings in its center.

An Italian flag swung damply in the wind over a doorway to the left of the buildings. It was a square, ugly concrete block with narrow windows. To its right, and adjoining it, was a taller, two-storied building, running right out to the water's edge. A board announced Albergo Commercio.

The old man pointed to the door under the flag. Wellard went through the doorway and the gloom rose about him like smoke. At the end of the corridor was a beaded curtain, and from behind the curtain a voice, heavily accented, said in English, "You from the ship?"

Wellard held the curtain aside. A man wrapped in blankets, lay on a small camp bed. He had a round, red face and crisp, coal-black hair. He gave Wellard a smile and then shut his eyes and shivered so that the bed shook. The spasm over, he said, "Giuseppe Dracopoli. Yousseff was here and told me."

"I'm Wellard. Yes, I'm from the ship." He went closer to the man and put his hand on his forehead. "I'm a doctor. Malaria?"

"Why not, when they put me in a swamp? Tomorrow I shall be all right. Ship in trouble? Must be to come here."

"We want to bring a few passengers ashore until the cargo's restowed. Have you dosed yourself for this?"

"Quinine and Chianti. You know something better, doctor?"

"Maybe. Who's Yousseff?"

"One of my askaris. He lives next door in the Commercio." He closed his eyes and his body shook. When the spell passed, he went on, "Tell Yousseff to fix everything for your people. But you bring blankets, and food."

"I'll fix it. I'll give you an injection too. We shall only be here a couple of days."

"You will find that too long. I have had five years; no, six." He shut his eyes and this time they stayed shut.

As Wellard crossed the room a shadow fell across one of the courtyard arches. A man stood looking at him. He was a Somali wearing an old Italian-army tunic and faded blue denim trousers.

"Yousseff?"

"Si, signore dottore."

"You were listening?"

"Si, signore. Hear everything tenente says. Ship very poorly, eh?" He made a tilting motion with his hands. "Come, I show you bedrooms. This ways." He backed toward the courtyard.

As they went out Dracopoli shouted feebly, "Don't give him anything to drink."

Yousseff smiled. "Tenente joke. Am very sober man, signore. Drunk once a week only."

The wind had practically gone, making now only the faintest whisper through the palm trees. The sea was still running quite high. Away in the lee of the low headland, lights from the Cambria picked out her white superstructure and made a wobbling oval of illumination all around her Sitting on the edge of a broken stone coping above the beach, Wellard jerked his cigarette away and, shifting his feet, felt the hard, crisp top sand break brittle beneath them. A couple of native boats had been run down to the water's edge and men were preparing for the night's fishing.

At his side Royce said, "But, old chap, I can't see that it's any skin off your elbow what happens to me."

"It isn't. Frankly, I don't care what happens to you."

"Well, then. I see Dracopoli has an old army truck at the back of his place. I could be fifty miles away by morning."

"You could do that without telling me."

"Not on your life. You'd hear the noise and you'd be out after me. Right?"

"Right."

"So, it's better to have an understanding. Look, you stay fast asleep and I'll make it worth your while. Name any bank, anywhere, and when I'm in touch with the good old funds again I'll send a draft."

Wellard laughed. "Don't waste your time. The captain's put you in my charge, and that's that. Even though I might be tempted by your money, you'd never pay me a cent. And between ourselves, the truck's no good. Yousseff's got half of its innards under the kitchen table."

Royce was silent for a while. Not dispirited. If one thing wouldn't work, there was always another that might. Looking now at Wellard, he had a rising curiosity about the man.

"You're right, doc. I wouldn't pay you. But just supposing you knew I would, and the truck was O.K.?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 94

OTHER VIEWS OF VOGUE PATTERNS FOR CHRISTIAN DIOR DESIGNS ON PAGES 54 AND 55

Vogue Design No. 1470. One-piece dress and jacket; 10–18 (31–38). $2.50. Version shown requires 4⅞ yards of 45″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 1471. One-piece dress and jacket; 10–18 (31–38). $2.50. Version shown requires 3¾ yards of 54″ fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 1472. Suit, coat and scarf; 10–20 (31–40). $3.00. Version shown requires 2⅝ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for suit and scarf and 3½ yards of 54″ fabric without nap for coat, size 14.

This tablecloth was washed in blue Cheer®

Wouldn't you like all your wash this white, this perfect?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 92

Wellard stirred a little and said, "Then I'd want ten thousand pounds."

Royce chuckled. "Every man has a price. Now I wonder what you've got your eye on for ten thousand."

"Something that wouldn't suit you at all."

"Like me to guess?"

"Some other time. We've got company." Juliet Barclay was coming down from the ridge.

"You couldn't get that for ten thousand," said Royce. "She's worth the earth. If I had her money, old man, I could afford to be honest."

Wellard was watching her cross the sand, sinking into it with her high heels and spreading her arms to keep her balance. She came over to them and settled alongside Wellard, her skirts spreading with a stiff rustle of silk. Her face, in profile, was pale and clean-cut. A drift of expensive scent caught his nostrils. Expensive, elegant, used to getting what she wanted, sure of herself... Perhaps she reminded him of the past because the other had been something like this.

Her hands were resting lightly on her knees. He was strangely, almost physically conscious of them. Long, cool hands. . . . He saw himself dancing with her, holding her hand, imagining the easy, responsive movement of her body. It was the kind of trick his mind hadn't played on him for a long time, and he stirred uncomfortably. To escape her he looked out across the waters to the Cambria.

That moment was one which was, all his life, to be inerasable, something to lurk forever sharp in his memory, to come leaping back with every detail clear at a moment's will. He sat there and watched the horror begin, with a dreadful deliberateness which was somehow also rapid.

Under the lee of the low dune headland the listing Cambria slowly dipped her starboard rail to the sea; the great open mouths of the after and fore holds, battens and covers loose on the decks, began eagerly to suck down and swallow the inrushing sea. Then she turned over completely. For a second or two she lay like that, then there was a deep, angry mutter of explosion. And abruptly there was nothing but a fury of boiling, turbulent white water.

Wellard was running hard down the beach. He had his hands on the gunwale of one of the native boats, lighting to run it seaward. A dark face appeared on the opposite gunwale, openmouthed with the strain of pushing. The boat began to move and Juliet Barclay was beside him, braced forward, white-faced, pushing with him. As his head bent with effort he saw, in the way that trivial details cling to the mind after shock, that she had kicked off her high heels to get a better purchase on the sand. The bow hit the sea, and then they were through the surf and throwing themselves aboard; already there were three men at the oars. From farther along the beach was the movement of other boats, other people. Seeing the steering oar unmanned, he went quickly aft and took it, bearing on it and taking the nose of the boat round and toward the distant headland. Crouched beside him was Juliet. He put his hand into his pocket and handed her a box of matches.

"Light this thing behind me."

She stood up, crowding against him, and with his free hand he held her by the waist while she struck a match to light the fishing torch of oily rags.

A few moments later and they were at the spot and by the flaring torchlight Wellard could see the surface, disturbed and marbled with oil and eddies, and littered with planks and hatch covers. Quite close one of the Cambria's boats drifted, upturned. A white face and the splash of hands caught his eye. He saw the face go under.

"Take her."

He pushed the butt of the steering oar to Juliet and flung himself over the side, hitting the water clumsily. He went under into the blackness, and after a while his groping hands felt the flesh of an arm. He came to the surface and began to kick out, dragging the man toward the boat. The bow swung round toward him. Above him he saw Juliet Barclay tail and white against the boat flare.

"Hold on!" She leaned over with one of the Somalis and they began to pull the man into the boat. He trod water, waiting; then Juliet reached down to him, her fingers clamping firmly about his own.

All through the night and morning a search went on.

Wellard followed Dracopoli into his house. "You shouldn't have come out."

"It is nothing. In another day it will be gone."

"What now?"

Dracopoli shrugged. "You are now in Sugulli for some time. In this season the big dhows stay close to their ports."

"The Cambria's radio went while she was at sea. We couldn't send a message that we were putting into Sugulli. When she's overdue at Aden, they'll think she went under in the monsoon."

"Well, she did go under. What tragedy! Of her captain and crew only one man saved."

"No other bodies have been found?"

"Yousseff has been out again with some of the men. There is no hope for anyone else. Most of them have been trapped in her, and then there are the sharks. She lies there in very deep water. I will send my askari to Kandala with a full report. From there they have communications. They can get a boat diverted to pick you up, or send one up for you."

"How long will that take?"

"Who knows? Kandala is over a hundred miles away. In this weather the road is useless for a truck. My boy will ride . . . four or five days, and then they have to make the arrangements. It could be a week, but almost certainly longer."

Back in the Albergo Commercio Wellard went up to the room where they had put the seaman. Edward Harkness, whom he had pulled out of the sea.

He was sitting up in bed, a bandage around his forehead. He gave Wellard a grin that showed three broken teeth and said, "Good evenin', doc. Think I might be allowed to have a smoke?"

"How are you feeling?" He went over and felt the man's pulse. It was normal. Wellard tossed a packet of cigarettes and a box of matches onto the bed.

"No grumbles, doc. No grumbles. Not for a while, anyway. Thanks to you."

Wellard went to the narrow window. It was getting dark outside. "Did you see anything of the captain when you came on deck?"

"Not a thing, doc. I was aft, you know. Nobody else was on deck. I'd just got up when over she went and I slid across the deck like a flounder and hit the rail with the old knob." He touched his head. "It's the nearest Mrs. Harkness has come to being a widow ——" He broke off; it was too close and the people who had gone too much alive in his mind still.

Wellard said, "How do you feel about food?"

"Fit, doc. Show me a steak and chips."

Wellard smiled. "Soup and spaghetti."

"No grumbles, doc."

Wellard went down the passageway toward his room. The door to the roof was open and on the rain-cooled air he caught a sudden drift of perfume. He stopped suddenly, as though a voice had called to him.

He went up the stairs. Juliet Barclay was leaning on the parapet overlooking the lagoon, her raincoat draped around her shoulders. As he went across to her she turned and gave him a calm smile and he contrasted it in his mind with the look on her face he had seen as she helped pull him into the boat. She had been full then of an angry anguish and he remembered how surprised he had been at the strength in her hands as she held his arm.

"I came up here for some air," she said. "My room was like an oven. What a ghastly day it's been . . . a terrible business. I can't get it out of my mind. Is there any hope for the others?"

"None, I'm afraid. With the Sugulli men we've been all round the beaches, right up as far as the place where the lagoon runs into the sea." He drew on his cigarette, relaxing against the tiredness in him "As soon as it was light some of the men and boys dived, but there's more than ten fathoms of water."

"What happens now?"

"We're stuck here for a while. Dracopoli is sending a dispatch to Kandala. If you want to send a letter, I'm sure it could go down in his bag."

She shook her head. "There's no one. No one that important."

"No one? What about your husband?"

Without looking at him, she said, "He was drowned three years ago in a sailing accident."

"I see."

She turned to him, her head softly silhouetted against the pale wash of night sky over the lagoon. "And you?"

He shrugged. "No one. So that makes two of us."

She went on: "It surprises me that such a small ship as the Cambria should have a doctor aboard."

"It doesn't normally. Usually I'm on the bigger boats in this line. But I got orders at Bombay to leave my ship and come back on this one as far as Naples to take over another."

"You like the life?"

Every time she moved, the fall of her hand or the turn of her head bringing the pale smoothness of her cheek into view evoked a flood of imagery in him—the kind of response he hadn't known for years.

"The pay's reasonable," he answered lightly. "So is the food. And the company changes."

"And you never wanted a shore practice?"

"It never happened that way." To steer away from the subject he asked, "What were you doing on the Cambria, anyway? She's hardly your class. No luxury bars, no swimming pool, no expensive private suites. You don't need to travel slow or rough."

She laughed. "I don't have to. But sometimes I need to. I know what you mean. I ought to keep in my own little world, the luxury world. That's the trouble with being rich: people expect you to stay in your proper place. You don't know how lucky you are having a job to do. Something that gives you a place in a real world."

"I wouldn't complain if I had money."

"I'm not complaining about the money. Only about the high-class jail it builds around you. And about people—people like yourself, for instance, who adopt a special way of looking at you. Not liking you very much. Perhaps secretly resenting you."

He shook his head. "You've got it wrong. I don't dislike you."

She laughed gently. "Now you're trying to get out of it. But it's no good. With someone like Lily Pincott, for instance, you're quite natural. With me, I can see the barrier go up."

Without thought he said quickly, "You're quite wrong. I like you. But if you want the truth, maybe I was prejudiced. It's not the same thing." As he spoke he was wondering why she should have this power, against all his experience, to draw him to her so that everything she did and said had a compelling appeal to him.

"Why should you be prejudiced about me? You don't know me." Her mouth tightened and she leaned back against the parapet.

"I suppose it was because you reminded me of someone. She was rich too." Too late a voice inside him cautioned him to keep quiet.

She said firmly, "You can't leave it like that. What went wrong?"

He straightened up. There was no escape. "Everything. I was too young, that was all. Just qualified. She was married. Unhappy. I thought there would be a divorce and we would be married. There was a divorce—I was cited. But no marriage."

"Why not?"

"She didn't see it that way. She was my patient and the General Medical Council struck me off. It took me five years to get a reinstatement. By that time I'd become a ship's doctor for good, I guess. There were plenty of foreign lines that didn't care about the G.M.C." He faced her and saw that she was moved. He went on with a light laugh, "It's all right; I don't have any dramatic feeling about it."

He put his hand out to her arm, to lead her away. But she stayed still looking at him. He could hear the water splashing musically from the cistern. The air was full of her scent and he could feel his hand trembling on her arm.

"Come on," he said, and she turned with him toward the roof door. But in the movement, not knowing whether it came from him or from her, they were suddenly close together and his arms went round her. He kissed her gently, and then with a stronger impulse.

She moved by him toward the door and he followed her down the stairs. In the darkness he felt her hand find his for a moment and then she moved quickly away to her room.

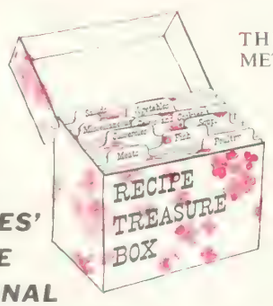
The open space in front of the causeway was dappled with great pools of water, and the air, now without wind, was full of a rich, tangy smell. In the starlight, Royce could see that the water had risen about a foot since yesterday. Halfway up the causeway a dark, squatting shape rose upright slowly. He recognized Yousseff, a plaited-grass basket tucked under his arm, trousers rolled high.

"What are you doing?"

Yousseff grinned and pointed to the culvert under the causeway. "Fish trap, sir. They come through hole and put heads in net. Yousseff pick them out. Very easy. Mister look for something to do?"

"What I want is something on four wheels that goes—and don't offer me your truck."

"For bottle of whisky, tell you where to see good Americano jeep. Only come today."



"Half a bottle. Tomorrow."

"O.K."

"All right," Royce said, "I can manage from here."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

A GIFT TO TREASURE

THIS WASHABLE PINK-FLOWERED METAL FILE BOX will hold 350 recipes. A perfect size for recipes you clip, it comes equipped with 12 handy index dividers and 50 all-time favorite Journal recipes, ready to enjoy.

If you'd like ADDITIONAL BUDGET TREASURES, the Journal has prepared a packet of 50 more recipes. Just add 50c*. Or if you already have the Treasure Box, and want these 50 extras you may order them separately.

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

RECIPE TREASURE BOX $1.35 Postpaid

SEND CHECK OR MONEY ORDER TO: Offer good in U.S.A. only

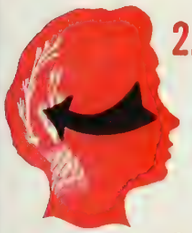
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL RECIPES

DEPT. 1, INDEPENDENCE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNA.

Pennsylvania residents add 4% Pennsylvania sales tax*

Acts Instantly....to give more complete pain relief from



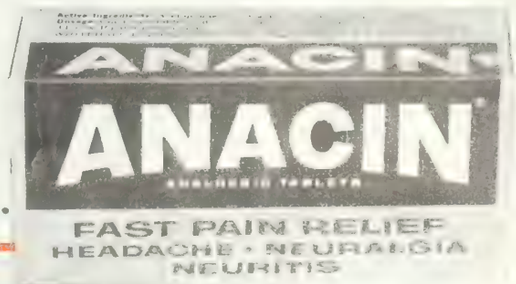
Tense, Nervous Headaches

ETTER THAN ASPIRIN OR SPIRIN WITH BUFFERING

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension
Nervous tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles.

2. Pressure
Tension puts painful pressure on nerves and tiny blood vessels in the head.



3. Pain
Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

Tense, nervous headaches need the special medication in Anacin. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever and no special medication to relieve nervous tension. But Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients — each with a specific purpose. Anacin not only relieves pain incredibly fast but also contains special medication to relax tension and release painful pressure on the nerves — assuring a better 'total' effect — more complete relief from pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients in····

Richer in natural

CORN CREAM

Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago 4,

It's in the taste, the texture! . . . the superior quality of Libby's Cream Style Corn. Libby selects the best quality corn to insure plump, tender kernels filled with natural "corn cream." Libby's—richer in natural "corn cream." 8½-oz. and 17-oz. cans.

Meat Loaves Libby-Style—Shape meat loaf mixture into individual servings (1 lb. meat makes 4 or 5); bake at 350° F. in shallow baking dish for 20 min. To a 17-oz. can Libby's Cream Style Corn add salt, pepper, 2 tsp. prepared horseradish and 1 tsp sweet basil. Pour into dish with meat and bake 20 more min. Garnish as shown.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

He went down the ridge, his feet sinking into the soft, damp sand.

It was an Arab-type house with a wooden balcony added to the front overlooking the lagoon. Underneath the trees a jeep was parked. Its canopy was up and it was covered with drying mud. Royce walked slowly round it. The tires were good. Something pricked him gently in his back. He turned slowly and found himself facing two Somali men. One of them held a short-handled spear, pointing now an inch from Royce's chest.

"All right, chums. I'm not giving any trouble," said Royce.

The man without the spear stepped forward and Royce followed him toward the house, the man with the spear behind him. The light of an oil lamp came out through a large doorway. As they came onto the balcony a man stepped through the doorway and the leading Somali stopped and said something to him. The man answered, looking at Royce over the head of the Somali, amusement twisting one corner of his mouth. Behind the man, through the doorway, Royce could see a tall Somali woman standing in the room. She was better-looking than any Somali woman he had seen so far; tall and well built and with a gentle, mild sort of face.

"Come in," the man said, his voice unmistakably American. "You must be either the doctor or the one they want for fraud."

"A good guess," said Royce, at ease now.

"Sit down." The man pushed a chair forward with his foot. "You're not the doctor—he'd be wearing uniform. Fraud, eh? I heard it was for half a million."

"I'm not in that class yet." Royce smiled. "Thirty thousand."

"So. Well, news gets a little exaggerated when it travels. I'm Harmer. American. Mining engineer. Been in these parts, here and the other side, Arabia, the gulf, fifteen years. This is my wife, Madame Harmer."

Without a flicker Royce bowed. The woman turned and unexpectedly smiled at him and then went out of the room.

Harmer laughed. "She understands some English. What are you doing out here?"

"Two helpings of Yousseff's spaghetti need some walking down."

Harmer chuckled. "And you came through that little cut in the reeds over the other side of the ridge? Clever to find it. Brave to come through it too. Crocodiles. Muddied those nice brogues of yours."

Royce shrugged his shoulders. "I was a Boy Scout. Anyway, Sugulli's no Monte Carlo. I was bored."

"It's not good, but I'll take it. You've got too much on your mind to start sidetracking after women. But for the record, these Somali girls can be pretty faithful. Eile always carries a knife when I'm away. We really are married. Took her all the way to Mogadiscio—and that's the end of the earth from here—and a drunken old pastor did it. One daughter, Maria. She's sleeping on the roof."

Royce said, "Not a family man myself. Have to be able to move around quickly. But here's to you and yours."

"I'll run you back to Sugulli," said Harmer. "I've got to see Draco."

Harmer parked the jeep by Dracopoli's headquarters. Royce thanked him for the ride and went into the Albergo Commercio through the courtyard. Yousseff was in the boxlike kitchen.

"You find jeep, sir?"

"I came back in it—with Mr. Harmer."

"Ah, yes, Mr. Harmer. Very fine man. But one day be trouble over his Eile. I get bottle of whisky now?"

"Not now, or ever. The jeep's no good to me. It would take dynamite to blast the ignition key out of a man like Signor Harmer."

Yousseff jerked his fox-cub head. "Me, I work for Mr. Harmer once. Services not satisfactory. Once I lose spare key for jeep. Signor Harmer very angry. Curiosa, signore, but I look again this evening and I find key." His hand came out of his trouser pocket.

Royce reached out for the key. "Tomorrow—half a bottle of whisky."

Yousseff's hand closed tightly. "Tomorrow. One bottle of whisky."

"O.K." Royce knew when not to haggle. "One bottle, tomorrow."

Yousseff flipped the key through the air to Royce. "See, signore, I trust you."

"A lot of people do." Royce grinned. "Allah be praised!"

"I met one of your party just now," Harmer said. "Royce. He turned up wandering around my place. I gave him a lift back in the jeep."

Dracopoli opened one eye. "That's what he was after. The jeep."

Wellard said, "You'd better keep your hands on the key. All he wants is a good start. Can't blame him."

Harmer bit gently at his lower lip. "He wouldn't get far. These are the gu rains. Even I pack up. Everything becomes mud." He pulled from his pocket a thick Manila envelope, wax-sealed, and tossed it across the table toward Dracopoli. "You've got a man going down to Kandala?"

"Yes, tonight. Fagih—he's going by mule. Anything new?" He nodded at the envelope.

"My report? No—the usual junk. When they read it maybe they'll send me back over the water. I'd like to get away."

"What do you do?" asked Wellard.

Harmer smiled. "I'm an oilman. Engineer, geophysicist, dog's body. I've got a small post about fifty miles south in the Almaskat."

"What's that?"

"The mountains you can see. From there I scout around with my two boys."

"His company holds an oil-exploring concession from my government," said Dracopoli.

"There's oil here?"

Both Harmer and Dracopoli laughed.

"Everyone would like it if there was," said Harmer. "But there isn't. I've been over five years trying to convince my people of that. My kid's got a couple of boils, doc. You wouldn't care to have a look at them?"

"Certainly."

"Mighty nice of you. I'll come by in the morning and take you up. Any time?"

"Any time. I'm not going anywhere."

"Good." Harmer stood up and his shad stretched black and squat across the gl tabletop. "By the way, the big boy's co down to Libah. I passed him about thi miles out today. Stopped and had a wo That's where I learned about the Camb He's sharp. Never misses a thing."

"He's sharp—uno stiletto." Dracopoli rol his eyes at Wellard. "We talk about the s tan—Ali Yacquibi. Once a year he comes the coast for many reasons. To bring the ca to the plains where there will soon be gc feed. For the air. To show his face arou so that none of his people will get big idea

"He's all right," said Harmer. "It's a ha over from the old days when they alw came down once a year to collect tribute. S do, maybe. Also"—he grinned—"any wre on this coast belong to him. So I guess a thing off the Cambria belongs to him, hi hoof and hair."

"Give him Royce," said Wellard.

Harmer went out and the bead curta made a lingering, sibilant sound after him

Dracopoli leaned back in his chair a wiped his hot face. "Like me," he said, "he been here too long."

Wellard said, "From what little I've seen it, this country could do with oil. Mor schools, irrigation, good roads ——"

"Oh, yes. It would put the place on map."

"You don't sound very enthusiastic."

"That is because I understand politics. here could cause trouble."

"I don't see why."

"Dottore, you are an innocent. The trust ship terms are that we are to hand this co try over to the Somalis in 1960. Comp independence. You think we should go if was discovered? And then there would be trouble with the Somalis. . . . Luckily, ther no oil." Dracopoli stood up. "In Sugulli known that you are a doctor. Tomorrow mo people will come to you. Yousseff has ranged this, and I have plenty of medical s plies here."

He hasn't said anything to me."
racopoli smiled. "Nor to me. But I know sseff."
t'll give me something to do."
One needs that in Sugulli to keep sane."
opoli picked up Harmer's letter from the
. "Now I must see to Fagih and my disnes."

gih sat his mule easily, Dracopoli's disn bag tied to a leather belt around his t under the ground sheet which he had ed over his shoulders. The rain fell stead-rough the darkness and the mule's hoofs
e a regular suck and splash in the muddy nd. After a little while the ground rose tly and the road curved inland along one of the lagoon. Where the curve began was ch of olive trees; two men moved out from cover and stood across his road. Fagih d in without alarm.
ey were Somalis, not coast people, and both carried short-handled spears, the n of the fighting men. Fagih slipped off mule and unshipped the dispatch bag his belt. He handed the bag to one of men. Without a word the two men turned began to run at a steady jog trot.
gih led the mule to the olives and hobit. Wrapping his ground sheet close about he sat down at the foot of one of the
. Now and again on his trips to Kandala happened. Sometimes he would wait here
t or ten hours before his bag came back.
however long it was, he waited patiently.
country belonged to Sultan Ali Yacquibi a word from him could kill a man. Allah no patience with a fool. And Fagih was ool. In the end his bag would come back he would go on to Kandala. And Fagih r permitted himself the curiosity of won-ng why the sultan liked to read Dracopoli's atches. Such curiosity could be dangerous.
shut his eyes and went to sleep.

lthough it was still raining, the three men nder a wide awning spread over part of lat rooftop. The wet awning sagged in the wind and the night was full of the sounds of water. Jibarti and the Khalifa Hassan Jebro would have been happier in the house, but the Sultan Ali Yacquibi hated to be enclosed by walls.

Two petrol lamps burned in niches cut into the roof parapet. The three men sat cross-legged on small carpets, and a low table between them was set out with small cups of shiaha tea. Also on the table rested Dracopoli's dispatch bag, opened. One of Ali Yacquibi's hands rested on it. The two others—his brother, Jibarti, and the holy man, Khalifa Jebro—waited for him to speak. The khalifa watched him with the eyes of love. The khalifa, over sixty, nearly twice as old as the sultan, watched the man he had known as a boy and knew that this was the exact moment when Ali Yacquibi passed from him to be neither influenced nor commanded any longer.

Jibarti, three years younger than his brother, watched the sultan, but with no love. One day the sultan should die at his hand, but he knew that not yet was the time or the place.

Ali lifted the empty bag suddenly and dropped it at Jibarti's feet. One hand protected the papers on the table from the wind.

"Burn this."

Jibarti let it lie. To have picked it up at once would have been the action of a slave.

The khalifa said, "You have chosen?"

Ali nodded, and there was a hint of a smile on his face. "A man must choose his path wisely before beginning his journey. And the path must be kept."

"If Allah sends a landslide," said the khalifa quietly, "a man must step aside into another path."

"Allah can also send a whirlwind which will lift a man up and carry him swiftly to the end of his journey. Everything is with Allah." He moved his hand slightly over the papers on the table. "This thing is with us. It will stay with us until I say the time has come." He looked at Jibarti. "Do I have to tell you what to do?"

Jibarti stood up slowly, and his dark head just touched the sagging belly of the awning above him. "How can it be known that the American will have said nothing of his discovery of oil to others?" he asked.

"He keeps it to himself until he is sure that the news has reached his company. He says this in his report."

THE WHOLE TOWN WAS TALKING

Jed Wallace, the banker, said, "You can't buck a whole town without coming out black and blue." The town was in a fever of excitement—women as well as men—because the high-school basketball team was so close to the state championship. Carlisle McIntosh was the star-spangled hero and nothing was too good for him! His mother worried and so did Debby Parker, with whom he went steady. So, too, did old Martin Hoodless, who thought it was all "cussid foolishness." Ruth Moore tells the story in a new novel,

THE WALK DOWN MAIN STREET

complete in the February JOURNAL condensed from the novel soon to be published by William Morrow & Co., Inc.

"A man who discovers riches will surely tell one friend?"

"Not this man. He knows the danger of this discovery. One careless word could be a dagger in his back. All this he explains to his company. Now go."

Alone with Ali, the khalifa knew that this was truly the moment. He was alone with a stranger. No longer could he say "Yes" or "No" to this man and be heard.

Ali said slowly, "In your heart you feel this thing is wrong?"

"It is not of right or wrong that I think. Things which seem safe and begin small have a way of growing. The hole in the water tank passes from dripping to a jet of water which will drain the tank."

Sharply, Ali said, "The discovery he has made belongs to Somalia. But it must be kept hidden until we are ready to use it. There is only one way to make a man silent."

It was almost dawn when Fagih was wakened by the sound of hoofs. With a man at each stirrup, running beside the horse, the rider came up to the trees. Fagih recognized Sheik Jibarti, saw the damp folds of the yellow maro draped over one shoulder, leaving his right arm bare, and on it, distinct against the brown flesh, the tight band of the ivory ring which marked him as a warrior who had killed more than five men.

Jibarti slid from his horse. This was no work for a chief. His men would do it, but he must witness that the thing was well done; Ali Yacquibi had one way with mistakes and that was to give a man no chance to make another.

In the moment when Fagih realized what was going to happen, the thing was already happening. The two warriors raised their warans and the sharp blades were in his flesh. He fell to the ground and lay still, his blood black and spreading above the tunic belt.

Without a word from Jibarti, the two men picked Fagih up and carried him to the lagoon edge. They waded waist high into the reeds, and threw him out into the gray waters.

It was a warm evening and the whole party stayed late on the terrace. Dracopoli had brought over an old phonograph and some even older records. Royce, concealing his impatience, was the life and soul of the party.

It was past midnight before everyone had retired and he could get away. He slipped quietly out onto the terrace, wearing rubber-soled shoes and an old raincoat which bumped awkwardly with the packages of food he had stuffed into his pockets.

He stopped at the top of the ridge, under cover of the acacias. Looking down, he could make out the whitish gloom of the house and the tall, dark shapes of the trees around the courtyard which hid the jeep. All he had to do now was to keep a wary eye open for Harmer's boys. Well, here he went: lucky Johnny Royce on the move again.

From the ridge behind him Wellard's voice, faintly out of breath, came quietly: "All right, Royce. Let's go back."

Royce said angrily, "I'm getting out of here."

Wellard shook his head. "Hand over the jeep key and we'll go back and forget this," he said.

Royce jumped forward, hands outstretched for Wellard's throat. Wellard caught his right wrist, side-stepped and kicked Royce's feet from under him. Royce hit the sand with a jolt that stopped his breath.

Standing over him, Wellard said, "I did too many years in foreign ships. Some of the men used to come back fighting drunk. I had to handle them. Now give me the key." He reached down for it.

Suddenly from the house below them came one high piercing scream, brief and agonizing.

Wellard began to run and heard Royce with him. Long before they reached the yard, rising flames had begun to cast tall, black tree shadows back toward them, and swelling in their ears came the sharp crackle of burning wood.

Wellard saw that the back of the house was ablaze. He raced up onto the veranda, pushed open the loose doors and shouted, "Harmer! Harmer!" Just inside the room he pulled up, one hand gripping hard at the edge of the door. Harmer and Eile lay on the bed, a silk cover pulled back from their bodies.

Wellard went over to them. But even as moved he knew there was nothing he cou do. Harmer lay on his back, naked except f his pajama trousers, and a short-handl waran had been driven into his chest abo the heart. It was clear from Eile's still, starin eyes and the fear that marked her gentle fa that for a few seconds she had wakened a had known what was to happen.

"They're gone?" Royce's voice, shakin came from behind him.

"Yes."

Wellard glanced at the flames which we curling and flaring at the steps that led to t roof. He could go up, but he would never l able to come down.

"Get outside," he said. "Round by the je and wait for me. The child's on the roof. Th may not have touched her."

Lying on a chair were Harmer's jacket a trousers. He snatched them up and ran to t stairs, twisting the clothes round his hea Smoke bellied down the hall and the awnin was alive with racing flames.

Maria whimpered as he came up to her. S was naked except for a small shift.

"All right, love. Just a little fun and gam with your Uncle Chris." He wrapped th trousers and jacket about her, lifted her in h arms and ran to the far parapet of the roo The thatch was flaming like a great torc Burning particles of palm eddied and whirl over them. "Royce! Take her."

He leaned far over the side, lowering t child, saw Royce catch her. Wellard hit t ground and rolled, and then was up and ru ning for the trees.

"There's nothing more we can do. We better get out of here quick," Wellard sai "There could be people about who mig think it none of our business."

Royce went toward the jeep. "Give me t key."

Wellard sat at his side holding the chil As they drove up the slope Royce turned h head and looked back at the house. "Well he said grimly, "I finally got my ride in th thing. And if you hadn't turned up to del me I might have walked straight in on thi party. And got the same treatment."

The next morning it was pouring. As We lard walked along the corridor to Juliet room, he could hear water cascading from t roof. Juliet's room was the only one with spare bed and Maria had been put in with he The child was still in bed, in front of her tray with warm milk and bread.

"How is she?" he asked.

"She didn't sleep much. But she's enjoyin her breakfast."

Maria looked at him, smiled, and sai something in Somali. She held up a bunch keys on a ring and shook them musically.

"I gave her those to play with. They're fro her father's clothes. She seems all right, don you think?"

He nodded. "They're tougher than w imagine."

"What's going to happen to her?"

"I don't know. Dracopoli can tell her th her father and mother have gone away for little while. In the meantime she'd better sta up here today. Is that all right?"

"Of course. Between us Lily and I can loo after her." She came with him to the door. " must have been terrible," she said.

He nodded. "It wasn't too good."

She stood there with the door pulled bac so that they were hidden from the child in th room. The rain drummed distantly on th roof. He saw her lips frame to say somethin and then she was in his arms. "Chris—o Chris," she murmured.

He found Dracopoli in his office, lookin much better and wearing a fresh uniform, h revolver holster and belt highly polished.

Wellard sat down and lit a cigarette. "You' been up there?"

"Yes. I took the jeep up at first light. Noth ing left that you could recognize. Your pad is looking after what remains. It is a terrib thing. Poor Harmer and Eile."

"What happens to the girl?"

"I shall have to think about it. Her people— that is, Eile's people—won't want her. They'

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

The variety found in the shapes of ilex, laurel and andromeda leaves makes this arrangement—set in an old pewter bowl—an interesting and attractive decoration for hall or living room.

Winter Flowers

Shiny evergreen leaves last the winter through, brightened up from time to time with a few colorful flowers from a shop.

By JANET COTTIER

In winter months the evergreens from a small garden come into their own. Arrangements made with a variety of dark green leaves will last without needing any change for about a month, and the infinite variety in the shapes of the leaves and in the subtlety of their coloring makes them eye-catching decorations wherever they are used. For special occasions the same evergreens can be used as a background for a few bright flowers—tulips, carnations, roses, and so on—bought from the florist to transform the dark leaves into a gala bouquet.

Here is the same arrangement of evergreens that is shown at the top of the page. but with the addition of only six bright red tulips the green leaves are changed into a dramatic bouquet for very special occasions.

In this arrangement andromeda leaves are used as a background for a few yellow carnations. The wooden box used adds a warm glow to the sharp contrast between the glossy dark green leaves and the delicate pastel of the carnations.

From a perfect paradise
– the perfect light dessert !
For sweet refreshment that's shy on calories—enjoy chilled Dole Pineapple Chunks. Every delicious bit is from Hawaii, where rich lava soil grows the world's best-tasting pineapple!
And it's no sooner picked than packed—to keep that fragrant freshness you'd enjoy in the Islands.
Have Dole in the refrigerator — ready to serve chilled !
Ala Moana Park, photographed in Honolulu
by Tom Hollyman for Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd.
Dole
HAWAIIAN PINEAPPLE

NEW!

"Now you add butter to our Betty Crocker Frosting Mixes for creamy-rich, buttery-good frosting!"

Smooth, rich, buttery-good—you make home-cooked-tasting frostings without cooking, with our Betty Crocker Frosting Mixes. The secret? A special shortening that blends perfectly, instantly, with the butter you add. We guarantee your frosting will come out *perfect every time!

Betty Crocker General Mills

Real cooked caramel flavor without cooking! Try it with Betty Crocker Honey Spice or White Cake. Makes wonderful sundae sauce for ice cream, too.

Buttery-good! You can tint it any color . . . add your own flavorings . . . team it with any Betty Crocker Cake. Easy directions for candy are on the box.

Chocolatey-good, old-fashioned fudge frosting without cooking! Perfect with Betty Crocker Yellow or Devils Food Cake. Makes great fudge, too.

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect or send the box top with a letter describing your results to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis 40, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

as stiff-necked about mixed blood as Mussolini was."

"Is there any chance of catching whoever did it?"

Dracopoli stood up. "Only one man can help, and that is the Sultan Ali Yacquibi. If he wants the murderers, then they will be brought in. That is why you and I are going to see him this morning."

Libah consisted of two or three Arab-type houses standing in a long sandy bowl. A small wooden staging ran a little way out into the water with a scattering of boats tied alongside, shallow low-prowed punt affairs piled high with cut reeds. A little way back from the houses were pitched the camel-hide tents of Yacquibi's people, and Wellard could see the movement of camels and cattle.

The sultan's house stood some yards back from the lagoon edge, flat-roofed with a tiny minaret at one corner and a large saffron-colored awning sagging across part of the roof. Two Somali warriors squatted at the low doorway, short spears resting in their arms.

Dracopoli spoke to one of the men and he went into the house. He came back shortly and led them through the house and up onto the roof. Ali Yacquibi was sitting under the awning on a palm-fiber mat, and a little to his side sat the khalifa, an open Qur'an on his knees from which he was reading in a monotonous voice. As they came across the roof the sultan raised his hand and the khalifa stopped reading.

Dracopoli saluted the sultan and gave him a greeting in Somali and then said, in English, "This is Doctor Wellard from the ship, the Cambria, and since he has little of Italian and no Somali it would be well to speak in English."

"He is welcome here," said the sultan. "I have heard of the misfortune to the ship."

"There is another misfortune too," said Dracopoli. "That is why we are here."

"I have heard of that also."

"The doctor arrived at the house. He saved the bambina."

"The child is nothing. The other two are dead." He turned to Wellard. "God has made you the witness of much violence." He went on, to Dracopoli, "You have come to ask why this was done and to ask me where are the ones who are responsible?"

"Yes."

"To the first question you know the answer. The woman was of good family from one of the Saleban rers. Had she taken the American as a lover it would have been less serious. But they were married. Does a Somali woman marry a sab, a Midgan, a Tumal, and her brothers do nothing? Only recently I spoke to the American. I told him to send her back or to take her away."

Dracopoli said firmly, "If her brothers have done this thing, there is the law of the Italian Administering Authority. The woman's brothers must be brought to me."

The sultan looked over Dracopoli's head toward the rain-veiled waters of the lagoon. "Her brothers were fifty miles away when this happened. I have authority over my people, Tenente Dracopoli, but not even I can find out who did it. The American was a good man and I liked him, but he was stupid." He looked at Wellard. "You talked much with him? He was your friend?"

"No. I hardly knew him."

"He understood this country well. He should have taken some woman from the coast. Then this would not have happened. There are elements among my people which I regret."

"Maybe," said Dracopoli. "But this man was an American. There's going to be much trouble over his death."

"There is little I can do," said the sultan. "Death is not important."

Driving back in the jeep, Dracopoli said, "Now you can see what kind of job I've got."

"He knows who did the murders?"

"Certo. He could have them brought in by raising his little finger."

"And he's really dead keen on racial purity?" Wellard asked.

"You heard him. No true Somali woma must marry a sab. That's a slave. Midga Tumal and Yibir . . . leather and metal wor ers, and court jesters—but outcasts. And, far as he's concerned, so are all the whites

"You know," Wellard said slowly, "th thing doesn't fit together. It just doesn't fit

"Why not?"

"Because of Eile. She was in love wi Harmer. The real thing. If she'd had just o idea that being with Harmer would ha brought him into danger, she'd have left him

"Interesting ——"

"You know it is. And why, after five or s years of marriage, do her brothers sudden feel that they have to do something about long-established, but not very serious, insu to their family pride?"

Dracopoli stopped the jeep and switche off the engine. "You are no fool," he sa slowly. "What is it you have in your mind?"

"Oil."

Dracopoli nodded. "Why should Harm be killed because of that?"

"If he'd discovered oil, the first people know would be his company. But if the sulta knew, he'd have him murdered before could tell anyone. The sultan would want keep any oil discovery secret until the truste ship ended."

"Dottore, you have forgotten one thin Harmer brought me his last report. If he ha discovered oil, the news would be in that. Th report is already on its way to Kandala wi my dispatches. Ali Yacquibi would have mu dered him for nothing."

"Then why do you think he was mu dered?"

Dracopoli shrugged his shoulders. "Wh can tell? For some other reason, not Eile, n oil. Maybe for no reason. To kill a man o here is like smoking your first pipe, or havin your first woman. Just something. In the ol days they went out and killed the first perso who came along just to wear the white feath in their hair to show they had killed." H switched on the jeep engine, and said, "Bu anyway, I would not like you to discuss yo theory with anyone else. In a little while yo will be away. You will forget Sugulli, and th only thing of this place that will be with yo will be a little dust, maybe, in your trouse cuffs. Fortunato lei."

The sky had cleared before a fresh nort west wind. Lily and Juliet were playing wit Maria under the shade of a palm tree. The had made a ball from paper and string an were tossing it to the child. Maria was wea ing a garment made from one of Juliet's dresse Blaikie sat at the other end of the terrac the Bible open on his knees. He stirred a littl uncomfortably as he heard the sound Maria's laughing voice. She had lost most her shyness and seemed unconcerned by th absence of her parents, accepting what ha been told her by Dracopoli. Complete trust her elders, he thought. Complete faith.

The paper ball came rolling toward hi Maria followed it, running unsteadily. He brown arms and legs were contrasted sharpl against the white silk of her dress. She picke the ball up and, smiling, held it out to him throw. Before he could restrain himself, h shook his head and frowned. The child, puz zled for a moment, turned back.

At once Blaikie was ashamed of himself an he felt the burden of his own guilt and anguis heavy in him. The child, the child's color an this place all revived sharply his past. She wa Harmer's child. And she was Harmer's sin He had been murdered because of her. Th wrath of the Lord? What, then, was to be hi punishment? Like Harmer, he told himsel brutally, he had taken a colored woman, an like Harmer he had had a child. But unlik Harmer, he had not taken the woman to b his wife. She had gone away and had had th child without his knowledge; had come bac to tell him that the child was dead, that h need have no fear. From one hour of loneli ness and weakness, one hour of darkness, lus and sin, a child had come into the world—hi child, to be killed at birth to keep his nam free from scandal. All this the woman ha done, without his knowledge, and out of lov for him.

The next morning after his surgery as Wellard od pulling on a clean shirt there was a ock at the door.

Yousseff came in. "Dottore—have case for u. Not at surgery. You come now?"

"Come where?"

"Only one hour from here, dottore. Very k amico. You ride mule. I run alongside."

Wellard knew Yousseff by now. The man s scared. "All right. What kind of sick-ss?"

"Not sure, dottore. You bring everythings."

Yousseff brought the mule to a halt by a t. "Here, dottore."

Wellard got down stiffly.

"Very poor peoples," said Yousseff. He lled aside a hanging piece of sacking and ld it for Wellard to enter. Yousseff spoke in mali to someone in the gloom and Wellard w that it was a small, wiry old man wearing ly a loincloth. He stepped by them and oped the sacking back so that there was ore light in the hut.

A man was lying on the ground, tightly cooned in a blanket. Wellard bent down r him. The man stared up at him, his eyes ight with fever.

"Amico mio . . . molto dolore," said Yousff.

Wellard put his hand on the man's fore-ad. The skin was hot and dry. With help om Yousseff he turned him and took away e blanket. The man was naked except for a ad of rags that had been spread across his est. In the feeble light Wellard saw deep ounds, one close up under the right arm d another in the lower part of his chest.

"How did he get these?"

"By spear," said Yousseff. "Attacked by d men. Throw him in lagoon, but this man ere, turtle fisher, find him when cutting reed. ring him here and send for me."

Wellard reached for his bag. "How long as he been here?"

"Three, four days. Is bad, mister?"

"Is very bad, Yousseff."

He worked on while the old man watched d Yousseff, anxious to help, fumbled with ings from his bag, getting in the way.

When he had finished, he said to Yousseff, Why was he attacked?"

"Robbed, dottore."

"What had he got that anyone would want? goat or a broken-down donkey? Who is ?"

Yousseff shuffled uncomfortably. "You do ot know, dottore?"

"Would I ask if I did? Who is the man?"

Yousseff dug his foot into the sand. "Is bad ing. Be much trouble over this. Is Fagih, ottore."

"Fagih?" Wellard felt the shock hit him. You mean the messenger to Kandala?"

"Yes, dottore. Fagih."

"What happened to his dispatches?"

"All gone, dottore. Robbers take them."

"Who would have attacked him?"

Yousseff's sharp, foxy face was full of nxiety. "Many bad men up here." If he knew ny more, he was not telling.

Dracopoli lay stretched out on his cane haise longue as Wellard talked. Now and gain he ran his hands through his thick black urls, puffing out his cheeks and letting the air o from him as though with it he would have iked to release years of futility.

"When we talked in the jeep—you were alf expecting something like this?" said Wellard.

"In a way. One learns not to be surprised n this country."

"You want to see Yousseff?"

"No. He will say no more than he has said. And the old man the same. One word too nany could mean a spear in their backs."

Wellard stirred impatiently. "But something's got to be done."

"Of course. But we must be careful. First"—e looked at Wellard—"there is your party. No message has gone through. So I shall send another. But I should keep this from the others."

"And Harmer and the oil business?"

"I think that he had discovered oil. His letter told about it. The sultan will have destroyed the letter. Already, too, he will have sent a party to clear away any signs of Harmer's work—wherever the discovery was made. When you leave here I shall go down to Kandala with you and report to my capitano. I could not trust to send about it by messenger."

"And Fagih?"

"You think he will die?"

"He should be dead already, but he isn't."

"He has a woman here. I will send her out to look after him and you will tell her what to do."

"And if the sultan finds out he's still alive?"

"He would have him killed. But I think he will not find out. His people do not go to that part of the coast. Yousseff, the old man and the woman will say nothing. As soon as Fagih is well enough to move he will go—without being told. He will stay away until I send for him."

"I see." Wellard leaned back in his chair, trying to sort out the various lines in this problem. Only he and Dracopoli knew the full truth. It would be easy to make a mistake that would put them all in danger. "I don't like this second messenger. Surely the sultan will stop this man and wonder why you are sending another message to Kandala about us when we aren't supposed to know that Fagih hasn't got through."

Dracopoli smiled. "You should have been a carabinieri. But I am sending another report, anyway, about Harmer's murder and asking for instructions. As a postscript I shall mention that the Cambria party is still here and getting impatient. It will look natural so the sultan will not stop it. So long as you and I keep our mouths shut, dottore, there is no danger."

He had, Wellard told himself, to get this thing straight; if he didn't it would run away with him, with them both, and there would be nothing but trouble. And the cold answer was that no matter what had begun between Juliet and him, no matter how they felt, the thing must be stopped. He'd known this all the time, and had ignored it, but he had to face it.

A shadow penciled itself across the ground at his feet. He looked up and saw Juliet. The faint sea breeze touched the looseness of her fair hair. Distantly he could hear the wash and hiss of the sea sucking at the white sands of the beach. The great pulse of the waters seemed to move into him, beating and surging through him. What could you do? What strength had you got, the anguish in him demanded, when the woman stood like that, all and the only woman under the sun, and logic and common sense fled before the magic which she carried?

He made a movement to rise, but she came forward swiftly and sat at his side. He kept his eyes down, avoiding her face, seeing the way she curled her legs under her and the thrust of one foot against the sand. He dug his hand into the sand, gripping it and feeling the hard, sun-baked grain of it against his palm.

"Chris—what on earth's the matter with you today?"

"It's no good," he said harshly.

"What isn't?"

"Us. This thing."

She was silent for a while, and then she said, "You love me?"

"Of course. Of course I do!" He turned quickly to her, fighting the thing which was inside him. "That's the trouble."

"I don't understand. From that first moment on the roof we've both known what was happening. And now here it is. What can be wrong with it?"

He longed to take her in his arms. But he held himself back as though he were holding some great door against a tremendous gale.

"We can't live in the clouds. We've got to come down to earth. We should have to the moment we left Sugulli. I'm a ship's doctor. I make about as much a year as you spend on nylons and scent." He saw her lips open, but before she could say anything he went on: "I've got nothing. Absolutely nothing."

"But I don't care. I just want to be with you."

"That's another thing. You wouldn't be—married to a ship's doctor. Me away half the time—living in one world. And you waiting for me in another. Can't you see it just won't work? We must be sensible."

"Blast being sensible. Chris, darling, what does my money matter? If you love, then you share. Our love is the only thing that matters. We should have that, and it would always be you and me."

"Would it? I could change."

"What nonsense. You're strong, you know yourself and you've got pride."

"That's just it. Pride, if you like. A man has got to bring something into marriage besides love. If I had a shore practice, a future, I'd not waste words. You'd be my wife and live my way. But I've nothing except . . . well, old-fashioned pride if you like. If I throw that overboard, what is there left?"

"And you wouldn't let me buy you a practice?"

"That's something every man has to earn for himself, the one thing he has to be able to offer a woman—a position as his wife. Surgeon's wife, plumber's wife—or what have you. I can't live off you. You must see that."

"All I see is that you're being stubborn and unrealistic. I suppose some women would take this. Kiss a beautiful dream good-by. But I'm not going to." She stood up and the sand from her skirt showered down in a thin hail over his hands. "You're a stubborn beast. Oh, I can see you think you're doing the right thing. But you're wrong. You're thinking about it instead of accepting it. A woman doesn't do that. Not me, anyway. Love isn't something that can be questioned or planned. Chris, look at me."

He turned his head up to her.

She smiled down at him. "I'm not letting you go. You don't want me to."

"You've got to face it, Juliet."

"No." She shook her head. "You've got to face it. Sooner or later you'll see it my way. You'll have to if you really love me."

She walked away. He had to fight with himself to stop from running after her.

Money. Suddenly it had become very important. He'd never worried about it much before. But now in this hot, sand-blown, flyspecked Sugulli he wanted it badly. With enough to keep going for a few years he could go to Juliet. He had to have that much at least. But how did a man get money in the bank?

Suddenly he jumped to his feet. He felt a surge of excitement like a great tide flood through him. There was all the money he wanted waiting for him up at Harmer's house. Right under his nose. All he had to do was to collect.

At Harmer's request he had gone up to attend Maria once. He reconstructed in his memory that time when he had seen Harmer, in the main room of the house, turn from him and open the little safe at the side of the desk. The safe had been clamped to the floor boards. The burning wreckage would have collapsed on it and buried it. Harmer would have a safe that was fire- and water-proof and he would be the kind of man who would have kept a copy of his report to his company. Back at the albergo Maria was playing with the keys of the safe. All he had to do was to take Harmer's report and keep it to himself until they were out of Sugulli. The oil company would pay for that information. Pay high. Ten, fifteen thousand pounds. Enough even to buy himself into one of the exclusive Harley Street practices—he could soon bring himself up to date. And Juliet—she'd be happier in London than buried in some country town.

An hour later he was looking down at the remains of Harmer's house—a black untidy stain in the sand beside the lagoon. He went to the house, picking his way through the remains of the stone piles that had supported the veranda. His feet sank in the thick ash. Before him ran the broken-edged outline of a mud wall which had divided the sitting room from the back of the house. Some blackened roof timbers were piled haphazardly against it. The safe should be to their left. He skirted the timbers and stopped.

He was too late. There was a large crater-shaped hole where the debris had been scraped aside. Clear in the ashes he could see the marks of the fingers which had clawed the safe clear. On the level ashes before him were the marks of naked feet. He swore.

Sultan Ali Yacquibi was covering every possibility. Somebody might remember the safe, so he'd got his men to take it. It couldn't be opened, but that didn't matter. The sultan already knew what was in it. His only concern would have been to get rid of it.

Wellard's eyes followed the footmarks toward the sand. Reeds stood six feet high at the water's edge, a belt of green and yellow running out twenty feet before meeting the open water. Clear through them were the signs of the men's passage. They had just heaved the safe out into the lagoon. He knew it was there. All that was needed were a rope and a boat and darkness.

Royce had a ladder against the palm tree on the terrace and had fixed a spar from the tree to the parapet of the albergo roof.

As Blaikie came out onto the terrace Royce called to him, "Padre, hand me up that rope, will you?"

Blaikie handed up a length of rope that lay on the ground. "What is it?"

"Just an old-fashioned swing, padre. Maria is so full of bounce we've got to find something to amuse her."

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

Courage: what it takes for a plump woman to order a rich dessert when she has the eyes of several slender women upon her.

This ordinary today is the wonderful yesterday in tomorrow's memory.

When a woman really wishes to see how old she appears, she should not look in her mirror but at her contemporaries.

A person's tact is measured not by what it accomplishes for him but by what it accomplishes for others.

The honeymoon is over when husband and wife realize that although marriages seem to be made in heaven, they are always lived on earth.

The way some persons can help keep drunken drivers off the road is to stay home.

Of all the achievements of the past half century, the two greatest are the emancipation of the atom and the emancipation of the housewife.

Too many persons think that passing a driving test is the only test they'll ever have to pass in driving.

Boy, half asleep: "Nobody gets up at this hour of the day."

Mother: "Of course not! They're all up."

Rich man: one who can afford to do without a necessity.

Green Beans...

young, tender and stringless

STOKELY'S FINEST on any can of green beans is a promise. A promise of crisp, "just-picked" flavor. Flavor you seldom find these days unless you have a garden of your own. All Stokely's Green Beans are picked young when they're most delicious. Serve Stokely's Finest Cut Green Beans, Whole Green Beans, French Style Sliced Green Beans or Shellie Beans. They're ready to eat just as they come from the can.

You serve the finest when you serve Stokely's Finest Green Beans

Green Beans
by Stokely-Van Camp, Inc.

"That's right," said Lily, coming along the terrace with Maria. The child was laughing and chattering away in Somali.

Fisher came out of the albergo carrying a sawed-off length of plank with holes drilled in either end. "How will this do?"

"Just the job. You and the padre fix the rope that end."

Blaikie looked at the child dancing around Lily. The child, he thought, of sin . . . like his own child. Maria half turned to him, called something in Somali which he could not understand and then giggled, covering her mouth with her hand and hopping on one leg. Something about the movement and the young dark face rippling with laughter struck at him. . . . Sin. How could anything so young bear any part of sin? This child, all children were born into innocence. . . . Suffer the little children to come unto me. The words were in his mind unbidden. He saw himself avoiding the child, refusing even to bend and pick up her ball—immersed in his own sin and despair, wondering why God had set him down here.

Royce came down the ladder. "Now," he called happily.

Blaikie watched as Maria was seated on the plank and Lily began to push her gently. She squealed, half afraid, half delighted, and then was suddenly bubbling with pleasure.

"Push!" Lily's voice sang out.

"Push!" Maria copied her.

Blaikie found himself moving to the back of the swing. His hands touched the thin shoulders for a moment and then the child swung out, legs flying, shouting with pleasure; as she swooped back to him he steadied her gently and sent her away again. Watching her, hearing her cries of delight, he was suddenly possessed with a great sense of relief—relief which had no words to explain it. As though this were all that the Lord demanded of him: that he should be here, pushing a little colored girl to and fro on a swing, that his hands should touch her and his eyes should watch her without bitterness; he was oblivious of everyone else, knowing only that there was something like the hope of peace and understanding with him again.

Royce said, "O.K., padre, you've done your spell. Let me."

Blaikie walked slowly away. Tears made the bright lagoon waters dance mistily before him. He turned back to the albergo. He wanted to be alone in his room to think and to pray.

It was ten that evening before Wellard could get away. In his pocket was the ring of keys with which Maria had been playing. Behind Dracopoli's courtyard there was a palisade of bamboos. In a cut in the reeds below was Dracopoli's boat. Wellard pulled out a length of bamboo about twelve feet long. He carried it down to the boat in which lay a rope that he had put there earlier in the evening.

He pushed off and let the boat drift. After a time he began to paddle and made a wide half circle, well out into the lagoon, to take him southward and past the albergo. Juliet would be lying in her room asleep.

He was doing nothing wrong. He was going to help himself and also vindicate all the work Harmer had done. No matter which side was right—if any were right—the spoiling of the sultan's plan was a rough justice to set against Harmer's murder. And there was no betrayal of Dracopoli. He didn't have to know about this until much later. All he wanted was the right to be able to offer his love to Juliet without fear—Juliet, his Juliet.

He dipped his paddle savagely into the water and brought the boat inshore. With the bamboo pole he began to probe on the bottom of the lagoon just off the mouth of the passage. The pole struck something hard. He held it in the water, tapping gently. There was no doubt in his mind—the safe was sitting below him, half sunk in the mud. He rammed the pole into the mud alongside it to mark the spot. He fixed the rope he had brought to the bow, gave it a half turn round the pole to steady the craft and dropped the free end overboard.

He stripped off his clothes and eased himself over the side. He took the rope and dived, following the pole down into a black world, and found the safe, the edges slippery with mud.

He came up, sucking in air and smelling the stench from the disturbed bottom. Two more dives saw the rope securely about the safe and he returned to the boat.

He dressed, not hurrying, because to hurry would have let his excitement and satisfaction have rein. Then he took the strain on the rope. The gunwale of the boat dipped low for a moment as the mud held the safe. Then it came free and the boat rocked back. Moments later he had the safe in the bottom of the boat. From the ring, he fitted the safe key. The door came open with a quiet little suck of air. Putting his hand inside, he felt papers and envelopes, dry and secure from the water.

Methodically he cleared the safe. All he had to do now was drop the safe and go back to the albergo. Somewhere in one of his pockets must be what he had come to find.

He had no time for action. From either side of him out of the night a reed boat closed in silently. From either side he felt the even pressure of spear blades against his back and he held himself very still, waiting.

Under the awning the sultan, Ali Yacquibi, sat cross-legged before a small table. On it was all the stuff which had been taken from Wellard's pockets.

Wellard stood there in the rain, watching the movement of the sultan's lean hands over the papers, watching him sort them, pushing them aside until he was left with the sheaf of quarto pages held by a paper clip. By the attention the man gave these he knew that they were the things he had come to find: the promise of money, and now the promise of exactly nothing—less than nothing, because he was not fool enough to suppose that his life would be of any more account to this man than Harmer's or Fagih's.

The sultan looked up now and said quietly, "The last time you were here I said that Allah had made you the witness of much violence. Allah now makes you the victim of violence."

Wellard rubbed his wet hands together and he saw at once how the movement made Jibarti stiffen into alertness. The one brother talked and the other watched.

The sultan looked down at the papers. "You know you must die?"

"If Allah wills it." There was a hard humor in the tone.

The sultan smiled. "You would like a drink? Whisky, I mean."

"I would."

"I have it always. Many people visit me who are not of my religion." He said something in Somali to one of the men.

A fiercer squall of rain beat across the roof and thundered dully against the yellow canopy. The sultan nodded toward the corner of the awning opposite Jibarti and said, "You may stand under the awning there."

Wellard moved, feeling his feet wet within his shoes, the damp folds of his trousers clutching at his legs. Beyond the khalifa was a pile of mats with a wooden headrest. He had heard from Dracopoli that the sultan always slept up here, hating to be inside.

The sultan said, "Tomorrow your body will be floating in the lake and the crocodiles will take it, as they will take the others."

"The others!" Wellard made a move forward, but Jibarti's spear came up, leveled toward him.

"But of course. Why should I kill you and let Dracopoli and the others go?"

"But they know nothing about this!"

"You expect me to believe that? That you have said nothing at least to Dracopoli? If only he knows, the others must go." The sultan's lips thinned to a cold smile. "There is no difficulty. No message has ever reached Kandala, you know. Your people will be presumed to have been lost in the ship. And Dracopoli is nothing."

"But you can't do this," Wellard cried. "I give you my word. No one knows but me. I wanted the money I could get from the oil company. No one else knows!" He felt his desperation go through him like a flame.

The sultan shook his head. "I can risk nothing. Nothing you can say can alter me."

Wellard stood there, possessed by agony. Out of his own recklessness and self-seeking, he had condemned the others to death.

'h roof door opened and a woman came ou carrying a small brass tray. He ch her. He was going to be killed, and il others. And for all their deaths he al be responsible. Each one he had con-m —Juliet . . . Lily—all of them—yc . . . Fisher . . . Blaikie and Maria . . .
ic oli . . . Harkness and Yousseff. All of n

'h girl came across to him, holding out gl ss. One chance, just one, he prayed. His re tightened round the glass as he thought hi wning pole at his back and the weighty go f the wet canopy.
He aid harshly, "Here's hoping nothing
s ght for you," and drank.
Hi hand came down with the glass and ar vement flowed into a quick jerk that t flying toward Jibarti's face. The glass ic Jibarti on the cheek and the man
m ed backward. Wellard whipped round l ked at the awning pole behind him. It t way from him, the guy rope sagging se

As he corner of the awning dropped to-rd him he jumped clear of it, turning to-rd ibarti. The Somali, in stumbling, had sh d into the awning pole on that side. The ol front part of the canopy collapsed over s an and the khalifa. The two Somalis by d or sprang to their feet, shouting, and t them threw his waran at Wellard. He c coming, ducked. Jibarti, tangled in the r pe, was struggling to get to his feet. The e able was now in the open. Wellard b d the sheaf of quarto papers. As he re or the parapet on the lake side, he saw tv warriors rush toward him.
Th ground was about fifteen feet below and hi it awkwardly. The next moment he was in for the lake edge, cramming the papers in is pocket as he ran. Behind him he ar the pad of feet on the wet earth. In the in led darkness ahead he saw the bulky p of reed boats drawn up halfway from w ter. He headed for the nearest and ran in splashing into the water until it was w his knees. He threw himself into the it nd groped for the paddle. He couldn't f and a desperate panic began to rise in hen it came under his hand close to the ar nd he whipped it over the side. He pa - di uriously, his breath panting from him, wg the boat out into the lagoon, praying.

Dcopoli dressed while Wellard talked.
"Ad that's it," he finished savagely. "I ad money and I went after it. I didn't think for one moment of anyone else. And now ——"

"All right, dottore." Dracopoli's red face was grim. "Let us get this thing out of the way. Between us, that is. The others you must face later. I am a soldier. You have done something which, except for a miracle, will mean my death. You know this. I know this. That is your punishment. At this moment I would rather be in my shoes than yours. Now let us do what we can. He knows that none of us can get away from here. That's why he did not send boats after you when you escaped. He has all the time in the world." Dracopoli held out a bunch of keys. "At the back of my bedroom is the armory. Unlock it and get out the machine gun, the carbines and the ammunition. When you have done this take the jeep and back it against the albergo wall. Switch the lights on to cover the causeway. I will get Yousseff and Harkness to help carry over the arms to the albergo." He turned and hurried through into the corridor.

When the job was done Wellard paused for a moment. There was no time now for maudlin self-reproach. Nothing mattered except the others. They had ammunition and food. There must be something he could do to give them some chance. He owed them all their lives and it was a debt which he must honor.

The jeep lights cut a great swath along the causeway and the sand hills were molded with shadows, black against the white sands. In a moment, he thought, as he pulled the shutters, he would go back and face them all.

Dracopoli, a solid authority in the room, had explained the true facts of Harmer's death, and the reason why the sultan had wanted to keep the oil discovery a secret. Step by step he took them through all he and Wellard had known up to the visit Wellard had made to Fagih. It was here that for the first time he was interrupted.

Blaikie said evenly, "Then no message has gone to Kandala about us?"

"None. So far as the outside world is concerned, you all went down with the Cambria."

Fisher moved forward. "Come to the real point. We're not children. All these guns and so on—what's happening?"

"One moment, signore. Unfortunately for us, the sultan has now discovered we know about the oil and is determined to kill us all to keep his secret."

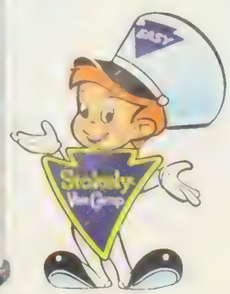
"What?" cried Fisher.

"But surely, this is ridiculous ——" Blaikie broke off as Dracopoli went on.

"Think how you'd feel if one of your pollywogs was missing!"

Shellie Beans...

country-cooking favorite



An old-fashioned family favorite—the meaty, nut-like flavor of shelled-out beans blended with the traditional goodness of cut green beans! Stokely uses a time-honored recipe—cooks them till they're just as tender, just as good as the beans grandma used to fix.

Serve Shellie Beans just as they come from the can or try them flavored with ham, bacon or onions, topped with cheese, or an egg sauce. Here's old fashioned goodness the modern, easy way.

You serve the finest when you serve Stokely's Finest Green Beans

Shellie Beans
Made only by Stokely-Van Camp, Inc.

"He is going to kill us."

"We knew nothing about the oil until this moment," said Royce. "Just what ——"

"You are serious about this?" asked Blaikie.

Dracopoli nodded. "It is the truth."

"But that's madness," said Lily. "He could never . . . wipe us all out ——" Her voice trailed away.

Dracopoli began to explain how easily the sultan could hush things up. The Cambria party didn't exist anyway, and the people of Sugulli would never dare to speak against the sultan.

Wellard saw Juliet watching him, her brows furrowed a little, her face serious.

"Signor Fisher has said not to treat you like children. This I do not do. I give you the facts." Dracopoli rubbed a pudgy hand against his sweating cheek and then went on. "We have a little ammunition, food and water—we can resist for a while. But only a miracle can save us."

Royce blew a cloud of smoke and said questioningly, "So we're all for the high jump? Well ——" Then looking directly at Wellard, he went on, "What I'd really like to know is how the sultan knows that you know about this oil thing. And also how you know what he intends to do. You and the doctor could have kept this to yourselves and we'd have been all right. Where did the slip-up come?"

Dracopoli gave a wave of his hand. "Is it important? The thing ——"

Wellard stepped forward. "I did it," he said. "Late this evening I got hold of Harmer's safe. I had the keys and I guessed there would be a copy of his oil report there." His mouth was dry, his words coming hoarsely. "I was caught by the sultan. That's how he knows. But I got away and came back here ——"

"Dracopoli let you do this?" asked Fisher.

"No." He forced himself on. "He knew nothing about it. If it had come off I wasn't going to tell him. I was going to sell the report to the oil company. I wanted money." He flung the words, seeing the room as a haze of yellow light. "I didn't think of anyone. Just myself."

Out of the shadows he saw Juliet's face, staring at him, and then he saw one hand come up and rest against her cheek and she lowered her head. For a moment there was no movement, no sound from the rest of them. Then Fisher sprang forward, his face contorted with passion. Dracopoli caught his arm and held him. But over the lieutenant's shoulder Fisher shouted, "You're a bloody murderer!"

"Howard!" Lily ran to him and held on to him. "Stop it! Stop it!"

"He's right," Wellard said savagely. "Everything he says is right."

Royce stood up. "Shouting our heads off won't help. But there's one thing I'd like to know. It's my life among others that the doctor has gambled. Just for the record, I want to know why he had to have money. I'm curious." He turned toward Wellard. "What were you going to shake the oil company down for? Kind of thing I'd do. Bit off your line, isn't it? What did you want the money for?"

Wellard was silent, facing them all. Even this, he thought bitterly, they were all entitled to; he had no right to preserve anything of himself. Against their jeopardy his own feelings were straws.

"All right," he said harshly. "If you must know ——"

"Chris." Juliet came across to him and put her hand on his arm.

Wellard shook his head. "It's all right, Juliet. Let me tell them."

"No. I'll tell them." She was fighting to keep her voice calm, but he could feel her hand shake. "He wanted money for me."

"For you?" Royce's voice echoed with surprise. "But you've got stacks."

"That's the trouble. I love him and he loves me. But he wouldn't marry me without anything. He had to have something ——" Her voice shook and broke. "He was a fool . . . full of pride and stubbornness, full of ——"

"Juliet." Wellard put his arm around her, holding her to him, and against all the distress in him there was this solitary joy of knowing that no matter what he had done, she was still with him. He looked grimly at them and said, "What Juliet says is true. I wanted a shore practice. I wanted a place I could take a wife to."

Royce shifted uncomfortably. "Sorry, old man—sorry. I didn't know I was going to get into anything like this ——"

Blaikie came forward like some dark, ruffled bird. "It is easy to blame the doctor. I blame him. But we should not forget that at times we all sin against one another—sin without meaning to, without looking ahead." His head came up sharply, his eyes dark and stern. "Nothing will be gained by bitterness. Through God's grace there is always hope. And it is to God that we must look now."

He began to pray, the strong Welsh voice echoing comfortingly around the room.

When it was over Dracopoli said, "Now it is necessary that everyone should know what to do." He began to detail the plans he had made and they listened in silence, all of them drawn close together by the danger which hovered over them.

As Dracopoli talked there came a shout from the head of the stairs. It was Yousseff, who had been left on the roof with Harkness.

Dracopoli started rapidly for the stairs and Wellard followed him. When they got onto the roof Yousseff pointed out to the lagoon. Dimly seen about a hundred yards off the albergo was the loom of five or six reed boats, spread out in a rough crescent shape.

Dracopoli turned from them and walked to where the machine gun had been posted overlooking the causeway. The sand dunes at the far end, swept by the jeep lights, were pockmarked with great pools of shadow.

"They will be there too," he said. "From now on we must stay at our posts."

Juliet stumbled a little on the angle of the roof stairs and felt hot coffee splash onto her hand. The ragged edges of the dawn were unraveling against the eastern sky. There were four of them on the roof, one in each corner of the parapet.

She went first to Fisher, on the lagoon side. He smiled at her across the top of his cup.

Royce called encouragingly, "Ha, cof
Just what I needed."

She noticed that he had his carbine ne tucked away under a ground sheet.

He grinned at her as he took his cup said, "Well, here's to the luck of the Roy Death or Dartmoor. Fine choice."

Despite herself, she smiled and then went to Dracopoli. He said, "Grazie, signor
When you go down, tell Harkness to switch the jeep lights. We must save the battery."

Reaching Wellard, she squatted on her he and put the tray on the ground. A sudd squall of rain beat across the roof.

"You don't have to go on feeling bad ab it, Chris," Juliet told him. "Not with me, a way. What you did was wrong, pighead silly. But whatever you did, you did for Oh, Chris, you fool."

He took her hand and said quietly, "I l
you. Nothing can change that. But I had l faith in it than you. I wanted some kind of surance; I know better now. A bit la though." He smiled wryly at her.

Wellard saw the tears in her eyes and pulled her to him. With his arms about h his lips on hers, the thought was drumming his mind that there had to be something could do. He didn't care about the difficulti which could lie in the future—only that the should be a future.

She moved out of his arms and there was brightness and life in her face that came fro courage and confidence. In a steady voice s said, "You put us all in this. You can't esca that, and I know you don't want to. But you the only one here I have any faith in, re honest faith. You've got to do somethin You've got to do something, Chris darlin because"—for a moment her voice faltered
"because I want more than twenty-fo hours—I want more ——"

Dracopoli sent Fisher and Royce below t eat. The sun was strengthening rapidly an little wraiths of mist were curling up fro sand and water. Dracopoli came across t
Wellard and lit a cigarette.

America's new way to bake

(from Pillsbury!)

fter a while Wellard said, "Surely with a m hine gun we can hold them off for days?"
racopoli shook his head. "We have very lit: ammunition for it. Enough, maybe, for ou night."
"You don't think we've any chance?"
None. The sultan has all the men he w ts—and arms. He has them. It will be at ni t. They will rush along the causeway and th boats will come in from the lagoon." He ge ed his half-smoked cigarette over the pa apet top. "No, dottore, we are dead already ex pt for a miracle."

he morning shadows were shortening ac ut the albergo buildings. Lower down the sl e some of Jibarti's men sat in little parties, n ed except for their loincloths, a few carry- ir rifles, but most of them armed with their w ans. Out on the lagoon the long, ragged cr cent of boats had drifted a little nearer th shore.
is eyes on the albergo, Ali Yacquibi was g ng his order for the attack that coming ni t. As soon as midnight was past —— Ali Yacquibi pulled the pony's head round a began to ride away. The khalifa rose and, st ing the right stirrup, walked alongside the p y as they made their way toward Libah.
After a little while the khalifa, looking al- w ys at the ground ahead of him, said, "You a content with this thing?"
"I am content."
"Allah has taken you beyond me."
Ali Yacquibi shook his head. "Allah has given me your holiness, Hassan Jebro. tariqua still strays in the foothills while y are on the mountaintop. Your holiness o great that you have forbidden me noth- , though in your heart you grieve. Last ght on the rooftop when I told the English ctor that all should be killed I waited for to curse me and forbid me. You have the wer of il kullul."
At the mention of il kullul, the burning eye, power to curse, the khalifa straightened. "hy should I turn on you the burning eye, son? My curse would not stop you. But already it is on you, not from me, but from the Great One."

Ali Yacquibi made a slight, uncomfortable movement of his shoulders. "I am in Allah's hands, in the great hand of God. When He wishes He will destroy me. The moment of death is in His mind."

"It could be soon, my son."

Ali Yacquibi looked up at the blazing eye of the mounting sun. "You think of Jibarti? Of the way he stood and listened when I spoke to him? Of his mind already awake to the fighting and the killing and the black stains of blood, and the power twisting inside him like a snake, threshing for freedom? All this I have seen."

"He will come back after the attack tonight with blood on his waran to kill you. This is the moment he has chosen."

"Who can know Allah's moment until it arrives?"

For two hours Dracopoli kept the jeep motor running to charge the battery for the lights he knew he would need when darkness came. They had now barricaded the doors and windows and had brought over all the food supplies which Dracopoli had in his headquarters. The roof of the headquarters abutted onto the roof of the albergo and they could cover it easily if anyone tried to attack across it.

Toward the end of the morning Wellard came down from a spell of duty on the roof. He got a can of beer and took it out onto the terrace, sitting down in the shade and staring out at the black line of reed boats.

Lily came out of the albergo. "How's it going?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"As bad as that?"

"Yes, Lil, as bad as that."

She was silent for a moment, then she said, "Last night I was dead scared. But, somehow, today I've got used to it—for a while, anyway. There are some people, you know"—there was a shade of a smile on her lips—"who can manage everything but love. But the moment they get tied up with that, everything goes wrong. You and me. Everything we do to make it right just puts it more out of joint. You wanted money. Enough to make it right between you and Juliet?"

ICE STORM

By LOUISE D. PECK

I woke from a night of wind and rain
To a mineral day. Stones, barns
And fences glazed. Strangled woods
Dazzled the air. As though ice were cage,
Neither bird nor squirrel moved along
The path of crystal grass I walked.
The perilous sun cracked among
The waiting trees. Everywhere
Was prison until I reached the pond.
In an open heart of water there,
Mallards swam in a pleasure of glide.
It seemed they moved the countryside.

"That was the idea."

"You made a mistake. No, I don't mean because you've brought the house down around our ears. But about her, and about love. . . . Still, how could you know? You're only a man. Somewhere in the book it says for richer or poorer, for better or for worse. That works, you know—if the other thing is right."

"I know. But it's all a bit late now." He made an impatient movement. "If only there was something I could do!"

"You'll think of something. I know you will." She hesitated for a moment, then said, "You mustn't mind the way Howard explodes—I'll have him trained in time."

He smiled at her, but at the back of his mind the words "in time" rang ominously.

Dracopoli glanced at his watch. "One minute past midnight."

Firing began simultaneously from the land and from the boats on the lagoon. The bullets thudded into the albergo wall and there was a crash as the windscreen of the jeep went.

Dracopoli said, "They want to put the jeep headlights out. See, the little wall at the head of the causeway. They are there."

He began to fire his carbine methodically, taking his time, and Wellard followed him. He could make out the thin pencil stub of the wall and now and again the shadow of movement above it. He fired, aiming carefully, but the range was too far for him to see the effect of his shots. Behind him he could hear Royce talking between shots to Fisher and once Royce turned and called, "It's difficult to see, but the boats are coming in a bit closer."

"Keep firing, slowly," Dracopoli called back. "If they get too close, I'll bring the machine gun over."

The bullets from the lagoon whined over their heads while below them the shots from the land plugged into the wall above the jeep.

Dracopoli, half talking to himself, said, "There are about four rifles over there and about the same number among the boats——" There was a great splintering of glass below them and one of the jeep lights went out. A few seconds later the other went. "Soon they will come," said Dracopoli. "Keep firing down the line of the causeway."

They fired steadily into the darkness, seeing the occasional white exclamation of water

CONTINUED ON PAGE 107

Great day in the mornin'! Pillsbury has 2 Quick Sweet Rolls...refrigerated!

(Just bake 'em and XXXX love 'em)

1. Pillsbury Quick Cinnamon Rolls
. . . ready in minutes—hot, fragrant, spicy-sweet! You get 8 plump rolls in every can (creamy icing, too!). Just pop in a pan, bake, ice and serve. A real treat anytime!

2. Pillsbury Quick Caramel Nut Rolls
. . . cinnamon-sugar filled. Nut-rich caramel topping right in the can. Simply slice rolls, pop 'em on the topping and bake. So easy, so good! Perfect for breakfast, dessert or coffee time. Tried 'em?

More kissin' cousins of America's most popular biscuits

...at your grocer's dairy case.

Advertisement

A special message to women about arthritis

If you're a busy housewife, watch out for arthritis. Here's what many doctors recommend for relieving the pain of sore, stiff or inflamed joints.

Why does the most severe form of arthritis strike three women for every man?

This and many other baffling questions still surround our country's top crippler. Doctors believe, however, that the natural changes of the female body are related, in some mysterious way, to the high rate of arthritis among women.

For instance, this disease may come on during the monthly period—or during or after the menopause. And, arthritis sometimes vanishes during pregnancy.

But doctors attach far more importance to daily living conditions as the trigger for arthritis. The physical and mental strains of running a home and caring for a family allow little time for complete relaxation.

When diagnosed early, doctors are well prepared to control arthritis and prevent serious disability. That's why you should see your physician promptly when you notice persistent pain in and about your joints.

For years, doctors had to rely upon straight aspirin for temporary relief of arthritic pain. But many arthritic patients cannot tolerate large doses of straight aspirin because it upsets the stomach.

So today, many doctors recommend a special compound—Bufferin®. For Bufferin's formula contains Di-Alminate®, Bristol-Myers brand of an exclusive and highly effective combination of anti-acids. Di-Alminate protects the stomach against the acid-irritation of straight aspirin. In fact, you can take Bufferin, as prescribed by your doctor, for long periods without risk of stomach distress.

Moreover—and this is of extreme importance to anyone who has arthritis—Bufferin acts faster than plain aspirin for the majority of patients because it is absorbed more rapidly into the blood stream.

Bufferin has proved far and away the safest, most effective pain reliever for arthritis patients.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 105

starts. From the land and the lagoon behind him the rifle shots went on in a slow, steady rhythm, all aimed at the parapet top.

"They're not coming. Those shots are as far away as ever," said Wellard.

Dracopoli called over his shoulder, "Can you see the boats?"

"More or less," shouted Royce. "They seem to be in the same place."

"It is Jibarti who leads this," said Dracopoli. "I saw the sultan ride off with the khalifa early today."

Wellard asked, "Jibarti's instinct would be to rush in?"

"Certo. He will not worry about losing men."

"Then what's holding him back?"

"I should like to know."

Crouched below the parapet, Wellard heard the whine and smack of the bullets. If they were coming, why didn't they come? Jibarti's whole instinct would be to rush the place. But he didn't. Why? Because he had other orders? The sultan, he thought, had given his orders and ridden off, a hard, confident man—gone back to his rooftop to sit there and wait while the khalifa read from the Qur'an.

There was a lull in the firing, and in that moment's silence Wellard heard something away in the darkness. He strained his ears and briefly he was sure he caught the sound of paddles dipping to water. There must be a boat close in to the headquarters. It came to him then. The sultan was too intelligent to take a bold frontal attack. Why waste men when a boat could go flanking away to the north and come up unseen behind Dracopoli's headquarters? Four men could set the place afire. It would go up like a torch and flames could sweep through to the albergo. And then the fire had a real hold the rest of the Somalis would come in.

He hurried to Dracopoli. "Quick, give me your pistol."

Silently Dracopoli handed the pistol to Wellard. He went, crouching, quickly across to the parapet that looked down on the carabinieri headquarters. He dropped to the lower roof and ran along its length to the far end. The yard below was a great block of darkness. Then there came the slap of bare feet on the smooth tiles.

The darkness below was suddenly pricked by a red, glowing eye. The tiny flame wavered a moment and then the piled bamboos and rushes against the wooden framework of the house wall swirled into a great torch.

He fired and the man nearest the flames went down. Two turned and began to run for the archway, but he fired quickly and one dropped to the tiles. The other gave a cry and Wellard saw him stagger into the arch side and collapse. He jumped for the ground. As he did so, the remaining man flung his waran at him. The spear passed above him as he crashed toward the man; they went down together. He felt the other's body twist and jerk and the movement of a hand forcing itself between them to get at the knife which the native wore on the top of his loincloth. Before the Somali could reach it, he fired.

Away on the albergo roof he heard the machine gun open fire. He ran to the cistern and grabbed the cut-down oil drum which Dracopoli kept as a dipper. Fortunately the fire was still feeding on its own body of rushes and bamboo and had not taken hold of the building yet. After a few drums of water had been thrown on, it died down, great wreaths of white smoke twisting up from it.

There was no firing now from the land or from the lagoon. The boats were still out on the water, but drawn farther back. For a moment they had won breathing time.

But time was running out fast, Wellard told himself angrily. Anything was better than just waiting, any chance was worth taking. He remembered Juliet standing in the darkness over him, saying, "I want more than twenty-four hours"; remembered Lily saying of Fisher that she would tame him, "in time." Time, time, time.

He went to Dracopoli. "You think the sultan will be with his men, or at Libah?"

A little puzzled, Dracopoli said, "He leaves the fighting to Jibarti. He will be at Libah."

"On the rooftop?"

"Possibly. Why?"

"What men will be up there? In the house?"

"The khalifa. But otherwise the house is used by the women only."

"What guards?"

"One at the door. Maybe one on the roof, but this is not certain. Every fighting man will want to be down here."

"Then there's a chance."

Dracopoli was looking shrewdly at Wellard. Then he said, "It is impossible."

"Why? You can do without me for two hours. And I need one other man. Harkness."

"Why him?"

"I'm a ship's officer. He's the only one left from the Cambria's crew—he'll come."

"All right, dottore," said Dracopoli."

AULD ACQUAINTANCE

By ELIZABETH HENLEY

Dear Dorothy Perkins,
A neighborly neighbor,
Hangs on the fence
And laughs at my labor—
Pink is her apron,
Ruffled her clothes,
"I'm coming right over!"
(She's such a nice rose.)
Dorothy Perkins,
Pink-cheeked, has smiled
In all of my gardens
Since I was a child.
Gossipy, blossomy,
Prim in her frills,
Little pink petals
Of laughter she spills.
Dorothy's washline
Is pink in the sunlight—
Starched baby dresses,
A scallopy hat—
Imagine the others,
The front-garden roses—
Baroness This and the Lady of That—

I say when I'm told
She's a climber, not clever,
"Who—Dorothy Perkins?
I've known her forever!"

Wellard filled his pocket with shells for Dracopoli's pistol and for the revolver with which Harkness was already armed. He found Harkness in the corner of the parapet overlooking the courtyard.

"We've got a job to do, Harkness."

"Anything you say, doc."

"We're going down into the courtyard and rub ourselves as black as we can in the fire ashes. Then we're going up to Libah in the boat those Somalis left behind. We're going to kidnap Sultan Ali Yacquibi. Once we've got him back here, we can walk out without trouble. All right?"

For a moment Harkness said nothing.

"Apart from me, you're the only Cambria man left. I couldn't ask any of the others until I'd given you the chance."

"Like keeping it in the family, eh, doc? All right, let's go."

When they were about three hundred yards from the shore Wellard stopped paddling. He could now make out the glow of light under the awning on the house roof.

He turned to Harkness. "That's the place. He'll be on the roof under that awning."

A few minutes later he ran the boat up onto the open beach. They crouched in the boat, watching the long slope of dark ground ahead of them, and the pale front of the house.

"All right," Wellard said and they went quietly toward the main, arched entrance.

A Somali, a shadowy huddle squatting against the door, looked up as they stood over him. His waran rested against the door. Harkness swung his clubbed revolver, and the man collapsed. The whole thing was done quickly, wordlessly, as though it were something long rehearsed between them.

They were at the bottom of the steps when above them Wellard heard the sound of a door opening. He pulled Harkness into the shadows at the side of the stairs. Footsteps came slowly down. The khalifa, his head bowed, lips murmuring, passed close to them.

They stood for a while after he was gone. Wellard could feel the sweat running from his face as he began to climb the stairs. Toward the top the darkness gathered again and Wellard went forward blindly, groping ahead of him. He felt rough wood under his hand, and an iron handle. To his surprise it moved easily and without noise. If there was a guard on the other side, they were in for trouble. One shout could finish them.

He whispered to Harkness, "If anything goes wrong, look after yourself."

He pushed the door back swiftly and stepped out onto the roof, swinging round rapidly to where the door guard might be. But the door was unguarded.

Ali Yacquibi was lying on the narrow bed at the back of the awning, his head propped up on a sloping wooden rest, and flat on his chest was a book. His head was turned toward them. As Wellard threw himself forward he saw the long, deeply cut hawk's face, full of cold intelligence, the dark, burning eyes.

Ali Yacquibi came up to meet him, his body twisting like a snake. Wellard's hands clamped about the thin, strong neck, just as the man opened his mouth to call. The power of the other's body under him was like some inhuman force, a wild, untamable anger at this assault. He hung on to him and saw Harkness, poised and waiting. As his fingers pressed against the man's neck he felt the other's hands slide over his face. The thumbs jerked deep into his eye sockets, blinding him with a red flare of pain. Harkness struck, and suddenly there was no resistance under his hands.

He sat back on his heels panting. Half blinded, he saw Harkness bending over the sultan, wrapping thick cloth about his face. He helped Harkness roll the man over. They roped him up, clamping his arms to his side and binding his ankles together.

"He'll be out a long while. I hit 'im a fair crack, doc. Couldn't do it any sooner, you was mixed up so."

Wellard stood up, the sharp pain in his eyes moving now to a dull ache. "We'll take him between us."

Harkness shook his head. "I can manage him, doc."

He bent down and, putting his arm around the sultan, worked him over his shoulder. With a grunt he rose to his feet, arching his back to avoid the awning top.

Wellard went down the stairs, pistol in hand. He beckoned to Harkness and the man came crablike down the steps. They were halfway across the hall when the door to the women's quarters opened.

Wellard spun round. In the doorway stood the girl who had brought whisky to him. She gave a long, wailing cry of alarm.

"Run for it!" shouted Wellard. "I'll be with you." He pulled the door and hung on to it until he judged that Harkness was well away. Then he sprinted after him.

They pushed off quickly and began to paddle. As they did so, from the darkness of the dunes away to the right they heard the thud of horses' hoofs.

Through the open door Wellard could see the first smoke-gray touches of dawn light begin to spread along the eastern horizon. He went into the little room where Ali Yacquibi sat tied in a chair, arms pulled behind him, feet bound to the lower rungs. The man said nothing, watching him intently. Even in this awkward position, his long white robe untidily open at the front, he gave the impression of smoldering power. The bruise over his left temple where Harkness had hit him was swollen and the blood had dried in a dark fan down to the cheekbone. Wellard, with Juliet, cleaned it, and then put a plaster over it. The pinky-white splotch added to the incongruity of the man's appearance—a final humiliation.

Maria was sleeping on a small bed against the wall. She was curled into a tight ball, the sheets half slipped from her to the floor. Wellard bent and put them back on the bed. He felt, in himself, the lift of new strength; not just hope, for he refused to have anything to do with that, but of certainty—the certainty, hard and vigorous with him now, that he was going to see this through, that the debt had begun to be paid and would be paid in full.

Dracopoli, Blaikie, Royce and Harkness were sitting, each on an ammunition box, in the center of the roof. He saw their faces come round, the creases lined with dust, the stubble dark.

"Now that we've got the sultan, you really think we'll get out?" It was Royce.

"We've a chance. How far is it to Kandala?" He turned to Dracopoli.

"Seven, ten days at the rate we should travel." He rubbed at his stubble.

"If we took the sultan as a hostage—how far should we get?"

"You're thinking of Jibarti?"

"Yes."

"The khalifa might hold him back for a couple of days. I wouldn't trust him. He has all to gain from his brother's death."

"You'd take the risk?"

Dracopoli shrugged. "What else is there?"

Blaikie said quietly, "May God give us a safe passage."

Wellard said, "Lily's got some breakfast under way. I'll keep watch up here while you eat. I'm pretty sure they'll be sending someone out soon."

"It will be the khalifa," said Dracopoli.

The Reverend Henry Blaikie came out onto the roof carrying a mug full of coffee. Wellard said, "I should sit down, padre. They might be tempted to take a pot shot at you."

"I've eaten," said Blaikie. "I thought you'd like some coffee." He sat down. He felt tired and dirty, and still shaken by the noisy horrors of the night, but he was aware that there was now a sense of peace in him which had nothing to do with this respite.

Wellard drank a little. "Why haven't they sent anyone yet, I wonder?"

Blaikie shrugged. "It takes us all some time to adjust ourselves to suit new conditions."

Wellard smiled. "You've all had plenty of adjusting to do in Sugulli. Thanks to me."

"Yes. I'm grateful to you for that."

"Grateful?" Wellard looked at him in surprise. "Why?"

"You showed me how a man should deal with his mistakes. There is always something to be done. God sees to that. But He expects a man to search it out for himself."

"I just took a long chance to get myself out of an awkward situation. I even risked another man's life—Harkness'—to do it."

Blaikie shook his head. "If we get out of here it will be because of you. That is what I want now more than anything. I want to give Maria a future."

"You're going to look after her?"

"Yes. I shall adopt her."

"We'll get out. Don't worry."

"If we do—and I pray God we shall—I shall go back to my work, knowing that the things which have distressed me, my doubts about God's will, or man's interpretation of it, are idle. One must take action as honestly as the light of our poor candle shows us how."

Wellard, fishing for a cigarette, said, "Here comes a rival of yours, the khalifa. But I doubt whether he's as full of good will to me as you are. We'd better go down."

The khalifa came along the sunken causeway onto the higher ground before the Albergo Commercio. The door was pulled back, and two men came out, both of them carrying revolvers. He recognized them at once. There was the Lieutenant Dracopoli, a man for whom he had much respect, short, fat, walking with the marks of tiredness on his body.

For the gentlest care in the world today

UMMM! THE SOAP THAT SMELLS AS GENTLE AS IT IS. That's your promise of naturally tender skin care. Cashmere Bouquet's rich, deep-cleansing lather is beautifully free of harsh, irritating detergents. And, Cashmere Bouquet is so long-lasting, too. Pick ladylike pink or white—foil-wrapped to protect its fragrant freshness for you.

Flower-fresh
CASHMERE BOUQUET
Gentle White—Gentle Pink

The other was the Englishman, the doctor, and there was fatigue in him too. But it informed his body like a steady anger; he walked, watching, full of awareness, and his lips were a thin, dark line against his tired face. This was the man who had taken the sultan; of all the people in the albergo, this man had the mark on him.

Dracopoli, talking in Somali, said, "Listen carefully, Hassan Jebro, for I give you the orders of the Englishman. He is taking his people to Kandala and I shall go with him and your people will give us free passage."

The khalifa, looking at Wellard, said, "Before we talk I must see with my own eyes my lord. He must be here before me."

Dracopoli went back to the albergo. The two of them remained, facing each other, but the Englishman was looking beyond, to the other end of the causeway where the Somali fighting men stood and watched. The khalifa was thinking that this man should be dead and all the others dead, for that had been the plan. But here he was alive and his hands were full of power. He had taken the power himself, and it was, he knew, more than any man could do by himself without the grace of Allah—so he was marked and chosen.

Dracopoli came back with the sultan. Ali Yacquibi walked slowly, for his feet were hobbled closely and his wrists were pinioned behind his back. There was a ragged patch of plaster on his temple. But for all these indignities he was still Ali Yacquibi, with the blood of the prophet in him. He looked at the khalifa without humiliation, and the khalifa, seeing the pinioned eagle, knew that nothing was finished. And now the Englishman began to speak and the Italian translated for him.

"This is your master," said the Englishman, "and he is unharmed. Unless everything is done as I order, he will be killed. Understand this"—the pistol made a slight movement—"he will die if any move is made against us."

"The Englishman is a man of his word. Do as he says." Ali Yacquibi's voice came harsh and severe. "Tell Jibarti that from Sugulli to Kandala is a long road. Tell him also that the guard who slept and the men who failed to light the fire must be killed."

"The men who should have fired the building are already dead at the hand of the Englishman. The guard shall be killed." The khalifa spoke now to the Englishman. "It shall be as you order."

"Good. Then all the boats, all the fighting men must return to Libah. This evening I go to Sugulli with two others; if we are attacked, the sultan will be killed. By dawn we shall be gone and the sultan will be left behind—but only if we are not attacked."

The khalifa bowed. "You require mules and camels for your journey to Kandala?"

The Englishman's thin lips moved to a faint smile. "We require nothing but obedience."

From the roof, Dracopoli and Wellard watched the Somalis moving away south to Libah and, later, the small flotilla of reed boats turn and paddle into the sun haze across the waters of the lagoon.

Dracopoli said, "When it is dark the fighting men will return. When you go to Sugulli they will not be far away."

"It's a risk. But we've got to take it. You yourself have said that we wouldn't get far along the road to Kandala. With every hour Jibarti will find it harder to hold himself back. But twelve hours could be enough. You can explain things to the others. All we need is food and water—and luck. And what I need"—he smiled at Dracopoli—"is a shower and a change of clothes."

He went down from the roof, took a shower and shaved and put on clean clothes. Afterward he lay back on his bed, feeling the tiredness running through him like a drug. There was nothing to do now but wait for darkness.

When he woke the light was on and Juliet was sitting on the side of his bed. She took his hand, smiling at him.

"You've slept for hours," she said.

"I needed it. How long have you been here?"

"Not very long."

He pulled her gently down to him and she lay in his arms without speaking. She put up her hand and touched the side of his face, and he was aware of a deep sense of contentment. In this moment there was all the truth that lay between them. All one needed was trust in love itself and the courage to accept what might come. . . . It was so simple.

The three of them stood in the darkness outside the albergo. Harkness and Youssef had carbines slung over their shoulders and carried small hand axes. Wellard had a .38 automatic pistol and a torch.

They went across the causeway and there was no noise except the splash of water around their legs. The immediate slopes of sand dunes and the rising stretch of road were deserted but beyond them the darkness was too thick to see anything.

A figure rose from the shadows and Wellard's pistol came up swiftly. He flashed his torch on. The khalifa stepped into the light.

Wellard, keeping the man covered, said to Youssef, "Ask him what he wants."

Youssef spoke to the old man and the khalifa replied.

"Is alone, signore. Say he come to see your orders are not broken. Come with us to Sugulli."

"Tell him to walk ahead."

Youssef spoke to the old man and he began to move along the road to Sugulli ahead of them. Wellard switched off his torch.

Somewhere away to his left he caught the sudden stamp of horses' hoofs. Youssef said quietly, "They are out there, dottore. Not even the khalifa could keep them away.

"Go ahead and tell the khalifa if our people hear one shot it will be the end of the sultan."

After a while Youssef dropped back. "He say there will be no shots. No trouble."

There were a few lights ahead of them now coming from the houses in Sugulli. When they reached the head of the beach Wellard said to Youssef, "Tell the old man to stay here."

He turned as Youssef spoke to the khalifa and looked at the houses. All the doors were shut, but from the barred windows the people of Sugulli were watching. And beyond, among the maize patches and in the scraggy olive groves, he knew there would be others—Jibarti and his men.

Harkness and Youssef followed him down the beach to where the Sugulli fishing boats were drawn up on the sands. There were several of them. One was bigger than the rest, with a small mast stepped amidships, its sail rolled on a boom. The boat would take ten people. Not in comfort, Wellard thought grimly. He flicked on his torch.

"All right," he said. "You know what to do, Harkness. I'll keep watch here."

Harkness turned to the nearest boat and Youssef went with him. The sound of the axes bit through the night as they smashed at the thin floor boards.

Wellard looked back at the khalifa. Behind the old man others were standing in the shadows of the palms, watching and listening. He knew that they must now understand what was happening. And he knew, too, that at the moment it needed only one wild cry from a tribesman, one angry movement from Jibarti to start them sweeping down across the white sands in a black tide.

His hand tightened on his pistol. He heard Youssef and Harkness begin on another boat. All had to go except the one they would use. The reed boats from the lagoon would be left but they could never venture out to sea.

The sound of the axes was suddenly still. Out of the gloom Harkness and Youssef appeared.

"Right," said Wellard. "Let's get this thing out."

He turned, setting his shoulder against the stern, and the others took up station, one on each side. They eased the boat down the steep slope to the sea. It went slowly at first, resisting them. Then, as the bow dipped, it ran easily to the surf. Wellard felt it rise, seeborne, saw the others slide aboard, the water breaking from their legs in untidy webs of phosphorescence. The sea rose about his own legs. He hung on to the sternpost, and Harkness, above him, reached down a hand to haul him aboard. As he righted himself he could

"There is a blue shirt for a boy and a pink one for a girl all ready and three-year-old Mary has a toy to give the baby." Preparations included sterilized newspapers, lots of boiling water and faith. "I asked Jesus for a girl," Becky told her father afterward.

"OUR BABY WAS BORN AT HOME"

BY JOAN YOUNGER
PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Patty Nissen wanted her husband Gene to share in the "great spiritual experience of birth."

"We're planning our July-expected baby to be born at home," Patricia Nissen wrote the JOURNAL last spring. "Would you like to share in the experience?"

Her husband Eugene wanted very much to be with Patty at the birth of their third child. Their daughters, Becky, now going on six, and Mary, just four, had been born in hospital delivery rooms without him, but Mary was delivered by natural childbirth, and to Patty her birth was an unforgettable and joyful memory.

This nine months of pregnancy went fast. Gene was teaching Greek at Concordia Senior College in Fort Wayne, Indiana, acting as assistant minister at a nearby Lutheran church, and continuing study for his Ph.D. Both he and Patty were occupied making things for their shining-new one-floor four-bedroom house on the Concordia campus. Despite her many activities, twenty-eight-year-old Patty felt entirely well and energetic, and confident the baby would come when she said it would: July 31, or the first of August. And so it is July 31, 7:30 P.M. Earlier today, by the neighborhood swimming pool, Patty had her first contraction. Now

CONTINUED ON PAGE 113

"Will I ever be that slim again?" Patty views her old dress form, now minus the pillow in the middle for fitting maternity clothes. Gene gets out the diaper pail: "Now we're really in business."

Early the night before. Patty lets the girls comb out her hair. She has never had her locks cut, and Gene has warned her, "If you ever do, you will have to sleep under the bed until it grows out."

"We'll never have a baby any

5:10 P.M. "What would I ever do without you?"—Patty.

6:30 P.M. "You're wonderful, Patty."—Gene.

NTINUED FROM PAGE 111

another, some-
at stronger, makes itself felt, and Patty ps sweeping the patio. Since dinner at six, e has washed not only the dishes but two ture windows in the hope of speeding up e birth process, but there is still no sense urgency, no need to notify the woman stetrician who has agreed to undertake the ivery. "Come on, girls," she calls out.
's time for bed." "I'll hose them down night," Gene says quickly, leaving his
wer. "Oh, no, you won't," Patty says, ghing. "I need the job." The two girls from the swings where they have been ying and frolic like two puppies around tty's knees. Quick, slim Beck is blond e her father, while roguish Mary is k and dimpled like Patty. "Pop along w," Gene says and they pop toward the rcelain tub by the back door and, slipping t of their sun suits, clamber in. Deftly tty soaps, scrubs and tickles them. "You a good mommy," Mary says. "You are good helpers," Patty says. She rubs them down on the shelf beside the tub and then they race back to their bedroom, where Patty combs out their pigtails and replaits them. When the girls are in their shortie nightgowns, she calls to Gene. It is time for the girls' nightly devotions.

Gene reads to them from a Bible-story book and then from the Bible. Together they all repeat the Lord's Prayer. "Thank You, God, for a lovely day and a swim and everything," Becky adds. Mary folds her hands and is briefly, solemnly silent. "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep," they sing in small, piping voices. "If I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take. If I should live another day, I pray the Lord to show the way."

"I'm going to wash my hair," Patty says to Gene as, hand in hand, they leave the children's room. "Will it be soon?" Gene asks. Patty shakes her head. "Oh, Noos," she says, "don't worry. It will be tomorrow—we have lots of time." Noos is her pet name for Gene. It means "brain" in Greek and she says that is why she chose it, but Gene, laughing, says obviously it is short for Nuisance.

She washes her hair in the shower as usual and combs it out before the dressing-table mirror in their big bedroom. The air is heavy and humid tonight and restlessly Gene paces around the room. It is here that the baby is expected to be born.

11 P.M. "I'm going to take the sewing machine down now," Patty says with a note of excitement in her voice, "and then get a good night's rest." She has been mending a seam in a friend's bathing suit and putting the finishing touches on a small flannel gown for the baby. The sewing machine stands on a card table in the middle of the nursery and it has long been understood that removing it would be the last thing she did when labor began. "Can I help?" Gene asks, but Patty is already lifting the seventeen-pound machine and putting it into the built-in closet.

"Tomorrow," she says. "Deo volente." It is Latin for "God willing." She is not the classical scholar Gene is, but she loves the ner way." Labor was long, but Patty never cried out.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

7:39 P.M. "What a thrill!" The baby is on Patty's stomach.

7:41 P.M. "It's a miracle," says Patty. "I love you."

ancient languages and uses many phrases from them. Last year they were all in Greece on a Fulbright teaching fellowship Gene was granted, and throughout the house there are countless mementos of what was to them an enchanted time. One of Patty's favorite smocks is printed with a Greek key pattern; on the baby's dresser is a Greek pin dish. Nearby is a Greek carrying basket for the baby.

But there are also American things. The crib in the corner was both Becky's and Mary's, as were the bathinet and the bassinet. "We certainly have enough things to put him/her in," Patty says, looking around. In their own room is also a cradle Gene made for Becky, a sturdy pine rocker carved in Greek across the top: "For of Such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

"Why don't you have a cup of coffee while I iron an extra sheet?" Patty says. "Betty called tonight to remind me to have it." Betty had her baby at home, too, with the same doctor, and has been an inexhaustible source of advice. "Sure," Gene says obligingly, but, thinking of Betty, he goes into the study and takes down the large table there and moves it into the bedroom. Betty warned them that the doctor needed a lot of space for "things."

12 midnight. The Nissen house is quiet now and Patty is drifting off to sleep while Gene is practicing his personal devotions. He reads from the devotional book and the Bible and then prays ex corda—from the heart. "Thank You, God, for giving us two little happy children. We ask You now for strength in the hours to come to meet our obligations as parents. In Jesus Christ's name, amen." Outside the cicadas cry, and in the distance a light gleams on the chapel spire.

August 1. 5 A.M. Patty rouses drowsily from sleep and sees Gene looking at her. "I can't sleep," he says. "Things are working," she says sleepily. She stays awake long enough to notice that the contractions are now about fifteen minutes apart, but they are not very strong. Vaguely she feels Gene still watching her as she slips back into sleep.

7 A.M. Half awake, Patty hears Becky's voice saying, "Hey, where's the baby?" Becky's head is deep in the cradle. "Not yet," Patty murmurs and, whispering, Becky begins explaining things to Mary. "That's the table for the baby to lie on when she gets her clothes on," she says. "That's the diaper pail for the diapers. Nobody must touch ——" Her voice lilts on, but Patty is no longer listening. Suddenly it gets louder. "Mommy, Mary is fricker-fracker." It is the family phrase for being naked. "Sh-h," Gene says, appearing at the doorway, shaved and dressed. "Let your mother sleep." It is his habit to make breakfast, and the children follow him from the room to the kitchen, Mary carrying her play suit. He helps her into it and then gets them their usual eggs, orange juice, milk and some of Patty's homemade whole-wheat bread. It was Becky's turn to say grace.

8 A.M. Patty wakes again and reaches for her devotional booklet. She practices her daily devotions in the morning and then writes tersely in her diary of the preceding day's activities. She sleeps with her hair up but now she takes it down, runs a brush over it and reknots it before slipping into a pink brunch coat for breakfast. "Isn't it a lovely day to be born?" she says happily as she goes into the kitchen. Picking up the phone, she calls her friend Eileen Porter. "May I bring the girls over to visit you today?" she says brightly. There is little need of further conversation. It is all planned. She hangs up and stares at the phone. "I'd better call the doctor," she says.

The doctor wants to come out and examine her, but Patty is sure "things are a long way off yet." She persuades the doctor that it is perfectly all right for her to come in to the office instead, which is on the way to Eileen's. The doctor agrees. She is pleased that Patty's baby is coming now because she has another woman about to deliver in a trailer and has been afraid that both babies would come at the same time.

The doctor's name is Lydia Shapiro and she is Russian by birth. A pediatrician as well as an obstetrician, she got her American training at Mt. Sinai in New York and Chicago Lying-In, where they handle many home deliveries. She sometimes uses hypnosis as a painkiller during birth instead of anesthesia, but Patty has told her she hopes to manage without either.

"Oh, I feel so good," Patty says now, stirring an extra teaspoon of brewer's yeast into her orange juice. "I'm going to pack a bag full of bajamas," Mary says importantly. "Maybe that's a good idea," Patty says, "although I hope it won't take that long." "Oh, mommy," Becky says, "I hope the baby will get here all right." Patty gives her a hug. "You'll see," she says.

11 A.M. The children are at Eileen's now; Gene took them there while Patty went to the doctor's. The doctor said she was pleased with Patty's progress and that she would cancel her afternoon appointments and be at the Nissen house by 1 P.M.—"Unless I should come earlier?"—and Patty promised to call her if she were needed in a hurry. Gene and Patty are sitting at the dining-room table now, a round pine piece that Gene made. "Present," Gene says, putting an old-fashioned pocket watch beside her coffee cup. Patty laughs and then tenses and closes her eyes. "When I get one now it's a whip," she says. "Seven minutes apart," Gene says when the next one comes, and he gets a sheet of paper and writes the time down. "I'd better get myself prepared," Patty says, standing up. "Isn't it wonderful I can do it myself? Nurses' razors are so dull." Going down the hall, she stops and looks back at Gene. "Don't be worried," she says gently. "Me? Worried?" he says. His eyes are pink-rimmed and his face looks pinched. "I just didn't sleep very well. Because of the heat."

12:30 P.M. "Do you want lunch, Noos?" Patty says. She is walking around the house, stopping now and again as a contraction seizes her. "No, thanks," Gene says. "Yes. Or no. At least I'm not as hungry as I was at breakfast." "Can I eat?" Patty asks. "Why not?" Gene says. "If you're hungry." Abstractedly Gene eats some leftover tuna casserole Patty puts in front of him, while she divides her attention between a bowl of gelatin salad and a bunch of grapes. "I miss the little guys," Gene says. "How many children did I say I wanted?" "Eight," Patty says. "Four boys and four girls." "No, I said at least six. You are the one who wanted eight. Do you still?" Patty nods dreamily. "Enough so there is never any income tax to pay. The saving will pay for their college education." "Oh, they'll all get through college," Gene says. "If my father could do it for me and my brothers on his salary as a minister, I can do it for my children being a teacher." Patty nods. Although her father was a successful sporting-goods salesman, her grandfather was a Lutheran minister and she has no more concern about money than Gene has. "I wouldn't know what to do with a lot of money," she says. "We have everything we want now. We are so lucky. God has been so good to us."

NEXT MONTH

"I think daddy ought to get a new job," Julie once told her mother, "so he would be home more." She and her sister Tricia aren't particularly impressed by the importance of their father's position, though they do know he is Vice President of the United States and know something about the functions of government.

. . . And that is the way the Richard Nixons want their home life to be: private, and no politics at the family dinner table.

NIXONS AT HOME

BY HAZEL MARKEL

HOW AMERICA LIVES
in the February JOURNAL

It is true that as well as health and happiness they have a plenitude of worldly goods. Gene's income has only recently gone up to $480 a month, but the house is provided for them by the college. Moreover, Patty is a bargain hunter. And in the nine years since they met at a church camp and married they have acquired all the major laborsaving appliances, and taken excellent care of them. They also have two cars—one a nine-year-old Chrysler given Patty by her father, the other a Volkswagen bus which they bought in Germany and fixed up as a camper. This summer Gene has been using the bus as both transportation and a home-away-from-home at the University of Michigan, where he is getting his doctorate. Patty makes most of her own clothes and the children's and by careful shopping and home baking keeps the food budget to a minimum. They have paid for their travel photographs by giving slide lectures on Greece. Even their baby sitters come easily—they are the young students of the ministry at Concordia.

1:13 P.M. The doctor rings the bell and walks in. "You're too early," Patty says. "Oh, no," says the doctor, waving her hand. "I don't mind waiting." She bustles into the kitchen and asks Gene to start boiling some water. "I thought that only happened in the movies," he says. "For the gloves, the instruments, the sterile cloths for the baby," the doctor says. Each pan is to boil a different length of time and Gene starts writing each figure down on the same paper on which he is timing the contractions. "You ought to be an accountant," he says to himself. The doctor goes back to the bedroom. She has already checked on Patty's preparations, earlier this week, but she wants to check them again.

1:31 P.M. "Wow, here's another one that's a beauty," Patty says. The contractions are now a regular six to seven minutes apart, but Gene is no longer watching Patty worriedly when she has one. He is excitedly occupied by the pans of boiling water and the time sheet. Patty's excitement, on the other hand, is leaving her. Her attention seems to have turned inward and she looks engrossed and absorbed. Only when a contraction comes does she stiffen and become taut. "The grass looks extra green today and the sky looks extra blue," she says now, idly. "Do you want to finish mowing?" "No," says Gene, gaping at her. "It will be a while yet," she says, not noticing his amazement. "I don't want to go anywhere," he says shortly. Patty draws in her breath, startled. "Oh, that was a funny one." "Six minutes on the dot," Gene says and then looks at her sharply. "Gee whiz, Patter, we're going to have a baby!" Patty smiles at him, a wide, dreamy smile with no surprise in it.

1:47 P.M. "Where are the newspapers?" the doctor is calling from the bedroom, and Patty goes down the hall to answer her. The newspapers are in two bundles in the nursery closet. Months ago Patty took forty sheets of newspaper, rolled them up in brown paper a baked them in the oven for an hour at 35 The roll will be opened and placed on the b to serve as a sterile pad during the delivery

"And now my gown," the doctor says, t ing it out of its plastic covering. She stays the bedroom and Patty goes back to Gene. is still boiling things and looks harried. "T Burner-with-a-Brain has the brain of a moro he mutters. "I see now why most people to hospitals."

"Imagine being in a labor cell right now Patty says. "Ugh." She picks up today's new paper from the tea wagon. "I haven't read t funnies today." For a moment she attempts concentrate and then puts the paper dow "They are not funny today," she says. "Ev Pogo. Or maybe I'm not. And yet I feel funny She laughs. "Remember those funny thin we used to say in high school? They all hac storal to the mory. Spoonerisms. 'Oh, son times your boubles are trig and sometim your smoubles are trall. But if you trad houbles at all, how could you blecognize yo ressings?'" She stops, closes her eyes and h body tenses. Then the wave has passed a she again is relaxed.

2 P.M. "I would like the gloves, please the doctor says to Gene and he points to a sti boiling pan. "Good," says the doctor. "No put on these three pairs." She hands them him and beckons to Patty. "Time for t checking." "I'm glad you're here, doctor Gene says. "I guess Patty would live throu it if I had to deliver the baby; but I mig not." The doctor and Patty have gone dow the hall and are not listening to him. A p boils over and he turns quickly back to t stove. "Noos," Patty cries, "put down a gre big one!" Her voice is filled with elation. Ge turns down the gas under the pan of cloth looks at the clock, scribbles on the paper ar then turns the gas back up again. "It looks if I'm the assistant, even so," he says to hin self.

2:23 P.M. The contractions are now comir five minutes apart and are of considerable i tensity, but Patty has been dozing throug them. She has had a shot of vitamin K, t blood-clotting vitamin, but no sedative, an she does not want them. The only time sh has cried "Ouch" was when the birth area wa washed with soap and germicide. She stretched out on the bed, the newspapers u der her and a sheet over her.

The doctor has been resting and waiting o a chair beside the bed. On the table is h open medical bag, some cloths, scissors to c the cord with, tape to tie it, and two of th three pans of cloths for the baby, while th third is cooling in the freezer. When Patt opens her eyes the doctor says, "You must g up and walk around now. We have only a fou centimeter dilation and we need nine.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

HOW THE NISSENS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

Their monthly income is $480 plus their house and Gene's tuition for graduate work. This is how they spend it:

Food (Patty bakes her own bread, buys beef wholesale, seeks out bargains for the freezer. Becky's hot lunches cost $5.)	$90.00	Recreation and entertaining (At least one trip a year costs $40—gasoline and souvenirs; they sleep in car.)	11.00
Clothing (Patty sews; grandmothers give girls clothes, Gene wears many wash-and wears)	22.00	Club dues (faculty & church)	2.00
Fuel, light (college pays water bill)	20.00	Donations (they tithe to Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod and give to charity)	51.00
Furniture and appliances (Gene makes many pieces, but they have recently bought major appliances)	40.00	Magazines, newspapers, books	15.00
Car maintenance (this includes insurance)	28.00	Life insurance and church pension fund	31.00
Child care (students and faculty daughters receive 50 cents an hour to baby-sit)	15.00	Income tax	27.50
Medical (Blue Cross, Blue Shield, dental care)	16.00	Personal-property tax	6.50
		Toys, gifts	5.00
		Debt retirement (They borrowed to go to Europe, buy used Volkswagen and film. Only $75 of doctor's $150 fee was paid by medical insurance.)	100.00
		Total	$480.00

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

The purest, best loved of all baby powders for so many reasons:

- All silky-soft talc . . . with no rough, uneven grains.
- Guardian against rashes . . . helps neutralize diaper irritants.
- Gentle fragrance . . . keeps babies baby-sweet.
- Allergy-safe . . . agrees with even the most sensitive skins.

Johnson & Johnson

959 Johnson & Johnson

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 114

Clumsily Patty gets up. "I'll walk a mile if it will help," she says. Her face is wet with perspiration, but her voice is as strong and happy as ever. She puts on her pink brunch coat again and Gene says, "Start pacing up and down the hall and I'll count out a mile." "When the water sac breaks, the baby will come," the doctor says. "Not before."

3:50 P.M. "I wish the time were going as fast for you as it is for me," Patty says to Gene. She has been walking up and down quite a while now, but still the sac has not broken, nor has the baby pushed much farther downward. "I'm not complaining," Gene says, putting his arm around her. Patty smiles up at him. "Let's have a cup of tea." She walks back to the bedroom to ask the doctor to join them. "I'll boil the water," Gene says. "I'm a water-boiling expert." The three of them sit around the table and Patty takes a banana from the fruit bowl and eats it. Gene chooses a nectarine and stares fixedly at it. "What will the cigarette ads do without the fuzz to shave off?" he says. "What do you mean, Noos?" Patty says, frowning. "You know, those ads with peaches being shaved. To show how sharp cigarettes are." He pauses. "Let's see now. I mean razors, don't I? I'm not excited—much." "I feel so dreamy and relaxed," Patty says. "I'd like to go back to bed. Or at least accomplish something. Could I wash some more windows?" The doctor smiles. "You are accomplishing something, Patter dear," Gene says. "You must walk," the doctor says. "Ah, the bension is tilding up again," Patty says, getting up, "and I am just putzing around."

5:10 P.M. The baby has moved downward now and Patty has gone to lie down. The doctor would like to break the water sac, but Patty has asked her not to so long as it is not medically necessary. "Let's just let nature take its course," she says, "even if it works slowly." The doctor agrees. "All is running true to course," she says, "but I do not want you to suffer." There is a long, strong contraction and Patty starts to pant to relieve it. "Relax," the doctor says quietly. The pressure subsides and Patty smiles at Gene, who is bent over her, holding her in his arms. "I sure would like a meat-loaf sandwich," she says. Her eye catches the newspapers under her. "Read to me," she says. "I'm all out of touch with the news." "You're so pretty, Patter," Gene says. "Oh, Noos," Patty cries, "what would I ever do without you?"

5:40 P.M. The water sac broke suddenly and completely a few minutes ago, and now the doctor is getting the blanket and diapers the baby will be wrapped in ready while Patty and Gene watch. "It's hard to believe it is true," Gene says. The doctor has taught him how to massage Patty to ease the delivery, and while he has been helping he an.' Patty have discussed whether he should take a course in male nursing. "Maybe you could get into a hospital delivery room then," Patty says. "Why would I want to?" he asks. "It's much better this way." "But it's so long for you. Mary came so fast—but this one —— Maybe they all struggle at being born—coming out of that warm place ——" "You saw Mary before I did, but I'll see this one first," he says. "Can you see the head yet?" "Not yet." "Just a couple more, though," the doctor says, entering the conversation. There is a big contraction and then Patty says, "I've forgotten how to dress a baby." "It comes to this after nine months," Gene says, "and still I can hardly believe we're going to have one. Let's see what you've got out for the little guy." He leaves her and looks at the big table. "A shirt—two shirts, one pink, one blue—a binder and a little gown. Oh, I see, one shirt is for a little boy and the other is for a little girl." "Mr. Nissen," the doctor says, "put your hands on top of her abdomen and massage very gently, please . . . very gently." There is a long, heaving breath from Patty. "I see the head!" Gene exclaims. "Dark curly hair—like yours, Patty, like yours!" "But I wanted red hair," Patty says. "Patter," Gene cries, "the baby is coming!"

6 P.M. But the baby does not come. Its head is pressing, pressing against the cervix, as each powerful contraction of the uterus drives it farther down the birth canal, but it cannot push through. The doctor would like to cut the skin, but Patty is adamant. She had stitches with both Becky and Mary and remembers the recovery from them as being more annoying than recovery from the birth itself. "We said we would let nature take its course and we will," she says. "I feel strong—and it's not hurting the baby, is it?" The doctor assures her that it is not. "It's Patty's show," Gene says. "She's run it pretty well so far." "I could do this every afternoon," Patty says, "when you consider what you get out of it." "Relax," the doctor says. "Relax. Relax between the contractions. Don't push. Push only with the contractions." "If I'd done my exercises regularly it probably would have helped," Patty says.

6:30 P.M. The baby still has not stretched the cervix sufficiently, nor have the contractions. The doctor again asks to cut an opening but again agrees with Patty there is no danger in not doing so and so she does not. The contractions are coming close together now and Patty is saving her strength after each one for the coming of the next. But she has not cried out; only the heaving of her body and the noise of her breathing reveal the pressure the baby is applying. The doctor alternately tells her to push and relax, and Gene repeats over and over how wonderful she is.

7:10 P.M. Still the baby has not arrived. Now Patty is asking how much longer it will take, and the doctor once again is asking if she may use her scissors. "No" Patty says. "No." Her voice is clear and strong. "I could never make it without you, Noos," she says. "You are a good patient, and he is a good help," the doctor says. "Some mothers are just robbed—robbed," Patty murmurs and then gasps for breath.

7:20 P.M. "The baby can't stretch that old scar, honey," Gene says worriedly. "It will," Patty says. "Don't be anguished," the doctor says and it is hard to know to whom she is talking, Gene or Patty. "Just relax, relax, relax as the contraction goes down." "Oh, it's a wonderful feeling in between," Patty says, sighing. "The poor baby." "He's doing all right," Gene says. It is cooler now, but still in the nineties. Patty lies near the foot of the bed with the doctor in front of her, kneeling on a pillow. Gene stands beside Patty and during the contractions bends over to cradle her in his arms. Now she is bent almost double.

Anna Marie Nissen, photographed minutes after her birth. She was a 10-pound baby.

7:30 P.M. Delivery is close now, as the baby presses downward, downward, and the contractions come one upon another so closely they are almost continuous. "Stretch, baby, stretch," the doctor murmurs. "Now—now, push with this contraction—push—push—now relax—relax ——"

7:39 P.M. Then—suddenly—there is the sound of a baby's wail and like an arrow the baby has popped from the uterus into the doctor's deft hands. In skilled rhythm the doctor has caught the child, clamped the cord, and laid the baby on Patty's stomach. "Oh-h"—Patty's wail is one of pure joy—"see the baby!" Gene is still thunderstruck. "Oh," he says. "Oh, oh, oh. What a thrill!" "What is it?" Patty says. But there is no tim to examine the baby now. The afterbirth i coming with the same catapulting speed th baby did. The baby cries healthily and con tinuously, its small face growing rosy, its hea shaping itself beautifully. Now the docto picks it up. "It's a girl," Gene says. "It' Anna Marie!" "It's a miracle," Patty says "Isn't she beautiful—she's so pink and he eyes are so round and her little fingernails– and a girl! With a ready-made wardrobe!" Gene has passed her the baby, wrapped now i a blanket and diaper, and together they loo down upon her tenderly. "I love you," Patt says to Gene, looking up at him, and he smile at her. "You are wonderful," he says and world of love is in his eyes. When the docto takes the baby to weigh her the scales regist slightly more than ten pounds.

10 P.M. The baby is asleep now, and Patty i almost asleep. The baby did rip her, however and a few stitches were necessary; she feel sorry about them. Still, she is glad she too the gamble—if the doctor had cut her it i possible that many more stitches would hav been necessary. The doctor used hypnosis t ease the pain and tension of the sewing up. " knew she was stitching me, but I didn' care," Patty says now. "Do you suppose it wa really hypnosis?" "We are nicely finished an that is what is important," the doctor answer and, waving good-by, goes home. Once mor the big room is tidy; the pans are gone an so is the table, and only the rosy-cheeke baby, peacefully asleep in the basket besid Patty, reminds one now of the miracle whic occurred here so recently. "Oh, I am so hun gry," Patty says, stretching. "I'll get you meat-loaf sandwich," Gene says. "You mus be so tired," Patty says. "I think maybe thi way is too hard for you." "Oh, no," says Gene shocked at the very idea. "I'll never forget it It was all wonderful. I wouldn't have anothe baby any other way." "Still," Patty says wist fully, "it seems sad that hospitals can't pro vide special delivery rooms for healthy an happy parents who are eager not to miss an of this great experience." Gene smiles at he gently. Her strong convictions about livin life fully and deeply have led him down man paths he might not have found for himself and he is keenly aware of how enriched hi life has been by her vigorous vitality.

For a moment they are silent with happines and then they both begin talking at once abou the two little girls. Gene has just called them on the phone at Eileen's house, where they have been too excited to go to bed. They are delighted with the news. "I asked Jesus fo another sister," Becky said, while Mar couldn't stop giggling. "Oh, I can hardly wai for them to see the baby," Patty says. "To morrow," Gene says, "I will baptize Anna Marie with water from the River Jordan." "Oh, Noos," Patty says, "isn't it wonderfu to be home!"

FUEL FOR THE FLAME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 64

The Indian raised his hand. "Please, Mr. Hallett, please. It's you who must get this straight. There is only one thing that is impossible: that you should cease to co-operate with us; you have got in too far. This is a dangerous game."

"I don't understand."

"I know that you do not understand, Mr. Hallett; but there are some things that it is not necessary for you to understand. There is only one thing that you must understand: that my friends are very powerful and they will not permit you to cease to be co-operative. You have signed three checks. They represent rewards for services that have been rendered. If those checks were in the hands of, let us say, Colonel Forrester, he would place a very unfortunate interpretation on your having received that money. It would be the ruin of your career."

"But ——"

Again the Indian raised his hand. "Mr. Hallett, it is not very desirable that we should be seen together here. It is, in fact, most imprudent. But it is important that you should realize, once and for all, the position in which you stand. So I trust you will supply me as soon as possible with the information for which I asked."

Harry Pawling turned the second sheet of the Pearl's monthly news bulletin. "Everyone will be glad to learn," he read, "that Mrs. Pawling was able to arrive in England in time for her son's operation. What a difference has been effected in the life of Pearl employees by modern facilities of communication and transportation. In the old days of the East India Company ——"

Pawling let the report fall forward on his desk. He closed his eyes and began soundlessly to recite his big speech in Rose Without a Thorn. It was the best part he had ever had, a part into which he could enter most completely. He got up from his desk; he began to pace the room, mouthing his lines.

There was a tap on his door.

"Come in. Ah, hullo, Basil." He checked. He had never seen Hallett look like this before; he had seen him with a hang-over but this was different. His face was haggard, his cheeks drained. "Are you ill?" he asked.

Basil shook his head. "It's what I came to talk to you about. It's . . . no, I don't think I'm ill, but this is the wrong place for me: the humidity. Suddenly it's got too much for me. I can't take any more. I want a transfer."

"I see." Harry looked at him thoughtfully. This wasn't a new phenomenon in his experience. Men had these breakdowns; so did women. "You'd better go down to the doc and have a check-over," he suggested

Basil shook his head. "That wouldn't do any good. There's nothing to show. He'd prescribe vitamins or a fortnight's leave in Singapore. But that's not the point. This place is wrong for me. I've got to have a change."

"How long has your contract got to run?" Pawling asked.

"Ten months."

"That isn't very long."

"It's more than I can take."

"That's how you feel this minute, but we all feel this way sometimes. We can't transfer everyone who feels depressed. If a man is really ill, if the doc says he needs a change, that is another matter. That's why I say go down to the hospital for a checkup."

"And I've told you, haven't I, that that isn't any good. The doc'll say there's nothing wrong with me. I've got to leave, I tell you. This place has got me down."

He spoke impatiently, in a way that Pawling was not used to being spoken to, especially by a junior. Pawling answered him abruptly. "You're not yourself and you forget yourself. That's not the way to talk to me. If you don't care to go down to the doc, then we will consider the matter closed."

Back in his office Basil stared at his empty out tray, his full in tray. He pressed his hands against his temples. He had to get away. He had to go. He looked at the chessboard and the box of chessmen. He got out his key; then wrote out a message. He needn't tell them too much: enough to keep them quiet while he laid his plans. He had to go. Julia must work on Barbara. What was the point of having influence, if you didn't pull every string?

Next day, shortly after breakfast, Lila rang Angus up. "You're dining tonight here, aren't you? Shelagh's coming too. You won't forget to be attentive?"

on't."
you doing anything this afternoon, out half past five?"
ought of going to the nets."
u'd better go then. I can't be certain of
ns. Anyhow, I'll be seeing you this eve-at won't be much use, will it? I never chance of talking to you when we meet ic."

n you shall tonight. You shall sit next t dinner. Mind you prove an entertainversationalist."
laugh, mocking, half contemptuous, ging in his ears when the receiver hung on its hook. He felt angry. Friendship, iness, was there one iota of either in her e to him? He clenched his fists, rebelresentful, impatient to even out the to assert himself. Ah, but when he held his arms she was subdued, dominated, vient to each successive whim. He closed s, picturing her as she would be that g.

neth Studholme tapped on the door of e's bedroom.
me in," she called. She was seated at essing table, penciling her eyebrows.
oked over her shoulder inquiringly. He ide her.
a little worried about tonight," he said.
e ordered a very special dinner. Bull
If they aren't a delicacy, what is?"
not worrying about that." He paused, rehead wrinkled. "Reynolds is an odd what way odd?"

I knew that, I shouldn't be so wornolds was a postwar type, the outcome orld in which there were three kinds of : capital that you could cut into;

s that were so highly taxed that it did y a man to earn more than a certain and expense accounts that were real to the men with access to them. Rey-was one of those: he lived from day to a world of mergers and new issues; he a profit out of every landslide, since he at extra sense of guessing half an hour ance which way the land would slide; he o share in progress; he did no worse things were going badly; he had no faith future, no reverence for the past; he ed the market. Men like Reynolds were ators, improvisers, exploiters. Yet they he sons and grandsons of the members old propertied middle classes. You had n where you were with them; but you t know where you were with a man like is Reynolds, and the disarming thing him was that he looked so exactly like a orthian Englishman. You felt that he Forsyte who would live by the Forsyte but he was not. He was devious. That hy Studholme was worried about this
g.
I be grateful if you would keep your eyes
rs on the alert," he said. "I want you to Reynolds. I've got a premonition that hing I ought to know about may get said
t." hat has he done to make himself so im-nt?"
hat's what I'd like to know. He calls
If a public-relations consultant. That be anything. He gets around a lot. He nfluential contacts. Frankly, I'm in the
"
ll do my best."

ner was at eight. It was a family party.
nolme had been anxious not to make it
l. Shelagh had come in on Lila's ince. He had asked young Macartney for gh. It was, in fact, the same party with ddition of Reynolds that had lunched e day that Annetta had planned to visit ya.
ynolds was the first arrival. Studholme ed him in terms of their wartime actanceship in Cairo. "So here's my man of ery again."
ynolds laughed: the easy, self-confident of the man who does not need to ex-himself. He turned to Lady Studholme.
you have wartime experience with the 'funnies,' Broadway or Baker Street?" he asked.

She shook her head. "My war could not have been less glamorous. A small child to be looked after allowed me only half-time war work. Fire watching, driving cars, you know."

"I know."

He smiled, a warm, understanding smile. Studholme noted it with a sensation of distrust. Much too much the professional ladies' man.

"Miss Marsh," the A.D.C. announced.

Annetta paused in the doorway. She had wondered how she would feel when she next saw Francis Reynolds. She was resolved not to give herself away. But at the sight of him, standing beside his hostess, so suave, so self-assured, a feeling of repulsion struck her. How could anybody be so double-faced? She had found men honest on the whole. If you played straight with them, they were straightforward in return. Reynolds was the first man who had deliberately tried to take a mean advantage of her. Her lips closed tightly for a second. Then she recovered.

"This is a pleasant surprise for me," she said; her voice could not have been more casual.

"It is pleasant for me, very pleasant, but I can't say it is a surprise."

"Not a surprise?"

"I knew that you were here. I was looking forward to seeing you again."

"But you didn't know that you were coming here. You told me definitely that you were not coming here."

"I often have to change my plans," he told her.

"I shall be very inquisitive until you tell me what made you change your plans," Annetta said.

"I'd like to be able to say it was your presence here, but I wouldn't be being altogether truthful if I did."

He underlined the word "altogether." Studholme, looking from the one to the other, thought, They know each other better than I realized.

"Did you hear about that chap who tried to shoot me?" Annetta asked.

"Of course. But I did warn you, didn't I?"

"Not in so many words."

"But I think I said ——"

She interrupted. "When I heard that you were coming here, I wondered whether that attempt had had anything to do with it."

"That's very flattering to me."

"I didn't mean it that way. You told me that you fished in troubled waters. That episode may have made you feel that the waters here were more troubled than you had suspected."

He looked at her thoughtfully, as though he were asking himself a question. His half-smile was a little crooked, was half affectionate. "One doesn't know for certain why one does half the things one does. I don't think I tried to work out why I had that hunch that it would be a good idea for me to come here, but maybe—yes, very likely—the news about that attack on you may have been the deciding influence."

How smooth he was, how convincing he made himself appear. But she had known that he was coming here long before that episode. Sir Kenneth had known for weeks. Reynolds was a cheat, a liar. Was she the only person who had seen through him?

"Where were you when you heard about that episode?" she asked.

"In Kuala Lumpur."

"Did they talk about it much?"

He shrugged. "Do people ever talk much about anything that's not their direct concern? So many dramatic things are happening in so many different places, and thanks to radio and TV they seem to be happening in our own drawing rooms. Nobody has time to worry for very long about anything that does not immediately concern him, but in your case ——" He paused. "I myself did feel rather personally about that."

The tone of his voice changed. It assumed a caressing quality. She resented it, and yet it warmed her. He might be a liar and a cad, but he had felt something for her. That's why people like this were such a menace. They had their sincere side. They cheated only every now and then. But he must have had all his plans laid to visit Karak before he had heard news about her in Kuala Lumpur.

"Dinner is served, milady."

They took their places. Lila turned to Angus. "I haven't seen you since that lunch party when Annetta arranged to go out to the oil camp. What have you been doing with yourself?"

"Nothing in particular. You know what the routine of life is here."

"Do I? I know what my routine is. But I don't know yours."

"Mine's not so very different."

"Oh, but it must be. You're a man and I'm a woman. You are a bachelor; I'm a carefully chaperoned young woman. Think what a difference that makes." Her tone was brisk and social. "I'd give a lot to see your diary," she was saying. "To know what you were doing hour by hour. I never had a brother. My stepbrother is too young to be any use. I'd like to have had a brother like you, somebody who's good at games, someone who enjoys life. You could tell me so much."

"If you think of me as a brother, you might at least call me by my Christian name."

"Should I? Perhaps I should. Now tell me, Angus, what kind of women do you like?

While sleep recharges your body

Prince Matchabelli's new face cream

recharges your skin

At night—when skin cell renewal is at its peak—Polyderm Compensating Cream replenishes your skin with polyunsaturates...elements of young skin that time drains away

Now, with Prince Matchabelli's Polyderm Cream, you can recharge your skin, because Polyderm contains all 3 polyunsaturates—natural elements of beautiful, young skin. In fact, 20-year-old skin is almost 50% richer in these elements than skin at age 40.

Just cleanse your face as usual before bed; then gently massage this vital, greaseless cream into your face and throat. Light, penetrating—Polyderm moisturizes and revitalizes dry, tired, end-of-day skin . . . recharges skin all night with all 3 beautifying polyunsaturates.

When you awaken, you'll sense a new, alive feeling in your skin. And before you know it, that vital, young look can be yours again, thanks to your nightly Polyderm beauty sleep. Daytime, enjoy Polyderm's greaseless moisturizing under make-up. $2, $3.50, $5, plus tax.

Complete your beauty treatment with New Polyderm Skin Freshener, $1.50, and New Polyderm Extra Deep Skin Cleanser, $2

Polyderm by PRINCE MATCHABELLI

What kinds of things do you like most in a woman?"

She paused interrogatively. He did not answer. His eyes looked very directly into hers. She recognized what that look said: "I may have liked other women in my time, but now there's one woman only for me, you." That was what that look said and the impulse was strong upon her to answer with the look it longed for, a look that said, "I, too, my dear, I too." But something stayed her, the prescience that the time had not yet come for that.

One day there would be in her life a man whose look across a table she would answer with the look that Angus longed for. But Angus was not that man. Her nerves might quiver at his look, at the sound of his voice. Her senses might vibrate to his touch, but she did not love him. He was nothing but a forerunner.

She smiled brightly. "Now tell me this about yourself. It's something I'm very curious to know. Do you always fall for brunettes or blondes or redheads? Or is it incalculable, unpredictable? You just don't know whom you'll fall for. Now be a brother, tell me about the way it is with you. It'll be such a help to me, when my time comes, when I fall in love."

He's loathing it, she thought. She gloated in the knowledge and the heady sense of power that it gave her.

On the other side of Angus, Shelagh was talking to the A.D.C.

"Have you made any decision yet about your future?" she was asking him.

"Up to a point. I've decided to give up the army and to look for a job abroad."

"Why abroad?"

"I want to start a new life among people who didn't know me before this happened. I don't want to be pitied, I don't want to be explained." He paused. "I'm being terribly egotistical. The trouble about you—or rather, the nice thing about you—is that you mak so easy to talk about oneself."

She flushed. He really was a terribly person. He would be so right for Barbara

"You have such a way of seeming terested," he said.

"But I am interested."

Oh, but I am, she thought. She did like for himself, and she was interested in him himself, but at the same time she was in ested in him as the solution for all t problems: hers and Barbara's, her fath and her mother's. It would be so wonde if it could work out this way. Five pe would be better off, five people who were too happy now. No one would suffer. Usu somebody had to pick up the bad hanc every deal, but this time there was no hand. Oh, but what peace, what content if could get her parents back together! To ha real home again, somewhere where she longed.

"You thought once of going into Pea she said. "Does that idea still appeal to yo

"I'm toying with it, Pearl or some equ lent of Pearl."

"In that case ——" She hesitated. An i had struck her. "Why don't you come spend a week with us? Then you could what the inside life of an oil camp is. have leave, don't you?"

"I'm about due for some local leave. I thinking of taking it in Singapore."

"That would cost a lot of money. might not have too much fun with people don't know. You could have a real rest us, and it would be a holiday. I mean y be doing different things. It is a world o own, you know, an oil camp. Don't you t that you should come down and see ho looks from the inside?"

"It's not a bad idea."

"It's a very good idea. When do you t you could get that local leave?"

"Any time I apply for it. I've been he year."

"Then I'll ask my stepmother whe would be most convenient for her," She said. "How long would you like to sta week, a fortnight?"

"From a Friday to the second Monday lowing. That would only count as a v against me."

"Ten days. Fine."

A lot could happen in ten days. Everyt could happen in ten days. A momentary s of guilt flicked her conscience. Was she p ing a very crooked game, cheating be their backs people who had trusted her, la traps for them? She shook her head. could she be behaving badly when five pe would be the better off as a result of wha was scheming?

Dinner was over. Lady Studholme hac the women into the drawing room. Studh moved round the table and took the next to Reynolds.

Now, he thought, what secrets can I tract? "I should very much value your v on what is likely to happen in Singapo he said. "What happens there will hav repercussions here. Particularly in the Ch community."

The door opened. A servant came i whisper in Gerald's ear. He rose. "Will please excuse me, sir." He was back w half a minute. "It's London, sir. I think should take the call." He followed his into the office. Reynolds and Angus wer alone.

"Tell me," said Reynolds, "I haven't h chance of asking you, but how is your fat I'd heard he wasn't well."

"Do you know my father?"

"I haven't met him, but I've heard a him. Who hasn't? Yours is a well-kn family. They told me in Singapore that he practically retired from the business. Is true?"

"As far as attending the office, yes, bu keeps in touch with everything that's g on. It's he who makes all the big decisi

"But he is seriously ill, isn't he?"

"His chest is bad and his heart is wea suppose that one day his heart will give u the strain."

Mmm—peaches in our oatmeal this morning!

Good hot Quaker Oats for breakfast

—because you love them so much!

NEW IDEA! Children love variety. Try blending sunny cling peaches into your oatmeal while it cooks. (Recipe on package.) Delicious!

Piping hot Quaker Oats is the breakfast that gives your family all that wonderful oatmeal protein. Oatmeal is unequalled among all leading whole-grain cereals in protein, vitamin B_1, food-iron and food-energy.

What wonderful benefits for your family when you give them delicious Quaker Oats or Mother's Oats, the same fine oatmeal.

BEST START FOR ANY DAY:
a hug, a kiss and a hot oatmeal breakfast!

isn't he very bored? What does he do all l read?"
He spends most of his day working out s problems."
Chess, indeed." It was interjected quickly, sudden note of interest. "Chess must been a great consolation to him during e months in prison," Reynolds said.
t would have been if he had played it
."
So this is a new craze?"
During the last eighteen months."
e door reopened. Studholme returned.
significant moment that he had foreseen come and gone. He had not been there otice it.

arbara was bored. It was eight-thirty in the ning. Charles had left an hour earlier for office. Shelagh had left ten minutes ago for "keep-fit" class. She ought to have gone Shelagh, but her attendance at the class ng the last two months had become insingly infrequent.
he walked across to the mirror, turned beit slowly. Charles told her that it suited to be a little plump, but that was because was nearly fifty. He did not want her to too thin. He did not want her to under-the disparity in age. That was the trouble ut marrying a man older than yourself. He excited and flattered by your youthful-
. At the same time he was frightened by it.
wanted to reduce the gap. I'll go to the o-fit class tomorrow, she assured herself.
he telephone bell rang. It was Julia. Could come round that morning? Any time that ed. What was wrong with right away?
a was always a counterblast to one's own ondency. Even when she was depressed, so dramatized her annoyance that you e stimulated. This morning, however, she ked harassed.
It's about Basil. I'm worried and I want r help."
What's wrong?"
I'm not quite sure. He's being moody. He s he needs a change."
When is he due for one?"
In ten months' time."
That's not so long to wait."
That's what I tell him, but he insists. He
't take another week of it, he says."
Is he ill?"
Not in any obvious way. He doesn't sleep well; that's why he drinks too much. So t he can sleep. He's worrying. That's all
now."
Everybody feels that way sometimes."
I know. That's what I tell him, but he n't listen. He's got to go, he says. That's y I've come to you. Can't you pull strings h Charles?"
'Well ——"
There was a pause.
'Has Basil asked you to ask me this?" said
rbara.
'Not in so many words, but that's what he ant after he'd been to Harry."
'So he went to Harry first?"
'Of course. He had to."
'Had he?"
'Naturally; a subaltern can see his colonel y by asking his captain first."

There's as much protocol as that, is there?
the new girl here, you know. I haven't rned all my lessons. What did Harry say?"
'He wanted Basil to see the doc. Basil said re was nothing wrong with him that owed."
Barbara guessed at what Julia was feeling.
ell, was it her fault if her husband was the neral manager and her friend's a junior astant?
"Of course I'll do my best," she said. "I'll k to Charles—but you know how it is with
e. I'm a newcomer here. I don't know how e score adds up. I'm always afraid I'm going make a mistake of some kind. Something at seems common sense to me is against otocol. I expect that this whole thing is far, simpler than I imagine and that Charles ll say, 'What on earth have you been making this fuss about?' Let's hope so, anyway.
t's have a glass of sherry."
They were back to their old harmony, chat-ing away, at ease; but nevertheless there had been that period of tension. A seed had been sown.

When Charles came back for lunch, he raised his eyebrows at the sight of dirty glasses. "On a weekday?"

"Julia's been here; a crisis." She explained.

He shrugged. "That's certainly a problem child."

"Can you do anything to help?"

"How can I? His contract says three years. He hasn't a doctor's certificate."

"But don't people get moved sometimes before their time is up?"

He shook his head. "Only under special conditions. If a man has fallen down on a job—and Basil's not done that. Or if a man deserves to be promoted out of turn, or if there's a vacancy and no one else can fill it. Basil isn't ready for promotion and heaven knows when he will be. He's not the most valuable member of my staff."

"You couldn't make an exception in his case?"

"If Pearl made exceptions like that, it wouldn't be the firm it is."

"Must I tell Julia that?"

"No need for you to. I'll have a talk with him. Not in my office; here. Perhaps he feels he's not appreciated. One or two little things have not gone right. Kingsford was telling me about some careless slip he made. I shouldn't be surprised if in the course of a little chat I put my finger on the trouble. Let's have them up as soon as possible, and make it a rather special dinner."

She made it that. From the start Charles set the tone. "There's so much red tape here in this job of mine," he said. "I spend so much time with people who are supposed to be important, that every now and again I need to relax with friends with whom I don't need to put on dog."

He set himself out to charm and he played the role of the uncle rather than the contemporary. He did not, as he had so often in the past, behave as though he were one of them. He did not, through Barbara, link himself with Julia and Basil. Instead he talked from the vantage point of twenty years' seniority.

It was planned as reassuring talk for young people on the threshold of a fast-changing world. Before he had his quiet talk with Basil, he wanted the atmosphere of the evening to say, "Take a long view. Things work themselves out. Look back three years; are any of the issues that were worrying you then still problems? Look forward three years. Nothing that worries you now will be worrying you then."

When Barbara and Julia had gone into the drawing room he refilled Basil's glass.

"I love the taste of port, but I've an idea that what I love about it most is the realization of all the trouble that's gone into the making. Have you ever been to the Douro and seen the harvest? You should. It's a fiesta. All those peasants coming down to the farms, singing the traditional songs; the gathering of the grapes by day and the treading of them in those great stone troughs; the music at night and the women dancing and all the courtships that begin there; then the wine coming down the river in those square-sailed barges, and the great casks where it matures, the constant care of it, the replenishing with wine and brandy as it evaporates; all that twelve years' labor for our half hour's pleasure. It makes one feel a millionaire. It also makes one a little humble. It helps one to be patient."

He paused. "When I get depressed," he said, "—and who is there that doesn't?—I like to think of those casks in Oporto, and the wine slowly mellowing. Whatever else in the world around us may be deteriorating, that at least is getting better."

He had, he hoped, lulled Basil into a kind of coma before he changed the subject, without altering his tempo. "I was having a talk with Harry Pawling the other day and we were mentioning you. He told me that you weren't too happy about yourself; that you wanted a change. I told him that we all felt like that when we were young, that that kind of depression was one of the occupational hazards of working for a firm like Pearl. He mentioned something about a slip-up you'd made at some shipping conference. I forget what it was. I know it was quite unimportant. But he was afraid that you might be bothered, that you were thinking he didn't appreciate your work; which of course he does, as we all do. Harry has doubts every now and again about himself. That's probably why he comes down on you rather hard sometimes. It wouldn't be at all a bad idea if you had a talk with him one day, and told him how much you enjoy working for him. I'd be very grateful if you would."

Later Charles told Barbara what he had said. "I shall be surprised if that doesn't put things straight. I made him think that Harry, not he, was the problem boy. I don't expect to have any more trouble there. That's thanks to you. What would I do without you?"

"It's chicken à la budget."

Back in the Halletts' bungalow there was no such atmosphere of peace. Basil strode up and down the room, a whisky soda in his hand. Julia sat by the radio, letting him talk on. "It didn't work," he said. "I didn't get a chance to speak. Oh, yes, he was very nice, very suave and smooth. But what good does that do me? I've got to get out of here." He went on talking, repeating himself, sipping at his whisky. "This place is wrong for me. I'll go off my head if they make me stay on here. Why can't they understand that?"

"If I can't understand it, how can you expect them to?" Julia said. "It can only mean one thing: that you've some reason you haven't given me."

"Why should you think that?"

"Because there are only three reasons why a man feels he has to leave a place. He's queer and he's being blackmailed; and you're not queer. Or he's borrowed money and can't pay it back, and you're not a thief. There's only one other explanation: that he's got himself mixed up with a woman and can't face the consequences. Is she married and her husband's after you; or is she a respectable debutante? Have you made Lila pregnant?" Her voice was sharp, angry and contemptuous.

"You've got it wrong. There isn't any woman in this thing."

"What is it, then? You're running away from something, aren't you? What are you running from, if it isn't a woman?"

He could not answer that. He had to turn the talk to the one issue of which he could speak sincerely. "I'm as much in love with you now as I was on our wedding day."

"Are you? How am I to know? And even if that's true, it wouldn't prevent your having your bits of nonsense on the side." She spoke spitefully, savagely.

Her anger made it easier for him. "Listen," he said, "there's never been any woman in my life but you. There never will be."

She laughed. "Do you expect me to believe that?"

"You can say what you like; and I don't blame you for being suspicious, since I can't tell you why it is so desperately important for me to get away. But you must trust me because this is true: you are the only woman in my life. By that I mean that you are the only woman I've made love to."

"What ——" She hesitated. "You always let me imagine that ——"

"I may have, but that was vanity. You know what young men are. You know how they boast about their conquests. All this modern psychology about the dangers of inhibitions."

"But you, Basil, I can't believe ——"

"How could you be expected to? There's so much talk about this, but —— I don't say that I'm entitled to a halo on this account."

Later in the dusk she said, "Now I'll believe everything you ever tell me. Everything but everything forever."

Next morning a letter from the familiar typewriter lay upon Basil's desk. Was it a check? If it was one, should he sign? As well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb. Four signatures to three. Did it matter much? But it was

America's Loveliest Low Priced
Rugs Wall to Wall Carpet

SAVE up to 1/2
The Magic Olson Way

...By letting us reclaim the Valuable Wools and Materials in Your Old Rugs, Carpets, Clothing.

Like Millions of Olson Customers, you, too, can have thick, luxurious, New Reversible Broadloom Rugs or wall-to-wall Carpeting at big Factory-to-You Savings. We Add New Wool. YOUR CHOICE of 49 lovely Tweeds, Solid Colors, Florals, Early American and Oriental patterns, Ovals . . . regardless of colors in your materials. ANY SIZE IN A WEEK up to 18 feet wide, seamless, any length. Monthly Payments if desired. You risk nothing by a trial. Our 85th year.

Mail Coupon or Postcard to Nearest Address

FREE New Money-Saving Olson Catalog in full colors
Model rooms, decorating ideas, Gift Coupon.
Your Name.....
Address.....©
Town.....State.....
OLSON RUG CO., Dept. K-86,
CHICAGO 41 ILLINOIS ● NEW YORK 1 NEW YORK ● SAN FRANCISCO 8 CALIFORNIA

MORE PEOPLE USE
refreshing, calorie-free
Sugarine
LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGAR
YET NO FOOD VALUE
Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.
USE-TESTED by McCall's
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.— 75c
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

BIGELOW'S
"Constant Comment" TEA
Everybody Loves it!

For you
... your family
... your guests
For 6-cup sample, send 10¢ to
R. C. BIGELOW, INC., Dept. LJ
15 Merwin St., Norwalk, Conn.

50 VALENTINES for 25¢
Make Extra Money with Greeting Cards ALL YEAR
Send only 25c for Special Offer of 50 assorted Valentines. Let us prove you can make $50.00 or more any time of the year showing friends best greeting card sellers for Mother's, Father's Day, Easter, Birthdays, all occasions. Big line of Gifts, Stationery. Samples on approval. Send 25c for Valentine Special today.
MIDWEST CARD CO. 1113 Washington Avenue Dept. 332-S, St. Louis 1, Mo.

a chess problem. He set the pieces out. "Report interview Forrester."

For a moment he was puzzled. Then he remembered. He had told in his last report that he had been asked by the policeman for an account of Reynolds' visit. He had reckoned that it was the kind of useless information that would acquire him credit without doing any damage; but the Indian was more interested in this than in the other items he had given. Reynolds was due tomorrow. He himself was going into Kuala Prang the following week; he would go in and see Forrester. He was anxious to know how the land lay there.

Forrester received Basil with his habitual bland geniality. "Good, good, I was expecting to see you soon. I read that our V.I.P. had been down. He's a pleasant fellow, isn't he?"

"Very pleasant."

"Did he show an intelligent interest in what you showed him?"

"He'd been round several camps before. He seemed to know the essential facts."

"I wonder why he wanted to go round this one, then," Forrester said. "Did he ask many questions?"

"A few. Mostly about the men who work for us. What proportion are Chinese, things like that."

"Did he mention the attempt on Miss Marsh's life?"

"He wanted to see exactly where it happened."

"Did he say anything that particularly struck you, something that seemed unusual?"

"I listened very carefully as you asked me to, but I didn't notice anything."

"The slightest thing may be important. That's the curious, the fascinating thing about this game of mine. You can't tell till the very end what is going to prove a clue and what isn't."

"I don't see how the visit of a man like Reynolds who has no connection with the place could provide you with a clue."

"That puzzles me. I don't see why there should be, but there may be. Perhaps I'm wrong. Are you keeping a check on Pearl employees who go racing?"

"I'm doing my best, but it isn't easy. It's like looking for a needle in a haystack."

"Exactly; but if enough people are looking for that needle, one of them may prick his finger on it. So much of police work is routine. I'll tell you something else that's curious. If you start investigating a man in one direction, you may catch him in another; or one of his friends. I remember a case during the war. I was suspicious about some hashish smuggling. I was mistaken, but while I was stumbling down that blind alley, I caught up with a very clever case of tax evasion. It pays to keep out of police records. By the way, you are a chess fan, I remember. I wonder if you can solve this one for me." He got himself to his feet. He pulled back a screen. Behind it were two boards with the men set on them. "I'm like a schoolboy with a crib under my blotter. It wouldn't be good for discipline if my staff saw the boards out in the open. Now look at this. White to play and mate in three moves. I've been on it for two days and made no progress."

Basil looked at the board. It was very crowded. "There seem a great many pieces on the board," he said.

"That's what I feel myself."

"Where did you get hold of it?"

"From a friend in England. We have a kind of tournament with each other."

Basil studied the board. He could see no sign of an attack developing.

"Could I take down the positions and try to work it out when I get back?"

"I wish you would."

On his return he arranged the pieces and took out his code book. "Situation dangerous, lie low," he read.

Angus Macartney tried in vain to concentrate his attention on a novel. His father had caught another cold and he had come out from Kuala Prang in the early afternoon. He had expected Lila to telephone that morning, but she had not. "It's difficult for me at times," she'd say. He couldn't see why it should be. She had no work to occupy her.

It was nine days since he had seen her. If she rang him up this evening at his flat and got no answer, would she call him here or would she shrug her shoulders with a "That's too bad" again? Why on earth wouldn't she let him call her up? Why shouldn't they admit a friendship? This wasn't 1859. Friendships between men and women were accepted nowadays.

His straining ears caught the crunch of car wheels on the gravel. It puzzled him. Visitors were rare. He rose, walked out into the hall. It was Forrester.

"Looked in to see how your father was. Heard he'd caught another cold. He ought to be more careful. Is he visible, as our French cousins say? Fine; and as he's a rich man, I'm sure that he won't neglect this old confederate. Yes, you've guessed right. And, for heaven's sake, no ice in it. I'm not a Yank."

Forrester stretched himself out in a long chair. He gave the appearance of having settled down for a long visit. "I'm too old for this job, yet I'll be sorry to quit it," he said. "I'm curious to know what'll happen next.

THE HUMAN MALE

or Achilles' Heel Isn't Weak
Until He Gets a Blister on It

By GEORGIE
STARBUCK GALBRAITH

The human male will doggedly sail
Through treacherous ice-blocked seas
To map the snow on some polar floe,
While his month-long whiskers freeze.
Or fighting jungles, he'll bravely track
Ferocious beasts to their lair,
To snare 'em and truss 'em and bring 'em back,
Intrepid and debonair

Yes, scorning hardships and laughing at peril,
His spine as straight as his rifle barrel,
He studies voodoo and tribal rites,
Or charms a cobra before it bites,
And manages feats of derring-do
That simply amaze me through and through.

For this hero hale is the selfsame male
Who, when he bides at home,
Lies limp on his couch, a quivering grouch,
With a little cold in his dome;
Who plucks at the coverlid, weak and wan,
When threatened by tonsillitis,
Or moans like a saint with his thumbscrews on
At the least hint of neuritis.

So whenever I read of how dauntless men
Are planning magnificent deeds again,
Like scaling some new Tibetan mount
Through rigors and dangers beyond all count,
I always pray that they'll make it minus
The black defeat of a touch of sinus!

There are so many questions to wi never have the answer. I feel as though reading simultaneously half a doz cartoons that can't have an end bec soon as I've got to the end of one set acters, another group will pick up the I find that tantalizing."

He was in a garrulous mood. Angus him closely. He was sufficiently famil Forrester's routine to know that he n his office except for a specific reaso rester had come especially to see his Why? He was talking now about the situation in Karak.

"For instance, I'd give a lot to kn it'll all work out. But within a few mont retiring I shall be out of touch. I sh confidential reports any longer. The Karak will be in the news; the balloon up. There'll be a revolution, or an att revolution. Somebody'll be murdered. be a leading article explaining the back to the situation. There'll be questions House. For three, four days Karak w topic of general conversation; then the some fresh sensation."

He paused ruminatively. "I'd give know exactly what it will be that Karak into the news, and when. I'll what I'd like to do. I'd like to choose dozen of the leading notables and as to write down what they think will ha the next five years; then put their pro into sealed envelopes not to be opene Karak hits the headlines. I wonder guess would come the closest?"

"Yours should be," Macartney said

"It ought to be," Forrester told hin would it? I don't know. I live in a smal of my own. Studholme is the man who know. He knows all I do and a good de I don't. I would give a lot to know w would prophesy."

"What would your prophecy be?" cartney asked.

"That's what I ask myself. In every ca comes my way I try to put myself in th man's position. That's how one cat criminal; asking oneself how one woul one were he. We're not dealing with cri now, of course. We don't know, in fac whom we are dealing. That's one troubles. But let's see what's happe other countries where there was an equ situation, where there are an oil camp reigning house. The local Nationalists w capture power. There's a move against th because the ruling house has close links Western country and it relies on the W maintain itself in power. Who are the N alists here? The mob can always be w up by the cry 'Karak for the Karakis who is going to work up the mob? Thos are going to profit by it: the army a industrialists. The army most of all."

The monologue ran on as thoug colonel were talking to himself, but knew that Forrester was preparing those traps to which he had referred. must be a point to this rambling discuss

"I would prophesy," Forrester cont "an attempt by the generals to seize po they succeed, they will nationalize t fields. That will antagonize the British a friends of the present regime, so they wil the support of another powerful co There are three such countries, China, and the United States. As the coup d'ét have been organized by a moneyed the United States will be the appropriat Americans are both anticolonial and Communist. They are ready to suppor dollars any country they can regard as wark against Communism. The ge therefore, will try to convince the Ame that they have staged their coup d'état t tect the country against the Comm menace. Here there is no real Comm party; at least I don't believe there is. Y essential that the rebels should co both outside world opinion and unpo nationals that a Communist menace do ist. Now what would I do, I ask mys that situation? What would you do, M ney?"

Macartney shrugged. "How can I tell I'd do? I can't picture myself in that posi ıd that, my good friend, is the reason ou'd never be a good policeman. You o be able to put yourself in other peo- positions. I remember hearing a lecturer be Balzac and Dickens as the two great- ovelists of their day because they could der the skin of a greater number of peo- an their rivals could. They were—this he phrase he used—themselves more e. The same holds true of the detective. nore people that he is, the more effective He's got to be able to guess at his 's next move.

this is what I say to myself in this case: t would you do in Karak if you were an tant industrialist and you wanted it be- that there was such a thing here as a nunist menace?' I tell you what I'd do: t as an agent provocateur. The few Com- sts there are could be easily misled, made ieve that the Kremlin took them seriously. ct, do you know what I believe, Macart- I believe that attempt on Annetta Marsh rganized by the revolutionaries so that lame should lie with the Communists." s voice did not change its pace, but is, watching him, was aware of a tension is watchfulness. His half-closed eyes on the old sick man. Angus looked the one to the other. Did his father react ıy way? He could not tell; the room larkening.

o that's what I should put in my sealed ope," the colonel said. "What do you , Macartney?"

ou may be right."

e old man's voice was steady. Angus, hing him, wondered whether the colonel got the result he sought.

When do you prophesy that all this will en?" he asked.

Not in the old king's lifetime. Or perhaps ould put it this way: I don't think that k will make the headlines in the old 's lifetime. But I've a hunch that the Com- ist Party, instigated by the generals, will number of wild things to prepare the ic temper. It will be a great relief to me this royal wedding is safely over."

nnetta woke early on her wedding morn- Though the room was still dark she could the thudding of the launches on the river. looked at her bedside clock: just after five. ying back, her hands clasped under her while daylight filled the room, she pic- d the day that lay ahead. She would go n with Rhya to see their future house. She no idea what it would be like. She did not know where it was. A priest wrapped in a on robe would scatter it with lustral water. would receive the king's blessing. She ld be wearing for both these ceremonies nary European clothes. After lunch at t Ladda's house she would assume her monial robes. They were voluminous and in texture. Red and blue silk, shot with and silver threads draped over a tight- ng jacket that buttoned high at the neck at the wrist. Her head was to be wrapped gold turban. Her shoulders would support llection of heavy gold and silver bangles to her, resembled the collar of a horse's ness.

t half past two Rhya would call for her they would drive to the palace for the re- ion. At the far end of a long room they ld kneel, side by side, at a kind of praying , their hands hanging over the edge while guests came up, one by one, to pour lustral r over them. The water would drip into a l of roses. There would be no party for the sts. On arrival the guests would hand over r presents to an attendant. After they had red the water, they would be given, as they the room, a souvenir of the occasion: a och for the women, a tiepin for the men.

When the last guest had gone she and Rhya ld drive to their own home. It would be first time they would be alone together for months. That was going to be the strangest ng about the day; stranger than the cere- nial robes and the lustral water. For three nths they had conducted a lighthearted affair. She had not even asked herself ther she was in love with Rhya. What did mean by "love"? By tonight she would be his wife, a future queen, under conditions which were opposed to everything for which—by training, taste and temperament—she stood. She almost envied the veiled Moslem woman being carried in a box to meet a stranger. That seemed a more natural destiny than hers.

The room was light. She supposed she should be getting up.

Lila saw, four places ahead of her in the long file moving up the stairway to the reception room, Angus Macartney's slim back and sleek dark head. The file moved slowly forward. For Angus the ceremony had a mystic meaning; he was not a Buddhist, yet when the time came for him to pour the lustral water, he would have the same sense of dedication as Elizabeth of England's peers had had when they took their oath of allegiance in the Abbey. The prince looked very dignified in his scarlet-and-black robe and the silver-and-gold turban. On his bride's face was a soft, tender look, but her chin was strong. Angus prayed that she might be the right wife for Rhya. The crown prince would need the right wife as much as the right friends.

Angus' turn had come. He was handed the short syringe, rather like a long, old-fashioned fountain-pen filler, and pressed the bulb. The water trickled out and dripped through the outstretched fingers onto the bowl of roses. The scent of the roses was delicate and fragrant. Angus' lips framed a prayer: May I never fail in my trust to you.

He turned and moved away and saw Lila. Their eyes met; she smiled mockingly. His heart began to thump. He felt tense and taut. He waited at the end of the room for her to join him.

"Do you realize it's eight days since we've met?" he said.

"As much as that? Oh, surely not," Lila told him.

"Eight days." His eyes were bright. "When do I see you?" he was demanding. "What about tonight?"

"I'm not quite sure. I may ——"

"If you aren't sure, that means you can't be doing anything that matters. I'm going back to my office. I'll be there till five. Then I'll be in my flat till eight. Ring me at one or the other. You've got to, do you see?" His voice was threatening.

"I'll try," she said. She watched him move away with a slow smooth stride.

It was five o'clock. Annetta and Rhya were alone at last. She had scarcely seen the house that morning. She longed to see it, but she was tired, desperately tired. "I'd like to rest," she said.

"I too."

Her clothes had been moved from Aunt Ladda's compound and unpacked. Her brushes and her manicure set were laid out on her dressing table; her dresses hung up in the wardrobe. She took off the heavy ceremonial clothes and laid them on the long rattan chair. The bathing room was modern in that it had European fittings, but its tiled floor was a step below the level and the huge traditional jar of water with a wooden cover and a dipper stood in the corner. She splashed herself with water, soaped herself, splashed herself again. Refreshed and half restored, she went back into the bedroom. A light silk dressing gown lay over a chair. She put it on. A box of cigarettes was at her side. She took one out and lit it.

There was a tap on the door. "May I come in?"

He was wearing black Chinese trousers and a light silk pajama jacket. His hair, half grown since it had been shaved at the monastery, looked like a crew cut that was in need of immediate attention.

"I'll be glad when your hair's grown," she said.

"Don't you think I shall too?"

They laughed, an easy, cozy laugh. "May I have a cigarette?" he said.

He lit one and they smoked in silence. The room was in half darkness through which the light of their cigarettes glowed.

"How little I thought when I tore up that ticket to the Drury Lane that we'd be here like this today," he said.

She did not answer. It was so exactly what she had been thinking twelve hours earlier.

"Do you remember what you said when I tore it up?"

"Very well."

"We're beginning a honeymoon; by all the rules it should be an anticlimax. What would the average person say if he were given this as a hypothetical case? A couple are separated for two months; when they meet again they have to behave as though they were practically strangers, putting their emotions away into cold storage."

He talked lightly, but her heart warmed toward him in a way that it had never done before. That he should have felt like this, that he should have thought just this! We really are one person. She sighed. How well he understood her own confusion; how foolish her doubts seemed now. She was utterly at one with him. He stubbed out his cigarette and turned toward her. At last, she thought. At last.

Two miles away, Angus paced his flat. He had been waiting for two hours now. The champagne in the refrigerator was chilled to freezing point. The canapés had begun to wilt. Seven o'clock. She would not be coming. Yet he could not leave till eight, in case she should

The Opposite Sex and Your Perspiration

Q. Do you know there are two kinds of perspiration?

A. It's true! One is "physical," caused by work or exertion; the other is "nervous," stimulated by emotion. It's the kind that comes in those moments when you are tense or emotionally excited.

Q. Which perspiration is the worst offender?

A. The "emotional" kind. Doctors say it's the big offender in underarm stains and odor. This perspiration comes from bigger, more powerful glands—and it causes the most offensive odor.

Q. How can you overcome this "emotional" perspiration?

A. Science says a deodorant needs a special ingredient specifically formulated to overcome this emotional perspiration without irritation. And now it's here... exclusive Perstop*. So effective, yet so gentle.

Q. Why is ARRID CREAM America's most effective deodorant?

A. Because of Perstop*, the most remarkable anti-perspirant ever developed, ARRID CREAM Deodorant safely stops perspiration stains and odor without irritation to normal skin. Saves your pretty dresses from "Dress Rot."

Why be only Half Safe? use Arrid to be sure!

It's more effective than any cream, twice as effective as any roll-on or spray tested! Used daily, new antiseptic ARRID with Perstop* actually stops underarm dress stains, stops "Dress Rot," stops perspiration odor completely for 24 hours. Get ARRID CREAM Deodorant today.

43¢ plus tax.

*Carter Products trademark for sulfonated hydrocarbon surfactants

People with ulcers

...don't go to bed on an empty stomach

If you have an ulcer, probably your doctor has advised a snack before bedtime as part of your program of frequent eating.

But what to eat is a problem. Your condition limits your choice of foods. Also, if you have been on a high milk-and-cream diet, it may be important to find foods that add pleasure, but not pounds.

That's why so many doctors suggest sweet-tasting, but low-calorie, D-Zerta® Pudding for people with ulcers. When made with whole milk, it's another way to get some of the milk benefits you need. Yet D-Zerta Pudding is made entirely without sugar and one serving has only 94 calories. D-Zerta Pudding comes in three smooth, satisfying flavors. Enjoy it at mealtime, bedtime—as often as you like.

Ask your doctor about D-Zerta Pudding... and D-Zerta Gelatin, too. He'll recommend them. D-Zerta is made by General Foods, makers of Jell-O® Desserts. It's available at grocery stores everywhere.

ON A LAXATIVE MERRY-GO-ROUND?

TAKE NR TO-NIGHT... TOMORROW ALRIGHT! SPARKLING BRIGHT!

Searching for effective overnight relief? Try NR tonight! You'll know why millions use it with utmost confidence. NR works overnight . . . and gently aids the function of elimination, with NO restlessness or sudden necessity. NR is an all-vegetable laxative that gives easy relief.

NR REGULAR CANDY COATED or NR JUNIORS

helps you feel better ...and look better!

Nature's Remedy NR-TABLETS-NR ALL VEGETABLE LAXATIVE

SHEETS, TOASTERS, TOWELS, MIXERS, etc. GIVEN TO YOU FREE!

Thousands of famous products to choose from—furniture, fashions, silverware, china, draperies, etc. You get $50.00 and more in merchandise just by being Secretary of a Popular Club you help your friends form. It's easy! It's fun! Nothing to sell, nothing to buy. Write today: Popular Club Plan, Dept. A959 Lynbrook, N. Y.

Popular Club Plan, Dept. A959, Lynbrook, N. Y.
Send Big FREE 276-Page FULL-COLOR Catalog

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

phone. He had said until eight, so he must stay. She might have some explanation. She might want to make a date for the next day.

He looked at the clock resentfully. Hurry, he adjured it. Let eight o'clock come quickly, so that he could leave this flat and all the torture that it held for him. The telephone and the clock, the warders of his prison.

In her bedroom at the Residency Lila lay back among her pillows watching the telephone, picturing Angus striding up and down his flat, flinging himself angrily into his long chair, picking up a book, trying to read it, tossing it away. He was her slave utterly. At any moment she could fling him from these torments of anger and despair into a heaven of gratitude and ecstasy. She had only to lift that piece of metal. She rose, walked over to the mirror, turning before it slowly. What power she possessed. Only four years ago she had been the ugly duckling. She stretched her arms lazily above her head. How good to think of him waiting there.

She went next door and ran a bath; this was one of the few houses in Karak—was there indeed another one?—where you could wallow in tepid water. She scattered a handful of crystals and watched the water cloud; the air grew scented. Poor Angus in that lonely flat. She dressed slowly. Half past seven. Should she call him now? Make some excuse, say something, make a definite promise; a promise that she would keep? She hesitated, then shook her head. She was only doing this so that later it would be better for them both. He would be grateful this time tomorrow.

She found on the radio a program of dance music. She turned it low, as an accompaniment to her thoughts. She watched the minute hand move round; at last it reached the twelve. She rose to her feet. That's that, she thought.

She switched off the radio. What was he doing now? Would he drive out to see his father? How ill was his father? She hesitated, then stepped toward the telephone. She lifted the receiver, dialed the number. A moment's pause, the ringing tone. It went on ringing. She waited for thirty seconds, then hung up. So he had flung out of the flat as soon as the hour had struck—or hadn't he? Had he gone earlier? She frowned. She wished she knew. Had she overplayed her hand, strained his patience beyond the breaking point? If she had, she must put it right. Early tomorrow she would ring him up, make a date for the afternoon.

In a fury of despair Angus drove through the night. The fabric of his entire existence was in shreds. He was nothing to Lila, he knew that now. He was neglecting his business, he was seeing none of his friends. And all the time there was this niggling worry about his father. He had thought back so often over those two interviews with Forrester. Did his father belong to a group that was employing agents provocateurs to goad the Communists into premature and foolish action? If that were so, what was he, Angus, doing, waiting hour after hour for a telephone bell when he should be trying to solve the mystery? That afternoon he had poured the lustral water over the crown prince's hands; he had vowed the allegiance of a lifetime; then he had turned and there was Lila. All thoughts of his future sovereign had vanished from his mind and heart. He had become a pathetic slave. How contemptible of him.

A baby moon had already sunk below the horizon, but the sky was cloudless and starlight lit the road. His foot was pressed on the accelerator. Half the cars that came toward him failed to dim their lights. Half the cyclists had no rear lights. The road was a raised causeway across the flooded rice fields. There was no room to avoid an accident if a reckless driver tried to cut in against oncoming traffic. But he did not decrease his speed. What was the point? He was sober and clearheaded. And did it matter so much what happened to him? What purpose was he serving in the world?

He arrived home shortly after nine. He had expected to find his father in the library, but the room was dark except for a single reading lamp shining on the chessboard beside his father's chair. This chess again. Something turned on this chess. Was not that the piece of information that had made Reynolds start, that had caught Forrester's attention? The pieces told him nothing. He called the No. 1 boy.

"When did my father go to bed?"

"At half past seven, master," the boy told him.

"Did he have any dinner?"

"No, master."

"Was he well?"

"He no say he ill."

"I see."

He tiptoed up the stairs. He stood outside his father's bedroom. So that the air could pass freely under the ceiling, the walls were set several inches short of it. He could hear his father's breathing, heavy, stertorous but steady. His father was asleep.

He tiptoed back into the library. "Some bread," he said. "Some cheese and the decanters."

THE STEEPLE WEATHER VANE

By DIONIS COFFIN RIGGS

The minister said
We ought to take down
The weather vane,
And put up, instead,
A more appropriate symbol.

What's weather
But the sign of God
That's written in the canopy
Of sky above the church,
Or in the restless sea?

He said there ought to be
No veering and shifting
On our stand,
No changing of direction
With each breath of wind.

That weather vane has been there
Ever since I was a boy.
That's pretty steady, I should say.
My father used to start his day,
Before he went afishing,
By looking up to see which way
The wind was blowing.

My old man wouldn't cut his hay
If the wind had backed around
Through the northwest.
He said the steeple weather vane
Was best.

It's truest,
Being highest in the town.
We can find out the weather
By watching the sea gulls' flight
To see which way they light
So's not to ruffle a feather.

Or by the grape leaves twisting
To show their silver undersides.
Or tell
By the sweet fern's smell
Whether the wind is south or east.
But that's not scientific.

If the minister thinks
We ought to go inside
The church to get our guidance,
That's one thing. But,
As for the steeple,
Let God proclaim the weather
To His people.

If his father had been there, a glass of would have sufficed; but alone, he felt the for alcohol. He cut a crust of bread, buttere and laid on it a thick slice of Cheddar lik Danish sandwich. He filled a tumbler full v ice and poured the whisky on it. He too long, slow sip; smoky and rich and sweet. H good it was.

He sat back in his chair, bit at the o sandwich. The jungle noises ebbed and swe around him. The screech of a monkey through the rattle of the crickets. He sip again. The undiluted liquor warmed his blo reassuring him, giving him courage, lenc him resolution. He was a man, wasn't he man's job lay to hand.

He sat in a half trance, munching at bread and cheese, sipping at the whisky. I it cleared the mind, sweeping away the su sential, Lila and all that went with Lila. I could she count against his duty to his fu king? First things first. That chessboard l the answer; but other places, too, must ho also. It couldn't all be on that board and ir father's head; there must be files, there n be papers. Where would they be kept? Th was no safe in the house. There was no r for a special strongbox where jewels coul shut away. There must be a locked drawe the desk in his father's study. If he could sack that drawer, surely he could find the swer to the colonel's problems.

He tiptoed up the stairs, listened outside door: the same heavy breathing. He mo down the passage. The study annex w opened off his father's bedroom opened onto the passage. He tried the door. It locked, but the locks were old and weak. had learned as a boy how a door coul opened if you adjusted your weight agains pivot. He bent down, put his shoulder be the lock, pushed gently at first, with a stea increasing pressure, just as he had done schoolboy. He felt the door yield; it mov quarter inch. He increased the pressure a gave.

He took off his shoes and stepped into room. The room was dark, but he knew exact position of each piece of furniture waited till his eyes had grown accustome the darkness. His heart was thudding. He toed toward the desk, tried the top drawe was locked. He tried the others. The sec the third, the bottom drawer all opened ea The top one, then. He knelt beside it. He h clasp knife in his pocket. The little blade strong; he inserted it, worked it round, fo the catch and pressed on it, turned it down over. The drawer came open as easily as lower ones had done. He pushed his hand side. A litter of papers and notebooks, began to stuff them in his pocket. He w take them down below, sort them at leisur tain anything that might seem important, ting back what was not.

He scooped up the papers quickly; t were not so many. He leaned forward, pas the palm of his hand over the bottom o drawer, to make sure that he had not m anything. His fingers closed over the las velope. He was about to rise when sudde gleam of light shone into the drawer. He round, startled, standing up. The beam c electric torch dazzled him, just as the h lights of the approaching cars had done. light, which had fallen into the drawer, now up on his chest. He could not see wha behind the light, but beside the head o torch he could see, held in another hand muzzle of an automatic pistol.

The pistol throbbed. He scarcely hear sound. He felt no pain, but he felt he had pushed, hard. He went down upon his k "Angus." His father's voice. The light was full on him. He looked down at his s Round his waist there was a spreading s Am I going to die? He had read as a schoo of soldiers, shot through the heart in the dle of a charge, continuing to fight for se minutes. Was that going to happen to now? He still felt no pain.

"I'm all right," he said. "Don't worry. phone for a doctor."

Next morning Charles Keable returne lunch early, looking serious. "Wh Shelagh?"

Out with Julia."
've bad news for her. Young Angus lartney's hurt."
Badly?"
Yes. He's been shot."
Where, how?"
n his home, by his father, by mistake. No-knows quite how it happened."
s he very bad?"
t's early to say, but nowadays if a man n't die in the first two hours he usually ives."
How do you think Shelagh's going to take
"
er father shrugged. "Your guess is as good ine. What do you think?"
Five weeks ago I'd have had no doubt, but e last few days she has seemed more ex-ll about that young A.D.C.'s visit here."
time-worn Chevrolet drew up outside the galow.
That's they," he said.
helagh and Julia came in, laughing. They been at the pool and were carrying beach kets. Her gaiety hurt him. It might be a time before she looked as gay again. "I'm id I've bad news for you," he said.
e watched as he told it. "Poor Angus," she
. "I'll call Lila right away."
ila was in. "I was expecting you to call. I dered how soon you'd hear. If you hadn't ed, I was going to ring you after dinner."
How bad is he?"
It's hard to tell. He's in the hospital."
Conscious?"
Yes."
Is he seeing visitors?"
They'd let him see you, I expect."
Do you think I should come in?"
It would look better, wouldn't it?"
It's terrible for you."
Oh, well."
I'll come in this afternoon."
he returned to the living room. "He's in pital," she said. "Lila seems to think he see visitors. I'll go in after tea if there's a
"
Of course there'll be a car, and I do hope realize ——" Charles checked. The fact t she was going meant that it was serious her. He walked across to Shelagh, put his round her shoulder.
he looked up at him and smiled. What a erable hypocrite she was. Never again uld she get into a mess like this. Never, er, never.

Shelagh arrived at the Residency shortly
r nine. Gerald came out to welcome her.
ila's gone to a cinema," he said. "She'll be k in about twenty minutes. The chief's ing out. They all asked me to apologize.
ey were arrangements that had been made g before. What about what to eat? Have had dinner?"
"A sandwich on the way."
"Will that be enough?"
"If I could have a cup of cocoa in my om."
"Fine; and I expect that you'd like to see a, wouldn't you, as soon as she gets back."
"Of course—and ——" She hesitated. She d to play this part through logically. "Any re news of Angus?"

e shook his head. "Except that they seem rtain he'll recover."
"Will there be any lasting effects? Will he be ne or anything?"
"Oh, no, I don't think that. He was shot oss the body."
She blushed, remembering suddenly that rald was victim of the same fate: a young hletic man struck down.
"If there's anything that I can do, you ow, don't you, that you've only got to k?" he said. "And may I say you have all my mpathy. I can guess at what you must be eling, the anxiety and the shock."
"That's very kind of you."
There was a lot that she resented about this ception program, but there was nothing she sliked more than having to play a part in nt of Gerald Fyreman. She did not want have him thinking of her as being crazily in ve with Angus. She wanted to be natural, be herself with him. Why on earth couldn't la come out into the open? Was she ashamed of Angus, was it a device to maintain her own independence, or was it a means of keeping him on tenterhooks? Did she enjoy making him unhappy? A mixture of the lot, she supposed.

"We are all very much looking forward to your visit to Kassaya," she said.

"I'm looking forward to it myself," Gerald told her.

No doubt he was. Ten days under the same roof as Barbara. Something should happen in that time.

In the hospital Forrester sat beside young Macartney. Angus had slept through the afternoon. He was rested and ready to be questioned.

"I won't keep you long," said Forrester. "I can guess more or less what happened. You went to your father's desk to see if there were any papers that would explain his odd behavior. He thought you were a burglar and fired. Had you any reason to believe that there were any papers there?"

"He must have papers somewhere. I did not see where else they could be."

"What had you and your father talked about that night at dinner?"

"We didn't dine together," Angus told him. "I got back late. My father had already gone to bed."

"Was he asleep?"

"I listened outside his door. He was breathing heavily."

"So you thought you could break into his desk. But you must have realized that he would discover his desk had been broken into."

"If I had got the kind of paper I was looking for, that wouldn't matter. If I found nothing, he might not suspect me. I hadn't thought it out in detail. The great thing was to see if there were any papers there."

"Had you time to get hold of any?"

"I emptied the drawer."

"Where are those papers now?"

"Most of them are at home. They took off my coat."

"Who's they?"

"The servants. While they were waiting for the doctor, they bandaged me up as best they could."

"What about your trousers? Were there any letters in the pockets?"

"Yes."

"They are probably here, then. Did you lose consciousness?"

"No."

"Would you let me take the letters from your pockets?"

"Of course. I was going to give them to you anyhow."

"I'm very grateful to you. You were very brave. If you'd done that in a war you'd have got a medal."

Next morning Lila and Shelagh drove down to the hospital.

"How do you want this played?" asked Shelagh. "Do we go in together, then I go out and leave you?"

"Of course not. That would look as though he wanted to see me. You know how nurses gossip. I'll leave the two of you together. Then next week I shall have an alibi for going down to see him: I can go on your account, to report back to you."

"I see."

Angus looked tired, but he did not look ill. His black hair and pale dark skin against the pillowcase gave him an air of elegance. His arms lay outside the sheet, the palms of his hands flat against it.

"We've brought some flowers," Lila said.

"That's very kind of you."

They were orchids from the Residency. The nurse brought in a vase and the girls arranged them. Forty hours ago, Angus thought, I was striding up and down that flat, with hell and heaven in my heart. He felt that it had happened in another world. Forty hours ago. He looked at Lila steadily. Now he was conscious only of his body's pain.

She smiled. "Now I suppose I must be tactful and leave you two young things together. Good luck, Angus. Get well quickly." She raised her voice loudly enough for anyone who had been listening outside to hear. In the doorway she waved her hand. "I'll be waiting downstairs, Shelagh."

Angus and Shelagh looked at each other. How long was it since they had driven back together from that cricket match? Seven weeks, eight weeks? Would eight weeks ever again contain so much drama for him? Now he was conscious of nothing but exhaustion and the slow pain that niggled at his wounds, the pain that would suddenly grow acute so that he would press on the bell beside his bed, querulous for the needle that would bring relief.

Shelagh was in the same chair that Forrester had sat in last night. She looked very pretty, far prettier than Lila. She was a nice kid. She hadn't had any fun out of this, being dragged in to cover up for Lila. Well, that was over now.

"You've been very sweet about all this," he said. "It must have been a fearful bore. You don't need to bother with it any more. I'd rather Lila didn't come here again. When I'm well, I'll take a trip somewhere. By the time I'm back, you'll have returned to England. That will let us both out. No need for alibis, though if you ever did feel like looking in when you are in Kuala Prang, of course I should be grateful."

"You don't want to see Lila again? You can't mean that."

"There's no use now."

They sat in silence. There seemed nothing more to say. Shelagh stood up. "Isn't there anything that I can do for you? There must be something."

"There is something, but it's rather difficult."

"I'll do my best."

"I'd like to see Prince Rhya."

"I could fix that, I think. I could do it through the princess."

"I'd be grateful if you would."

"Is there nothing else?"

"There's nothing else."

"There's not much point in my staying on here, is there? Good luck, then. I hope it won't be all too bad."

Lila looked surprised at seeing her so soon. "You didn't stay long."

"There wasn't anything to stay for."

"Hadn't he any messages for me?"

"Only that . . . well, he didn't see any point in your coming in again."

"Then that lets me out, doesn't it?"

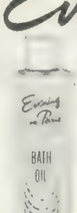
How callous can you get? thought Shelagh. "There's no point either in my staying on then, is there?" she said. "I might as well go back this afternoon."

Lila came up while Shelagh packed, stretching herself out on the other bed, just as she had done on the evening of the dance. And just as she had done that evening, she talked as though she were talking to herself.

"It's strange, but when I saw him lying there, I didn't feel a thing. No pity, nothing. It isn't that I'm heartless. He wasn't the same person. He must have felt it too. I'm glad he did. It would have been such a bore if he hadn't. Now we can both go on to the next thing with a clear conscience. I wonder what the next thing will be, when it will be."

Her voice glowed with anticipation. Shelagh made no comment. She had felt envious of Lila after the dance. She did not feel envious now. She prayed that it would not turn out this way for her, that when she came eventually to love a man it would be for a long, long time. Surely the man she loved that way would not suddenly lose interest in her, in the way that Lila and Angus had lost interest in each other. She felt very lonely. When she had first met Lila, she had believed that she had found a friend at last, but Lila had gone beyond her. She was useful to Lila as an accomplice; that was all. She felt lost. If only this visit of Gerald Fyreman's could work out the way she hoped.

Colonel Forrester drove down that afternoon with a search warrant to the Macartney house. The letters that Angus had stuffed into his trouser pockets had told him practically nothing. They were bills and personal letters for the most part, but, studied in connection with the papers that Angus had put into his jacket pockets, they might have some significance. There were one or two names that had quickened his curiosity. Very likely Macartney would have destroyed those papers, but there was a chance that something might have been overlooked. He kept the search warrant as a last resort. He intended to give his visit the appearance of a friendly call.



He arrived to discover a mingled atmosphere of commotion and unnatural silence. There was no sound of voices, but there were sounds of movement. No one came out to greet him. He walked into the house. He looked round him. He raised his voice: "Hi there, Macartney."

He heard a whispering, then a patter of bare feet. A servant bowed before him. "Master not here, sir. Master dead."

Slip into new beauty as you slip into your bath! Say goodbye forever to dry, flaky skin ... bathtub ring, too!

Evening in Paris
DRY SKIN BATH OIL

Priceless beauty for just pennies a day!
Big, 4 oz. size $2 value for $1

Send 25¢ for a generous introductory-size of new Evening in Paris Dry Skin Bath Oil. See for yourself how this new luxury bath oil enfolds you in a delicious smoothness that lasts from bath to bath.
Bourjois, 711 Fifth Ave., New York, Dept. LO-1

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

"What?"

"Master sleep all day yesterday. Master ask for nothing. This morning master still asleep. No sound master breathing. Me fetch doctor. Doctor say master dead."

"Which doctor?"

"Doctor Blunden."

"Is he here now?"

"No, sir, doctor go arrange funeral. Doctor say master dead yesterday."

"Is master upstairs now?"

"Yes, upstairs now."

Forrester went upstairs. The windows of the rooms were open, but already the odor of corruption was upon the air. He walked over to the bed; the sheet had been pulled down over Macartney's shoulders. His features had resumed the clear texture of middle age. He looked a man of forty, dignified, serene. Whatever he might have done during these last months, the account was closed. He was beyond reach of censure.

Forrester called Doctor Blunden. "Can you spare me five minutes? It's about Macartney."

"Of course."

Blunden was a Karaki, of mixed blood. He had been trained in Edinburgh. He was a short, breezy, punctilious man. "It was the heart," he told Forrester. "I warned his son that he might go at any moment. Those incessant coughing fits."

"What about sleeping pills? When a man dies from an overdose of barbituric, he actually dies of pneumonia, doesn't he?"

"That's so."

"Macartney might have died that way?"

"He might."

"A post-mortem would show if he had, wouldn't it?"

"Do you want to have one?"

Forrester reflected. Would it do any good to know that Macartney had committed suicide? If it came out at the coroner's inquest, suspected persons would be on their guard, and he did not see how he himself would be any the better placed in his search for those suspected persons if he knew the exact truth about Macartney.

"There's not much point if you can conscientiously sign a certificate for heart failure. We don't want to rake up any scandal."

Twenty-four hours later his curiosity was at rest. He had found nothing of interest among the old man's papers. The papers that Angus had put into his jacket pockets had disappeared. He had questioned the houseboy about the jacket. It had been thrown away, along with the shirt. Both had been torn and bloodstained. They could not have been repaired.

"Weren't there any papers in the pocket?"

"Yes, master, I put them on dressing table."

"Where are they now?"

"I don't know, master."

It was all he needed to know.

Next day he presented his report. Studholme listened thoughtfully. There was something here he did not like. He had the suspicion that Forrester was keeping something back. He had had the same feeling with several Britons recently; not only with Francis Reynolds but with Charles Keable. They were not any longer pulling in the same direction. Keable's first duty was to Pearl, an international oil company, rather than to Britain. Francis Reynolds' duty was to heaven knew whom and Forrester, though he had been appointed on the recommendation of Whitehall, was in fact a Karaki civil servant; paid by Karak, owing his first duty to Karak. Studholme could not, in his case, any more than he could in Keable's, make an appeal to patriotism. He had the right to know only what Forrester chose to tell him.

"You work in your way, I work in mine," he said, "but I do rely on you to give me warning about anything that is likely to damage British interests and the safety of British nationals in this country."

"You can rely on me to do that, sir."

"Do you feel that there is any immediate danger?"

"I can only give you the same answer that I have always done. I do not believe that anything will happen during the old king's lifetime. I know that underground plans are being laid for taking over control should an emergency arise, but I do not know who is responsible for those plans or what those plans are. We should not be too worried by the fact that there is an underground. My own opinion is that we should not disturb it. Let sleeping dogs lie."

A typical policeman's answer, Studholme thought. Forrester played with his cards held close against his chest. He enjoyed his little secrets. Studholme felt apprehensive. He wished he had a younger man out here.

As soon as she got back to Kassaya, Shelagh wrote to Annetta:

It is hateful of me to bother you at such a time, but I've made a promise and here is the fulfillment of it. You have heard about Angus Macartney's accident. He is really very ill. I visited him this morning. He will be in hospital for a long time, and it is unlikely that he will ever be completely fit. I asked him if there was anything he needed. He said there was just one thing. Could the crown prince see him? He said it was important. It is a great, great deal to ask at such a time, but he said he had something important to tell His Highness.

Annetta handed the letter to Rhya.

"But I scarcely know him," Rhya said.

"You are an important person to a great many people whom you scarcely know. I don't think Shelagh would ask me unless she thought it was important."

"You'd like me to go?"

"I would."

"O.K. I'll go next week. That should be early enough, shouldn't it?"

"I'd say so."

A week later Angus lay back among his pillows, relaxed, at peace. Every day he was feeling stronger. They had told him that he would need another operation, perhaps a series of operations; that he was now building up his strength so that he could bear the strain of them. But his strength was growing every day.

A nurse came into the room. She looked breathless although she was not out of breath. The crown prince had rung up. He had wanted to know if it would be convenient for him to call in twenty minutes' time.

Angus flushed. He had been sick and in pain when he had given Shelagh that commission. He had needed then the support that a visit from his future sovereign would have given him. He had felt like a wounded warrior on the battlefield; but now that he was partially recovered, he was embarrassed by his own presumption. The throne had its own guardians, Forrester and the rest. He felt proud, at the same time sheepish, when Prince Rhya came into the ward. He used practically the same words that he had used to the colonel all those weeks ago after the notables' meeting.

"You'll think I'm making mountains out of molehills," he began, "but this is how it happened. I don't know what Colonel Forrester has told you, but this is how I've seen it. I think, sir, that you should be told."

He told his story undramatically. Prince Rhya listened in silence. Angus, watching him, had no inkling as to the impression that he was making. Rhya's face was against the light. He would have been surprised could he have seen to the core of Rhya's thought: This man is lying here in pain because of me. He risked his life because of me.

He heard Angus out, then set a few practical questions. "Have you told Colonel Forrester all that you told me?"

"Yes, sir."

"Was he at all surprised?"

"Is Colonel Forrester ever surprised at anything?"

They laughed at that.

"Did Colonel Forrester in the first place suggest that you should try to get hold of your father's papers?"

"No, sir."

"I still can't see quite why you did. M people say to themselves, 'That's none of concern. Policemen are employed to look that and I contribute to their support by ing taxes. My conscience is clear.' That's most of my father's subjects argue. Why you act so differently?"

Angus flushed. He had been afraid of question. Yet it was the answer to this q tion that had made him, when he was in and weak, ask Shelagh to intercede for He had to give a straightforward answer.

"I was at the palace, sir, on the day father asked you to return. He said that would need friends when you returned. hoped that I would be your friend. I rem bered that trust when I began to suspect my father might be plotting against throne."

"That was the main reason why you ope your father's desk?"

"It was the only reason."

Rhya looked at the tired, maimed body the bed. When he had heard of the attack Annetta's life he had been indignant, but saults such as that were a part of the risk by royalty. This was a different matter young man had run this risk, a gratuit risk, solely on his account.

"I shan't forget this," he said. "This very well prove far more important than e Colonel Forrester can guess. I'll come ro again and see you. In the meantime, get as quickly as you can."

That afternoon he sent for Colonel rester. "I have seen Angus Macartney," said. "He told me why he broke into his ther's desk. I should like you to tell me opinion of all this."

Colonel Forrester repeated in large mea what he had said to Studholme. "There is ways an opposition party in every coun sir. When there is a dictatorship or when th is a one-party government, the oppositio driven underground. There is such a p here. They want to seize power and nationa the oil fields. They have to have an excuse their coup d'état. They will make the C munists that excuse. That is the familiar tern. I do not believe that there is anythin fear from the Communist Party. There small party here, but I am even doubtful is in direct communication with Moscow Peking. I believe its orders come at sec hand from Calcutta. I think the atte against your wife, though made by a kin Communist, was instigated by this mili opposition. It was a first step."

"And when do you expect the second?"

Forrester shrugged. "I have no idea, sir," told him. "But I do not believe that anyth will be seriously attempted during y father's lifetime."

"And what steps are being taken to prev it?"

Again Forrester shrugged. "There is n ing that we can do, except wait and watch."

Rhya felt his temper rise. Each country its particular traits that exasperated the tionals of other countries, and Rhya, de though he loved England and the English, invariably infuriated by Whitehall's Mic berish attitude of, "Don't be in a hurry. So thing will turn up; when a crisis arises appropriate action will be taken." In the me time Angus Macartney was lying in a hospi But it was pointless for him to lose his tem

"Are there any men whom you defini suspect?"

"There are one or two, but I seem to h more information about the Communi They are easier to trace. They have for contacts."

"Have you any evidence against them?"

"A certain amount, sir."

"Then why do you not take action aga them?"

"Because I can learn more from them w they are at liberty. They do not know t they are being watched. It is better that t should not know."

"How can you say they do not know? gus' father was apparently in the moveme Angus has been wounded. His father is de Are you certain he didn't commit suicide?

"I am almost certain that he did."

"Was there a post-mortem?"

ere was not."
ıy not? If there had been, you would een quite certain, wouldn't you?"
t if there had, I might have put those conspirators on their guard."
sleeping dogs lie. But suppose they t sleeping and in the meantime young e in hospitals."
re was a pause. I've been asked enough ns, the policeman thought. It's time I a little.
hen we went on police courses," he be- they used to talk, in terms of under- l organizations, of the 'cut-out': the line n the respectable, aboveboard side of anization and the underground disrepu- ide that plants bombs, organizes black- nakes people disappear. A letter arrives, tance, in a foreign embassy. It is one of letters that are contained in a series of pes. It is destined eventually for some- ery obscure whom the writer of the let- London, Paris or Madrid does not know. ddressed officially to a third military ; he transfers it to a civilian who is in ; the civilian hands it over to the 'cut- he civilian does not know the name of rson to whom the cut-out will hand the The man who receives the letter will not who is the civilian from whom the cut- ceived it. Only the cut-out knows who is other side of the fence. Until a police- nows who the cut-out is, or the equiva- the cut-out—I have taken a very ele- ry setup—he cannot destroy a subver- ciety. He can only lop off a few limbs of ntipede. My present trouble is that I t yet found the centipede." He sat back bland expression on his face.

again Rhya's anger mounted. The teeply this time because he could see the for the colonel's action. That was the ning thing about these Whitehall Mi- rs. They always had a case. Their meth- ere fine for those who had a limitless ce, but he hadn't. He was used to driv- ing motorcars, and taking high-banked at's fine," he said. "Don't think I don't ur point, but I am not going to sit here nothing while the organization matures, these little preparatory gestures are and one after another of my friends gets You say that you have definite informa- against certain of these Communists. don't let's sit twiddling our thumbs till volutionaries take action against them. do something. Let's arrest those Com- ts, search their premises. Might not that quickest way of finding that 'cut-out' been talking of?"

might be, but it might also be the way of ; off a land mine."
uld you explain that, please?"
I were to make a raid upon the extreme ng group, I should certainly bring into t a number of people against whom I lefinite information. By searching their ses I should almost certainly find some material, but at the same time I should ly the small fry. The big fry would get One of two things would therefore hap- the big fry would be alarmed and go ground and we should lose sight of them; y would lose their heads and take action they were ready."
ould there be any harm in that? About cond case, I mean?"
think there would. They wouldn't be to take action, but at the same time we dn't be ready to take counteraction. might do something desperate. Certain ns might be hurt, persons whom we are a position to protect. There might be unpleasant consequences if we moved on."
ore unpleasant than if we did nothing t these revolutionaries make their pre- ary gambits, with a house set on fire here, d kidnaped there, perhaps some innocent n shot?"
hink so. Yes, sir."
nce Rhya looked at Forrester thought- He could see the issue set out clearly. ld man had put his cards honestly, face rd on the table. But Forrester was old. as a Briton, too, not a Karaki.

"Colonel Forrester," he said, "you are a Briton. Your Sir Kenneth regards you as one of his right-hand men. But you are—your official position here is that of technical adviser to the Karaki C.I.D. You are paid by Karak. Your first duty is to Karak. You take your orders from Karak, not from Whitehall."

"I realize that, sir."

"You could answer that you take orders from my father, not from me. If you choose, you could force me to refer this whole matter to my father. Are you going to force me to do that?"

There was a pause. Forrester was a man trained to work under orders. He could warn, he could advise, but he was not in a position to initiate a campaign. It was, however, his duty to give a warning.

"The attacker always runs a risk," he said. "He falls into traps that have been laid for him. He also provides the occasion for a counterattack that he may not be able to beat off. If we attack now, we shall be goading the opposition to retaliate. At the moment our investigations are making progress. We are not being idle. If we wait a little longer, we should have a complete defense prepared to meet the eventual attack. I am sure we would be wise to wait a little longer. If we act now, there may be reprisals that we shall all regret."

"I see your point of view," Rhya said. "There are always two courses of action. One has to take the course which suits one's individual temperament. I shall go off my head if I sit here inactive while my enemies are laying traps. Let us have action, colonel."

"Very well, sir. Action it shall be."

It would not be his fault if that action proved disastrous. He had been given his orders. It was for him to ensure that the consequences were as mild as possible. His first act on his return was to order Ahmed Abrusak brought to him as soon as was possible.

(To Be Concluded)

NEW! Recipe for Prune All-Bran Muffins now on packages of Kellogg's All-Bran

Happy mealtimes start with Prunes

You can do so many happy things with prunes. They're brimful of energy for breakfast, make magnificent muffins and colorful compotes. And they taste as good as they look. Plump, tender, tree-ripened California Prunes are chock-full of natural fruit sugar, vitamins and minerals...all the things that make you feel happy and healthy. Treat your family to prunes often. Your grocer has them in bags, cartons, ready-cooked in jars or cans...and as appetizing prune juice.

SEND FOR YOUR SUNSHINE JAR

Prepare a good supply of tempting, tender California Prunes this new, easy Sunshine Jar way, without cooking. Get your colorful, unbreakable Marlex jar, $2.50 value, for only $1.25 and label from any brand of prunes. Send check or money order to Sunshine Jar, Box 49, San Francisco, Calif. Offer good only in U. S. A.

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

J-2

Get that happy feeling with Prunes—the California Wonder-Fruit

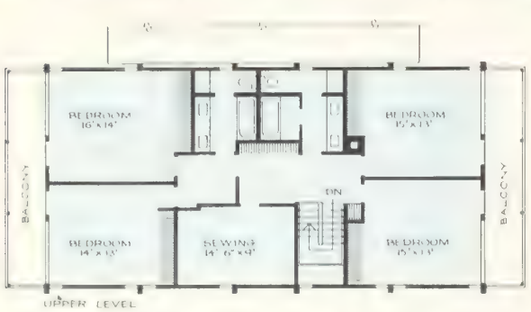
CALIFORNIA PRUNE ADVISORY BOARD

COMFORT AND CHARM IN AN AMERICAN MODERN CHALET

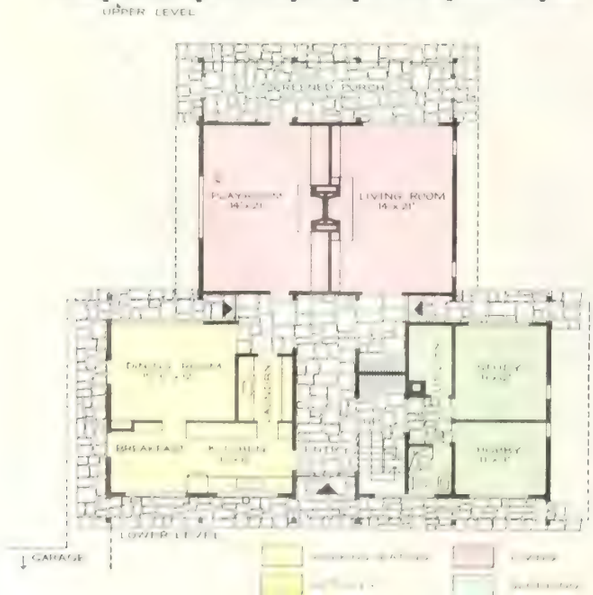
BY JOHN BRENNEMAN
ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR

This large house, designed for a big family with special needs, is a freely composed cluster of planned areas in which a lot of living can go on all at once.

There are a working-and-eating unit, an activity unit, and a living unit. Above them is a simply planned sleeping unit with big rooms. With these and the downstairs study to accommodate guests, this house will hold a lot of people, giving each of them the privacy he really needs along with a roominess seldom seen today.



Underneath this spaciousness is a remarkable practicality. The house is a modular structure, surprisingly inexpensive, simple, and easily built. It can be erected in stages, with the living room occupying the study/hobby space until the extra wing is added.



This is a homey-looking house with an air of generous, adequate shelter and a delightful, slightly Swiss feeling of structural honesty to it—a most practical and exciting combination.

Plans available.

This house is at home with snow: bolted structure shows clearly here at dining end of house.

ARCHITECT:	VICTOR F. CHRIST-JANER
PHOTOGRAPHER:	ROBERT STAHMAN
AREA:	3570 SQUARE FEET
COST:	$32,000 TO $39,000

Comfortable style is modern, fits in anywhere. Garage is at left.

There are two kinds of catsup: Snider's...and all the others!

Snider's is different because we simmer-in a whisper of Capsicum, the high-spirited chili pepper. It puts the zing in Snider's, gives food a bright new lift. You already know what the others taste like. Now, try Snider's.

Snider's

the chili pepper catsup

THE FLUFF

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

That was silly reasoning, she told herself. No one could get used to being sued for eight hundred thousand dollars.

Hadn't the success been guaranteed, in fact, even before she got to New York? Hadn't her uncle persuaded Sam van Allen, one of the partners of Broadcast Packages, to give her a job, any job, that first summer after she got out of college?

Which was all that was needed, really. A foot in the door. Once in, she knew she couldn't fail.

And she hadn't. Look at this white apartment, even though it was only half done.

Four years. In only four years she had come from being the most obscure reader to the most important writer in Broadcast Packages. And smoothly; if with hard work. And not much fun. There wasn't time for that—or opportunity, living in the Girls Hotel.

But it was all right. She did what she meant to do, and frivolity could wait. Sometimes, in the first year, instead of going back to the Girls Hotel she had sat in the office till midnight, reading, reading.

Broadcast Packages was just what it said it was: a firm that manufactured television shows—found a script, a director, actors—and then sold the package to an agency or a sponsor or a network, whoever would buy. There are plenty of good actors and good directors in New York, but oh, where are the scripts? The offices of Broadcast Packages spent most of their time looking for scripts.

Sara looked. All the junk that came in unsolicited was hers, the piles, the stacks, the mountains of it. She read, every week, more bad writing than most people do in a lifetime. She wrote rejection notices by the hundreds—the thousands—polite ones, but firm. In that first year, however, Sara found four scripts that were not junk. They were turned into properties, they were packaged, they sold. Sara was a genius.

It takes, of course, only a single step for a genius to become a writer. Sara took the step.

"Darling," Eleanor said. "We saw your name last night right in our living room. We were appalled. You're famous!"

Sam van Allen himself had suggested she attempt to dramatize a novel he controlled. He would take any chance, harassed as he was, to find a captive writer.

One script didn't make a career. Sara stayed on at her job, and at the Girls Hotel, and wrote at night. But if you are going to become famous in television, you do it fast, and by the time she had had her name on six shows—this took a couple of years—she was indeed a Name in the private world in which she lived.

It was then, or about then, that Eleanor said, "Darling, you've got to stop staying in that hotel. You're rich. You need an apartment. You can't just write all your life. That would be silly."

Sam van Allen agreed that she should stop reading the junk and sending out rejection slips, that the time had come for her to Concentrate on her Career, so she said to Eleanor, "All right. But it will have to be an apartment I can afford."

Now it is a well-known fact that there are no apartments in New York that anybody in his right mind can afford. So it was months before Sara took a deep breath and the plunge.

A duplex suddenly turned up—a two-room duplex, to be sure, but one that was full of light and opened onto a walled garden.

Eleanor was enchanted when she saw it. "Two floors," she said. "Divine." She ran upstairs, looked, and gave a little cry. "Sara, there are six telephones in this bedroom."

"I know," Sara said.

"But how could anyone possibly use six telephones in a bedroom?"

Then she came down and took a knowing look around. "It needs a lot of work," she said.

"It does that," Sara said.

So began the business with Ace.

"Listen," Eleanor said later, "I know the most wonderful carpenter. He's about half as expensive as anyone else."

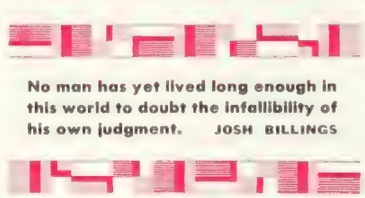
"Who?" Sara said.

"He's not actually a carpenter in real life," Eleanor said. "He's an actor. But that doesn't matter. He dresses like a carpenter . . . or maybe he dresses like an actor. It's hard to tell these days. But he's wonderful."

Sara shook her head. "I don't think so," she said.

"Don't be silly," Eleanor said. "He's terribly handsome. If I weren't married to Jack I'd have the whole house done over. Shelves everywhere."

Sara said, "Actors are all right in their place, but their place is not the home."



So. She called up a regular carpenter and he came around and gave her an estimate on bookcases of five hundred and eighty dollars.

So she called Ace and he came around, not looking much like a carpenter but certainly handsome, and said he'd put them up for a hundred and a quarter.

"You have a job, my friend," Sara said.

It is not to be supposed that Sara was unacquainted with men. In her life in television, she had come against many who were handsome, or dynamic, or ambitious, or amorous or talented, and indeed some who possessed a combination of these qualities. She had even had a couple of flutters, but they had done nothing more than serve their pleasant purpose, and been forgotten.

But she had never had a casual relationship around the house with a man who was so obviously attractive and competent. If there was danger in this she did not foresee, she is not to be blamed, for Sara had never had a house of her own before. Her parents were dead; indeed, since she was eighteen, she had known nothing but the narrow single rooms of college and the Girls Hotel.

An apartment of her own. This was a profoundly exciting experience for Sara. And everything, of course, had to be perfect.

"Get the upstairs done first," Ace said, "the bedroom and bath. The kitchen's usable. Then you can move in."

He was sensible. He could carpenter, he could paint, he could lay vinyl tile upon the floor. He could sprackle, and if pressed, he could renovate wiring. "Just call me the Universal Man," he told her.

"I act too," he said

"So I hear," Sara said. "I can't think why. When you're so charming as a little old simple Universal Man."

"My Id demands it. You know. Billy the Id. Compulsive."

"Dear heaven," Sara said. "A comedian."

"All right," Ace said. "What color's the bedroom going to be?"

"White, I think," Sara said. "Everything. Rug, bed, walls, curtains. All different shades of white."

Ace nodded. "I thought that's how you saw yourself."

Sara narrowed her eyes. "For such remarks," she said, "you will be docked fifty cents."

Ace looked surprised. "Only fifty cents?" he said. "I was sure I was better than that."

She couldn't stay away. She was writing a new hour show, she had a deadline, she should have spent every day in her office at Broadcast Packages, but she could not.

"You're quite a nuisance," Ace said.

"I have found," Sara said, "that people who delegate authority never get anything done."

Ace painted for a moment. "You must inform the Joint Chiefs of Staff," he said.

"Somebody should," Sara said. "Are you sure that's white enough?"

"Go away," Ace said. "Write something."

"No," Sara said. "It's too hard. I like to watch other people work."

"Go on. Write a good big fat part for uncle."

Sara stared at him. "You?"

"Why not?"

Sara said, "Well, as a matter of fact —— How tall are you?"

"Six even."

"What color is your hair?"

"Come off it."

Sara walked over to the window and looked out at her bleak garden. "Actually," she said, "there is a part—it's a man who is irascible, insulting, bad-tempered, ill-mannered. . . . But I don't know. I'm always afraid of type casting."

About ten days later, Sara had to go out of the apartment for a couple of hours to get her hair fixed, and rather naïvely she left her unfinished manuscript—half typewritten, half in her own illegible hand—sitting on the kitchen stove. When she got back Ace was sprawled on the living-room floor, reading it.

"You put that down," she said, and meant it.

Ace looked up at her and smiled. "It's very good," he said.

"Give me that."

"I'm not kidding," he said. "It's a wonderful script."

It took maybe four seconds, but then Sara the human being dissolved, and Sara the writer took over.

"You really think so?" she said.

Some time after that, Sara delivered the script to her boss, Sam van Allen, and while he sat fingering it, she said to him, "Listen, Pushface dear, you know I never make any trouble about casting, but ——"

Sam van Allen raised his eyebrows.

"But I've found the absolutely perfect actor to play Ted."

"Where?" Sam van Allen said.

"That doesn't matter."

Sam said, "Send him around. I'll take a look."

"No," Sara said, "that isn't good enough. I want him to play Ted."

"Sara dear," Sam said, "do you think it's entirely wise for a nice girl like you to go around meeting actors socially?"

"Shut up," Sara said.

"I must say," Eleanor said, "you seem to be seeing an awful lot of him."

"He's very competent."

"Competent. Of course. But that's hardly the point. It's not as if he were really a carpenter. You're so inexperienced in things like this, I feel I've got to give you a little advice. I ——"

"Oh, shut up," Sara said.

They sat on the floor of the empty living room, Sara and Ace, an orange crate between them, the remains of a delicatessen dinner spread around them. In his hand Ace held the manuscript.

"It's great," he said. "Solid. Solid. All but that one speech."

"Don't keep saying that. There's nothing the matter with the speech."

Ace shook his head, frowning.

"You should be thankful for it," Sara said. "It's the payoff. You have a whole half page of talk. Nobody says a word except you."

"I know," Ace said. "I know. But the way Ted is feeling at that moment . . . I don't think he'd be so articulate."

"He has to be," Sara said. "There's information in that speech that has to be got out."

Ace shook his head again. "All right," he said. "But I just don't feel comfortable ——"

Sara said, "Ha. Let me warn you. Sam van Allen doesn't hire actors to feel comfortable. He hires them to act."

Ace put a hand on his head. "Don't beat me," he said.

"Just learn your verses and get on with it," Sara said. "The director will take care of everything else."

"O.K.," Ace said. "I'll do my best."

Sara stretched a hand to him, across t orange crate. "Baby," she said, "I went out a limb for this. Do me proud."

Ace took the hand and smiled. "You'r good girl," he said. "I will. I will."

He meant to. There was never any questi of a shadow of a doubt about that.

And it looked as if he would. Ace was co petent and right for the part. The director satisfied—more than that, delighted—w everything Ace did, except for that one spee

That one speech would not come right. T rehearsed and rehearsed, they rewrote and wrote, but as Sara had said, there was mation in it that simply had to be given to audience, so a large part of it had to rem

Finally one day in desperation the dire looked around the set and on a desk that in the scene he spotted a large ivory le opener—an old-fashioned one, with an tricately carved dragon for a handle. "He he said, giving it to Ace, "try this. Hit palm of your hand with it, hit your leg wit make gestures with it. See if that helps."

Ace was skeptical, but he tried. He hac choice, something had to be done and Awkwardly he wiggled the letter opener walked up and down with it, tentatively smacked his hand.

And then, miraculously, it began to hap It was feeble at first, but in a minute the w began to take on meaning. Ace sliced th with the letter opener, he tried this, he that; and gradually the stick seemed to come for him an instrument that allowed to say what he had to say. He tried onc tried twice, he tried ten times. And the had the speech, and he had it perfectly.

The director shrugged. "I am a genius, said.

"You see," Sara said that night over orange crate, "it was nothing."

"Wait a minute," Ace said. "It wasn easy as all that."

Who could have foretold that the pro was not solved? Everyone agreed it was.

But on the night of the actual telecast Monday night . . .

Everything went perfectly for the first f five minutes. Ace was making a reputatio himself. He was easy, strong, interesting. he came, with great confidence, to that sp

Well, live television is a gamble.

He walked to the desk, put out his l and froze. The letter opener was not the

He froze. Every line of the speech le head.

He turned from the camera, grabbe hair with a hand. He had, he had to say s thing. "H'm," he said, "how can I be artic at a time like this?"

He went on saying words, hoping tha of them would jolt the pattern of the s back into him, knowing he had to get t formation out.

It was a horrible couple of minutes.

But he did, somehow, say the things h to say. They were in the wrong order, ar very smooth, but they were there. miraculously, the last five lines of the s came to him and he was able to turn b the camera, say them, and make his exi

Nobody at home, watching, knew tha thing was wrong, of course. It was di only to the people connected with the Ace got to the side of the sound sweat standing on his forehead. The found Sara, who stared glassily at him.

"Really," she said.

It was not the word Ace needed a moment.

"If the speech had been written righ said, "this never would have happened. you that—a hundred times."

Sara turned and walked away from h

It was the Thursday morning afte Monday night when Eleanor called. didn't, as she said, get there in ten m

CONTINUED ON PAGE 130

Does anything else you use so often give you such trouble-free service?

We build a long life into your telephone because it's no good unless it works all the time.

If something does go wrong, we fix it as fast as we can, at no charge to you.

Day in and day out, your telephone is a constant and faithful companion, giving you low-cost service that's useful, and pleasant, and necessary.

Service so good you can take it for granted.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

WHEN IT'S COLD OUTSIDE GIVE 'EM WARM "INSIDES" WITH

NEW NESTLÉ'S
EVERREADY COCOA

THE INSTANT HOT CHOCOLATY DRINK
YOUR YOUNGSTERS LOVE!
WITH NUTRIENTS
THEY NEED FOR ALL-DAY
ENERGY

NOW WITH VITAMINS

VITAMIN C FOR STRONG BONES
VITAMIN B1 FOR HEALTHY NERVES
VITAMIN D3 FOR SOUND TEETH
IRON FOR HEALTHY BLOOD

NESTLÉ'S MAKES THE
VERY BEST CHOCOLATE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 128

she made it in twenty. That was good for Eleanor.

There were two chairs in the living room now, and Sara and Eleanor sat upon them. But before there was time to sit down even, Eleanor said, "You must have it wrong, darling. Eight hundred thousand. A million, yes, or five hundred thousand, but eight isn't the sort of figure anyone would think of."

"It's eight," Sara said, and they sat down. "Eight's gotten to be a very common amount these days. Almost fashionable."

Eleanor shrugged. "All right. But who, and why? Tell me."

"A woman called Clara Stone. She says I stole the Monday-night show from her."

"But you didn't do that."

"Of course not. At least I don't think so."

"She must be mad."

"She's not. And she has a good lawyer."

"But ——"

Sara leaned back in her chair and rubbed her cheek. "Here's the thing. . . . Clara Stone has a manuscript—I've looked through it, and it's frighteningly close to mine—and she has a letter, signed by me, written about a year ago when I was still reading all the stuff that came into the office, saying thanks for letting us see this, but we don't want it. And it is signed by me. It's my signature."

"But how peculiar."

"Yes. Everybody thinks so. She's not suing just me, of course. The network, the sponsor and a whole chorus of John Does. They all think it's very peculiar."

"I understand why you were crying," Eleanor said. "This is incredible. . . . You couldn't possibly ——"

"Have stolen a whole show? I wouldn't have done it intentionally. If nothing else, that would be just too dangerous. I've beaten my brains trying to remember. But I've read hundreds, literally hundreds of manuscripts. Oh, dear ——"

"Yes," Eleanor said. "Oh, dear." Then she went on: "You don't think that by some hideous psychological quirk Clara Stone's play could have got lodged in your subconscious?"

"If it did," Sara said, "I've got a superio subconscious." She picked up a gray-covere script from the floor. "This is it. 'A televisio play by Clara Stone.' Her lawyer gave it t our lawyers. And I must say there are whol scenes in it that are too too similar to mine. don't understand ——"

Eleanor took the script and began to lea through it. "Eight hundred thousand dollars, she said. "Really ——"

But then from the doorway someone said "Hi!" and they turned and there was Ace.

"I have an announcement to make," h said. "I have given up acting for good. I an going to become a full-time carpenter."

"How splendid!" Eleanor said, but Sar got up and walked over to the window.

"Didn't you hear me?" Ace said. "I an making an apology."

"Don't bother her," Eleanor said. "She' upset."

"But I mean it. I apologize."

Eleanor said, "I don't see how that will d any good."

Ace said to Sara's back, "Look. You can' still be sore. Nobody noticed. I got wonderfu reviews. Didn't you see them?"

Sara turned. "Forget it," she said, and the to Eleanor: "You tell him."

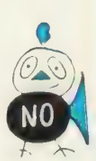
"Ace," Eleanor said, and she told him. Sh garbled the facts a little, and she managed t imply that Sara was guilty of bald and de liberate theft, but she told him everything h needed to know.

When she had finished, Ace said, "You'r kidding."

"No I'm not," Eleanor said, "here," an she handed him Clara Stone's gray-covere manuscript. He took it, bewildered.

Then Eleanor said to Sara, "Come on You're coming out to lunch with me. I'll be you haven't eaten properly in who know when."

Sara rubbed her eyes. "Not since break fast," she said.



After lunch Sara got rid of Eleanor an went back to the apartment. She was shaking she was afraid to see Ace alone, but sh couldn't help herself.

By MUNRO LEAF

Nobody likes to play with an Own-Way Wanter. It never thinks about anybody else's wants or feelings at all. If it can't have everything its own way, it is so stubborn and unpleasant it ought to be left all alone. That is what is happening to this Own-Way Wanter. Its playmate has just gone home in tears and won't be a friend any more. Too bad!

WERE YOU AN OWN-WAY WANTER THIS MONTH?

When she went in, drawn and white, Ace e over and put his arms around her. She xed and let her head fall on his shoulder.
s was what she had come for.
"Stupid," he said, "why didn't you call me?"
"I was afraid."
"But why?"
"Oh, because of what I said."
"That wasn't anything. That was the artist you talking. The ugly side. Not the real
."
ara leaned closer. "Oh, Ace ——"
"Listen," Ace said. "I'm not a very good penter, and I'm a bum actor, but as Gala-l, I'm number-one boy."
"You are," Sara said.
"You don't understand. I'm talking about script. I have come to your rescue."
"What?"
"I've figured out the trick, I think."
"Now you're kidding."
"No." He laid his cheek on the top of her
d. "Plenty of time for this later. Right now
've got to call Sam van Allen. They made a o of the show, didn't they? Or a tape?"
"They always do."
"Get him to set up a showing. Immediately.
an hour."
"I will, but ——"
"Trust papa."

In the screening room sat Sara, Ace, Sam n Allen, two of the network lawyers and a retary. Ace was at a table with a light, Clara ne's script was open before him.
"Skip the first part," Ace said to the man in booth. "I just want the last twenty minutes."
"Why all this mystery?" Sam van Allen
d.

"I've got to be sure of myself," Ace said.

The lights went out and abruptly the last part of the show was in action on the screen. Everyone sat tense, silent, until suddenly, about fifteen seconds before his payoff scene, Ace said to the secretary, "Take this down."

She began, and for the next three minutes, all through Ace's agonizing ordeal, her pencil flew. After he had made his exit on the screen, Ace turned to the man in the booth and wiggled his hand. The film stopped and the lights came on.

Only Van Allen spoke. "I'm not sure, but I think I understand. Is it true?"

Ace nodded, with a fat-cat smile. "It's true," he said.

One of the lawyers said, "I'm sorry, but I'm going to need a little more explanation."

"O.K.," Ace said. "Here you are. I was given Clara Stone's script to read. Well, I'm an actor. I naturally read my own part first. And I must say Miss Stone's script was awfully close to Sara's. Except in one place."

"My word!" Sara said, light dawning.

"Except in my last big scene," Ace said, "then it was close to me, to my fluff. To what I made up and said that instant on the screen. In fact, she actually uses my first desperate line—'How can I be articulate at a time like this?' Now we have a hundred witnesses, all the people who were on that sound stage, who knew that I made up that speech ——"

"Ace, Ace, Ace ——" Sara said.

Van Allen turned to the lawyers. "It's the most beautiful scheme," he said. "This woman, Clara Stone, did have a perfectly legitimate rejection slip from us. But for something else she had written. Then what she did was take down Monday night's show and change it—oh, just change it enough to make things plausible—it's a wonderful scheme, and it would have worked if we hadn't had this bum actor —— Poor woman, how could she know Ace was going to louse everything up?"

Van Allen walked over to Ace and put an arm around his shoulder.

"Bum actor," he said, "as of this moment you are under exclusive contract to me. I'm going to have Sara write a show just for you. Right, Sara?"

"Right," Sara said.

Then Sam van Allen frowned and looked from Ace to Sara. "You two have met, haven't you?" he said.

"We've met," Ace said.

Some time later—oh, quite a long time later, because the apartment was by then fixed and furnished—Eleanor called Sara up and said, "Listen. You remember I told you Jack's mother needed some shelves in her bathroom? Well, she's never gotten them up and I wondered if Ace ——"

"No," Sara said.

"That's rather unfriendly."

"He isn't going to do any carpenter work any more. Except here around the house. Just for us."

"But why?"

"He hasn't time. I'm writing him a show, you know, and he has to spend every minute getting comfortable in the lines."

"I should think that's the last thing you'd want."

"It is. But . . . oh well, you know. You're married."

Eleanor sighed. "I know."

THE BEAUTY OF THE WORLD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 84

women will, "You were pretty engrossed that blonde."

So rich is masculine nature that the love of ne woman often leads to a heightened appreciation of the sex as a whole; but of course is not such a mug as to say so.

"Not really," he smiles.

"You were talking to her most of the evening."

"One has to be polite."

"Polite! I saw you. What was so special bout her?"

"Well, it was a curious thing"—more flashing smiles—"but she reminded me of you."

"Then why not talk to me, and be reminded ill more?"

"Oh, you dear little funny."

She allows herself to be embraced, but she as tucked the matter away in her mind for iture reference.

Nor is her opportunity long in coming. oon after that, eying her in a tender farway manner, he murmurs, "You'd look wonerful in black lace."

"Black lace, eh?" she flares up. "I see."

"Oh, darling, what is it now?"

"That blonde of yours was wearing black ace."

"Really, really, women's minds! How they lo skip about!"

"May we just get this straight," she pleads vith horrible calm; "is she supposed to remind ou of me, or am I supposed to remind you f her? Only a trollop would wear black lace!" he suddenly bawls.

"Oh, haven't I suffered enough?" and he ears out of the house and buys her a flask of Dior. If she has told him once that she uses Guerlain, she has told him fifty times.

This wild to-and-fro of feminine thought is a grievous burden to the male. He offers the concept of pure beauty manifest in black lace and she goes rambling on about a blonde. And she has a trick more irritating still: she will drag that blonde in, somehow, apropos of nothing at all. He will begin tentatively, "Darling, how would it be if we ——" and she at once, fixing him with a beady eye, breaks in with, "Now, Thomas" (or Michael, Derek, Wilbur), "we will do no such thing. I've stood quite enough, thank you." All he was going to suggest was that they run over to the country club for a drink. Now it is perfectly true, and he is the last man ever to deny the truth, that the blonde goes to the country club six evenings a week. But who said anything about the country club? What makes her so sure she can read his mind? He might have been going to say, "Darling, how would it be if we stayed in tonight and tied up the roses?" Very soon he believes that he was going to say precisely that. Ah, but she knows better, of course, with all the assurance of a featherweight brain behind her.

"I was going to suggest we stay in tonight and tie up the roses," he tells her frigidly and, rising, stalks into the garden, with the reflection that against stupidity even the gods will struggle in vain.

He is entirely and absolutely right, of course. But will the wretched little woman see it?

In attempting to justify, and to illumine by examples, the claim "in action how like an angel!" we must own to a certain unwonted hesitation. This is due to no unworthy skepticism on our part, but rather to our lack of experience of angels and their modes of behavior. Exactly what, we are tempted to ask, was in the Lord Hamlet's mind? What information had he that is not available to the rest of us? He could not, could he, have been talking for the pleasure of hearing his voice? Words, words, words, and all that?

We only ask because the isolated acts of individual angels of which we have heard tell do not remind us especially of men. Those winged creatures with golden hair, for instance, that appear beside beds of pain to soothe and cheer and watch over the hours of darkness have no counterpart in our male acquaintance. The very expression "ministering angel" lacks virility. The men we know are far too sensitive and delicately put together to endure the sight of illness in anyone, while in the beloved herself it fills them with indignation. "I can't bear to see you like this," they grumble; "you should always glow, glow ——" and if she knows which side her bread is buttered she'll struggle up and start glowing, glowing, as if the fiend were after her.

But when we come to "in form and moving how express and admirable," we are back on solid ground. Reader, have you ever watched a kingfisher speed along a riverbank, or seen the play of summer lightning in the hills? Both have much to learn from the Beauty of the World as he distances himself from something disagreeable or inconvenient. Is poor old Aunt Matilda coming for a long weekend? Out with the seven-league boots; he has remembered a promise to go sailing with Joe. He hates missing Aunt Matilda, who keeps up so wonderfully for her age, but a promise is a promise, after all. It is just one of those things. Do give the old lady his love and say he was thinking of her; and, pressing a tin of toffee into the beloved's hand, he murmurs that it's funny, he never feels so close to her as when he is away.

So much, then, for Hamlet's list. The longer we reflect on it, the more astonished we are at the number of things he left out. No mention whatever is made, for example, of the quality in man that springs to mind almost before any other; namely, his exquisite tact. To watch him deal unruffled with a situation that would make a woman's blood run cold is to know real greatness. We venture to illustrate this by an experience of our own when a gentleman in whom we had been romantically interested called to introduce his bride—just the sort of cozy idea a man is likely to have. For some reason the bride was not entirely at her ease, and after twenty minutes' careful analysis of the weather there seemed nothing for it but to inquire if anyone had read any good books lately. Before we could do so, however, the husband blithely exclaimed, "What marvelous coffee! Sylvia, why can't we have it like this at home?" Just a few kind words, no more; but the ice was broken at last and thereafter the female parties smiled at each other across the cups, relaxed and friendly as a pair of cobras.

We might prolong this indefinitely, but we shall spare our reader and ourselves. There is something depressing in the contemplation of excellences to which we can never aspire. As Nietzsche sagely remarked, "The woman senses the power of the man but is unable to understand it," and we have been dealing with matters beyond our little compass. One minor claim we make, and that is to be free of the envy, the rancor that a conscious inferiority so often engenders. Our admiration is complete, unforced, ungrudging: we glory in man, divine attributes and all; and our dearest wish, our fondest hope, is that the creature may continue exactly as he is forever. END

Now...a special laxative for women!

Gives gentle relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative

Mrs. Charlotte Hatch
Portland, Ore.

"After depending on a prescription laxative for some time," writes Mrs. Hatch, "I am now using Correctol. I find that Correctol is much milder and easier to take, and the relief it gives me is wonderful."

Correctol® has been specially developed for a woman's delicate system. It is completely different from harsh, all-purpose laxatives.

Its secret is a non-laxative miracle regulator that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give regularity a start.

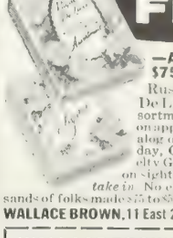
Working together, these two gentle ingredients make Correctol bring relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can. Even in pregnancy and following childbirth. In menstrual periods—and after middle age, too!

Do try Correctol soon. 30 tiny pink tablets, $1.00 —at any drug counter.



Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MOMMY!...MOMMY!..
MOMMY!

To mothers, that cry means that there's another cut, scratch, scrape, or burn. It also means she should get iodine—but she often doesn't, because iodine burns and stings, upsets youngsters. Here's good news. Science has discovered a new kind of iodine that stops infection best yet doesn't burn or sting. It's polyvinylpyrrolidone-iodine, found only in new ISODINE® ANTISEPTIC. Where other types of antiseptics may kill only 1, 2, or 3 types of germs, ISODINE kills all types —even virus and fungus. And up to 40 times faster. Get painless ISODINE ANTISEPTIC. Money-back guarantee.

© 1958 Isodine Pharmacal Corp., Dover, Del.

I'll Send You
These 2 Assortments of
GREETING CARDS
ON APPROVAL AND BIG CATALOG
FULL OF MONEY-MAKERS
FREE

—And Show You How to Make $75 to $500 in Your Spare Time

Rush coupon for sensational Royal DeLuxe and Floral Elegance Assortments of Everyday Greeting Cards on approval . . . and FREE full color Catalog of lots more items, masses Birthday, Get-Well Ass'ts, Stationery, Novelty Gifts, etc. Friends, neighbors order on sight. Keep up to 40% commission you take in. No experience needed. Last year thousands of folks made $75 to $500 this easy way. Send coupon now!

WALLACE BROWN, 11 East 26th St., Dept. A-9, New York 10, N.Y.

WALLACE BROWN, Inc., Dept. A-9
11 East 26th St., New York 10, N.Y.
Rush on approval the Royal DeLuxe and Floral Elegance Greeting Card Ass'ts. plus FREE Catalog.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____

TEEN-AGE REPORT TO THE NATION

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

caddies at country clubs, and in some areas doing farm work. At seventeen, boys can drive delivery trucks. Younger kids shovel snow, garden or have paper routes. Girls can always baby-sit, sometimes work at supermarkets and at camps or playgrounds, or clerk in the five-and-ten. Many teen-agers have regular Saturday jobs, and almost all work during vacations. Girls buy their own clothes with the money; boys spend it on cars and dates; some is saved for college.

No matter what a teen-ager's family income, many of us feel that taking money from parents without working for it is selfish and irresponsible. There's something very satisfying about spending money you have worked to earn, instead of spending someone else's. Of course we can't be completely self-supporting, but we can help out a lot.

YOU'VE GOT TO GET INTO THE SWING OF THINGS

We still love to dance, but not the frantic jitterbug of the '40's. Strolls and Sleepwalks have replaced it in some towns, and even rock 'n' roll is being danced to a slower beat.

This may come as a surprise to you, but not every teen-ager loves to jitterbug. We do a kind of slow step that is almost like walking, or fox trots and even waltzes. In San Francisco Latin-American dances—cha-cha-cha, rumba, samba—are hits, and a slow-beat rock 'n' roll.

THE NEW MARCH OF DIMES
NF
THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION

Sleepwalks and Strolls are coming in. In Beaumont, Texas, they like to dance faster than a slow bop but slower than a jitterbug. And in Minneapolis, calypso and a combination cha-cha-cha-calypso has taken hold. There are lots of variations, but the general trend is toward a less-frenzied beat—a smoother step. Dancing at home has always been popular if there's room.

A lot of boys build their own stereo sets, which they can put together for thirty-five or forty dollars. And it's quite the thing for a boy to build one for his girl and give it to her as a special present.

Eating is a popular American pastime, and it's something we all know how to do. Your imagination can really let loose!

Driving to an eating place after a date (or even as a date) is standard. Pizza places with jukeboxes are still popular, although the rage for pizza is beginning to cool. Hamburgers, with French fries and catchup, generally rank in first place—and malted milks too. In California, it's taco stands. A taco is like a tortilla, a crisp corn pancake filled with grated lettuce, grated cheese, a lot of ground meat and a little gravy—all highly spiced—then folded over. In Pennsylvania, hoagies are a kind of submarine, or hero, sandwich. They are generally filled with meat, cheese, lettuce, tomatoes, and lots of oil on the bread (which is a hard loaf). Usually they cost thirty-five cents, sometimes forty-five, but you can buy a giant size for seventy-five. Sundaes are good, too, but you can get more for your money with a hoagie.

On the West Coast and in Minneapolis, coffeehouses are big, where you can go and talk for hours without the waiter coming over and asking you to leave. In Port Huron, Michigan, pizza parties at home, where the girls whip up pizzas from mixes, are another way of eating and having fun on an inexpensive date. Usually you have several couples over, and end up by driving out later on for a malt to wash it all down.

There are certain things we like which seem to have caught on just about everywhere.

It's like the Paris fashions when they hit New York, and everybody went around wearing sacks or the Empire look. Of course we're not that extreme. Pale lips might look O.K. on Brigitte Bardot, but most of us avoid that like the plague. Some schools have put the taboo sign on white lipstick. The casual look is fine, but it has to be carefully thought out.

Long hair and sideburns are associated with hoods, and for the most part we don't like them much. Oh, some of the younger kids—say, fourteen or so—try to be a little rock. A rock wears a flat-top haircut, and can be quite properly dressed. He may even be a big wheel at school—class president, or football captain. But he tries to seem a little tough. Then, when he's sure he has it made and thinks everyone knows he's very masculine, he can go very Ivy League—around sixteen, generally. But most boys wear their hair short, nowadays, in a college or crew cut. The ducktails and unkempt look are passé. Very popular is the "Ivy League Cut," closely clipped at the sides and back, longer than a crew on top, and brushed to the sides or back. And not slicked down with a lot of grease!

Trench coats are almost standard, for girls as well as boys. Some of the girls wear theirs with a little fur (usually raccoon) in the colla and some have plaid linings which zip in f cold weather.

The button-down Ivy League shirt in da patterns is a real favorite with most boys, f school wear and dressier dates. Chinos a worn to school, in olive green, black or khak Tight jeans are a lost cause. Continental trou sers are new this year, at least in Westpor with a narrower and slightly tapered leg, r cuff, and worn without a belt. And corduro trousers are also big—small-ribbed, Contine tal or Ivy League style.

Gone are the days of white bucks (except Cleveland) and saddle shoes for girls. Loafe

SCHOOLS, COLLEGES AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Girls' Schools

Oak Grove A Friends' School for Girls. Fundamental Preparation for College and Gracious Living. Music, Art, Speech Studies. 12 Broadcasting studios. Interracial enrollment. Riding included. Indoor ring. Winter Sports Location) Mount Laguna. Beautiful 'Mountain Quadrangle.'
Mr. and Mrs. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Hewlett School On Long Island Girls' boarding 10-18 Est. 1915. Accredited by N.Y. Bd. Regents. College prep & general courses. Music, Art. Small friendly classes. Field trips. Full sports program. Riding. Secretarial. 50th N.Y.C.
Jeanette J. Sullivan, Headmistress, East Islip, L.I., N.Y.

Kent Place College preparation for girls. Boarding & Day, Grades 8-12. Beautiful location 20 miles from New York. Fireproof buildings. Riding, hockey, tennis, etc. Rich program includes music, art, drama, modern dance. Classes limited to 15. Supervised study. Established 1894. Catalog on request.
Florence A. Wolfe, B.S., M.A., Headmistress, Summit, N.J.

The Grier School In the Alleghenies. For Girls, grades 9-12. Accredited College Preparation and General Courses. Home Economics. Music, Art, Dramatics. Riding. Private stable. Winter team sports. 1000-acre Campus. 100th year. Accessible Chicago, Washington, New York. Catalog.
Mr. & Mrs. Thomas C. Grier, Co-Heads, Box 111, Tyrone, Pa.

Milwaukee-Downer Seminary A College Preparatory School for Girls. Boarding, grades 9-12. Fully accredited. Small classes. Excellent faculty. Varied social, sports programs. Art, Music, Drama. A friendly school. Est. 1851. Write Elizabeth E. Anderson, Ed. D., 2513 E. Hartford Avenue, Milwaukee 11, Wisconsin

Penn Hall Accredited prep school. 192-acre campus "a little north of Dixie." Also Junior College. A. A. or A. S. degree in 2 yrs. College transfer or specialized career courses. Modern buildings. Swimming pool, riding, golf on campus.
Dr. C. Gordon Fruntz, Pres., Box W, Chambersburg, Pa.

Cathedral School of St. Mary An accredited Episcopal school for girls. Boarding, grades 6-12. Strong college preparation. Choose from 5 languages, 5 years math, 4 years science. Music, drama, art, dance. Full sports program. Riding. Near New York City. 83rd yr.
Address Registrar, Box J, Garden City, Long Island, N.Y.

St. Katharine's School Episcopal. Accredited. College preparatory. Sound education training for individual development. Small classes, 7th-12th Grades. Sports and fine arts programs including Music, Art, Dramatics. New fireproof dormitory. For "Sampler" and Catalog address
W. L. Lemley, Headmaster, Davenport, Ia.

Coeducational Schools

Judson School In Arizona. A good ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Accredited. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley near Phoenix. Healthful year-round climate. Riding & polo included in tuition. Desert exploring, pack trips, hiking, rodeos, other outing trips. Boat and Catalog.
David J. Wick, Headmaster, Scottsdale, Arizona

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep. Grades 9-12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog. R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

Girls' Camps

brown ledge Mallett's Bay, Vt. "One America's finest camps Girls 10-18. Free daily riding for all. Waterskiing, swimming, sailing, drama, golf, riflery, archery, crafts, trips. N "extras" ! (Also Buff Ledge, girls 7 & up.) Give age. Fo booklet, write winter office:
Mrs. H. E. Brown, 18 Carver Ave., Box A, Scituate, Mas

Ogontz White Mountain Camp For girls. On Ogontz Lake, near Sugar Hill, N.H. Aqu planing, swimming, sailing, golf, riding, tennis. Crafts, n ture study, dancing, music. Outdoor cooking. Mt. trip Tutoring. Cabins. 750 acres of woods and meadows. 38th y Booklet. Abby A. Sutherland, Box B, Ogontz Center, P

Summer School—Coeducational

Crestwood Hills Overlooking Lake Cayug Ithaca, New Yor A new summer program of professional guidance a counseling designed to discover and develop your child hidden abilities. Accredited college preparation. Beaut ful college town. All sports. Coed. 14-18.
Dr. William Smith, Box 133, Ithaca, New Yor

Girls' School Switzerland

La Chatelainie St. Blaise, Neuchatel, Frenc Switzerland. Preparatory Schoo for Girls, 13-18. College Board prep in English. Language Also post-graduate finishing school. Home Economic secretarial courses. All sports. Optional winter & summer a Gstaad. Tours to Italy and France. Also summer session
Dr. A. L. Jobin, Principa

Medical Technology

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Supervision Courses to 12 mos. in clinica laboratory X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coe classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn

Home-Study Schools

ARE YOU A BORE?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of everyday conversation which can pay you real dividends in both social and business advancement and works like magic to give you added poise, self confidence and greater popularity.

According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by what they say and how they say it. Whether in business, at social functions, or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances, there are ways in which you can make a good impression every time you talk.

To acquaint the readers of this book with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in everyday conversation, the publishers have printed full details of their interesting self-training method in a 24-page booklet, "Adventures in Conversation," which will be mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Simply send your request to: Conversation Studies, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1371, Chicago 14, Ill. A postcard will do.

ART LEARN AT HOME! Fun or profit. Big pay career or part-time hobby. Cartooning, Illustration, Lettering, TV, etc. We train you at home, in spare time. TWO 22-pc art outfits included free of extra charge. LOW COST—only 20c a day. Write free FREE Book to college of practical Art. No salesman will call. Washington School of Art, Studio 1551, Port Washington, N. Y. (Estab. 1914)

Dolls! Learn to make, repair and sell dolls and accessories at home. Excellent money making opportunities. May we send free informative booklet? No obligation!
Norm & Sue's Doll Hospital School, Studio L-10, 11826 San Vicente Blvd., Los Angeles 49, Calif.

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. text supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H13, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Floral Training Learn flower arranging at home—countless money-making opportunities. Accredited training. May we send free and without obligation, our booklet? Act now!
Norm & Sue's National Floral Institute, Studio L-10, 11826 San Vicente Blvd., Los Angeles 49, Calif.

$ More MONEY for YOU through HOME STUDY $

Millions of women are supplementing family income, some because of necessity, others for the satisfaction it brings. If you are a homemaker planning to someday return to the business world you should convert your spare time now for a quick brushup of your former skills and latest business techniques. Your training record can mean higher initial pay—quicker recognition for pay increases—security in your work. Shorter specialized courses enable you to train at home for greater opportunities. LaSalle accredited home study training has helped thousands of women step up into higher earnings quickly. Check the field of your choice. We'll send you, without obligation, complete information. Low cost, easy terms. WRITE TODAY.
LASALLE Extension University, A Correspondence Institution 417 So. Dearborn Street, Dept. 146R, Chicago 5, Illinois Send me your FREE book describing courses in ☐ Accounting ☐ Secretarial ☐ Bookkeeping
Name ..... Age .....
Address .....
City ..... Zone ..... State .....

Sewing Learn modern dressmaking methods, factory shortcuts professional techniques at home. We show how to make money. Countless opportunities. May we send free, and without obligation, our informative booklet? Accredited
Norm & Sue's Good Dressmaking Institute, Dept. L-10, 11826 San Vicente Boulevard, Los Angeles 49, California

LEARN Interior Decoration at home for professional or personal use. Approved supervised method. Step-by-step authoritative training program. Includes working kit. Low tuition. Easy payments. Send for free 24 page illustrated booklet, "Adventures in Interior Design & Decoration." No obligation.
CHICAGO SCHOOL OF INTERIOR DECORATION
835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept.1371, Chicago 14, Ill.

Design Smart Fashions LEARN AT HOME—SPARE TIME

Fascinating field. Design own wardrobe at considerable saving. Gain experience designing for others. It may lead to thrilling career. Basic "learn-by-doing" course under guidance of qualified teachers provides excellent starting point for a career. Send for free booklet, "Adventures in Dress Design."
NATIONAL SCHOOL OF DRESS DESIGN
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1371, Chicago 14, Illinois

Play Right Away!

ANY INSTRUMENT

Now it's EASY to learn ANY INSTRUMENT—even if you don't know a single note now. No boring exercises. You play delightful pieces RIGHT AWAY—from very first lesson! Properly by note. Simple as A-B-C. You make amazing progress at home, in spare time, without teacher. Only few cents per lesson. 1,000,000 STUDENTS, including Lawrence Welk.

FREE BOOK Shows how easy it is to learn music this modern way. Write for it. No obligation. No salesman will call upon you. U. S. School of Music, Studio 631, Port Washington, N. Y. (62nd year). Tear this out.

ar sneakers have replaced them; girls wear lders with white socks pulled up, flats with st kings, and in San Francisco colored sneak-er (red, blue, white, khaki), worn without st kings, are a big hit for school.

here's a new-type jacket called a popover
th 's a minor rage, and boys are buying them fc both themselves and their girls. They're fc outdoor use, but they look something like a irt, have tails that go flapping out behind, in slip over the head. They come in brushed wool and have a shirt neck that buttons high.
Ponchos are coming in at Westport, and plaid
k worn just above the knee are great with th girls. (Plaid vests are also worn, with matching straight plaid skirts). Shetland sweaters with a classic round crew neck (although the boat neck is new) have gone over big with everyone.

In Arkansas, Texas, Virginia and Arizona the knitted cotton sports shirt is very popular. And everybody is crazy over jackets, especially tweeds. Red or navy-blue blazers with brass buttons are hits with boys.

Nobody would be caught dead in short-shorts any more—it's all Bermudas. But they're only for picnics, sports, etc.—never what you'd call "public" attire. Shirtwaist dresses are the rage in San Francisco, and the boy's button-down shirt with a gold circle pin above the button is worn by almost every teen-age girl in the country, except in Atwood, Kansas, and Beaumont, Texas. It is on the way out in Minneapolis, though, where frilly, feminine blouses are coming in.

Tight, narrow skirts and toreador pants revealing a lot of torso have lost favor in many towns. Pants are usually worn only at home, or to sporty events. Pleated skirts, stitched down over the hips, in pretty-colored tweeds, are popular. The tight sweater has also been discarded for a looser one—more ladylike.

Thonged sandals and silver concho belts are the rage in Tucson, Arizona. But stiff petticoats have lost appeal, except in Cleveland, where they are still worn. There is a trend to less jewelry, and silver chains worn around the neck with a ring (either a school ring or your boy friend's) are seen almost everywhere. There is a courting system in Fort Smith, Arkansas, when a boy and girl are going steady. They go to a jeweler and buy a silver heart. The jeweler cuts it in half and the boy wears one, the girl the other, on matching chains around their neck.

Pony tails are giving way to more sophisticated hairdos, and the pixy cut has really been modified. And girls don't try to look like boys any more, with those short, mannish cuts.

The whole trend is toward neatness and taste, whether in girls' or boys' fashions, and we teen-agers are becoming very conscious of the way our appearance reflects our attitudes. To play it cool, you have to look that way too.

We're really hot for music, and contrary to what most people think, we do go in for classical.

Not everyone is crazy over rock 'n' roll. On the West Coast, in Texas, Cleveland and Minneapolis, it seems to be on the way out—and Pennsylvania and Michigan feel it might be replaced. Dixieland is coming along—San Francisco teen-agers seem to be going for it in a big way. South American music has caught on in a few places, too, and good jazz is always a seller.

Most teens love to collect records, and have whole albums of their favorites. Dave Brubeck, The Kingston Trio and George Shearing are popular, with their more sophisticated type of jazz. We like movie sound tracks, too, and themes from TV shows. "Peter Gunn" and "77 Sunset Strip" (we get a kick out of Kookie) have really gone over, and singers like Pat Boone, Ricky Nelson, Johnny Mathis, Sal Mineo, Fabian, Frankie Avalon, Tommy Sands and the Everly Brothers. Lots of us watch Dick Clark and the Bandstand show, but it looks as if Elvis Presley is becoming a has-been. Of course there are the vocalists, too, like Sara Vaughn, Ella Fitzgerald, Nat King Cole, Frank Sinatra and Julie London. Mood music, ballads and classical, are becoming really popular. Most of us appreciate good things and we don't completely look down on long-hair stuff. In Michigan "The Nutcracker Suite" and "Rhapsody in Blue" are well liked by the high-school set. Folk songs and Broadway show tunes are way up there near the top too.

Well, that's about it. Maybe you can get some idea from all this about what we teen-agers are like in 1960. We hope so, anyway. I don't know what you were like when you were our age, but today one of the most important things is to feel useful, not just to sit around for several years doing nothing except waiting until you grow up. END

EXTINGUISHED

By KATHERINE ROCHEFORT

It's just a matter of time,
they said,
As final as a slammed door.
And in just a matter of days
He would be four.

We bought horns and hats and a cake
While he planned the fun.
We bought four little candles
And never lit one.

We bought four gay little candles,
But when the day came
There were five little candles
That had no flame.

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Junior Colleges

AMBLER JUNIOR COLLEGE OF TEMPLE UNIVERSITY
Est. 1savs as Pa
Horticulture, and Liberal Arts. Co-Ed. Accredited A.S. & A.A. degrees. Electives in Horse Husbandry & Horsemanship. 150-acre campus near Phila. Greenhouses, gardens, nurseries, orchards & stables as labs. Credits transferable to BOX L, AMBLER JUNIOR COLLEGE, AMBLER, PA.

ermont College A two-year college for 345 women. Degrees in rses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, sery teaching, secretarial, medical sec'l, medical tech, al. Electives in art, home ec., music. Spacious hill-campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 17 bldgs. Catalog
R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier, Vt.

icester Two Year College for Men. Associate in Marketing, Management, Medical and Executive Secretarial. Accredited Worcester Polytechnic Institute Alumni Program. Worcester Business Institute prepares for success at management levels. Terminal or college transfer. Vocational guidance. Suburban campus. All sports.
Paul L. Swan, President, Leicester, Mass.

verett College girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts, professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, all classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 101st yr. Catalog Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

irginia Intermont Fully accredited Junior College for women. Lib. Arts and Career Courses. Music, Art, Drama, Radio, Journalism, 2-year Nursing, Home Economics, Physical Education, Retailing, Secretarial. Elevation 2000 feet. Sports, riding, gym, pool. Est. 1884. Inclusive rate $1500. Catalog.
Dir. Adm., Intermont, Box 102, Bristol, Va.

itchell College A coeducational Junior College. Fully accredited. Non-denominational. Small classes. Preparation for advanced academic work; specific vocational training. Basic liberal arts, terminal business education, voice, piano, organ. Dormitories. Est. 1856. Endowed. Rate: $794. Catalog.
Ivan J. Montgomery, Pres., Mitchell College, Statesville, N.C.

Business & Secretarial

pencerian College Coeducational. Est. 1863. Small classes. Work-study plan. College life; social, athletic activities. In residential area. Earn B.B.A. degree in 2 yrs., 8 mos. in Accounting, General Business, Sales Management, A.A. in Executive, medical, legal, secretarial; court reporting. G.I. approved. Catalog.
Registrar J, Milwaukee 10, Wisconsin

Wood Secretarial School College-level courses for High School and Private School graduates. Accredited by N.Y. State Education Department. Placement service. Air-conditioned. Dormitory. 81st year. Enroll now for Feb., July or Sept. Catalog. Enrollment Sec'y, 125 Park Ave., (100 E. 42 St. opposite Grand Central), N.Y. 17. OX 7-1290.

Katharine Gibbs SECRETARIAL
BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.
Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

BRYANT COLLEGE BACHELOR'S DEGREES IN 2 OR 3 YEARS
Business Administration:
Executive Secretarial:
Business Teacher-Education:
Diploma Courses
For catalog write: RUTH WEST
BRYANT COLLEGE, PROVIDENCE 6, RHODE ISLAND

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS
Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. 120 words per minute. No symbols; no machines; uses ABC's. Learn at home or through classroom instruction. Low cost. For business and Civil Service. Over 500,000 graduates. Typing available. 47th year. Write for FREE booklet.
© 1959
Speedwriting
Dept. 9901, 55 W. 42 St., New York 36

Boys' Schools

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY

In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J-1, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U.S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS.
Founded 1860

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. Near Charlottesville. 82nd year. Also Camp Wahoo. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P. O., Va.

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Fully accredited. Semi-military. Outstanding preparation for all colleges and the service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music, activities. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Perkiomen Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading colleges, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 9–12. Sports, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New York City, Philadelphia. 86th year. Summer school. Write for catalog.
Stephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Penna.

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Aeronautics, Artillery. Band scholarships. Grades 5–12 and P.G. Catalog. Est. 1889.
17 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley: Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1275. Catalog.
Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

Greenbrier Military School
148th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band. Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write
D. T. Moore, Box J-601, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 6–12. How-to-study training, remedial and developmental reading; individual guidance. Christian influence. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Est. 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

Howe Military School
Academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited college preparatory, business. Potential Achievement Rating gives individual goal. Jr. school. Sr. ROTC. Sports. Activities. New dorms, pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1710 Academy Place, Howe, Ind.

Western Military Academy
Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 82nd yr. Near St. Louis. Enroll now for January classes. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-1, Alton, Illinois

College

Nichols College of Business Administration For Men. B.B.A. degree. Concentration & Internship Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment.
James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols College, Dudley 6, Mass.

Fine & Applied Arts

New York School of Interior Design
Four Months' Practical Training Course starts February 1st. Faculty of leading N.Y. decorators. Period and modern styles, color schemes, all fundamentals. Send for Catalog 7R. Home Study Course for those who cannot come to N.Y. Starts at once. Catalog 7C. 29 East 72nd St., N.Y. 21

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design, Fashion Merchandising with Modeling, Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for out of town girls. Enter Jan. 4. Write Registrar, Room 706. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 750 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Valley Forge, shrine of our freedom, has become the home of this fully accredited, Senior Junior Mil. Acad. and Jr. Coll. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep School grades 7 thru 12 & Jr. Coll. Varsity sports Arty., Cav., Infantry. Band. Senior Div. ROTC.
Catalogue, Box Radnor, Wayne, Pa.

Cornwall Academy In The Berkshires Boys 12–18
College preparation with special emphasis on learning to study intelligently. Remedial instruction in English, reading, math. Daily counseling. Small classes. Full sports program, hobbies. 50 acres. Also Summer Session.
John J. Moran, Headmaster, Great Barrington, Mass.

Milford College Preparatory School for Boys. Famous for its teaching since 1916. Grades 8–12. Homogeneous grouping in small classes helps and develop good study habits, assures maximum achievement. Full athletic program and extra-curricular activities. Music. Spacious campus. Winter term Feb. 1st. Catalog.
William D. Pearson, Headmaster, Milford 14, Connecticut

Cranwell Jesuit Boarding School in the Berkshire Hills. Outstanding academic training for boys. Grades 8–12. Excellent college record. Campus of 400 acres. Attractive dormitories, gymnasium. All sports, skiing, riding, private golf course. Alt. 1250 ft. Also summer camp for boys 7–14.
Rev. Thomas M. Lannon, S.J., Box 414, Lenox, Mass.

Miami Military Academy Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory high school, Junior School. Small classes. Boys learn to study. National Defense Cadet Corps Honor School. Sports, sailing; pool. 35 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 34th year. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38, Fla.

The Baylor School for Boys
January entrance. College prep. Accredited scholarship. Boys 12–18. Semi-military. Endowed awards. Ideal location. Modern facilities. New gym. Championship athletics. Non-sectarian religious guidance. Summer camp, boys 8–15. Catalog.
129 Cherokee Road, Chattanooga, Tennessee

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ NEW [illegible] PLAN
★ [illegible]
★ buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 [illegible]
★ Junior School grades
★ 4-8 has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 62nd year. For ONE SUB-
★ Dr. J.C. Wicker, Box 861, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School
71st yr. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Essentially college prep. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 30-acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 110 Main St., Mexico, Missouri

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 76th year. Catalog.
Dir. of Admissions, Box 310, Delafield, Wis.

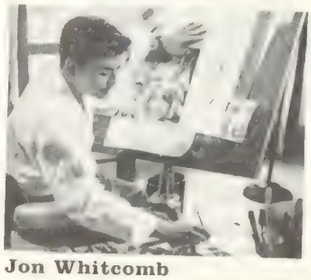
Northwestern Military & Naval Academy College prep. Est. 1888. Accredited. 75 mi. north of Chicago. Average class 10. Fireproof buildings. New 3-court gym. 85 acres on lake. Sr. ROTC Basic. All sports; sailing. Summer Camp. Write for catalogs.
81 So. Lake Shore Rd., Lake Geneva, Wis.

Hotel Training

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in the hotel, motel and hospitality field. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book
Accredited by N.H.S.C.
Course Approved for ALL Veteran Training
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL 44th SUCCESSFUL YEAR
Room FA-549, Washington 7, D. C.

* America's 12 Most Famous Artists



Albert Dorne

Norman Rockwell

Al Parker

Jon Whitcomb

Austin Briggs

Ben Stahl

Fred Ludekens

Robert Fawcett

Harold Von Schmidt

Dong Kingman

Peter Helck

Stevan Dohanos

* We're looking for people who like to draw

IF YOU LIKE TO DRAW, America's 12 Most Famous Artists want to test your art talent. We'd like to help you find out whether you can be trained to be a successful money-making artist.

This offer is part of a program we began ten years ago. We found that many men and women who could have become artists—and should have become artists—never did. Most of them were unsure of their talent and had no way of finding out whether it was worth developing. Others who were convinced they had talent simply couldn't get topnotch professional art training without leaving home or giving up their jobs.

A Plan to Help Others

We decided to do something about this. We decided to make it possible for anyone, anywhere, who likes to draw—and who has talent worth developing—to get the training he needs to become an artist. Taking time off from our busy art careers, we pooled the extensive knowledge of art, the professional know-how, and the priceless trade secrets which we, ourselves, were able to learn only through long and successful experience.

We illustrated this knowledge with 5,000 special drawings; then organized it into a series of lessons covering every aspect of drawing and painting . . . lessons that anyone could take right in their own homes and in their spare time. Finally—after years of teaching—we perfected what is probably the most personal and effective method ever developed for criticizing a student's drawings and paintings.

Our program of art training is now well known and respected all over America. We have helped thousands of people find success in art. Here are just a few:

When Don Smith of New Orleans wrote to us, he knew nothing about art—even doubted he had talent. Today, he's an illustrator with the South's leading advertising agency.

Father of Three Wins New Career

Stanley Bowen of Ohio—a married man with three children, unhappy in a "no-future job"—began studying with us, evenings. Now he's earning a much higher salary as an illustrator for a growing art studio. And his family sees a happy, secure future ahead.

With our training, Wanda Pickulski of Rexford, N. Y., was able to give up her typing job to become fashion artist for a local department store.

Changes His Whole Life

"Your course has been the difference between failure and success for me," writes Robert Meecham of Ontario, Canada. "I've come from an $18.00 a week apprentice to where I now own my own house, two cars, and hold stock in two companies."

A Career of Her Own

"I now have extra money for trips and bank account to do with as I please," s housewife Doris Hagen. "Without yo Course, I would not have had a profession.'

When Kathryn Gorsuch of Mt. Vern Ohio, found out she was to have a baby—s left her filing job at an aircraft company a studied art at home with us. By the time baby was seven months old, she went back work for the same company . . . this time a well-paid commercial artist.

Eric Ericson worked in a garage while studied nights with us. Today, he is a success advertising artist, earns seven times as much and is having a new home built for his fami

Profitable Hobby—at 72

A great-grandmother in Newark, Ohio, c cided to use her spare time to study paintir Recently, she had her first local "one-ma show—where she sold thirty-two water colo and five oil paintings.

Donald Kern—a cowboy from Miles Cit Montana—studied art with us. Now he pain portraits, sells them for $250 each, and ge all the business he can handle.

Paintings Pay for House Addition

Virginia Tootill writes: "The sale of m paintings has more than paid for my Cours It's building an addition to the house for ou new baby."

In just four months Doris White of Wauw tosa, Wis., has painted and sold $750 wort of her paintings . . . all in spare time!

Send For Famous Artists Talent Test

To find other men and women with tale worth developing, we have created a speci 12-page Art Talent Test. Thousands of pe ple formerly paid $1 for this test. But no our School offers it free and will grade it fre People who reveal talent through this test ar eligible for professional training by the Schoo . . . right in their own homes.

If you like to draw and want to know if yo have talent worth developing—mail the cou pon today. The test will be mailed to yo without cost or obligation.

Famous Artists Schools
Studio 5022, Westport, Conn.

I want to find out whether I have art talent worth developing. Please send me, without obligation, your Famous Artists Talent Test.

Mr.
Mrs. _____ Age _____
Miss (please print)

Address _____

City _____ Zone ____

County _____ State _____

JOURNAL

PUBLIC
LIB.

February
1960 35¢

The Magazine Women Believe In

Had It to Do er Again
y Debbie Reynolds

W THE KONS
VE

EAM HOUSE
T PRACTICAL

Marvelous shions
Pages

ONE DAY
O YOURSELF
VER

BURLINGAME CALIF
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME PUBLIC

Floor is style 8653

for a free sample of the most intriguing floor in the world—Tessera Corlon

Write Armstrong Cork Company, 6002 King St., Lancaster, Pa. In Canada, Dept. 20-A, Box 919, Montreal, Quebec

Tessera Corlon is one of the famous Armstrong VINYL FLOORS

1860-1960 Beginning our second century of progress

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

VOL. LXXVII NO. 2

February, 1960

JOURNALITIES

Oh, a livelier, more provocative tle tale was never told than that Elizabeth right tells on page 50! Free Dust is the work a free spirit, a distinguished short-story iter and the mother of three sons. The do-it-urself husband in this tale, when told by an forgettably obnoxious visitor that he looks e death, builds himself a . . . that is, it turns t to be a . . . well, it's appropriate, you'll see.

Note from Margaret Bonham (Tiger, ger, page 54): "My husband is a social an-ropologist; we have two daughters, Cary and ys, and two sons, Charles and Justin. We live a stone house, dated 1610, thatched with rfolk reed, on the edge of a North Oxford-ire village. We h.. going to London. We eatly enjoy reading, talking, playing indiffer-t bridge, watching cricket, listening to music."

We have been intending to celebrate e centennial (one hundred poems sold to the URNAL) of Georgie Starbuck Galbraith, and if e don't do it soon she will have sold us two ndred poems. The one on page 44 is ap-opriately titled No Complaint. "Selling one ndred to the JOURNAL is only slightly less hlikely than a successful moon shot," she ys. "It took seventeen years for me to do it."

CONTENTS

CONDENSED NOVEL COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

THE WALK DOWN MAIN STREET	Ruth Moore	56

STORIES

FREE DUST	Elizabeth Enright	50
TIGER, TIGER	Margaret Bonham	54
FUEL FOR THE FLAME (conclusion)	Alec Waugh	60

SPECIAL FEATURES

A QUESTION OF VALUE	Dorothy Thompson	11
VALENTINE FOR MY CHILDREN	Holly Hickler	18
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?	Dorothy Cameron Disney	22
A HEART-TO-HEART ABOUT PARENTS	Pat Boone	37
TELL ME, DOCTOR	Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.	40
IF I HAD IT TO DO OVER AGAIN	Debbie Reynolds, as told to Jane Ardmore	52
HOW MOVIE AND TV VIOLENCE AFFECTS CHILDREN	Fredric Wertham, M.D.	58
I'M LUCKY! LUCKY!		63
WOMEN WHO CARE	Beatrice Blackmar Gould	64
BECAUSE WOMEN CARE	Margaret Hickey	64
YOU CAN HAVE FUN WITH YOUR CHILDREN	Benjamin Spock, M.D.	77
HOW AMERICA LIVES: The Nixons at Home	Hazel Markel	156
NIXON: Republicans' Leading Candidate	Earl Mazo	158

GENERAL FEATURES

LETTERS OUR READERS WRITE US		4
UNDER COVER	Bernardine Kielty	17
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK	Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.	46
FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN		49
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE	Harlan Miller	62
THIS IS A SICKBED SNEAKY	Munro Leaf	96
ASK ANY WOMAN	Marcelene Cox	148

FASHION AND BEAUTY

FOUR FRESH NEW LOOKS	Dawn Crowell Norman	78
THE NEW FASHIONS MAKE YOU FEEL NEW EACH SPRING	Wilhela Cushman	80
THE JOURNAL'S GEM OF A WARDROBE	Nora O'Leary	86
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!	Bet Hart	124

FOOD

DELICIOUS IN THE SPRING		88
THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM	Margaret Williams	134

ARCHITECTURE, HOMEMAKING, INTERIOR DECORATION

JOURNAL'S PORTFOLIO HOUSE NO. 11
DREAM HOUSE IN THE WOODS	66
IMAGINATION LOADS THE LIVING ROOM WITH GLAMOUR	70
THE DINING ROOM IS LIKE AN INDOOR GARDEN	72
THERE'S JOY IN A BIG KITCHEN	74
SECOND-FLOOR LAUNDRY LINES UP WITH BATHROOMS	76
THE BATHROOM HAS THREE-WAY LUXURY	76

POEMS

AND SO THEY WERE MARRIED	Evelyn Adams	13
THE CHILD IN THE FAIR FRUIT	Kate Barnes	18
OVERSIGHT	Janet Henry	33
NO COMPLAINT	Georgie Starbuck Galbraith	44
ON THE COLD SIDE OF THE HILL	Ethel Fairfield White	94
LADIES' CHOICE	Kay Owens	126
YOU KNOW ME	Memory McGonigal	131
GIFTS	Jean Todd Freeman	133
LINES FOR A WOOD ENGRAVING	Stanley Donaldson	137
SONG FOR A SLEEPING CHILD	Alexander Taylor	150
UNMARRED	May Richstone	153
LITTLE YOU KNOW	Elizabeth McFarland	164

COVER ILLUSTRATION By JOE BOWLER

HANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If iis is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philaelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, © 1960 The urtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preeding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; ntered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the uianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. nconditional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications ot previously mailed. The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, r. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. obinson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director f Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

NEW! Powder + foundation (no grease)

Covers flaws and tired lines

Won't streak, won't change color

Coty

French Flair

Complete compact make-up

Smart golden metal case
12 flattering shades

150 plus tax

©COTY, INC., [illegible] ALL RIGHTS RESERVED

Kraft DeLuxe Slices
give you extra goodness

Sure you can buy cheaper cheese slices than Kraft's. But not with the extra rich cheese flavor that comes from the truly fine natural cheeses Kraft uses.

And Kraft's are big, full-ounce slices that pack important protein power into every sandwich you make. What's more, only Kraft can use the exclusive method that makes these slices taste so extra good and separate so beautifully. That's why they're called Kraft DeLuxe Slices.

KRAFT AMERICAN OLD ENGLISH Brand
SWISS • BRICK
Pasteurized Process
Cheese

LETTERS

our readers write us

[illegible]

MORE MONEY FOR MINISTERS?

Dear Editors: "I'm the Child of a King" (November JOURNAL) brought vividly to mind my own childhood in a parsonage. Our parents could not bequeath us any material wealth, but they left us a far richer heritage: an appreciation of good literature and music, esteem for the Ten Commandments, and a knowledge of right and wrong; a respect for order and cleanliness, a desire for the things that are more excellent.

Yours truly,
Baraboo — ELIZABETH TARAS HERRITZ

[illegible]

Sirs: All ministers' families I know of agree that as "children of a King" we are profoundly rewarded in countless ways that the world in general doesn't know about. But I get very tired of people who remind us that Jesus had no place to lay His head. He also had no wife, no children, no doctor or dental bills, and no car expenses. Miss Thompson should try living on a salary equivalent to the one her father made before she urges it on anyone else.

Sincerely,
Mt. Union — MRS. ROY K. HOOVER

[illegible]

DRUGS FOR CHILDREN?

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: I am writing to you because the JOURNAL has so often warned mothers against dosing their children with certain harmful medicines and drugs. Last year the chief child psychiatrist of a large hospital advised us to put our ten-year-old son on tranquilizing pills. Our son was a perfectly normal, bright, healthy boy, but he occasionally had bad temper tantrums. The tranquilizing pills might relieve his hostility and calm him down, the psychiatrist said. He added that the pills might also produce the opposite effect and jive him up, or they might slow him down to the point where he was half asleep all the time and unable to do his schoolwork.

My husband and I decided not to put our ten-year-old on tranquilizers. Instead, we followed the psychiatrist's suggestions for making his life in the family and co[illegible] munity more satisfying to him. Last su[illegible] mer he won many honors for leadersh[illegible] at camp, and recently the children in h[illegible] school elected him Captain of the Sa[illegible] ties, a highly responsible post. He h[illegible] not had a tantrum in months.

I wonder how many other mothe[illegible] have been advised by their family doct[illegible] or psychiatrists to put their children [illegible] tranquilizers whenever their antisoc[illegible] behavior needs toning down. I'm su[illegible] that many children with severe emotion[illegible] illnesses can be made more malleable [illegible] therapy by the use of drugs. But some [illegible] my friends, I've discovered, give th[illegible] children tranquilizers simply becau[illegible] they won't sleep or seem irritable [illegible] high-strung.

I looked up tranquilizers in a big me[illegible] cal library and found that they can cau[illegible] dizziness, severe nausea and vomitin[illegible] swelling of the joints, itching and co[illegible] vulsions. They can also produce the sym[illegible] toms of Parkinson's disease in adults wh[illegible] never had a tremor before. Fortunatel[illegible] these symptoms go away when the pi[illegible] are discontinued.

The cause of Parkinson's disease is u[illegible] known, but it results from a gradu[illegible] degeneration of nerve cells deep with[illegible] the brain. Nobody knows exactly ho[illegible] tranquilizers work, except that they [illegible] fect the base of the brain. In childr[illegible] they may also affect the growth cycle, a[illegible] cording to Dr. Walter Alvarez, form[illegible] Mayo Clinic consultant.

There are about fifteen tranquilizi[illegible] pills on the market. They all require [illegible] doctor's prescription, but the prescri[illegible] tion can be refilled again and agai[illegible] Most of the tranquilizers are very new[illegible] only four or five years old—so that ne[illegible] of the tests made on monkeys or huma[illegible] can reveal the long-term results of tr[illegible] quilizers on the emotions, memory, m[illegible] tivations, responses and other high[illegible] functions of the mind.

A pill that can reduce a healthy adu[illegible] to a trembling, unco-ordinated Parki[illegible] son's case must be pretty powerful. [illegible] this the kind of medicine to give to [illegible] child—any child? Sincere[illegible]
Chicago — E.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

"Chuck and Peggy" –appearing for Aunt Jemima on "The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet"—ABC-TV

New answer to "What's for lunch?":

Aunt Jemima Golden Corn Pancakes

Look what you can do that's new:
ADD ½ CUP OF NIBLETS® BRAND CORN TO AUNT JEMIMA PANCAKE BATTER

SHAKE UP IN AUNT JEMIMA SHAKER AND BAKE A DELICIOUS NEW BREAKFAST OR LUNCHTIME TREAT

FREE! A can of Niblets® Brand Corn when you buy Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix

Buy a 12-oz. can of Niblets® Brand Corn and a box of Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix. Send Niblets® label and Aunt Jemima boxtop with your name and address and price paid for corn to: Green Giant Company, Box 5, Minneapolis 60, Minn. Full purchase price of corn, plus 4¢ postage, will be refunded. Offer expires April 30, 1960. Void where prohibited, regulated or taxed.

Limit one per family.

This "Handy Ham" makes a dandy Western...

For a delicious Sunday night snack or noon-time treat, go Western at your house.

● JUST BEAT TOGETHER A 2¼ OZ. CAN OF UNDERWOOD DEVILED HAM, 2 EGGS, CHOPPED ONION, CHOPPED GREEN PEPPER, 1 TBSP. MILK. FRY TO GOLDEN GOODNESS. MAKES 2 SANDWICHES.

It's just one way this "handy ham" goes great with eggs at any house. Underwood Deviled Ham takes up so little space—keep plenty on hand for ham treats in a hurry!

DOES MOST ANYTHING HAM CAN DO . . . AND JUST AS DELICIOUSLY, TOO!

Made from whole hams finely ground and deftly seasoned for a wonderful can't-be-copied flavor.

FOR OTHER SNACK RECIPES WRITE: ANNE UNDERWOOD, DEPT. L20, RED DEVIL LANE, WATERTOWN 72, MASS.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

PENNSYLVANIA

WHAT HAPPENED TO WITCHES?

Dear Sir and Madam: Your allowing "The Salem That Never Burned Witches" to be printed caused the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL to forfeit the right to have women believe in it. The lie that witches were burned in Salem was used as evidence that the Puritans were coldly cruel; but no witches were burned in either England or New England. Hanging was the method of execution.

I am anxious to see how you will squirm out of this. Yours,

Allentown LEVERETT CUTTEN

● We'll just say we're sorry we burned you up. ED.

NEW JERSEY

TAKE YOUR CHERSE (BY VERSE)

I love to read the JOURNAL
With stories fine and counsel sound.
But in each recent issue
Discrepancies I've found.
Those tempting illustrations
Of desserts delight my eye!
I hurry to the kitchen
Each recipe to try!
But then, on turning pages
Invariably I see
"Before and after diet" views
That surely challenge me.
On which side is the JOURNAL?
Juicy pies and cakes immense?
Or insipid-sounding diets?
Or just sitting on the fence?

Glen Rock MARJORIE UHL

● A man who likes his ladies slim
Suggests the food be served to him. ED.

WASHINGTON

GREETINGS TO MR. BOONE

Dear Editors: We enthusiastically approve your December article by Pat Boone. It's really wonderful that someone leading such a busy life has taken the time and thoughtfulness to help our youngsters. Sincerely, Deer Park MR. and MRS. R.W.S.

NEW YORK CITY

DR. SCHAUFFLER IS TOO MODEST

Dear Editor: In the August Journalities, it is stated that your Dr. Goodrich C. Schauffler (Tell Me, Doctor) received in France, during World War I, a French Croix de Guerre "for bringing up an ambulance load of champagne from Rheims under bombardment."

Obviously, any intelligent reader will realize that this must be a joke—but one in rather poor taste. The entire world knows that thousands of Americans sacrificed their lives on the battlefield, side by side with their French comrades, so that we might continue to live in freedom. Some survivors returned home proudly bearing the Croix de Guerre, which is awarded only for heroism at the risk of one's life.

While it is certainly possible to risk one's life in order to save champagne, there is no doubt that French authorities placed too high a value on the lives of their soldiers to risk them for such a purpose. We have furthermore been assured that Dr. Schauffler obtained his Croix de Guerre for gallantry in action, and that perhaps, thanks to his heroic feat, several hundred soldiers' lives were spared. Let us hope there will be no further jokes of this kind.

Very truly yours,

OLEG YADOFF President
American Order of the Association Nationale des Croix de Guerre of France, Inc.

● Mr. Yadoff is right, of course. Dr. Schauffler was simply being modest in describing his own war experiences. ED.

CONGO BELGE

EGGSTRAORDINARY STORY?

Dear Editors: Perhaps you would be interested in the "mileage" one copy of the JOURNAL gets here. It makes the rounds of our station (four women), two other stations (seven more), and is often lent to Belgian friends. Its final destiny? After favorite recipes are removed, it is sold for four or five eggs! Yours truly,

Mission Mwanga BONNIE TERPSTRA

SOMEWHERE U.S.A.

OTHER SIDE OF THE COIN

Dear Editors: I have become increasingly interested in how many wives find themselves in a position similar to my own—healthy, responsive women married to frigid, unresponsive and sexually inhibited husbands. Who writes articles on this problem?

I don't want to be an erring wife, but I can't hold out much longer.

NAME WITHHELD

MASSACHUSETTS

TOO YOUNG TO DRIVE

Dear Editor: How many children would not be dead, how many illegitimate babies would not have been born, and how many early elopements would never have happened if these children did not have a license to drive a car?

What's the matter, parents? Are we getting so lazy that we'd rather take chances with our children's lives than do a little chauffeuring once in a while?

Yours truly,

Peabody ELAINE L. TALBOT

● A recent study also showed that few A students drive cars, while many who fail in school do. ED.

Spectacular 30th Anniversary Offer from Doubleday's Dollar Book Club!

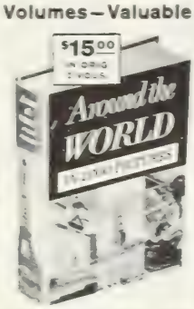
ANY 4 BOOKS FOR ONLY 99¢

when you join and agree to take as few as 6 best-selling novels out of the 24 to be offered within a year

Never Before This Extraordinary Choice of Best-Sellers—Illustrated Volumes—Valuable Sets of Books!

...n World Atlas! Big 256-...e book covers U.S., Can... and foreign lands. ...l pages of the latest color ...ps. Illustrated geography

Sheer excitement—intrigue, conflict, sea ...mas every-thing! Brilliant smash novel-of life and love in the Connecticut tobacco country



Big Garden Ideas handbook. Build walks, pools, rock gardens, terraces, etc. Self-pronouncing Dictionary of Plant Names. Illustrated

Best-Seller! Under the guns of war, a proud Southern beauty trades the night of love for the safety of her beloved plantation Exciting Action Pictures and first-hand news reports vividly portray the struggles, heroism and great men of the War Between the States.

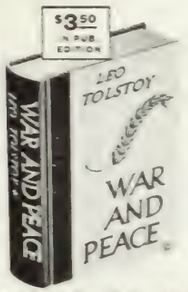
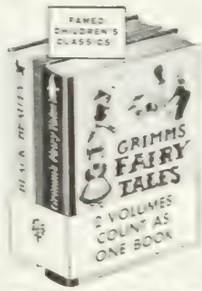
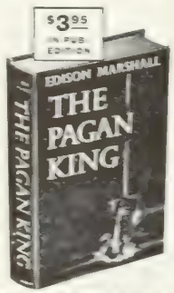
Sail the Seven Seas—tour Rome, Paris, Hong Kong, Mexico—see the wonders of 64 lands in vivid photos and reading. 768 thrilling pages!



Giant 700-page novel of the men and women who lived and loved in the kinderbock of Colonial America during the French and Indian Wars!



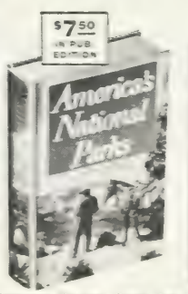
2-Volume Health Set, Handy Home Medical Adviser by Dr. Morris Fishbein, plus Stay Slim for Life. Both illustrated—620 pages



...mous 2-volume Desk En-...clopedia has 2,440 pages, ...,000 articles, 1,250,000 ...rds. Up-to-date knowledge ...every field! Illustrated.

One of the World's Great Novels. Vast panorama of love, adventure and ambition in the Napoleonic era. Abridged to 640 pages

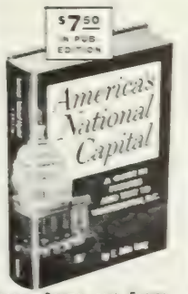
Famed Children's Classics in 2 volumes. 32 never-to-be-forgotten fairy tales plus perished Black Beauty. Delightful illustrations



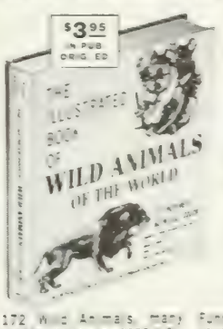
Action-Packed Story of the sweet Eden, the temptress vixen and the lusty warrior destined by Fate to rule ninth century England

Giant 512-page Treasury of stories for children, 121 fairy tales, legends, Bible stories, animal stories, etc. Delightfully illustrated.

1,250 Delicious Recipes, 250 menus, 540 pages. Latest edition of the most useful cook book published, up-to-date freezing section!

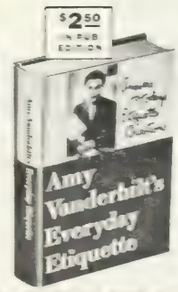


Fabulous Picture Tour! See Glacier, Sequoia, Yellowstone and 26 other wonder parks in U.S. and Canada. 527 photos—33 in color!



Glamorous Guide to Home Decorating. Lavish new volume, 216 illustrations, 90 in color. Covers fabrics, furniture, lighting, etc.

...claimed Modern Dictionary ...n a new 2-volume edition. ...,000 entries, 700 pictures, ...6 pages. Hundreds of new ...rds, grammar section, etc.



Charm, Drama and Excitement of Washington, D.C. in 228 beautiful photographs plus fascinating reading and useful information 172 Wild Animals, many rarely seen in captivity, live before your eyes in thrilling text and pictures, including 80 in full color!

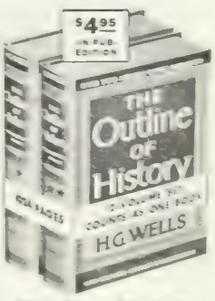
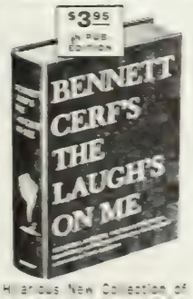
Funny and Wise Sayings of youngsters—collected in one priceless volume by TV's famed Art Linkletter. You'll blush, laugh, cry!

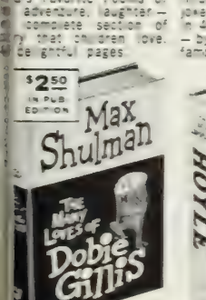


Sensible Modern Guide answers your questions about weddings, dining out, dining parties, dress and every social occasion.

Great Classics of Suspense by Daphne du Maurier, Agatha Christie, Dashiell Hammett, Erle Stanley Gardner and others. 2 full novels, 540 pages



A gay shipboard blonde, a dark-haired Madrid beauty and a handsome American adventure-bound—in Helen's newest best-seller!



Whole Story of Mankind—from earliest times to now. One of the most acclaimed works of the 20th century. 1,024 pages, 200 illustrations.

...s Favorite Poems of ...adventure, laughter—...complete section of ...y that children love. ...de gruful pages.

Hilarious New Collection of jokes, jests and anecdotes in 480 laughter-filled pages—by one of America's most famous storytellers.

...Shulman's uproarious ...of the romantic mis-...ventures of a confirmed ...an chaser—the "Casa-...a with a crew-cut"

Official Rules for all Popular Games—bridge, canasta, chess, poker, scrabble, and 500 more! Winning strategy by top players! 700 pages.

You Get $10.90 to $45.00 Worth of Books for only 99 cents if You Act Now!

JOIN Doubleday's Dollar Book Club now and take advantage of the most generous offer made to new members in thirty years.

Select any 4 of the full-size, hard-bound books on this page for only 99 cents. Choose from new best-sellers . . . beautiful library volumes . . . big illustrated books . . . even 2-volume sets! Many are newly offered for this event. Think of it – a total value of $10.90 to $45.00 in publishers' editions – yours for just 99 cents when you become a member.

Members Save up to 75% on New Best-Sellers!

Imagine – best-seller selections costing up to $3.95 in publishers' editions come to Club members for only $1 each! Over the years the biggest hits by top authors like Ernest Hemingway, W. Somerset Maugham, Daphne du Maurier, Thomas B. Costain, Frank Yerby and others, have come to Club members at this low $1 price. Occasional extra-big books are also offered at prices slightly above $1. All are new, full-size, hard-bound editions. An exciting new bonus plan offers other big savings too. But you buy only the books you want – and you don't have to take one every month. You may take as few as six $1 selections a year!

Send No Money – Just Mail the Coupon Now

Receive any 4 books on this page for only 99 cents, plus a small shipping charge. This is your introductory package as a new member. Thereafter, you will receive the Club's Bulletin, which describes forthcoming $1 selections and other book bargains.

No-Risk Guarantee: If not delighted, return all 4 books and membership will be cancelled. Act now to accept this special anniversary offer—just mail the coupon!

DOUBLEDAY ONE DOLLAR BOOK CLUB, GARDEN CITY, NEW YORK

30th ANNIVERSARY OFFER - MAIL THIS COUPON

Doubleday One Dollar Book Club
Dept. LH-2, Garden City, New York

Send me at once the 4 books checked below and bill me only 99¢ FOR ALL 4, plus a small shipping charge. Also enroll me as a member.

- ☐ Thorndike-Barnhart Comp. Dictionary—set
- ☐ America's National Capital
- ☐ Favorite Stories Old and New
- ☐ War and Peace (19)
- ☐ Civil War in Pictures (20)
- ☐ Pannish (44)
- ☐ The Laugh's on Me (47)
- ☐ Health Set—2 vols. (48)
- ☐ Columbia-Viking Desk Encyclopedia—set (61)
- ☐ The Outline of History—2 vols. (62)
- ☐ Around the World in (illegible) Pictures
- ☐ The Pagan King (101)
- ☐ Modern Family Cook Book (114)
- ☐ Amy Vanderbilt's Everyday Etiquette
- ☐ Garden Ideas and Projects
- ☐ Kids Say the Darndest Things!
- ☐ Lorena
- ☐ Grimm's Fairy Tales and Black Beauty—2 vols.
- ☐ New Complete Hoyle (117)
- ☐ Best Loved Poems (119)
- ☐ Illustrated Book of Wild Animals (122)
- ☐ Ladies' Home Journal Book of Interior Decoration (125)
- ☐ Station Wagon in Spain (141)
- ☐ Hammond's Family Reference Atlas (161)
- ☐ Many Loves of Dobie Gillis (163)
- ☐ Ten Great Mysteries (164)
- ☐ The Young Titan (166)
- ☐ America's National Parks (167)

Include my free issue of The Bulletin, describing the new forthcoming one-dollar selections and other bargains for members. I may notify you in advance if I do not want the following month's selections. I do not have to accept a book every month—only six a year. I pay nothing except $1 for each selection I accept (plus a small shipping charge) unless I choose an extra-value selection at a somewhat higher price.

NO-RISK GUARANTEE: If not delighted, return all 4 books and membership will be cancelled.

Mr.
Mrs.
Miss
Address
City &
Zone . . . . . State . . . . .

DH-4A

IMPORTANT SAVINGS ON TWIN-BED SET

. . . during SEALY'S BIGGEST-YEAR

EXPANSION SALE

GREAT VALUE IN SCULPTURED BEAUTY!

Grey plastic headboard with gold button tufting. Striped mattress ticking has metallic gold highlights. The Jubilee also includes box spring, steel frame.

$79.95
4-pc. set

NOW... SEALY'S SIZE MAKES BETTER BU

America's fastest-growing bedding maker passes along savings to you from

- new plants
- new techniques
- greater purchasing power

IMAGINE—A SET WITH FOOTBOARD AT THIS PRICE!

Charming spindle design at head and foot in ever-popular honey maple. It's the Merrivale, with gayly striped, sturdy ticking. Includes box spring, steel side rails.

$79.9
5-pc. set

SO LITTLE TO PAY, SO MUCH GLAMOUR!

And practicality! Snow white plastic headboard is deep-tufted and washable. Imported damask covers button-free mattress. The Acclaim includes box spring, steel frame.

$89.9
4-pc. set

BARGAIN IN LUXURY—BENCH INCLUDED!

Golden decorator touches on deep-tufted plastic headboard and bench. Luxurious ticking on button-free mattress. The Arlene! . . . with box spring, steel frame.

$99.95
5-pc. set
Includes upholstered bench

YOUR BEST BUY IN A BOOKCASE-HEADBOARD SET!

The Portsmouth! Lovely damask on tuftless mattress. Traditional style in maple . . . modern style (see inset) in walnut or limed oak. Also included: box spring, steel frame.

$99.95
4-pc. set

Sealy
79th Anniversary

Prices slightly higher in Canada

BROWSE HERE...

. . . for current books you have been anxious not to miss . . for other good books you have long promised yourself to read . . . for valuable sets that should be part of every library . . . and for practical books needed in your home or office.

* * *

BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB OFFERS YOU . . .

IN A SHORT TRIAL MEMBERSHIP

ANY FOUR FOR $1 EACH*

IF YOU AGREE TO BUY FOUR ADDITIONAL BOOKS DURING THE NEXT YEAR AT THE MEMBERS' PRICES . . . WHICH AVERAGE 20% LESS THAN THE REGULAR RETAIL PRICES

104. Advise and Consent by ALLEN DRURY. (Retail price $5.95)

108. Act One by MOSS HART (Retail price $5)

102. Doctor Zhivago by BORIS PASTERNAK. (Retail price $5)

103. The War Lover by JOHN HERSEY. (Retail price $5)

105. The Ugly American by WILLIAM J. LEDERER and EUGENE BURDICK. (Retail price $3.95)

101. Exodus by LEON URIS. (Retail price $4.50)

106. The Years with Ross by JAMES THURBER. Illustrated (Retail price $5)

125. Inside Russia Today by JOHN GUNTHER. (Retail price $5.95)

107. John Paul Jones by SAMUEL ELIOT MORISON. Illustrated (Retail price $6.50)

110. The Harmless People by ELIZABETH MARSHALL THOMAS. Illustrated. (Retail price $4.75)

111. Elizabeth the Great by ELIZABETH JENKINS. Illustrated Retail price $5

112. The King Must Die by MARY RENAULT. Retail price $4.50)

113. Anatomy of a Murder by ROBERT TRAVER. (Retail price $4.95)

114. What We Must Know About Communism by WILLIAM L. NEUMANN. (Retail price $5)

115. The Crisis of the Old Order by ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR. Vol. I of The Age of Roosevelt (Retail price $6)

116. The Coming of the New Deal by ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR. Vol. II. (Retail price $6.75)

117. Aku-Aku by THOR HEYERDAHL (Retail price $4.95)

118. Peter Freuchen's Book of the Seven Seas (Retail price $5)

119. The Birth of Britain by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. I of A History of the English Speaking Peoples (Retail price $6)

120. The New World by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. II. (Retail price $6)

121. The Age of Revolution by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL (Retail price $6)

122. The Great Democracies by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. IV. (Retail price $6)

123. A Treasury of Science (Retail price $5)

124. The Autobiography of Mark Twain (Retail price $6)

126. The Affluent Society by JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH (Retail price $5)

183. The Cave by JOSÉ SARAMAGO. Retail price $4.95)

128. This Hallowed Ground by BRUCE CATTON. Retail price $5.95)

129. The Dead Sea Scrolls by MILLAR BURROWS. (Retail price $6.50)

184. The Marauders by ELEANOR ROSS TAYLOR. Retail price $4.50

185. The Natural History of Love by MORTON M. HUNT (Retail price $5)

109. It's Good to Be Alive by ROY CAMPANELLA. Illustrated (Retail price $4.50)

132. A Study of History, a 2-vol. abridgment of the Toynbee work (Retail price $7.5) Each vol. $1

133. A Stillness at Appomattox by BRUCE CATTON. (Retail price $5)

134. The Complete Short Stories of W. Somerset Maugham 2 vols. (Retail price $12.50) Each vol. $1

135. The Complete Works of O. Henry 2 vols. (Retail price $10) Each vol. $1

136. The Complete Sherlock Holmes by A. CONAN DOYLE 2 vols. (Retail price $7.50) Each vol. $1

137. The Bounty Trilogy by CHARLES NORDHOFF and JAMES NORMAN HALL (Retail price $6.75)

138. Remembrance of Things Past by PROUST. 2 vols. (Retail price $15) Each vol. $1

139. Ulysses by JAMES JOYCE Unexpurgated (Retail price $4.75)

140. Fireside Book of Favorite American Songs (Retail price $5)

141. The Gathering Storm by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. I of The Second World War (Retail price $6.50)

142. Their Finest Hour by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. II. (Retail price $6.50)

143. The Grand Alliance by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. III. (Retail price $6.50)

144. The Hinge of Fate by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. IV. (Retail price $6.50)

145. Closing the Ring by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. V. (Retail price $6.50)

146. Triumph and Tragedy by WINSTON S. CHURCHILL Vol. VI. (Retail price $6.50)

147. The War of the Revolution by JOHN FISKE 2 vols. (Retail price $15) Each vol. $1

148. The Story of the Declaration of Independence by MILTON KAPLAN (Retail price $4)

149. The Story of Philosophy by WILL DURANT (Retail price $7)

150. Studies in the Psychology of Sex by HAVELOCK ELLIS 2 vols. (Retail price $12.50) Each vol. $1

151. Ideal Marriage: Its Physiology and Technique by TH. H. VAN DE VELDE, M.D. (Retail price $7.50)

152. Bartlett's Familiar Quotations (Retail price $8.75)

153. Standard Handbook of Synonyms and Antonyms by FRANCIS A. WOOD (Retail price $4.95)

154. An Encyclopedia of World History by WILLIAM L. LANGER Retail price $8.50)

155. Encyclopedia of American History by RICHARD B. MORRIS (Retail price $6.95)

156. Encyclopedia of the Opera by DAVID EWEN (Retail price $7.5)

157. The Popular Medical Encyclopedia by MORRIS FISHBEIN, M.D. Retail price $4.95)

158. Goren's New Contract Bridge Complete by CHARLES H. GOREN Retail price $4.95)

159. Vogue's Book of Etiquette (Retail price $5.95)

160. Singer Sewing Book by THE SINGER SEWING BOOK STAFF (Retail price $4.95)

161. The New Joy of Cooking by IRMA S. ROMBAUER and MARION ROMBAUER BECKER. (Retail price $4.95)

162. A Child's Geography of the World by V. M. HILLYER Revised by E. G. HUEY

163. Winnie the Pooh AND The House at Pooh Corner by A. A. MILNE Both Vols. for $1

* In the case of multi-volume sets each volume is to be counted as a separate purchase at $1, unless otherwise noted.

BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB, Inc. A162
345 Hudson Street, New York 14, N. Y.

Please enroll me as a member of the Book-of-the-Month Club and send the four library volumes whose numbers I have indicated in boxes below, billing me $4.00 (plus postage). I agree to purchase at least four additional monthly Selections—or Alternates—during the first year I am a member. Thereafter I need buy only four such books in any twelve-month period to maintain membership. I have the right to cancel my membership any time after buying four Club choices (in addition to those included in this introductory offer). The price will never be more than the publisher's price, and frequently less. After my fourth purchase, if I continue, I am to receive a Book-Dividend* with every second Selection—or Alternate—I buy. (A small charge is added to cover postage and mailing expenses.) PLEASE NOTE: A Double Selection—or a set of books offered to members at a special combined price—is counted as a single book in reckoning Book-Dividend credit and in fulfilling the membership obligation.

INDICATE BY NUMBER IN BOXES BELOW THE FOUR BOOKS YOU WANT

☐ ☐ ☐ ☐

Mr.
Mrs.
Miss

Address

City Zone State

Subscription subject to approval of application by the Club. Offer limited to one membership per family.

Trademark Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. and in Canada

GOOD SENSE FOR EVERY READING FAMILY

THE PURPOSE of this suggested trial membership is to demonstrate two things by your own experience: first, that you can really keep yourself from missing, through oversight or overbusyness, books you fully intend to read; second, the advantages of the Club's Book-Dividend system, through which members regularly receive valuable library volumes—either without charge or at a small fraction of their price—simply by buying books they would buy anyway. The trial offer described here really represents "advanced" Book-Dividends earned by the purchase of the four books you engage to buy later.

* The four books you choose will be sent to you immediately, and you will be billed one dollar for each volume (plus a small postage charge).

* You have a wide choice always—over 200 Selections and Alternates during the year.

* If you continue after this trial membership, with every second Club choice you buy you will receive, without charge, a valuable Book-Dividend averaging around $7 in retail value. Since the inauguration of this profit-sharing plan, $220,000,000 worth of books (retail value) have been received by members as Book-Dividends.

NEW LIQUID LUSTRE-CREME IS HERE!

Now you can shampoo... Set with plain water...and have lively, natural looking curls!

New Rich, Rich Liquid! Lanolin-Blessed!

LOVELY JANE POWELL must keep her hair looking soft and shining at all times for her many television appearances and screen roles. That's why she always asks her hairdresser for a Lustre-Creme shampoo because it leaves hair shinier, easier-to-manage in any hair style. Shouldn't you use it, too?

FOR CURLS THAT COME EASY—HERE'S ALL YOU DO:

Shampoo with new Liquid Lustre-Creme. Special cleansing action right in the rich, fast-rising lather gets hair clean as you've ever had it yet leaves it blissfully manageable. Contains Lanolin, akin to the natural oils of the hair; keeps hair soft, easy to set without special rinses.

Set—with just plain water! An exclusive new formula—unlike any other shampoo—leaves hair so manageable any hair-style is easier to set with just plain water. Curls are left soft and silky—spring right back after combing. Waves behave, flick smoothly into place.

Lustre-Creme – never dries – it beautifies – now in liquid lotion or cream!

4 OUT OF 5 TOP MOVIE STARS USE LUSTRE-CREME SHAMPOO!

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

Executive Editor: Mary Bass

Associate Editors: Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella G. Shouer
Mary Lea Page
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Peter Briggs
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
William McCleery
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart

Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

Editorial Associates: John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Eileen Sharpe
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills

Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Alberte Wright
Corinna Wildman
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Joan Huse Cornog
Grant Harris
Jean McClory

Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen
Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Frances Johansson
Mary Lee Jones
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Ann Blackmar

BASKET OF FLOWERS. Self-taught, French-born artist Leon Hartl has won prizes in this country for his oils and water colors since he came here forty years ago. Using the colors of dawn, he painted this in 1956.

A QUESTION OF VALUE

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

A few months ago the British Advisory Committee of the Universities Federation for Animal Welfare complained to the American ambassador regarding an article describing experiments on live animals being carried out in the biology courses of American public schools. Because of the very close relations that exist between this country and Great Britain, and the Americanizing influence on British cultural life, this committee felt moved to scotch something that might spread outside our borders.

The article that occasioned the protest revealed that the National Science Teachers Association in Washington is encouraging certain practices. Its author, a biology teacher in a Buffalo, New York, high school, wrote of blowing pepper, dusts and smoke into the lungs of mice to provoke "violent shutting off of the glottis"; toxicity tests to find out what dose of nicotine will kill animals; substitution of external artificial hearts; and routine and periodic transfers of cancer cells to healthy animals. These tests are carried out by teen-agers, and the simplest of them are practiced even in the lower grades in some schools.

The teacher-author of the article also reported student reactions. "Surgical procedures are especially thrilling to pupils. After the first few weeks there is an amazing absence of squeamishness and fear. In fact, it frequently surprises me to see the avidity with which pupils plunge into the dissection of rats, mice, rabbits and dog sharks."

The pupils, we are told, are never allowed to give names to animals. "I prefer to have the pupils develop an impersonal and objective attitude. It is too easy to become emotionally attached and thus strongly disturbed at seeing a 'friend' handled directly."

I have italicized certain words in this teacher's account, in which I think he quite unwittingly reveals a good deal. It clearly demonstrates the unintellectual approach of adolescents to experimentation on live animals and records a reversal of normal emotions. Pupils start by being squeamish, but in a few weeks they find the work, not soberly interesting or important but thrilling; they plunge into dissection of living creatures with avidity once their normal ("too easy") emotional attachments to living creatures are suppressed. They are then no longer strongly disturbed, but excited and titillated.

Now, I maintain—and I think most psychiatrists would—that there is

CONTINUED ON PAGE 13

New...The Most Trustworthy Napkin Ever Created

New . . . a magic channel of protection you can trust

New . . . a discreet deodorant you can trust

Modess . . . because

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

hing slightly deranged about these ado- t thrills and avidities. It is unnatural for oung to mistreat animals. An infant's oys are usually representations of cuddly ls. The growing child is given pets in to nurture in him loving and protective cts. The physical balance between ag- ve and protective instincts is established e child's being the recipient and giver of ion. Many children (and perhaps most m) feel toward an animal smaller than selves and dependent on their care a er tenderness than they feel toward hu- beings. We have all seen illustrations of Last summer I saw a five-year-old in the of enjoyable play suddenly clap his s to his head and cry, "I forgot to feed bbit!" He insisted on rushing home, de- d to find his "Peter Bunny" scampering hily about his pen; but feeding him oats, hild murmured loving apologies to the creature, patting him tenderly as he fed few years later, while still in elementary l, this same child may be conducting a kbook experi- " on mice, guinea or rabbits, depriv- alf of them of pro- or carbohydrates feeding the others anced diet, to prove any child can be ht without such tifically worthless ties; that a diet of ng but sugar will animals and pre- ably humans. Or he be, as a Pennsyl- high school re- , conducting re- h into the effects of voltage radiation ice, deliberately in- g damage to the s and organs of the als, without adding or tittle to knowl- already possessed. ward he will cut s victims for exam- n.

he may have the rience that caused sensitive high- l girl to become and rush from the when a half-anes- zed kitten being gically" dissected started to scream—as he pupil.

e read of a sixteen-year-old girl whose trembles while injecting cancerous tissue dermically into a mouse, but who is tually rendered sufficiently cold-blooded. one case the youngsters put up cardboard stones over their consciously starved vic- —in this case "The wrong ones died. I s we needed something else," a pupil re- ked indifferently.

his is not scientific experimentation. It is ly demonstration of facts already estab- d.

e eighteen-year-old high-school student greatly praised for making Siamese twins of two rats. She is ambitious to become a eon. But medical colleges, with a great of psychological insight as well as intel- al experience, do not admit immature ents. One must have completed two years ollege before beginning even premedical ing.

he medical student is indoctrinated with rt Schweitzer's "reverence for life." He is centrated, not on experimenting for experi- tation's sake but on finding ways to save prolong life and health. If he is not, he r will be a good doctor. I am not an anti- sectionist, like George Bernard Shaw, who e falsely claimed that nothing had been d to knowledge of the treatment of ase in both humans and animals by section. The National Academy of Sciences down, however, strict principles of lab- ory-animal care which are unlikely to be completely observed in schools—and, alas, not always in adult laboratories. Some children and youth, for instance, are encouraged to take home animals in order to pursue their demonstrations (without supervision) in their own basements and back yards. Well, I see by the papers that five teen-age boys recently killed four rabbits by igniting firecrackers in their ears. For this they were hauled into court. But they also conducted an "experiment" which at least induced in their victims instantaneous death and proved beyond peradventure of a doubt that explosions in the head are fatal!

The case histories of delinquents of brutal or homicidal tendencies often reveal that cruelties and brutalities were first performed on cats, dogs or other animals.

Who are behind these cruel animal experiments conducted by children and teen-agers in schools? Not, it would seem, outstanding scientists, and least of all outstanding psychiatrists. Dr. Chauncey D. Leake, assistant dean of Ohio State University and president of the American Academy for the Advancement of Science, recently wrote:

"It seems to me that it is wise to avoid getting our youngsters so enthused over biological sciences that they are anxious to undertake extensive animal experimentation without the background, the experience, the judgment, or the wisdom that is necessary in handling animals appropriately for complicated biological experimentation . . . there is plenty of biology to be gotten from a study of unicellular organisms that can readily be obtained in any high-school laboratory and handled and followed with skill and convenience."

There is also vastly more that can be learned by the study of plants and animals as the naturalist studies them, on the spot and in their native environments—as the great Louis Agassiz studied them, adding with his notes and his sketches immeasurably to our sensitivity, our knowledge and our sense of the beauty and wonder of life. Biology is the science of organic life, and before the young student begins tearing every petal from the flower and cutting up living animals to see what makes them tick there should be encouraged in him those naturalist studies that awaken him to such awe and wonder. So to learn, the child and youth need not live in the country. John Kieran, in his delightful The Natural History of New York City, has explored the teeming native life of America's greatest metropolis. Glen Rounds, with his sensitively minute observations of the life of animals and insects, lifts biology into the realm of humanistic studies—and the two, science and humanism, must be closely conjoined if science is not to prove to be a curse to the human race. It is still true, as William James said in The Varieties of Religious Experience: "Strong intellect needs strong sympathies to keep life steady."

If there is any doubt about this, it would be well to reconsider one of the still insufficiently explored phenomena of our age; namely, the frightful atrocities inflicted upon human beings by the German Nazi regime. These did not happen in a primitive country; they bear no psychological resemblance to the horrible cannibalistic and other rites performed by savage African tribes; they occurred in the most scientifically advanced nation of Europe, and they were actually committed in the name of science, of eugenical science, "the elimination of the racially unfit," and later as tests of what the human body could endure under certain circumstances. The medical experiments

AND SO THEY WERE MARRIED

By EVELYN ADAMS

Once you cared if my hair was clipped short, if I wore
A special white sweater; and at the door
If the porch lights were on, if I touched your hand,
It mattered to you that my nose was tanned.

Now because you like oak with a just-waxed gleam,
Clean sheets each night, raw cabbage, the cream
And sugar already in your cup,
It matters to me that the sun comes up.

beautiful discovery!

New! Moisture Base by Pond's

new kind of greaseless foundation cream!

brings you "night cream" moisturizing under your make-up all day!

Creates an all-day "moisture reserve." At last a cream that goes beyond superficial smoothing . . . that actually controls the moisture level of your skin under your make-up. At the same time, it normalizes your skin's protective chemistry all day long.

Prevents under-make-up dryout! New Pond's Moisture Base protects your skin against sun and wind—the drying effects of make-up itself! Your skin stays soft and dewy all day.

For a smooth, no-shine finish. Pond's Moisture Base is greaseless. Your skin never feels sticky—your make-up never streaks or cakes. Completely transparent, it can't conflict with any make-up shade.

For a lovelier face, smooth on New Pond's Moisture Base every morning. And, of course, use it for nighttime moisturizing, too.

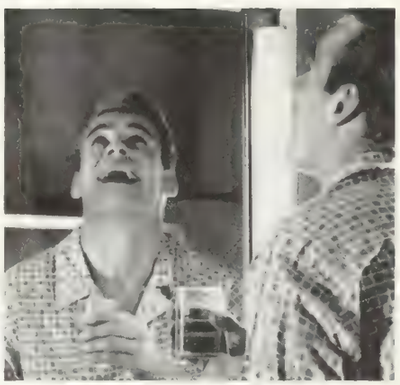
Pond's Moisture Base
NEW GREASELESS UNDER-MAKE-UP MOISTURIZER

Great Idea! Do it with

ARM & HAMMER SODA

(BAKING SODA)

BICARBONATE



MEETS ALL REQUIREMENTS OF U.S. PHARMACOPOEIA

BRUSH YOUR TEETH WITH SODA— Ask your dentist—He can tell you that bicarbonate of soda is recommended as a dentifrice in literature of the American Dental Association. Arm & Hammer soda cleans both natural and artificial teeth thoroughly, safely. It neutralizes enamel-eating acids—removes bad breath that starts in the mouth. Buy Arm & Hammer soda at food stores.

RELIEVE ACID INDIGESTION—One-half teaspoon of soda in half glass of water neutralizes excess acidity—helps bring quick relief from acid indigestion and heartburn. Keep Arm & Hammer soda in your medicine cabinet.

REFRESH MOUTH AND THROAT—Use a soda mouthwash daily to cleanse mouth, sweeten breath. So soothing for sore throat, too. Mix one teaspoon per glass of water for mouthwash or gargle. Listed in U.S. Pharmacopoeia.

In certain areas, such as metropolitan New York, the same high quality soda is sold under the name COW BRAND

ARM & HAMMER SODA BICARBONATE

SO PURE it meets all requirements of the United States Pharmacopoeia, which sets standards of quality and efficacy for pharmaceuticals and drugs.

SO PURE it is recommended as a dentifrice by dentists everywhere.

SO PURE it is prescribed and administered by physicians for many medical conditions.

SO PURE it is used in numerous hospitals for injection, internal administration and application to skin.

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., INC., 70 Pine Street, New York 5, N.Y.

required the active collaboration of scientists and physicians. There was nothing wrong with German brains under the Nazis; if there had been, they could not have conducted the organization necessary to fight for so long a war against a great majority of mankind. The derangement was psychical and emotional.

Everything of importance, however, to life and policy arises out of feeling. The education of the feelings is no less important than the education of the intellect. If we are to have science, we must have art, music, poetry, literature, manners, deportment, instinctual "good behavior," or society is a jungle.

The psychologists feel more strongly than the other scientists about introducing immature youth to experimentation upon animals. "Among psychopaths the most readily observable trait is lack of sympathy and affection. Sight of pain and suffering does not move them." This deficiency in warm and benevolent emotional reactions usually dates, if it is not neurological and congenital, from some trauma or traumas developed in childhood, and (as our forefathers knew and our most "modern" child psychologists have relearned) the child cannot get or give enough of loving—by which I do not, of course, mean indulgence. Anything whatever, therefore, that develops callousness to the sufferings of others during childhood and adolescence is psychologically injurious.

And this has nothing to do with the development of the hardy virtues of courage, fortitude and heroism, without which, demonstrated in one form or another, there is no strength in a society. Callousness is not a synonym for bravery; if it were, our "beatniks" and delinquents would make the best soldiers, instead of being immediately classified as unfit for service. Even in war the protective instincts are called into play as a necessity of morale among comrades in arms, and medals are awarded to those who, beyond the call of duty, go into enemy fire, not to kill an enemy but to save a wounded buddy.

In all sciences powers of accurate observation must be cultivated, but these are oftenest awakened by sparking the sense of the wonder and miracle of life. The child's enduring interest in botany, and zoology, is far more likely to be called up by the immediate observation of living things in their natural environment than by classifying and collecting, and handling anesthetized animals or their skeletons.

In the long run, it would seem, nations and civilizations rise or decline according to the values they are able to cultivate, maintain and transmit, and I know of no civilization that has long endured whose values were purely economic, material and "scientific."

No humanistic civilization or culture can be built upon such foundations. It is the humanism of Western Europe and America that has given them their peculiar flavor and strength. This humanism assumes that the material universe is maintained and expanded by the energy that flows from the spiritual universe that encloses it. This, of course, is the view of all great religions—of Christians, Buddhists, Muslims and Jews alike—and if its truth is a matter of faith it is nevertheless pragmatically demonstrated over and over again.

This spiritual universe is responsive to feelings rather than intellect. The unfeeling man, no matter how brilliant, is a thoroughly sick soul. And I submit that in the education of children and adolescent youth, nothing should enter the curriculum that tends to produce unfeeling callousness. END

Electric Blankets 2 for $25

Our Budget Floor irregulars, priced so modestly, you will want one for every bed at your house! Washable shell; UL approved wiring; two-year replacement agreement. Rose, blue, yellow, beige or green. Twin or full size, single control, 12.98 or 2/$25. Full size with dual control, 15.95. Please add 50c each for mailing. In Washington, also add 4% sales tax.

Frederick & Nelson
FIFTH AND PINE
SEATTLE 11, WASHINGTON

ON A LAXATIVE MERRY-GO-ROUND

TAKE NR TO-NIGHT...TOMORROW ALRIG SPARKLING BRIGHT!

Searching for effective overnight lief? Try NR tonight! You'll know millions use it with utmost confide NR works overnight . . . and ge aids the function of elimination, wit restlessness or sudden necessity. NR all-vegetable laxa that gives easy reli

NR REGULAR

helps you feel bette ...and look better

CANDY COATED or NR JUNIORS

Nature's Remedy NR-TABLETS-NR

ALL VEGETABLE LAXATIVE

EXTRA INCOME

OF COURSE! Write to the addr below and we'll send you details abo a money-making offer. No obligati

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
957 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pen

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING NAIL BITING

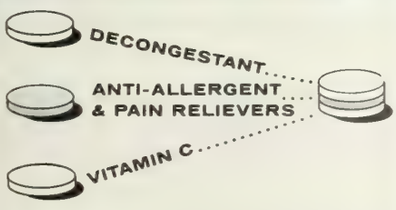
THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips 60c at your drug store



Revolutionary 3-layer tablet for relief of

COLDS MISERIES AND SINUS CONGESTION

HELPS DRAIN ALL 8 SINUS CAVITIES

(critical areas of colds infection)

REVOLUTIONARY 3-LAYER TABLET

DRISTAN is the exclusive 3-layer tablet discovery which for the first time makes it possible to unite certain medically-proven ingredients into one fast-acting uncoated tablet! The exclusive DRISTAN Tablet formula cannot be duplicated.

DRISTAN Decongestant Tablets, working through the bloodstream, bring dramatic relief from colds miseries, sinus congestion and pollen allergies. DRISTAN . . . amazing medical achievement . . . contains: (1) The [illegible] (2) Antihistamine to prevent reactions. (3) Vitamin C, to help build body resistance to colds infection. For quick relief get DRISTAN

There's Nothing like DRISTAN

ness and politics.

scribe minut
. . . prnnedy: A Po-
(2) Afile, by James reactiurns (Harcourt, gossipy book about erican family, as I suggesting. It is a an American politi-0, whom you may
as easily not like,
know him better.
ndidates for high itten up with such l objectivity!

book. Yet the three men I know who have read it, to date, were fascinated.

Two JOURNAL favorites in book form, take note: THE QUEEN'S GRACE, novel about Katryn Parr by Jan Westcott, is already out (Crown), and QUEEN MARY, by James Pope-Hennessy—that remarkable biography!—is being published this month (Knopf).

Excellent mystery: A Penknife in My Heart, by Nicholas Blake (Harper).

effective combination of pain relievers. Relieves body aches and pains due to colds, reduces fever.

a big comfortable, prosperous Jewish family living in a country place on Long Island, in what today would be considered sumptuous style—with maids, chauffeur, and hats galore. Mrs. Sherman's Summer, by Marjorie Fischer (Lippincott), is definitely gemütlich. Several daughters, sons-in-law and grandchildren; strong-minded mamma with an eagle eye, and oldest son Joe, hated because he holds the moneybag—maybe this is the American answer to G. B. Stern's The Matriarch.

Dale Robertson, TV star of Tales of Wells Fargo, says . . .

STAKE YOUR CLAIM

TO ALL THE CASH ON THE COACH

IN IVORY'S $100,000 WELLS FARGO GIVE-AWAY!

SEE RULES FOR $10,000 BONUS PRIZE

2ND AND 3RD PRIZES
FORD THUNDERBIRD

97 OTHER PRIZES

The fastest gun in the West never had it so easy . . . a chance to carry off a whole Wells Fargo shipment by simply estimating how much cash Dale Robertson is helping Ivory Soap give away! A heap of other prizes too, like "Thunderbirds" and mink, $100,000 worth, all told. You'll need 3 Give-Away wrappers from any size of Ivory with each entry . . . so round up enough of America's favorite skin soap for everyone in the family to enter today!

Get Ivory in special Give-Away wrappers at your dealer's. 99 44/100% pure®...it floats.

IVORY *100,000 GIVE AWAY

water neutralizes excess acidity—helps bring quick relief from acid indigestion and heartburn. Keep Arm & Hammer soda in your medicine cabinet.

mouth, sweeten breath. So soothing for sore throat, too. Mix one teaspoon per glass of water for mouthwash or gargle. Listed in U.S. Pharmacopoeia.

In certain areas, such as metropolitan New York, the same high quality soda is sold under the name COW BRAND

ARM & HAMMER SODA BICARBONATE

SO PURE it meets all requirements of the United States Pharmacopoeia, which sets standards of quality and efficacy for pharmaceuticals and drugs.

SO PURE it is recommended as a dentifrice by dentists everywhere.

SO PURE it is prescribed and administered by physicians for many medical conditions.

SO PURE it is used in numerous hospitals for injection, internal administration and application to skin.

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., INC., 70 Pine Street, New York 5, N.Y.

transmit, and I k has long endured economic, materi

No humanistic built upon such fo
ism of Western E
given them their
This humanism as verse is maintain energy that flows that encloses it. T all great religions
Muslims and Jew
matter of faith it demonstrated ov

This spiritual ings rather than no matter how b
soul. And I subj children and add enter the curricu
feeling callousne

Use this entry blank to enter the Give-Away today

IVORY'S $100,000 WELLS FARGO GIVE-AWAY ENTRY BLANK

PLEASE PRINT CAREFULLY

My estimate of the amount of cash on the stagecoach is:

$_____

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

DEALER'S NAME_____

I am enclosing 3 wrappers from any size of Ivory Soap.

☐ $10,000 Bonus Prize. Check (✓) here if your 3 Ivory Soap wrappers include one from each size—Large, Medium, and Personal—to be eligible for $10,000 Bonus Prize.

Mail to: Ivory Give-Away, Dept. 0, P.O. Box 14, Cincinnati 99, Ohio. Entries must be postmarked no later than midnight, May 1, 1960, and received no later than midnight, May 15, 1960.

IVORY
$100,000 GIVE AWAY

IVORY'S
$100,000
TALES OF WELLS
FARGO
GIVE-AWAY!
entry instructions

1. Estimate the total amount of money in the picture. Write your estimate on an official entry blank or a plain sheet of paper. Print your name and address plainly. The estimate closest to the actual amount of money shown on the stagecoach will win first prize—all the cash! The next closest will win second prize, etc. The prizes are as follows:

FIRST PRIZE—
all the cash on the stagecoach.

SECOND AND THIRD PRIZES—
Ford "Thunderbird" automobile.

NEXT PRIZES IN ORDER ARE:
4 RCA Victor Hi Fidelity Consoles
10 Mink Stoles
13 RCA Victor Color TV Sets
15 RCA Victor Hi Fidelity Phonographs
55 Wrist Watches

Each bag shown in the picture contains 1,000 U. S. silver dollars. Each money chest is packed with the same equal assortment of all U. S. silver coins in current circulation. There are twice as many coins in the money chests as there are silver dollars on the roof of the stagecoach.

2. Mail your completed entry, with one estimate only, together with 3 wrappers from any size of Ivory Soap to: Ivory Give-Away, P. O. Box 14, Cincinnati 99, Ohio. Enter as often as you wish but each entry must comply with all the rules and be mailed in a separate envelope. Entries must be postmarked not later than midnight May 1, 1960 and received no later than midnight, May 15, 1960. Entries are limited to residents of the Continental United States (including Alaska) and Hawaii, but excluding employees of Procter & Gamble, its advertising agencies and their families. This contest is subject to government regulations.

3. SPECIAL $10,000 BONUS
If your three Ivory Soap wrappers include one wrapper from each size of Ivory—Large, Medium and Personal Size—you will receive a $10,000 bonus if you are the First Prize Winner.

4. In case of ties, which are quite possible, tying contestants will be required to complete a statement about Ivory Soap. The most apt of the tie-breaking statements will be selected and rated for prizes. Except for incidental help from family and friends, entries must be wholly the work of the person in whose name the entry is submitted, and will be disqualified for outside, professional or compensated help. The purpose of this rule is to disqualify entries prepared in whole or in part by professional or compensated contest writers, schools, or services. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in case of ties in statements judged. Only one prize will be awarded to any person or household.

5. Judges' decisions will be final. No entries will be returned. Entries, contents and ideas therein belong unqualifiedly to Procter and Gamble for any and all purposes. The winners or tying entrants will be notified by mail about 8 weeks after close of contest. A list of winners will be available upon request approximately 3 months after close of contest.

©Procter & Gamble

"That's why we have an election: so that these little differences . . ."

Under Cover

By BERNARDINE KIELTY

One August morning in 1947 a young American congressman drove away from the castle of Lismore in Ireland on a short trip of exploration. Lismore Castle stands high on the Blackstone River, and is the property of the Duke of Devonshire. The young man had been visiting his sister, daughter-in-law of the duke, and was on his way to the village of New Ross, some fifty miles to the east. There he found what he was looking for: a farm cottage with thatched roof, whitewashed walls and dirt floor.

The American was John Kennedy, of Massachusetts, and the farm cottage was the home of Patrick Kennedy, his great-grandfather. It took John Kennedy under two hours to get back to Lismore Castle, but it had taken the Kennedy family a hundred years to get there—by way of the Atlantic Ocean and three generations of American business and politics.

John Kennedy: A Political Profile, by James MacGregor Burns (Harcourt, Brace), is not a gossipy book about a rich Irish-American family, as I may seem to be suggesting. It is a serious study of an American politician, vintage 1960, whom you may like, or may just as easily not like, as you learn to know him better. Would that all candidates for high office could be written up with such thoroughness and objectivity!

Perhaps the greatest value of this book is its clear, concise account of the workings of Congress, in which your markedly unpolitically minded reader found herself absorbed to the last word.

It is big news that Marcia Davenport has written a new novel. A versatile woman, the author of Mozart, The Valley of Decision and Of Lena Guyer now writes a passionate modern love story, underlined by a deeply controversial theme. The first title of this novel was A Winter in Milan, which is just what it is. The next was Harriet's Winter. Harriet, the beautiful American, certainly had a winter. The final title (as we go to press) is The Constant Image (Scribner). Although many women will take violent issue against it, I'd say that this is distinctly a woman's book. Yet the three men I know who have read it, to date, were fascinated.

Two JOURNAL favorites in book form, take note: THE QUEEN'S GRACE, novel about Katryn Parr by Jan Westcott, is already out (Crown), and QUEEN MARY, by James Pope-Hennessy—that remarkable biography!—is being published this month (Knopf).

Excellent mystery: A Penknife in My Heart, by Nicholas Blake (Harper).

Ethel Barrymore has appeared again. A lovely lady, slender in the aristocratic style of Charles Dana Gibson, her fair hair high in a pompadour, cheeks touched with pink, eyes blue as the sky, she walked onto the stage of a New York theater one Monday night last fall.

The stage was empty until the single figure walked on, graceful and at ease. Her dress of pale pink fell in soft folds to the floor, her blue eyes were smiling. It was Ethel Barrymore's daughter Ethel Colt, singing songs of America's musical theater from 1789 to 1959. This number was 1905, and she sang "Kiss Me Again." It was not an Ethel Barrymore song, because she had no songs, but it was of her time, and as her daughter sang it, tenderly and nostalgically, the glamour of another day spread across the little theater.

That was a year to be remembered: Mlle. Modiste, of course, in which Fritzi Scheff sang "Kiss Me Again"; Peter Pan, with Maude Adams; Shaw's Man and Superman; Edith Wharton's The House of Mirth; and three shutout games pitched by Christy Mathewson in the World Series.

The year 1911 was a good one too—a comfortable, secure, prosperous time in which to have lived. The novel that won the Lippincott Award this year is about 1911, and a big comfortable, prosperous Jewish family living in a country place on Long Island, in what today would be considered sumptuous style—with maids, chauffeur, and hats galore. Mrs. Sherman's Summer, by Marjorie Fischer (Lippincott), is definitely gemütlich. Several daughters, sons-in-law and grandchildren; strong-minded mamma with an eagle eye, and oldest son Joe, hated because he holds the moneybag—maybe this is the American answer to G. B. Stern's The Matriarch.

3 Festive Frostings

—HOMEMADE PERFECT WITH BETTY CROCKER FROSTING MIXES!

"Just add water to our Fluffy Frosting Mixes for light 'n elegant 'cooked' frostings—without cooking. Just blend butter with our Creamy Frosting Mixes for rich, smooth, buttery frostings. We guarantee you'll have a homemade perfect* frosting every time!"

Betty Crocker

To-Each-His-Own Frosting! Your frosting whips right up into glossy peaks! Fill cake, then divide frosting into 3 parts; tint. Mark sections on cake; frost in alternate colors. Add coconut.

Hobnail Frosting! Rich, chocolatey, please-a-man frosting you make in minutes. To make hobnail design, press bowl of teaspoon down on frosting, swirl slightly and draw up into sharp peaks.

Valentine Frosting! Ever-so-pretty party pink frosting! Bright red cherries are right in the package! Fill cake and frost top. Tint remaining frosting deeper pink with food coloring. Draw heart outline with toothpick; then fill in outline with ⅓ cup tinted frosting. Frost sides of cake.

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top with a letter describing your results to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis 40, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back!

VALENTINE FOR MY CHILDREN

By HOLLY HICKLER

The dawn filtered through the corrugated-glass windows of the delivery room. A young man with his head bound in white and a cotton mask drooping under his chin leaned over me. "A boy and a girl," he said and smiled. I closed my eyes and wept. That was nine years ago. Six years ago Mark was delivered in a hallway between the semiprivate floor and the labor room. The nurse's aide told me never to do that again. Three years ago Lisa obediently waited a reasonable time before making her arrival.

The valentines I want to give them won't fit by their places on the table. They are made up of gratitude that floods the house, laughter, closeness, anger, too, and anxiety and pain.

"What color are your eyes, Peter?" we used to say when you were small. Your eyes are blue—a light dazzling blue—with a gravity in them. But, unexpectedly, you smile—a tolerant grown-up smile—and show a partly colored campaign poster you are making for school elections. Your anger, when it comes, is just as sudden and overwhelming. But whatever your private struggles are, I can't know any more; you are past the age for holding. Designs for rockets are scattered on your desk. Baseball pictures clutter your shelves. I see you, touched by lamplight, leaning over your map drawing, lips pursed. I must learn to keep distance. You are trying to make your way toward the tents of the men, as Indian boys do. I will find a funny valentine for you. You must not know how my heart surrounds you.

Kate, your dark blond hair is shining and swinging as you come toward me, your full mouth as always on the verge of smiling, your slightly tilted gray eyes amused and comprehending. You like jewelry and fancy dresses, and trying out my make-up. You want a bicycle and skates. You make doll arrangements in your room, tiny flowers out of paper, an acorn cup with minute red clay apples for the table centerpiece. You patiently play with Lisa, but fly at her for disturbing your possessions. You have a listening face. I watch your generosities, your warmth, your responsiveness to friends. Your valentine must be pink, of course, flowered and conventional. It will tell you nothing of my joy in you.

What for you, Markie? With your jacket flying open you rush past me, flashing a crooked grin, and bang down your lunch box with a handful of first grade papers, grab an apple and run out again. You asked the other day, "What does mean mean?" I leaned down and hugged you and we laughed together, your wide grin showing uneven teeth. Your arms around me were wiry. Laughter bursts from you in squeals and long silent breaths. You have tacked up five drawings of pirate ships. But you are gentle with pets, your brown eyes sweet with sympathy. I will find you a Teddy-bear card that has a tab to pull to make the bear move. You will show it proudly to Peter.

You are pleased with dressing yourself, Lisa, and frown when I try to help if your shoes are on the wrong feet and your shirt is buttoned crooked. You breathe heavily in concentration, all your roundness bent toward the job. This is your work. "I'm a mommy, too," you announce proudly and take a washrag to dust the desk or wrap your dolls solicitously in damp towels from the bathroom. You watch your brothers and sister with wide eyes, laughing when they laugh, not bothering to understand the joke. You croon to yourself, playing with pebbles beside the driveway, utterly absorbed. When you wake up from your nap and call, I come in and sit down beside you. Your hair, so blond it looks white, is feathery on the pillow. I bury my head in your tummy. You smell sweetly of soap. "Give me a chocolate kiss," I say, playing our favorite game. "On'y stropberry," you announce, pretending to twist a stem from your mouth. Your kiss is cool and fresh. I nibble at your ear and feel the giggle run through your small body. I shall give you a candy valentine. You will invite Kate to share it.

I imagine each of you now going to the table to find your envelopes. Markie runs from his room, bumping into Kate. She walks, ignoring the shove. Lisa is behind her, dancing up and down on tiptoes. Peter stays in his doorway, waiting for Kate. I will stand silent and watching. Promise surrounds you like a haze of sunlight. "Happy Valentine's Day!" I shall laugh, while my heart pounds wordlessly, "I love you, I love you!" END

THE CHILD IN THE FAIR FRUIT

By KATE BARNES

The child in the fair fruit
growing bursts the heart,
Bends the desires, tames the wild spirit raging,
Gentles the hand, darkens the eye, and softens
The voice into a whisper of expectation.
"Now," says the wind to the branch, "now you are heavy
And all your blossoms are made manifest."
"Softly, softly," says the grass to the doe;
"You crop my growing seed to nourish your burden."
The quail sits murmuring in her crazy voice
To the fragile eggs, low hidden in the stalks.
And how should I be singing,
except to croon,
And how be dreaming, except of a child at my breast?

GOLDEN LIGHT CORN OIL

your golden guarantee of lighter crispier fried foods

...and of all leading brands

ONLY MAZOLA® IS CORN OIL

No other is more digestible. No other brand is better for delicious fried foods. Mazola pure corn oil is your golden guarantee of perfect frying.

When it comes to preparing good foods for your family, both the taste and the nutritional value are important. That's why you should use Mazola Corn Oil. Mazola makes fried foods crispy, golden outside — tender and juicy inside. Mazola is sparkling fresh for salads, brings out the zesty seasonings in homemade dressings. Mazola adds golden-light goodness to everything and of all leading brands, only Mazola is corn oil.

FRESH, CRISP SALAD WITH "EASY-MIX" FRENCH DRESSING
...SO GOOD WITH FRIED CHICKEN!

2 cups MAZOLA OIL	2 tablespoons sugar
1 cup vinegar	2 tablespoons catsup
1 tablespoon salt	1 teaspoon dry mustard

Measure all ingredients into bottle or jar. Cover and shake well. Chill. Shake before serving.

Nutrition...a delicious business at Adventurous ideas from the Breakfast Kitchen

You know the rule by heart . . . "Everyone should start the day with a good breakfast." . . . usually this means fruit, cereal, bread, milk, spread.

But you know your family! Someone isn't hungry. Someone else hasn't time. Suggestion—surprise them with something elegant and off-beat that packs in all those unseen proteins, vitamins and minerals that you know they need.

Even your most problem-y breakfaster should go for one of these glamorous ways to begin the day—including the worrisome gulp-and-runner. Each breakfast idea accounts for a good share of the daily food requirements. Each one is complete in its own bowl, plate or glass.

Color can guide you to a better me

If a meal is well-balanced nutritionally, it probably include a pleasing variety of colors.

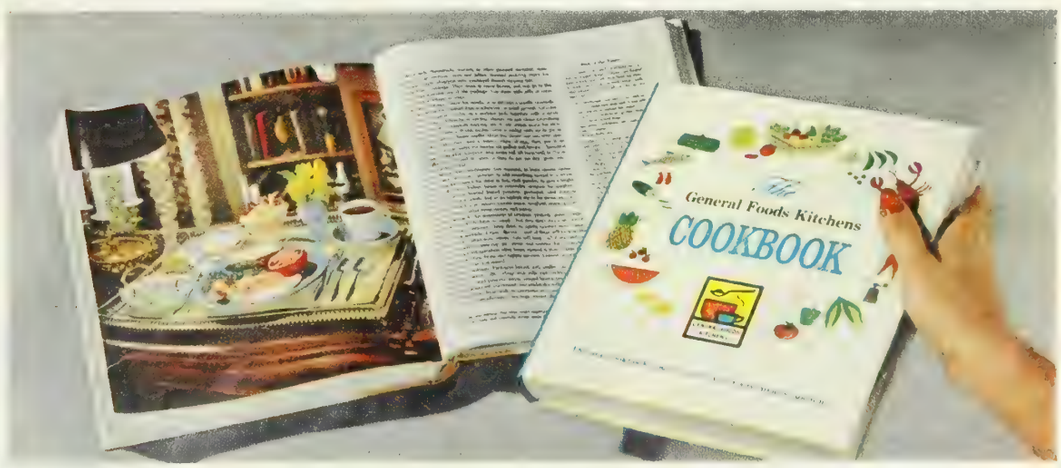
For instance: your dinner could be a gay c bination of protein-rich red meat, brown br white cheese or milk. A green salad and ye vegetables will round out a pretty color sch —and think of those vitamins and minerals!

t General Foods Kitchens

WHAT became of the old hat notion that wholesome food has to be dull? It bowed out when folks started to ask themselves: "What's the good of nourishing food, if you can't persuade people to eat it?"

At General Foods Kitchens, getting plenty of good-for-them food inside your family is one of our pet hobbies. That's why we set out to make nourishing Post Cereals the crispiest in the land; Log Cabin Syrup so rich in real maple flavor you'll love every drop.

That's why we gave Tang Breakfast Drink a taste everyone loves, as well as all those important vitamins A and C.



There's more to a cereal than meets the appetite

A cereal must be delicious so youngsters will scramble for it. But even cereals that taste alike can be different as night from day, nutritionally.

To make sure our Post Cereals bring you the good food values Nature intended, there's a clever machine at our Research Center. It's called the Colorimeter. Its job is to help us determine the vitamins, proteins and minerals that are present in nourishing Post Cereals.

So . . . when a Post package promises a certain number of milligrams of vitamin B_1 to a serving, you know that's what you'll get.

Easy way to plan nutritious meals from The General Foods Kitchens Cookbook

On page 4, you'll find a handy rule-of-thumb nutrition guide. It groups the foods your family needs each day to be really well-fed.

To help you with the delicious end of things are hundreds of recipes. Tips on tempting the appetite with color. Meals for folks on diets.

The Cookbook helps you plan, prepare and serve hundreds of family and company meals. Uniquely arranged by situations. Written by the women of General Foods Kitchens.

At your bookstore now. De luxe edition—with holder-easel—$7.50. Regular edition—$4.95.

is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation.

When you see this seal on a food package,
you know you'll enjoy what's inside.

Here are some of General Foods fine products:

JELL-O GELATIN DESSERTS • TANG BREAKFAST DRINK • POST CEREALS • LOG CABIN SYRUP
MAXWELL HOUSE COFFEE • BIRDS EYE FROZEN FOODS • BAKER'S ANGEL FLAKE COCONUT

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Modern marriage is for adults. Today, successful living as husband and wife requires maturity. This month we meet two young people, Beth and Lance, who married before either was emotionally mature enough to live independently—let alone mature enough to live with another in marriage. The price they paid in unhappiness, before they came for marriage counseling to the American Institute of Family Relations, was a very high one. Everyone who is genuinely interested in the future of the American family is now hoping that an awakened public interest in the problem of too-early marriages will lead to more constructive marriage guidance for young people. The counselor in the case of Beth and Lance was Emanuel Groobin. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "His indifference to our baby and his fascination with his mother had a lot to do with our final blowup. I think my mother-in-law is stuck up and disagreeable."

HE: "Beth doesn't try to be efficient and on the ball. She used to be quick, vital, a lively girl. Nowadays she is intellectually dead on her feet."

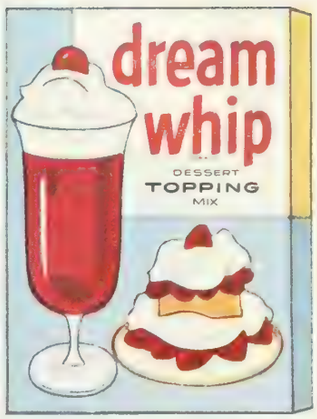
Beth tells her side: "This may sound rather strange to you, but I left Lance in order to save my love for him," said nineteen-year-old Beth, youthful wife of a college senior. She was broad-shouldered, deep-breasted, with vividly alive eyes, a big, well-lipsticked mouth. "The night Lance hit me, five weeks and two days ago, I knew I couldn't bear to be mistreated a second time. I was afraid my husband would make me learn to hate him. So I packed our baby daughter's bottles and diapers, picked her up, and went back to my parents' home in Bakersfield.

"Mother and I don't get on especially well—she is almost as bossy as my mother-in-law—but thanks to the tact and unselfishness of my father, the baby and I are making out all right. Surely Susie and I are better off than we would be staying any longer with Lance. Before our marriage he was warm and sensitive and generous. He has turned into a hermit, an egotist, a tyrant.

"He objects to my friendships with the other campus wives and hardly speaks to his fellow classmates. He does all his studying in the college library and leaves me alone with the baby for hours. Last month my family staged a big reunion to celebrate my youngest cousin's birthday and Lance behaved abominably about our going, although my mother and my aunts issued a special invitation to us. Lance and I had no engagements that weekend, but he wanted to stay away, annoy my parents and hurt everybody's feelings.

"If I say I'm lonely and need diversion, Lance says I'm stupid and unresourceful, that intelligent people are never lonely. That remark is a direct quote from my mother-in-law. Nowadays the only person in the world Lance seems to admire is his mother. He thinks his mother is a brain and that everybody else is a square.

"He ignores our baby daughter. On the morning of Susie's birth he strolled into the hospital room where I was coming out of the anesthetic—I had a Caesarean—and announced in an airy, offhand way that he had seen our baby in the nursery. 'It's a girl; weight eight pounds, four ounces,' he said, and that was all. He didn't tell me Susie was cute, that she had curly hair, that he was proud of her and me. He



CONTINUED ON PAGE 24

"Beth is badly spoiled, although she complains about her mother's strictness. She wasn't taught to cook, clean, wash and iron. I had to be the teacher."

Enjoy all you want

New Dream Whip is low in cost, low in calories–only 17 per serving. And so easy to mix–just add milk, vanilla, and whip. Comes in a box (big new double size or regular), stays fresh on your shelf, needs no refrigeration. Won't wilt, won't separate, keeps for days.

NEW DREAM WHIP

Light and lovely Dream Whip makes pies and puddings twice as fancy. And you can use it for days—stays fresh in the refrigerator.

Cherry Dream Cake is the easiest dessert ever! Simply layers of sponge cake . . . chopped cherries . . . and luscious new Dream Whip.

Snowy Pears—with Jell-O. Pear halves...soft Jell-O gelatin spooned on . . . and a mountain of Dream Whip. Calories? Hardly any.

Dream Whip on anything costs so little. Like on gingerbread cake. You can heap it high with never a thought for the budget.

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Tested by General Foods Kitchens. Jell-O and Dream Whip, trade-marks of General Foods Corp

Wish-Bone Italian DRESSING

gives Tomatoes a "touch of Genie-us"

Garden Bouquet

It's a joy to build a magnificent salad with tomatoes, leafy greens, and crisp raw vegetables. Just before serving, toss with Wish-Bone Italian until the greens glisten with its golden goodness. Perky vinegar and oil, swimming with sparkling seasonings and tender young chopped garlic buds.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 22

doesn't kiss Susie, he doesn't cuddle her. Whenever the other wives praise her, he scowls and walks away.

"His indifference to our baby and his fascination with his mother had a lot to do with our final blowup. On Sunday five weeks ago we went to visit his mother. It's a long drive and all the way he kept up a drumfire of complaints. Why did I hold Susie in my arms? The poor child was teething. Why was I such a sloppy housekeeper? Our apartment is miserably equipped and located in a dismal Quonset hut with peeling walls and splintery floors that are virtually impossible to clean. Later my mother-in-law added her bit of cheer by informing me that Susie was wet, which wasn't news and was no concern of hers. I asked Lance to do the diaper changing, but he refused on the grounds that our baby was sticky and repulsive. That was his exact crack, and in his mother's hearing. I broke down and cried.

"Neither Lance nor his mother showed any sympathy. All afternoon my mother-in-law and Lance carried on an interminable private conversation without so much as a smile at Susie or a nod in my direction. They discussed philosophy, economics, debit financing and other abstruse subjects with which Lance is currently involved. He is majoring in business administration and his mother keeps in close touch with his curriculum. Whenever he takes up a course of study which she doesn't feel competent to discuss, she enrolls for that course in night school. She has already earned enough credits to qualify as a certified public accountant and there is nothing, but nothing, she can't talk about for hours with Lance.

When a man is wrong and won't admit it, he always gets angry.

HALIBURTON

"I think my mother-in-law overdoes her scholarship, that she is stuck up and disagreeable, and on the drive home I said so. At once Lance launched a violent attack on both my mother and my father, who have done no harm to him. I tried to shut my ears. At last we reached our apartment. Another student's wife, with whom I'd left our key, was there. She and several of my other buddies had made sandwiches and a big pot of coffee for us. Lance was intolerably rude. He practically ordered my friends to leave.

"Then after he banged the door he suddenly decided we could make up our quarrel by making love. I wasn't in the mood. I couldn't forget the torrents of abuse and criticism. Besides, Susie was crying and needed to be fed. I pushed Lance away. At that point he hauled off and hit me.

"Next morning I took the baby and went back to my parents. Mother wasn't surprised to see me. From the beginning she had predicted my marriage would fail because Lance wasn't a member of her church and wasn't established as a breadwinner. She often reminds him that he isn't self-supporting and that my father, who has no college degree, earns $12,000 a year in the construction business.

"Susie and I moved into my old room, which is beautifully furnished and vastly superior to what Lance provided for us. Next day mother offered to tend the baby for me and suggested I go out and get a job. Father thought I should wait awhile, but as usual mother had her way. A few days later I found work at $60 a week—I'm an expert secretary—and began paying board for Susie and myself.

"I haven't received a penny from Lance since I left him. Mother considers that a scandal, but I don't agree. Lance has no money to spare. He receives $100 a month from his father, who is separated from his mother, and earns $200 working in a filling station, but that isn't much when you figure on books and tuition as well as living expenses. Frankly, I'm glad I'm able to do without his assistance.

"Lance has always made me furious by acting as though I were a financial idiot. I was

CONTINUED ON PAGE 29

NEW WONDER DRUG LOTION
STOPS STINGING O
DETERGENT
HANDS...instantly

When hands are dried out . . . sore and r from burning "detergent irritation" or ch ping . . . they may itch or sting painfully. Y want quick relief and healing help ordin "cosmetic" lotions can't possibly give you.

A remarkable new medicated lotion is t answer to your problem. Called Solarcaine is greaseless, stainless . . . acts in these 4 wa

(1) Wonder "anesthetics" such as ben caine "put pain nerves to sleep" . . . relie the smarting discomfort almost at once. "Refrigerant" ingredients act to cool a soothe instantly. (3) Skin "conditionin agents soften the tissues, restore moistu And (4) Antiseptics penetrate the skin's s face and help to stimulate quick healing.

Solarcaine is wonderful for kitchen burns, too . . . for "skin pain" and minor itching. In plastic squeeze bottle. Save up to $1.42 by getting large size.

SOLARCAINE

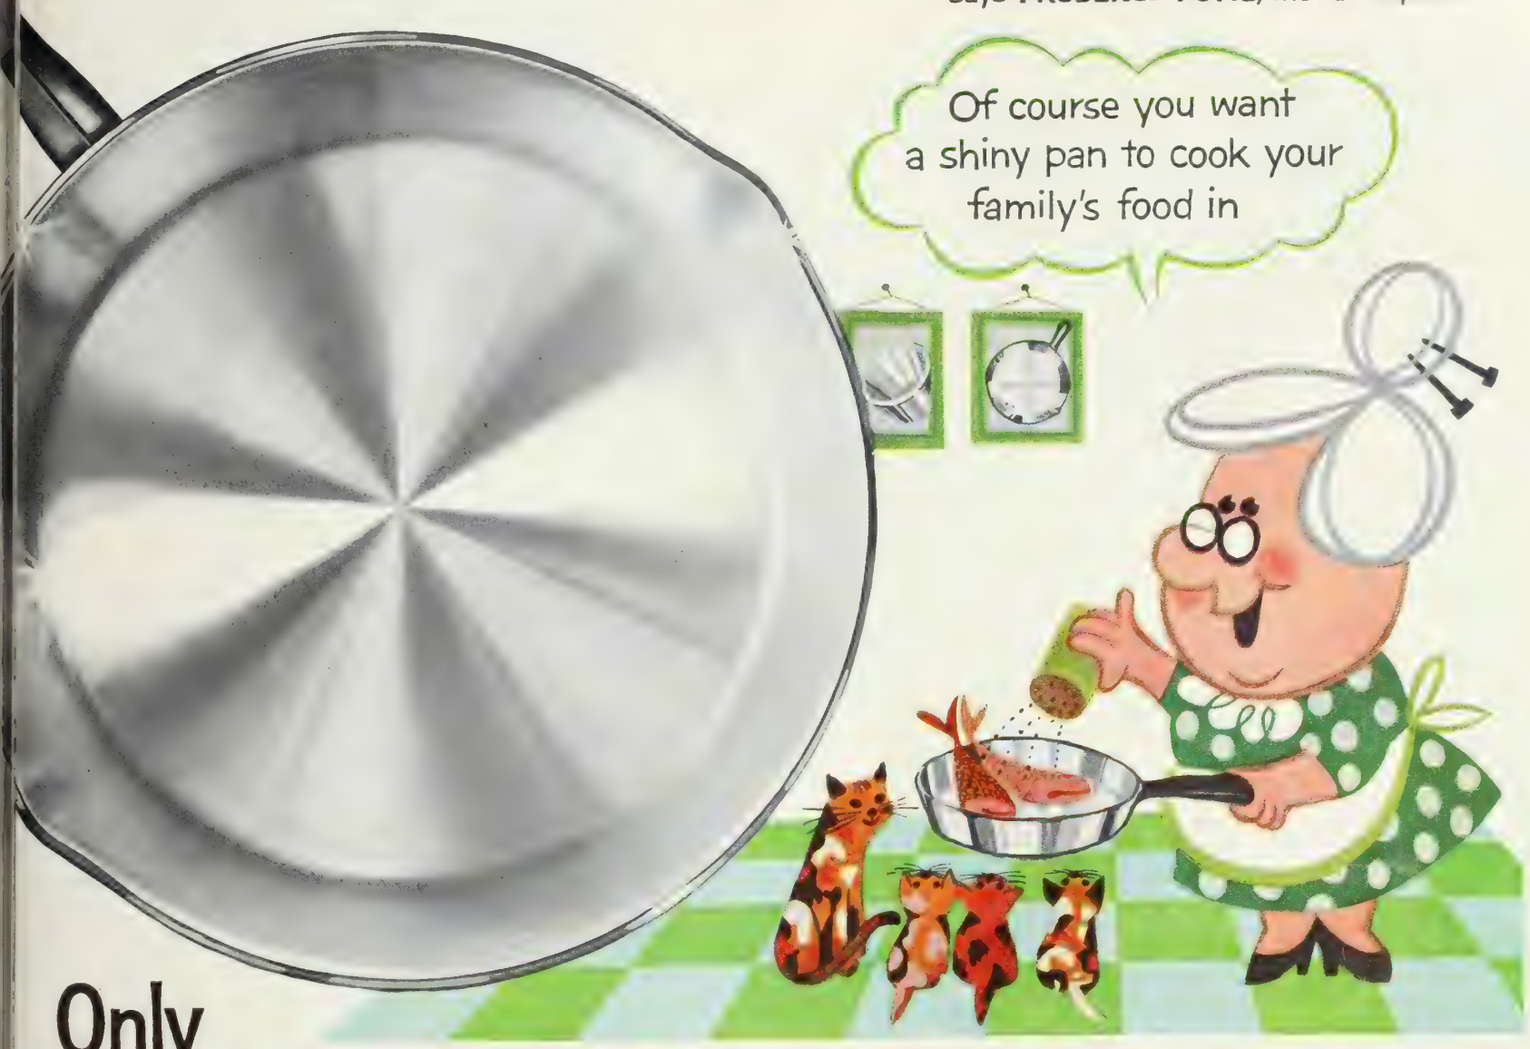
FREE! STAMP FREAKS

To introduce you to the World's Largest Stamp Firm and America's Favorite Hobby — Four Spectacular Offers in One!
115 different, genuine foreign postage stamps:
1. World's Largest and Smallest stamp.
2. Fantastic collection of other stamp freaks — giants, midgets, weird designs, peculiar shapes, from strange remote corners of the world — Aden to Zanzibar!
3. Giant Collection of 100 all-dif. stamps from other exciting parts of the globe.
4. Big Bargain Catalog; Collector's Guide, other exciting stamp offers for your free inspection. Send 10c for mailing. ACT NOW.
H. E. HARRIS & CO., DEPT F54, Boston, Mass

LIVING FENCE

Amazing Fast Growing Red Rose

See the sensational Red Robin Living Fence (Gloir Des Rosomanes) that's sweeping the country! Sur round your property with beauty and protectio for as little as 12c a foot. Plant this spring, have vigorous Living Fence bursting with fragrant re roses this summer. Grows up to 6 feet. Not a mul tiflora. Keeps out intruders, noise. Available onl from Ginden Nursery. Send name, address for fre full-color landscape book, prices, guarantees, etc
GINDEN NURSERY Dept. 3131, San Bruno, Calif.



RUST STAINS
Vanish in 15 Seconds with WHINK

At your favorite store, or from your tea and coffee man. If not supplied, send $1.00 per bottle postpaid
WHINK PRODUCTS, ELDORA, IOWA

"The shine is the sign it's really clean!"

says PRUDENCE POTTS, the Pan Inspector

Only Brillo Soap Pads

contain special soap with Jewe

Nothing else cleans so fast... shines so bright... your best buy too!

Firmer, sturdier pads

A Brillo Soap Pad just has to clean more pots. The only pad that's tightly knit with firm "hemmed" edges—to stay in shape longer—give extra cleaning surface for crusty scouring jobs.

Richer, livelier lather

"Lavish" is the word for Brillo lather. Foams up faster because each pad is packed with soap clear through. Brillo with its exclusive polishing soap cleans faster, shines brighter!

Thriftier, more pads

Count the extra pads you get in the 5, 12 and 20 pad boxes. No other product gives you so many pads—such long-lasting pads—plus special soap with Jeweler's Polish. Your best buy!

GUARANTEED! A NEW UTENSIL FREE IF BRILLO FAILS TO CLEAN!

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y. and Toronto, Canada

Nothing shines aluminum like BRILLO

Softasilk Cake Flour and Westinghouse say: "It's Leap Year!"

Be Smart Be Sweet have a Leap Year Treat!

A Leap Year party's the thing... in which to capture or keep the fancy of the man in your life. Bake a sweetheart of a Softasilk cake. And let him make the coffee to show how smart he is! (It's easy with a new Westinghouse Spoutless Coffee Maker.)

Leap Year Cake

- 2¼ cups sifted SOFTASILK
- 1½ cups sugar
- 3½ tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. salt
- ½ cup soft shortening
- 1 cup milk
- 1 tsp. flavoring
- 4 egg whites (½ to ⅔ cup), unbeaten

Heat oven to 350° (mod.). Sift dry ingredients. Add shortening, ⅔ cup milk, flavoring. Beat 2 min. Add ⅓ cup milk, egg whites. Beat 2 more min. Divide cake batter between 2 greased and floured pans—one 8" sq. pan and one 8" round layer pan. Bake 30 to 35 min.; cool. To make heart-shaped cake, follow pictured directions below. Frost with your favorite homemade fluffy frosting or for special ease, use Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting Mix. In either case, add a few drops of red coloring to get just the shade of pink you like. Decorate with candy hearts.

pushed La off and hit
"Next m back to my
to see me.
dicted my wasn't a m tablished a him that he

With Betty Crocker Softasilk Cake Flour it's easy to make this heart-shaped cake that says "I love you" any day of the year. You'll bake it lighter, higher and lovelier with Softasilk, because it's made from a special blend of the world's finest wheats. Make all your extra-special homemade cakes with Softasilk . . . and be proud you did!

A soft...soft...Softasilk cake says such nice things about you!

Save $1.00

00 refund on this new estinghouse Spoutless ffee Maker
th certificate packed
this specially flagged Softasilk package.

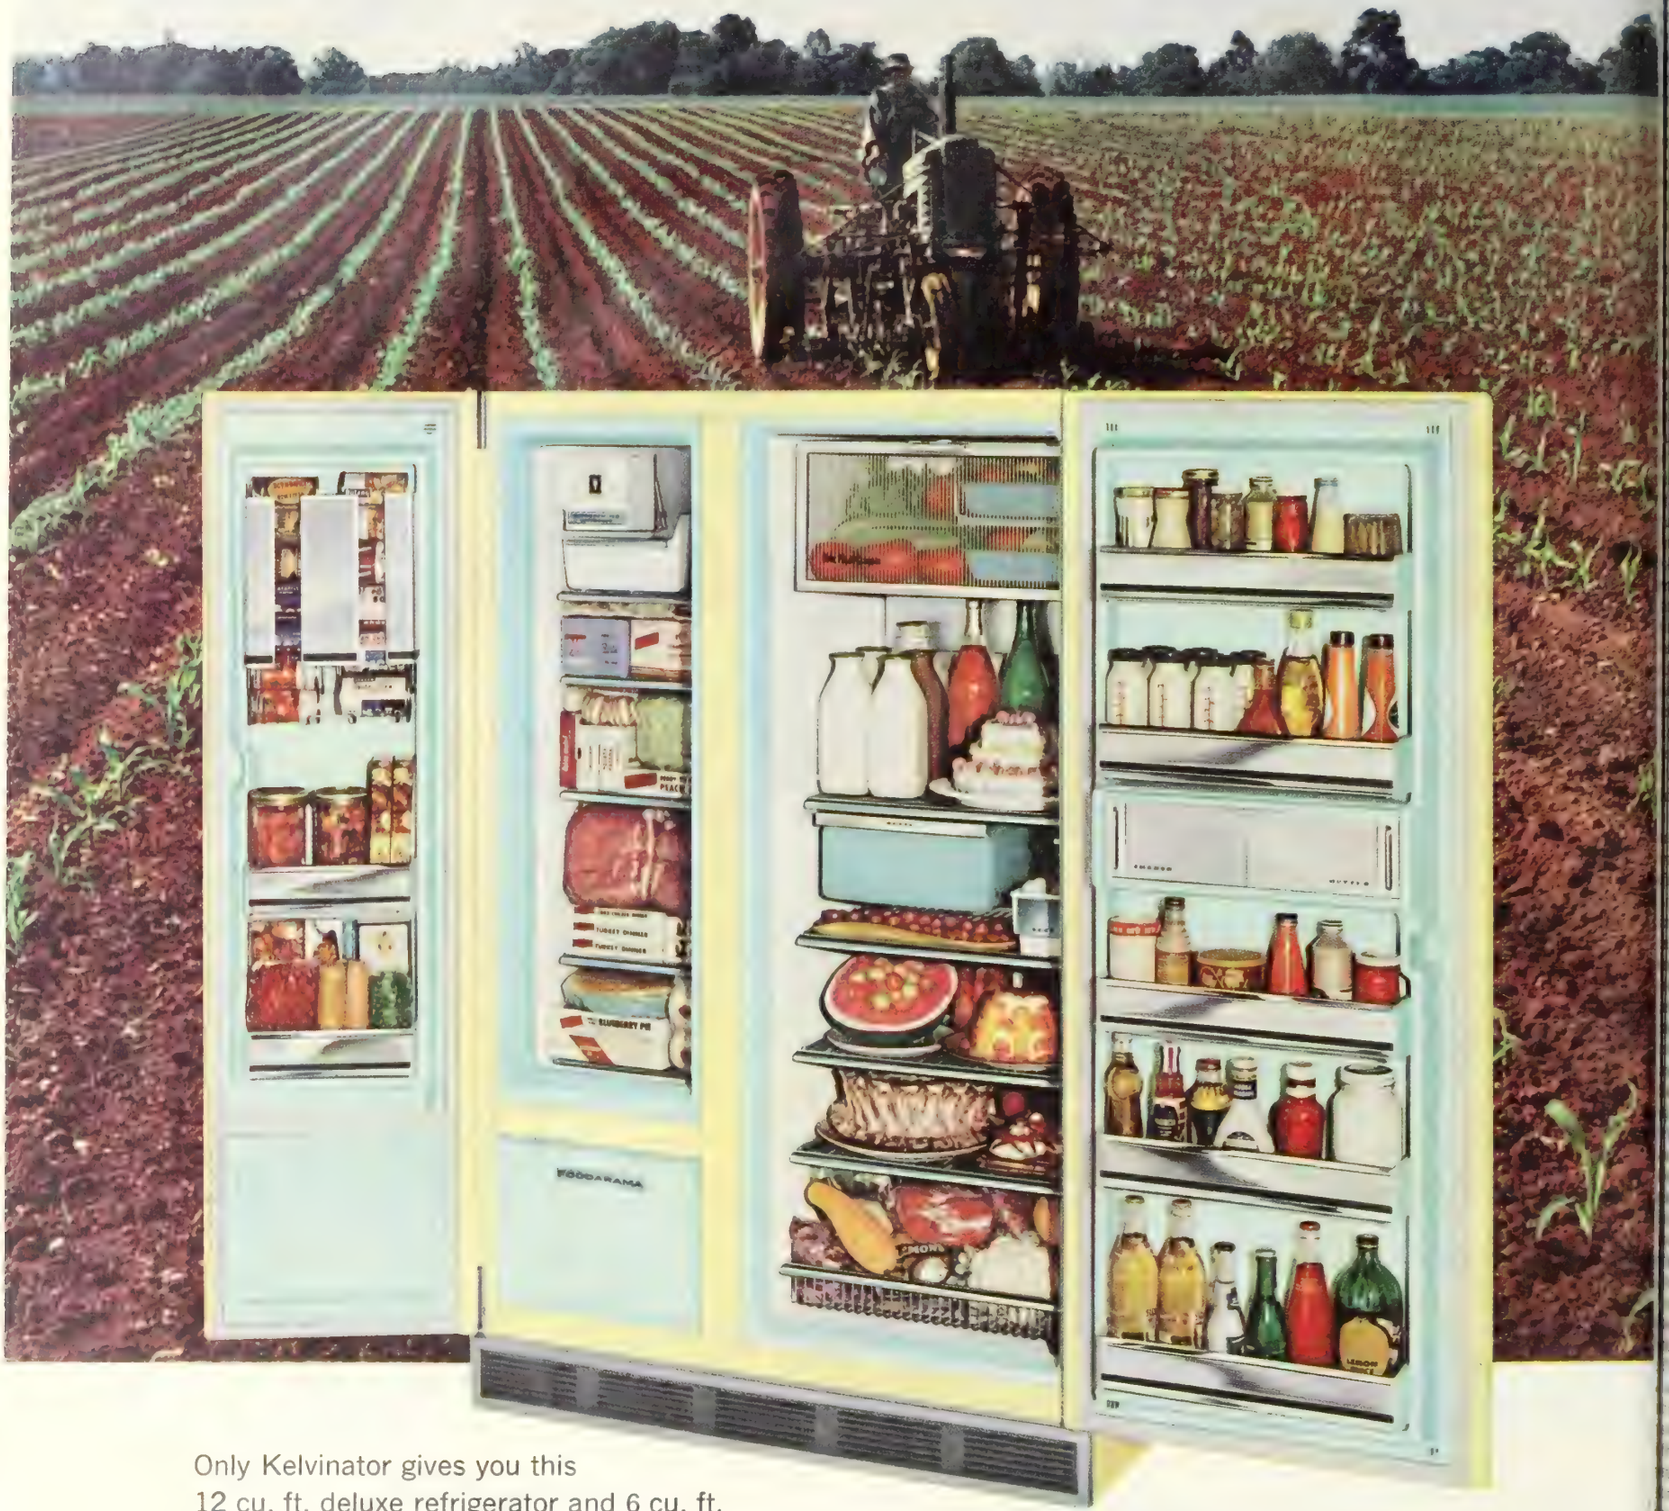
ils on how to get your $1 (plus 5¢ for postage)
d on flagged Softasilk package.



What a special month this is—
Leap Year and Valentine's Day all together! Celebrate with the best coffee you can make...in a new Westinghouse Spoutless Coffee Maker.

Every brew is deliciously fresh—time after time! This new Westinghouse Coffee Maker has no spout to collect bitter-tasting oils. Coffee pours fluidly through an opening in the top. Brewed to taste "mild" or "strong." Just set automatic brew-selector dial. Starts perking in seconds; flashes light when coffee is ready! Brews two to eight cups of fresh, fragrant coffee.

YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse

The rich soil promises abundant foods for Foodarama Living

Only Kelvinator gives you this 12 cu. ft. deluxe refrigerator and 6 cu. ft.
upright freezer, all in one cabinet only 41 inches wide...

Fabulous Foodarama by Kelvinator

Foodarama Living brings greater enjoyment of the good things from America's fertile farms. It's a happy new way to save time, save money, entertain easier, and serve better meals all year long!

Foodarama's huge capacity puts an abundance of foods at your fingertips. You shop less but have more on hand. There's always room for supermarket bargains. And what a relief not to trot to and tote from a basement freezer.

You never defrost because frost never forms. Foodarama's safer, more economical "No-Frost" system makes frost a total stranger in both the freezer and fresh-food compartments. And with the automatic ice dispenser, you never fuss with ice trays, yet a plentiful supply of ice cubes is always conveniently at hand.

Even with all this, Foodarama actually costs you less to buy and operate than a separate refrigerator and freezer.

Foodarama is a stunning example of the basic quality and usefulness found in all kitchen and laundry appliances made by the Kelvinator Division of American Motors Corp., Detroit 32, Michigan. Make it yours! Fabulous Foodarama!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 24

in more than he was when we got mar-
I worked until ten days before Susie rn. Nevertheless, he constantly critily system of spending. I bought good in classic styles, and years from now I o be wearing them. My favorite dress ears old. Lance thinks it cost too much.
we first became acquainted he was g away a sizable amount of his father's check on beer, cigarettes and movies didn't own a decent suit or pair of nly jeans and slacks and loafers. I saw at he got a blue suit, a tweed jacket, a , two pairs of shoes. He looks marin those clothes. He thinks they cost ch.

ce regards his mother as a wizard barnter. At his request she bought nearly staple groceries for us, in quantity, and d them to our apartment twice a
She then stayed and told me how to e food. Lance thinks his mother is a ook and dietitian than I am; one of her urchases for us was a case of chocolate
g, a whole case, and if I never see chocudding again it will be soon enough.
metimes I'll admit I'm extravagant and nistakes. Who doesn't? I like to show ie. I've bought her things she doesn't need. The week we took her home
e hospital I fell for the spiel of a door-salesman and ordered two dozen ex-photographs. When she was a month ther salesman got me to subscribe for ensive magazine on child care. To pay or those crimes closed our joint g account and ter forced me
eal to him for ent I spent.

nce's attitude on ances burns me
isp. It's an in-my intelligence.
ther has plenty
s, but way back childhood she me the value of
. The summer I
elve and started itting, she began to charge me three a week for board. My father objected, brushed him off. She banked the pay-
I made and that fall she let me apply the ulated savings to my school wardrobe.
eling of independence was quite a thrill,
I must say mother blunted the thrill a y refusing to let me choose my own
.

ther was forty-four when I was born e and I have never held a frank, confi-conversation in our lives. She and her are too hidebound and prudish. They elieve in facing or talking straight facts.
ried to hold the girls in the family in line ron rules and regulations, but their ess misfired. I wasn't a virgin when I d and three of my girl cousins, like
, had their babies too soon.

was incredibly ignorant when I entered high school. My only sister is fifteen lder; I had no brothers, and boys and ife were a mystery to me. The first time I ruated I thought I was badly hurt and mother in terror. She equipped me and ted to reassure me, but her voice was so d and peculiar that I asked no quesshe volunteered no information.

ur school you couldn't survive socially t going steady. Partly because of my r and partly because of my unbecoming s, I was cold-shouldered by the boys and t of everything. At the age of fourteen I ver had a date. One night I slipped out-nd lay on the cold ground and hoped I catch pneumonia and die. I didn't catch nonia—I didn't even catch a cold—and morning I decided to put up a fight and myself popular. A member of mother's h had a son who was three years older and an outstanding athlete. I got up my and went to Hal and asked him if he d to be my steady.

obably out of sheer surprise Hal said or several months we went to the school affairs together and I walked on air and everything was all right. Hal and I seldom kissed each other. Mostly he rambled on about sports and I listened and praised his prowess and smiled at the proper intervals. During the summer vacation, however, he worked on a railroad gang with a bunch of grown men and I guess they talked about sex and such. Anyway, the day he returned we drove to a deserted orange grove and he seduced me. He didn't explain what he wanted, he didn't woo me in any real sense. He skipped all the grace and sweetness of love-making. I scarcely knew what had happened except I knew I had done wrong, very wrong.

"Once I started with Hal I didn't know how to stop. I was afraid of him, I guess. For two years we went together and the other girls envied me. About once a week we would have sexual relations. Sometimes it was only thirty minutes from the time he picked me up at our house until he took me back. I used to hate those times; Hal made me feel like a shoeshine rag or something he used and then threw away. He never treated me like a sweetheart.

"Until I was graduated from high school I behaved as though I were under a spell and had no will power of my own. At sixteen I got an exciting job with a newly founded electronics firm—I refused my father's offer to send me to college—and simultaneously I acquired a little spunk. I told Hal I was through with him and all men.

"My refusal to see him any more had an odd effect on Hal. He began clamoring for dates, real dates, fun dates. My mother and his mother, who were close friends through their church, had no idea of the real situation. They thought Hal and I would make an ideally happy married couple. We went out a few times more, but on a very different basis. I wouldn't even let him kiss me good night. I didn't love Hal, I had never loved him, but I hesitated when he proposed that we announce our engagement on my seventeenth birthday. It was partly because of mother's urging, but I had another reason for my indecision. Because of the wrong I had done with Hal I wondered if I weren't obligated to marry him.

Democracy wishes to elevate mankind, to teach it to think, to set it free. It seeks to remove from culture the stamp of privilege and disseminate it among the people—in a word, it aims at education.

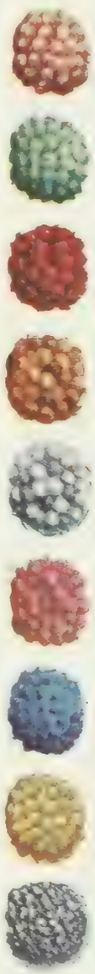
THOMAS MANN
The Coming Victory of Democracy

"Two weeks before my birthday I met Lance. It was love at sight with me, or maybe it was trust at sight. I have always felt that Lance and I met like two rocks hurtling separately through the air, colliding and then falling to the earth together. I'd never been able to talk to Hal; I couldn't get enough of talking to Lance. That first evening I told Lance everything—all about my troubles and worries, all the things I'd never dared tell my parents. Lance was only two years older, but he was finishing his second year at college and to me he seemed the ultimate in wisdom. I know he was the ultimate in kindness that evening. When he told me I wasn't obligated to marry Hal, that my idea was ridiculous, I believed him. He gave me the courage to break with Hal.

"There was a terrible ruckus at home. Mother carried on for days. She didn't approve of Lance because he was a student and wasn't working full time. She considered his car a disgrace. But when she tried to break us up I threatened to change jobs, leave town, move closer to Lance. That silenced her.

"Lance and I didn't intend to be married until he was graduated from college. We dated every weekend. He was living with two other college students, but frequently they went out and let us have the apartment to ourselves. Sometimes I cooked his dinner. In those days he thought my cooking was marvelous and didn't get all upset if I left the dishes unwashed. Once my parents took a vacation and we managed to spend two whole nights together. With Lance and me, sex was a true expression of love, though I know the world would consider our actions wrong. At times I was afraid

CONTINUED ON PAGE 33



Save-Factory-to-You

FREE Beautiful Rug, Carpet Catalog in Full Color — MAIL COUPON

"It's Reversible—so we can use Both Sides."

4-color Tweed beauty possible only the Olson Loom-Woven Way

Isn't our New Olson Broadloom Wonderful?
. . and we Saved about ½

"It's pure Magic . . . Olson Broadloom Magic! Our dreams really came true the day we wrote for the big Free Olson Rug and Carpet Catalog in actual colors. We were delighted to find we could get Better Rugs and Save up to Half by sending our Old Rugs, Carpets, Clothing to the Olson Factory."

For every pound of your material required, we Add almost one pound of New Wool. And if you wish, you can send your materials After your new rugs arrive.

THE VALUABLE SEASONED WOOLS (and other materials) are expertly reclaimed like new by the famous Olson Process—then merged and combined with choice, imported New Wools to give you the most luxurious, longest-wearing rugs or wall-to-wall carpeting you've ever seen for so little money. Small Monthly Payments if you wish.

YOUR CHOICE of 49 newest Tweeds, Solid Textured colors, Embossed Effects, Florals, Oriental and Early American designs in any width up to 18 feet, seamless, and in any length in about a week. Nearly 4,000,000 customers. Satisfaction Guaranteed or Your Money Back. Our 86th year. Save—Direct from Factory!

Olson Display Rooms In Many Cities . . . Factory Representatives In Many More.

We'll mail you our nearest address when you write for catalog. If you wish, we can come to your home with samples in many areas—or you can order by mail.

Mail Coupon or Postcard to nearest address

FREE America's Money-Saving Carpet, Rug Book in Color

49 Model Rooms—Decorating Ideas— Gift Coupon

Your Name_____

Address_____ © ORC

Town_____ State_____

Olson Rug Co. Dept. K-27 — CHICAGO, 41 2800 N. Pulaski | NEW YORK, 1 15 W. 34th St. | SAN FRANCISCO, 8 209 Post Street

OLSON Broadloom Rugs, Carpets

World's Largest Makers Dealing Direct with the Home

Captivating little blooms in spicy colors! Northrup King's new

Sugar 'n Spice ZINNIA

Here's a truly miniature zinnia that's enchantingly pretty!

Northrup King's new Sugar 'n Spice Zinnia gives you tiny, fully doubled blooms in clear vibrant colors . . . on compact plants only 10 to 14 inches high.

Picture these glowing little beauties brightening your flower beds or borders . . . or accenting foundation plantings! In flower arrangements, they're an inspiration . . . the crisp dainty blooms last and last! And what colors . . . Clove Pink, Sugar White, Saffron Yellow, Chili Orange and Pepper Red.

Be among the first to plant Sugar 'n Spice Zinnia! It's easy to grow, early to bloom, and costs only 25¢ a packet at your Northrup King Seed Rack. It's one of Northrup King's famous "Garden Winners" . . . newest improved flower varieties in special cellophane-wrapped packets.

Left, background: another 1960 Garden Winner! It's Northrup King's blazing "Forest Fire Celosia."

NORTHRUP KING SEEDS

NK

Even if you've never planted a seed... it's easy to

PUNCH 'N GRO NK

TRADEMARK

Brighten dull winter days with perky, colorful flowers you grow on your own window-sill! It's easy, sure, inexpensive . . . whether you're growing for winter cheer or spring transplants! You'll delight in this dainty new planter that comes "ready-to-grow". Perfect gift, too, for shut-ins, hospital patients, school and scouting projects.

Punch 'n Gro is a colorful, plastic planter with the seeds already planted. It has a special growing "soil" with plant nutrients added. The seeds are held in place on a patented top for best spacing and planting depth. Available in a variety of your favorite flowers and vegetables.

NORTHRUP KING SEEDS

NK

LEMON DROP MARIGOLD

They bloom indoors! Specially chosen strain of dwarf plants will bloom, and bloom, and bloom! Idea . . . try Rainbow Coleus for dazzling-color leaves—or Indoor Peppermint Pinks with miniature blossoms that you'll love!

At your dealer's now

ONLY

49¢

You just punch with a pencil, water and watch 'em grow!

"BRINGING UP BABY" HINTS COLLECTED BY MRS. DAN GERBER, MOTHER OF FIVE

Aids to Baby's Athletic Program:

Baby needs his daily dozens. For exercise, like sound sleep and balanced meals, helps baby grow and glow. A few small-fry "setting-ups" that your little gymnast will love:

PRE-BATH WORK-OUT

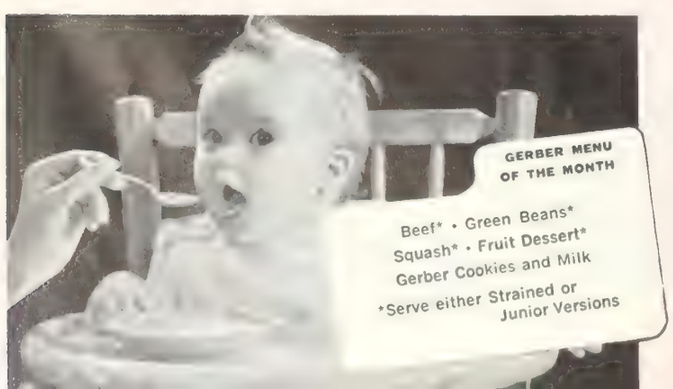
Let baby kick to his heart's content, with no clothes to hamper his enthusiastic exercises.

PULL UPS

If your baby is old enough to hold up his head, let him latch on to your index fingers. Then gently pull him up and down for a minute or two.

PLAY GAMES

When baby gets older, Pat-A-Cake and Peek-A-Boo combine mild exercise with lessons in coordination.



YOUR LITTLE ATHLETE NEEDS PROTEIN

For growth and muscle development, meat means protein with a capital P. For high-quality protein with lots of appetite-tempting variety, ARMOUR Gerber offers 13 Strained and Junior Meats — from beef to chicken, veal to lamb. All are made from selected, lean Armour cuts, specially processed to remove most of the fat and preserve a high degree of vitamin values.

Exercise your imagination in planning your baby's main meal-with-meat. Vary the menu with Gerber High Meat Dinners . . . "baby casseroles" of meat and vegetables. Prepared by specialists who help you combine what baby needs with what he likes.

MORE "GROWING POWER"

for your baby. Gerber High Protein Cereal has a whopping 35% protein content . . . a delicate, toasted, nut-like flavor babies love. Like the other 4 good-tasting Gerber Cereals it's specially cooked and twice-tested for digestibility.

BABIES ARE OUR BUSINESS . . . OUR ONLY BUSINESS!

P. S. from Dan Gerber: It might interest you to know that one of our major projects is a constant search to find methods that will promote the preservation of natural food values. As a result of this continuing study, we have developed special cooking and processing methods to provide the utmost in nourishment so important to your baby. Gerber Baby Foods, Fremont, Michigan.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 29

her might find me out, but I never felt with him. Not once.
en I became pregnant in the middle of ior year at college both of us were —or so I thought. If there had to be with my mother, I was prepared to
There was no battle. I now believe suspected the truth. She had always of a big wedding, but now the big wed-isn't mentioned. Lance and I were marth just the two families attending. It first time I had met his mother.
ring our courtship we didn't quarrel a ime or even raise our voices to each
Our quarrels commenced with mar-
My mother-in-law took charge of our shopping. Her wedding present to us nonth's supply of food and she selected ingle item. We had to move into the d students' quarters. I wouldn't have the poor accommodations, but I did Lance's insulting the friends I made the other wives, his carping at the way I did everything, from unpacking cases to scrubbing the kitchen floor. I egnant, I was working long, hard hours office. I couldn't see why he didn't un-ne clothes and scrub the floor himself.
ought I should wash and iron his shirts rofessional, though I had never ironed life. Mother didn't want me fooling in her kitchen and laundry.
henever it was time to visit my parents made a scene. My mother wanted us to hand on Sunday. With us, Sunday has been a family day, with my aunts and s dropping in. Lance abhors traditions—aditions of my family. He feels very toward the traditions his mother has ly dreamed up. During our courtship ely heard of her existence, but now he to see her practically every weekend.
aybe I could learn to tolerate Lance's ms of me, maybe I could learn to e his blows. I just can't stand to have ut his mother first, nor can I stand to im criticize Susie. Unless Lance is will-change his whole attitude, I think we continue to live separately. I still love but, as things are, I don't care to share
d. To me sex without affection and muderstanding is wrong. I can't take the hat someday I might feel as coldly to-Lance as I used to feel toward Hal."

ce Tells His Side:

fore Beth and I were married I thought as something rare and special," said
-one-year-old Lance, a slender, somber-ng young man with wide, intelligent eyes.
I'm not a cinch to please. The other day down and made a chronological list of girl I had met in my life, beginning back mentary school. When I finished I d the only one on the list who had ever sted me in the slightest was Beth. She is ly girl I ever went with of wanted to go on a regular basis.
ossibly I should have remained a bache-y inclination I am a sort of solitary inual. After I entered college I roomed with r three other fellows, sometimes more, y object was to save on expenses, not to companionship. I was bored by most roommates—in my opinion, they were ch of time wasters and they considered dreary grind—but I did have one friend d Fred. In a way it was because of Fred met Beth. Around the Christmas holiwo years ago Fred and I got fed up with ing one evening and began boasting and nging lies about the girls we knew.
er of us had dated the whole semester—
roke, too busy with books. Finally I bet
I could be the first to land a date. We raced for the telephone. Purely on spec d a married student whose wife is from rsfield, Beth's home town. Beth happened visiting their apartment, so I won my nd got a date that same night.
the beginning I was bowled over by by her directness and honesty. Most le are such hypocrites. But Beth—well, w think she is too outspoken and free
t expressing her ideas and her feelings.
aughs so hard in the movies others stare
r, and she cries by the bucketful.

"Not long ago she cried an hour because I complained that our baby's yelling was ruining my powers of concentration, although it was true. Eventually I had to go over to the college library to get away from the uproar. Last month I was working on an important term paper when Beth's mother ordered us to come to help celebrate a kid cousin's ninth birthday. I refused to drive the hundred and fifty miles for this command appearance. Beth turned on the waterworks and kept the tears flowing until eventually I gave in. My paper barely made the deadline.

"It seems childish and unprincipled to me for Beth to cry to get her own way. I've never seen my mother cry—or, for that matter, heard her laugh out loud. I was taught early to control my own emotions. My two sisters were usually let off easy, but I was the son and mother kept her standards high for me.

"Practically speaking, I had no father. During my boyhood my father spent months on end racketing around South America prospecting for oil. I used to wish he would stay at home like the other kids' fathers. One time mother caught me crying because he wasn't available to attend some school event. She whaled the daylights out of me and said my father was too busy to be interested in my affairs.

"I just can't understand a person like Beth. On the night we met she gave me a blow-by-blow account of her whole life. I was astonished, but flattered. When she asked my advice about the heel she was then dating, I was glad to assist in sending that guy on his way. I thought she thought I was wonderful. She said so. She said she fell in love with me on sight. Most girls could take me or leave me, but seemingly Beth admired everything about me.

"I was glad when Beth became pregnant—although I later realized that wasn't a good foundation for marriage—since in those circumstances her parents could hardly object to our marriage. My mother might have objected, but I didn't notify her until the day of the ceremony. At the time I was that crazy about Beth. Even before Susie was born I became disillusioned.

"Beth complains about her mother's strictness but she is badly spoiled. In a few days I discovered she was completely untrained to be a wife. She wasn't taught at home to cook, to clean, to sew, to wash and iron. I had to be the teacher. As a bachelor student I had learned out of necessity, to wash my own clothes, to iron, cook, clean. I learned in half the time it took me to teach Beth. She is still a wretched ironer.

"Beth worked for a while after we married. She earned a high salary for someone her age—$75 a week—and fancied herself as quite a financier. She didn't know beans about managing money. The week of our marriage she wiped out her savings account—$400—buying clothes for me. I'll admit the impulse was generous, but then she had no money left for her own trousseau. Her father had to step in and pay for the suit she wore at our wedding. His annual income is $12,000, and neither he nor my mother-in-law lets me forget it. I'm sure Beth doesn't think I will ever earn that much. Her mother comes right out and calls me an educated bum. Incidentally, my mother-in-law's wedding present to Beth was a long-sleeved, high-necked flannel nightgown.

"Beth objects to my commenting on her mother, but she has nothing good to say about mine. My mother was disappointed at my marrying so soon, but she has tried to be helpful. She repeatedly offered to show Beth how to plan menus and prepare the dishes I particularly like, but Beth declined the offers. Once my mother heard Beth say her favorite dessert was chocolate pudding. On her next visit she brought us a case containing a gross of packages of it. Beth wasn't grateful for the kindness. After we received the gift she served chocolate pudding only once.

"It isn't necessary for Beth to be a bum cook and housekeeper. She blames her failure on our equipment and compares our cheap stuff to the high-priced range, refrigerator, washing machine and other truck in her mother's home, which is a backhanded way of hinting I'm not a good provider like her father. Poor workmen always blame their tools. Beth doesn't try to be efficient and on the ball. She used to be a quick, vital, lively girl. Nowadays she moves like molasses in January and is intellectually dead on her feet. She complains that my mother and I shut her out of our conversations, but all she wants to talk about is Susie's teething, Susie's diaper rash. Beth is as bored with my ambitions as my father is.

"When Susie was born I lost all status in Beth's eyes. I was practically pushed out of our apartment into the public hallway. The day I brought her home from the hospital I found my mother-in-law had crowded our bedroom with so much baby paraphernalia I couldn't even open my bureau drawers. I shoved Susie's crib over in the corner so I could get at my underwear. At once Beth snatched Susie from the crib and put her in my place in our bed. I moved the baby right back to the crib where she belonged and Beth began to cry. She then telephoned her mother and described my cruelty. Susie has spent more time in our bed than in her own crib. I didn't like it one bit.

"Nor did I like the way Beth brightened up whenever our doorbell rang. Beth is hopelessly undiscriminating in forming friendships. In three years of college I made one friend. She filled our apartment with hordes of stupid dames who drank quarts of coffee, gabbled at the top of their lungs about their small fry, and glared at me as though I were an intruder. In order to study in peace I had to retreat to the library. I should have paid rent there. Beth didn't even notice my absences.

"When I complained of the constant company she said she was lonely. Why should she have been lonely? She had me. She had Susie, who was always yelling unless she was in Beth's arms. I pointed out that all the coffee drinking was wrecking our budget, which was true. Beth then called me stingy. Ever since she had to quit her job we've needed desperately to economize. Economy is a word that isn't in Beth's vocabulary. She spent $50 we didn't have on studio photographs of Susie. We'd hardly recovered from that blow when she bought a ten-year subscription—yes, I said ten years—to a child-care magazine. After a fight I closed our checking account in an attempt to stave off total bankruptcy.

"For a while our long-distance telephone calls to Bakersfield cost more than my books. On the rare occasions Beth and I were alone in the apartment I got little benefit from our privacy. She was either looking after Susie or hanging on the telephone telling her mother Susie's latest cute doing. She complains of her mother's bossiness, but was always in the market for hints on how to raise our child.

"One night when I was trying to iron a shirt Beth had manhandled she talked to my mother-in-law nearly thirty minutes about Susie's first tooth. It made me so mad that next day I had the phone removed. That made Beth mad. She was afraid Susie might get sick in the night and need a doctor. She didn't wonder if I might get sick or if it might inconvenience me to be unable to talk over assignments with classmates.

"Beth never wants me to enjoy the stimulation of seeing my mother, but she would like to subject me to her mother's nasty tongue every weekend. On the visits which I made to

OVERSIGHT

By JANET HENRY

The television wouldn't even hum.
I called the serviceman in great chagrin;
And for the seven-dollar minimum
He plugged it in.

New Curity®

S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

The revolutionary new Curity gauze diaper with the stretch-and-return weave gets stretchier with washing. New, streamlined size is easier to handle . . . folds conveniently to provide more absorbency where most needed.

Easier pinning. Adjusts more readily to all size babies . . . no hems to irritate tender baby skin.

- NO BINDING
- NO SEAT SAG
- EASIER PINNING
- NO GAPPING

Curity diapers are softer, smoother when washed in quality products like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Don't forget Curity dressup diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers
DRY FASTER
WASH EASIER
ABSORB MORE
WEAR LONGER

PAT. APP.

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Textile Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. J20C

Enclosed is 25c (coins only) for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper. Print clearly. Only one to a family.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Good in Continental United States and Hawaii.

Advertisement

By Gene Wilburn, Medical News Writer, Houston Chronicle

The nation's most mysterious ailment, the common cold is most easily spread by school children who take it home and infect their families. Thus, mothers, being in closer contact with children, get more colds than do fathers.

Great strides are now being made toward discovering the cause and prevention of the common cold. Researchers have isolated some 70 viruses which can be found at one time or another in the throats and noses of infected people. Among these is the important group of adenoviruses.

More research needed

Unfortunately these known viruses may be responsible for only 50% of man's respiratory diseases. Until the causative agents of the remaining half are isolated and vaccines developed—a real cure for the common cold will remain a thing of the future.

Because the common cold can pave the way to more serious infections like flu, strep throat and pneumonia—it falls to the housewife to help protect her family against spread not only of colds but of the more serious infections which may follow.

Hints on prevention:

1. Avoid sneezers and coughers . . . cover your own coughs and sneezes. 2. Keep up your resistance . . . avoid chilling and fatigue, get proper rest and nutrition. 3. Always wash hands before eating and preparing food. 4. Disinfect regularly while you houseclean to combat disease bacteria in the environment. 5. If someone in the family is ill with a serious infection (like flu), isolate the patient . . . disinfect sickroom floor, nightstand, dishes, anything he touches. Use Lysol in solution.

Lysol Brand Disinfectant kills disease germs on contact—including those involved in flu and pneumonia. In laboratory tests, its antigerm action was found to last 7 full days. Lysol disinfects from one cleaning to the next as nothing else can. Now in pine scent as well as regular, a bottle costs as little as 29¢.

DURING THE FLU SEASON:

Whenever there's sickness in your house, use Lysol. Use it to clean your sickroom, bathroom, kitchen. To disinfect dishes and eating utensils. Lysol can help protect your family from infection by contact. Be sure you have it on hand. Check your medicine chest for other sickroom needs. Your druggist is featuring them now.

Bakersfield she invariably turned in a long report on my latest misdeeds to her mother and I got the business. Often Beth dissolved in tears. I hate to see Beth crying in her mother's arms as much as I hate to see Susie in our bed.

"I'm sorry I hit Beth. If she comes back I promise it won't happen again. I promise to control my temper. Beth says she moved out because she loves me, which strikes me as nonsense. If she loves me she should come back with our baby and start behaving like a grown woman, a married woman. If she didn't want a husband, why did she get married?"

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"This was almost a textbook case of teenage marriage. Both Beth and Lance were impulsive and undisciplined. They thought they were adult. Through counseling they learned, without undue difficulty, to see themselves as they really were.

"Beth was more fully emancipated from parental influence than Lance, but she wasn't nearly so emancipated and wise as she fancied. As a fledgling high-school graduate, Beth earned high wages because she started off with a burgeoning electronics firm and grew up with it. She worked long, irregular hours, frequently responding to an emergency call by springing from bed in the middle of the night and rushing to her office typewriter in sweater and slacks. She acquired an outward air of efficiency and a charming surface personality.

"Inwardly she was confused and unstable, as evidenced by her pitifully wrong premarital sexual ventures. The initial episode grew out of an intense, foolish desire to be popular, combined with an equally strong desire to escape from maternal domination. Her youthful triumph in the business world gave Beth confidence and deceived her into thinking that her revolt against her mother had been completely successful. Beth was convinced that Lance was bound to his mother, but she was quite unconscious that she herself was far from independent.

Culture is receptiveness to beauty and humane feeling. Scraps of information have nothing to do with it. A merely well-informed man is the most useless bore on God's earth.

ALFRED NORTH WHITEHEAD
The Aims of Education and Other Essays
The Macmillan Company

"Lance was a tall, handsome young man—with an air of remoteness about him. His unsociability, like his obvious insecurity, was the product of an unhappy home life in boyhood. The separation of his parents made him standoffish with people and suspicious of offers of friendship. As a matter of fact, his world-traveling father was a kind and generous man, but Lance's antipathy to him still persists. Lance sided with his mother.

"In our first interview Beth spoke sharply about Lance's dependence upon his mother. But it quickly became evident that she herself was leaning heavily on her mother's judgment and opinions. Early in our discussions I asked a single question which abruptly brought Beth illumination and awakened insight. The question was: 'Do you want to be your mother's baby or the mother of your baby?' At once Beth replied that she wanted to be little Susie's mother and realized that she wasn't behaving like a mother. She acknowledged that flight to her girlhood home was a flight back into her own childhood, that she herself was allowing somebody else to make decisions she should make for herself.

"At that point, in re-evaluating her relationship with Lance, she was able to perceive her mistakes. She saw how her actions and attitudes had increased his feelings of insecurity, alienated him, encouraged him to sulk and behave like a juvenile bully. She saw she had deprived Lance of the pride of fatherhood and had turned Susie into his rival.

"Beth acknowledged that a change in her attitude would be helpful both to Lance and to her own growth toward maturity. She didn't wait for him to make changes. She resigned her job, despite her mother's vehement protests, and she and the baby moved back to the cramped, substandard apartment. In a matter of hours her mother, indomitable, telephoned that she and Beth's father were coming to spend the weekend.

"The old Beth would have capitula meekly and borrowed cots. The new B stood firm. She said that the get-toget would be inconvenient. She was polite, she made it clear that in the future she Lance would issue all invitations to their hc and would decide what invitations they co accept.

"Then, following counseling advice, B told her mother that she loved her, lo her father, would always love them both— that she must be allowed to build a life w her husband and child. She added that, in immediate future, Lance would be too b with his studies to drive to Bakersfield v often. Her mother was offended at first, acceded to the inevitable.

"Lance hadn't believed Beth was cap of such firmness and he was much impres He said so. Beth was appreciative of the compliment. She quickly earned other com ments.

"Beth was a clever girl who had been re ing to use her good head. When she be really to try, she conquered her tendency dawdle and went at her household tasks e in the day. If the doorbell rang she ignore until she finished the sweeping, ironing other chores which were on the morr agenda. She didn't become a top-fli housekeeper or first-class chef, but she s fied Lance.

"It was absurd of Beth, who had quic mastered the complexities of secretarial w in an electronics firm, to be overawed by much less complex mysteries of Lance's lege studies. dipped into his t books, puzzled out meaning of the s quotations on new per business pages, thereafter saw t that she wasn't left of the conversati held by her husb and her mother-in-

"Lance did change as drastic as Beth. but he change. Beth's hun for companions had filled the apartment with other can wives. It was hardly strange that Lanc dedicated student, fled to the library whe had to concentrate. 'Home,' he told me one occasion, 'is really Grand Central tion.' But Beth had already got the point. had begun to keep the apartment empt examination time, to invite guests only w Lance could ease up on study.

"Susie was undoubtedly an engaging b as are all healthy babies. When Beth remo her from the center of the stage for cooin males and made Lance's home-coming event of the day, he began to show an inte in his child. In a quiet household her crib came a regular port of call—mornings evenings.

"In short, the unfriendly Lance war thawed. He made friends of other yo fathers on the campus. He became more t ant of female chatter. He told his mothe buy no more bargain groceries for his ho hold, made his home visits fewer, but retained his mother's affection. He struc successful blow for manhood.

"Most of Beth's and Lance's problems the problems of youth and inexperience. L was graduated with honors last June. Se interesting jobs were immediately forthc ing. He talked over the various offers Beth. Secretly he was fearful that she m urge him to accept the job that paid the and was the most likely to lead him to solid annual income her father earns. Ins she urged him to accept the job he consid the most provocative and worth while.

"When Lance joyfully passed on this of news to me, I congratulated him and very pleased myself. In the old days L would have asked his mother's advice. N adays Lance talks about his prospects plans with Beth, his wife."

Editors' Note This case history was compiled condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

hat assurance to know you can give ayer® Aspirin for Children with your doctor's blessing...

s the exact dosage doctors recommend. You can give Bayer in for Children with complete confidence. Each tablet contains exactly 1¼ grains of in—the precise dosage doctors prescribe for children.

uality controlled. No other maker submits children's aspirin to such thorough qual- ontrols as does Bayer. This assures uniform excellence in the world's best aspirin.

s instant flaking action. Bayer Aspirin enters the stomach as thousands of tiny flakes, ing the fastest, gentlest relief your child can get from a headache or the pains and of a cold. Your child will feel better, fast.

tes so good. Children take it without fussing. And the new grip-tight cap on the e helps keep them from taking it on their own.

Give your child the Best— Flavored BAYER Aspirin for Children

Hunt . . . for the best

a heart-to-heart about parents

Gertrude Stein once wrote a line that tantalized everyone so thoroughly it became famous. It was kind of goofy, but it made a lot of sense too. You've probably heard it. In perfect seriousness she wrote: "A rose is a rose is a rose is a rose." Ever since I first read it in high school and decided it sounded good and might mean something I've been trying to do one like it, and finally I have. Here it is: A parent is a parent is a parent is a parent—and I'm serious about it too. It sounds good, and to me it means that a parent is a thing most all of us have and it takes all kinds to make up a teen-age world.

Since this discussion is meant to be strictly between us, I've tried to insure our privacy by suggesting in the title that parents not tune in. That way we won't have to be self-conscious or afraid of hurting anyone's feelings. So we can start right off by admitting that they (parents) are not all alike. There are many kinds and degrees, but generally speaking they fall into four classes: the Good, the Bad, the Indifferent (which translate into teen terms as the normal, the too strict, the too lenient) and also the Problem Parent (there are probably as many of those as there are Problem Children, although, just between us, that's no excuse for being a Problem Child, as we'll see later).

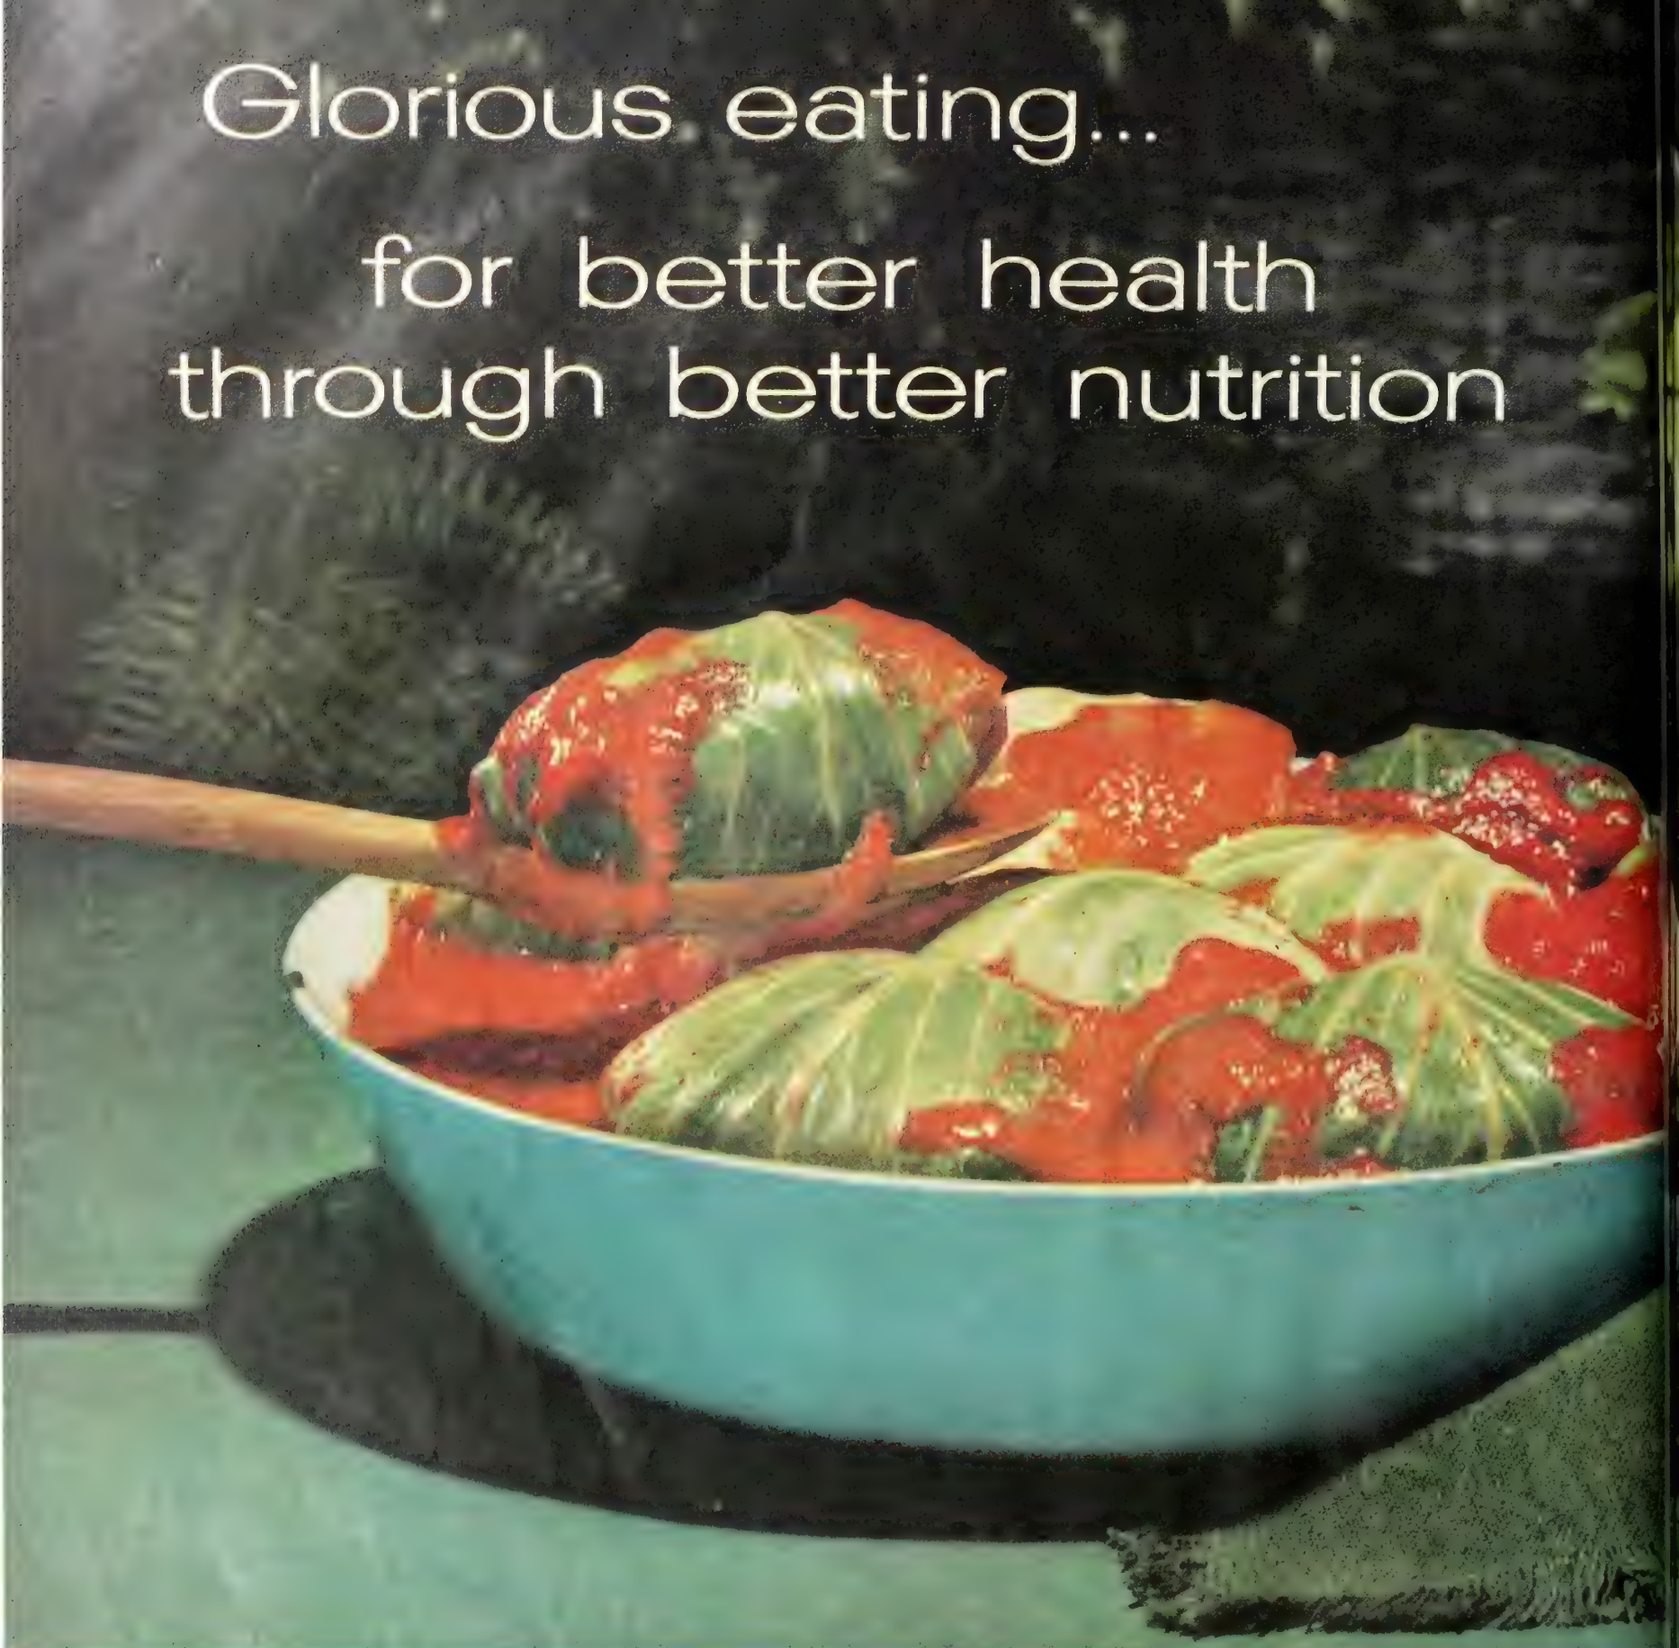
Just yesterday Pat and Shirley were themselves teen-agers, wished parents would recognize that teen-agers are people.

The point is that, since Adam and Eve, no matter what else we have or do not have, like freckles, or money, or a big house, or big feet (don't look at me!), most of us started out life with one set of two parents. Sometimes we lose one or both and have to make an adjustment, and that is difficult. In recent years a most confusin' complication has set in where some teen-agers acquire three or more parents—two separate sets, so to speak—and this overabundance requires further adjustments and can be even more difficult.

I want us to think very seriously about this parent situation, and I hope you'll be perfectly honest with yourself as we go along, because here, in this relationship, can be the most vital help or hindrance in these important years between twelve and twenty—and some of your most urgent problems and questions arise in this area. Only you can honestly evaluate what type of parents you truly have and then face the necessary adjustments you'll have to make.

To be perfectly honest with you, to ward off any cries of "Traitor!" let me hurriedly remind you that I'm now in the parent camp myself (by four pink noses—count 'em). This is bound to color my views a little. For instance, I'm thinking of promoting a Be Kind to Parents Week, or an S.P.C.P.—a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Parents (I can't see why children and animals get all the protection); or if that doesn't work, I may publish a wistful pamphlet entitled: How to Spoil a Parent and Why Don't You?

Sometimes at the end of a long weekend when Shirley, the beautiful partner in the Boone Baby Girl Factory, has been very busy shopping, or something, and I've been chief baby sitter, I feel like that lady who received a playpen as a gift after her fourth child arrived. "Thank you for the playpen," she wrote. "It's a godsend. I sit in it every afternoon and read, and the children can't get near me." It's during those moments I want to form the S.P.C.P.



The Parental Me

When asked what kind of parent I personally am, I refer the questioners to Shirley, who says firmly that I'm not such a hot one—this week. That's because, as I am a father who's not home all the time (on account of breadwinning and the Pat Boone Show), the little colored pillows on the couch in the den (which the children are allowed to play with) looked to me exactly like the little colored pillows on the sofa in the living room (which, it turns out, the children are not allowed to play with). When their mommy returned from a shopping trip last Saturday to find me in charge and colored pillows all over

CONTINUED ON PAGE 147

Glorious eating...

for better health through better nutrition

Each dish has the wholesome bonus of Wesson, the pure vegetable oil. It's poly-unsaturated.

This delightful dinner demonstrates how cooking with Wesson can provide the extra-good nutrition your family needs for good health.

Wesson is a real vitamin preserver. Light clear Wesson—the pure vegetable oil—seals out air to help keep vitamins and minerals in foods—even helps our bodies absorb more of certain vitamins. And Wesson itself provides a bountiful supply of Vitamin E.

Wesson is an unexcelled source of concentrated food energy that stays with you. While an average serving of this entire supper totals only 775 calories, these calories satisfy hunger longer. Cooking with Wesson helps you fight the temptation to snack between meals.

Wesson takes the smoke out of skillet cookery—brightens and sharpens all food flavors. Lighter and clearer than any other brand, Wesson is also the most highly refined pure vegetable oil you can buy.

Among all leading brands, poly-unsaturated Wesson is unexcelled when medical recommendation specifies a readily-available vegetable oil to replace solid fat. Wesson is processed for optimum poly-unsaturates, therefore—unlike solid shortenings—it is never hydrogenated.

Free. For 16-page booklet of delicious Wesson recipes with your health in mind, write The Wesson People, Box 873, New Orleans 2, La.

STUFFED CABBAGE IN TOMATO SAUCE

Mix 1 pound lean ground beef, 1 cup cooked rice, a small chopped onion, 1 teaspoon each caraway seed (optional) and salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper, 1 egg. Trim off thickest part of stem from 12 cabbage leaves. Divide meat into 12 portions, wrap each in a leaf, fasten with wooden picks. Brown cabbage rolls in Wesson. Add contents of two 8-oz. cans tomato sauce, such as Hunt's, and ¼ cup water. Cover, cook slowly about 40 minutes. 6 servings at 315 calories per serving.

SINGLE CRUST STIR-N-ROLL PASTRY

You make it with Wesson. Mix 1⅓ cups sifted all-purpose flour with 1 teaspoon salt. Add ⅓ cup Wesson and 3 tablespoons milk all at once, then stir to mix. Press into ball, flatten slightly. Roll dough between waxed papers. Dampen table top to prevent slipping. Peel off top paper. Place paper-side-up in 9″ pan. Remove paper. Fit to pan, prick with fork. Bake 8 to 10 minutes at 475° (very hot oven), cool.

FROSTY LIME PIE FILLING

Heat 1¼ cups applesauce to boiling. Add 1 package lime-flavored gelatin, stir until dissolved. Mix in ½ to 1 cup sugar. Cool till almost stiff. Whip 1 cup very cold evaporated milk with 1 tablespoon lime or lemon juice until stiff. Pour onto gelatin mixture, beat in slowly. Place in baked pastry shell. Chill at least an hour. 8 servings at 337 calories per serving.

Delicious

Wesson®

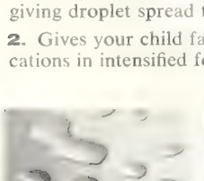
Lighter, Clearer and Poly-unsaturated

Vicks announces new liquid medication

MAKES STEAM FOR COLDS TWICE AS EFFECTIVE

New relief for congestion, croupy coughs . . .
children breathe easier instantly.

Hospital test report: Recently a New York hospital tested a new kind of steam medication called Vicks VapoSteam. An official medical journal reported that nothing else used "including cough syrup, antibiotics, or vaporizers, medicated or not, approached the effectiveness of (VapoSteam)" in relieving the cough.



This new medication helped babies and children suffering with severe nasal stuffiness, croupy coughs and chest congestion "more rapidly and completely than any other therapy used."

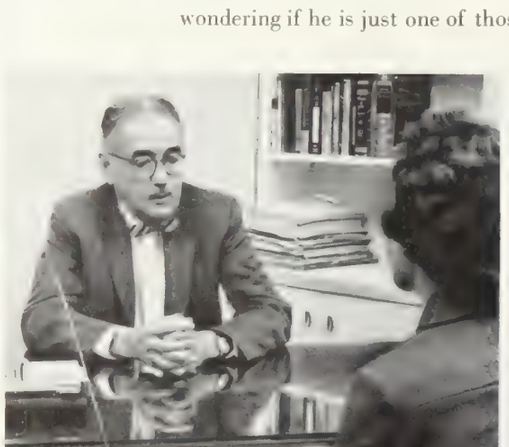
VapoSteam is now available at your drug store. Pour it into vaporizer, bowl or wash basin of hot water to make the steam twice as effective in spreading relief — more effective than ordinary steam or any other steam medication you can buy.

Helps your child 2 ways that plain steam can't:

1. Changes the steam itself — makes every relief-giving droplet spread twice as far.
2. Gives your child famous Vicks aromatic medications in intensified form.

Ordinary Steam
vapors are really tiny drops of moisture that can't spread very far.

Vicks VapoSteam
bursts open these drops and spreads their relief twice as effectively.



NEW VICKS
Vapo Steam®
Greaseless Liquid
Steam Medication

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M

Tell me, doctor. . .

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me Doctor, Doctor Schauffler will discuss some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

I have had two perfectly n childbirths. My doctor wants to do a Caesarean whe third baby is due to be born. I can't understand it wondering if he is just one of those doctors who like to

ABBOT MILLS

This time the do secretary ushered women into the co ing room, one of v was obviously in a stage of pregnancy. other, slightly yo woman said, smilin am Mrs. Jansen, Dc and this is my sister, Smith. I can't expec to remember me. Bu Frank called you in sultation when I ha baby four months a

"Indeed I do remember you, Mrs. Jansen. I agreed Dr. Frank that he should operate. Isn't that right?"

"That's right, Doctor. Perhaps you also remember, t that the two of you had to talk very fast and hard to ge to consent? I don't know whether Dr. Frank told you th not, but I had had training for natural childbirth. I cou bear the thought of being anesthetized and operated am afraid I gave you doctors a lot of trouble."

"Not at all, Mrs. Jansen. We both respected you very m for your desire to have your baby naturally. That was Dr. Frank had let you go into trial labor, though he already informed me that he might want a consultation regard to doing a Caesarean. He had let the labor pro as long as he dared to before he called me in."

Mrs. Jansen had been nodding her head in confirma of the doctor's statements. "Well, my sister has been that she must have a Caesarean, and she hates the idea jus much as I did. She has been worrying about it. I thoug might help if you would

CONTINUED ON PAG

WONDERFUL NEW BEAUTY LATHER NOW IN

NEW LUX...

it actually helps purify your skin!

Now—you don't have to let skin trouble-makers damage the fresh, clear look of your complexion!

Now—with new-formula Lux your every-day cleansing care can actually help purify your skin!

Now—in Lux beauty soap, famous for its unusual mildness, you get for the first time this extraordinary beauty benefit: a new cream-enriched lather that actually helps purify your skin! New-formula Lux lather that cream-softens your skin . . . and purifies away complexion trouble-makers.

This is the beauty of new Lux! Every time you use wonder-working new Lux, you're actually washing your way to a smoother complexion . . . a more beautifully clear complexion!

Marvelous for keeping my skin clear!"—Natalie Wood

NEW CREAM-ENRICHED LUX WITH PURIFYING LATHER

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees you'll be delighted with new Lux—or you'll be repaid every penny you spent!

brighter "happier" haircolor—

Your beautician will tell you: the "secret" of beautiful haircolor is a natural look that glows with highlights—the look that Roux can bring to your hair. For Roux will give you brighter, happier haircolor, whether you want to color gray or brighten dull natural color or try dramatic blonde lightening—whether you want lasting new beauty or color effects you can wash right out!

Roux, you see, is a complete family of haircolorings: temporary rinses, hair lighteners, lasting tints and color shampoos. And one of these fine cosmetics is designed specifically for your haircolor need—designed to give you the loveliest hair of your life!

ROUX

"AMERICA'S FIRST FAMILY OF HAIRCOLORINGS"

AT BETTER BEAUTY SALONS AND COSMETIC COUNTERS EVERYWHERE.

LASTING HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR SHAMPOO
CREME HAIR TINT
TEMPORARY HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR RINSE
COLOR RINSE (POWDER)
COLOR CURL HAIR SPRAY
HAIR CRAYON
HAIR LIGHTENERS
CREME HAIR LIGHTENER
RAPID HAIR LIGHTENER
CREME COLORTONER
AND FOR YOUR HAIR CARE
CREME SHAMPOO
CREME RINSE
CREME HAIRDRESSING

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

tell her exactly why you advised the operation for me."

"I'll be glad to, Mrs. Jansen. I remember quite well how your X rays looked. You have what we call a 'restricted outlet,' which occurs in certain types of pelves. Their bony structure is such that there is plenty of room for the baby's head at the top of the birth canal, but very little at the bottom. This may create a dangerous situation, because the trouble, if there is trouble, comes at the very last. Generally when the patient is quite tired, or perhaps after an unwise attempt or two has been made to deliver the baby by forceps from below. It was very smart of Dr. Frank to foresee the possibilities, and stop the labor when he realized you had done all you could."

"I felt capable of doing a whole lot more at the time!"

"You were worse off, Mrs. Jansen, than you would admit, you were so determined to have your baby normally," the doctor said gently. "Your pulse and blood pressure showed how courageously you had worked; and also that you shouldn't be allowed to do any more. Your baby, too, was beginning to show signs of increased and prolonged pressure. The heart tones weren't too good. To cap it all, your cervix wasn't dilating as it should. It looked as if there was still a long, tough haul for both you and the baby. Too long and too tough, in my opinion. It would have been very hard on you and could very well have ended disastrously for the baby.

"You see, Mrs. Smith"—turning to the sister—"we obstetricians are very much concerned about the baby in these cases of 'bony disproportion'; that is to say, disproportion between the size of the baby's head and that of the bony canal of the pelvis through which it must pass.

Get thy tools ready; God will find the work. ROBERT BROWNING

"About nine out of ten first Caesareans are primarily in the interest of the baby, as a matter of fact. At least in cases of difficult labor due to the condition your sister has. The baby might possibly be dragged out finally with forceps, but at a serious risk."

Mrs. Smith, who had been listening intently, said, "Yes, I can see why you advised operating in Marie's case. But I have already had two babies. They were small, but their births were normal in every way. So I was really troubled when my obstetrician—we have moved from our old home, I had to go to a new doctor—started talking Caesarean. I just can't help wondering if he is one of those doctors who like to cut!"

"What reason has he given you for mentioning Caesarean section, Mrs. Smith?"

"He said the baby is getting pretty big and he isn't satisfied with its position. I did have a long, slow labor with my second baby. It was bigger than the first, but only six pounds at that. But it finally came through all right. My doctor says this one is considerably bigger."

"I couldn't give you an opinion that would be of any value unless I were to examine you and see your X rays. Would you like me to do that?"

Mrs. Smith looked at her sister, who said vigorously, "I certainly think you should, Joanna. You see, Joanna has been afraid to ask her doctor for a consultation. She thinks he would be offended."

"I'm sure you are mistaken about that, Mrs. Smith. As a matter of fact, your doctor would be required to have a consultation with a specialist before doing a Caesarean section. If you go into a first-class hospital, that is. That is the rule in most good obstetrical hospitals, even though your doctor is an obstetrical specialist himself. Ordinarily the consultant makes no charge in these cases. There may be very difficult decisions in obstetrics, and I think that often it is a great relief to any of us to have another sound opinion. I'll examine you now,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 44

Dieting to reduce

Special laxative for wom helps keep you "regular"

Are you dieting to duce? Then you eating far less th usual. Less bulk passing through system. In such stances, irregular often occurs.

When laxative h is needed, rely on the gentle, more natu action of new Correctol®—the laxat specially developed for a woman's d cate system. Correctol is completely ferent from harsh, all-purpose laxati which may leave you feeling so w that you want to break your diet.

Correctol's secret is a non-laxat miracle regulator that simply soft waste. Along with this, Correctol c tains just enough mild laxative to g regularity a start.

Working together, these two ge ingredients make Correctol bring re more naturally than any ordinary la tive can. Not only while dieting, but e during pregnancy, after childbirth, menstrual periods and after middle a

Do try Correctol soon. 30 tiny pink tablets, $1.00 —at any drug counter.

Guaranteed b Good Housekeep

CORNS

Removed by Mosco, also Calluses. Quick, easy, economical. Just rub on. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refu ed if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N

MOSCO ★CORN REMOVI

Know the facts about Funeral ...beforehand!

A bit of knowledge can be helpful when YOU are the who must "take charge." Th why you're urged to have a c of this FREE informative boo on hand . . .

FREE— "FACTS Every Family Should Know"

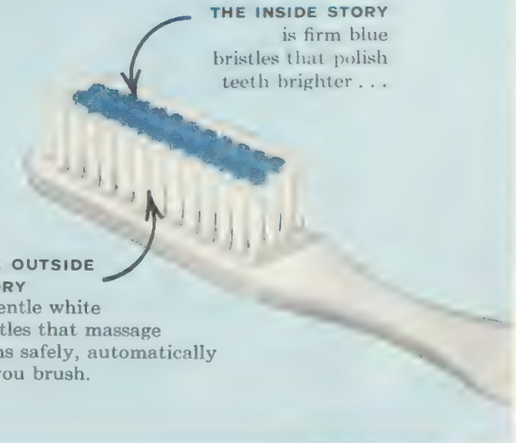
SEND A POSTCARD OR LETTER TO: WILBERT, P. O. Box J-1, Forest Park, Illinois. (No obligation and no sales contact will be made.)

Your funeral director explain how WILB Burial Vaults of the best "pe of-mind" tection. Sc tifically m and pie through ov quarter-cen of ser WILBERT B Vaults made f heavy, r forced concrete fused to a thick, pre water-repellent asphalt 2. They are sealed by a cial sealant 3. You should sist . . . in time of need . . . the FOREMOST and MOST SPECTED NAME IN BUR VAULTS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Wilbert BURIAL VAU

® Trademark of Wilbert W. Haase Co



It never was possible before.

It still isn't possible, with any other tooth brush.

Only the PRO Double Duty gives this double dental care...

Cleans teeth really clean as it massages gums safely.

Home dental care moves into the modern era with the Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush. Other brushes you thought were up-to-date a short while back are suddenly, totally outmoded. Only the new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush among America's top 14 brands combines effective hard-bristle cleaning with gentle, safe gum massage in one dentist-designed brush. In all-nylon or nylon-and-natural. Children's size, too. Get a Pro Double Duty for everyone in the family at your favorite store. PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., FLORENCE, MASSACHUSETTS.

Advertisement

YOUR HANDS TALK

What do they say about you?

Simple care can give you lovelier hands in a few weeks

By Ruth Miller

Every time you lift a fork, wave good-bye, shake a hand...your own hands are in the spotlight. They're you...as expressive as your face, as telltale as your voice. Why not start today...to make them as lovely as you'd like them to be?

Cracking, splitting nails? A few seconds a night...less time than it takes to brush your teeth...can do wonders! Begin massaging Cutex Nail-Flex into the base of your nail between the cuticle and the first finger joint. This gentle cream contains lanolin, cholesterol and white iodine to strengthen and harden your nails.

Ragged cuticle? Never cut it, except to remove a bad hang-nail. Cutting your cuticle toughens it, can lead to infection. Instead follow this safe and simple method. One...wrap the tip of a Cutex genuine Orangewood Stick in cotton. Two...moisten the cotton generously with Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover. Three...push back the cuticle gently all around the base of the nail with the moist cotton. The Cutex Oily Cuticle Remover will float away dead tissue and leave your cuticle soft and perfectly shaped. As an added touch, finish off your home manicure with Cutex Cuticle Oil.

Stubby nails? The way you file your nails can make your fingers seem more tapering...help nails grow longer, too. Harsh metal files often cause splitting. So does a sawing motion. File your nails from side to tip with a flexible Cutex Emery Board, leaving 1/16 inch of nail at the corners. Then use the curve of your cuticle as a guide in shaping the tips. Overly pointed nails will break more easily, call attention to stubby fingers.

Your hands are one of your greatest beauty assets. Surely they deserve the same attention you give your face... and your wardrobe!

For our helpful little booklet "Beauty Treatment for your Hands," send 10¢ with your name and address to Northam Warren, Dept. A, New York, New York.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 42

Mrs. Smith, if you like; and with your permission, will get in touch with your own doctor at once about your X rays."

Next day the sisters returned to hear the doctor's decision. "I have just inspected your X rays, Mrs. Smith, and I agree with your doctor absolutely. Your due date is still several weeks away and your baby is pretty big even now, probably around eight pounds. The X rays show that it will be a breech presentation. I don't think I need to explain to you that this means the lower part of the baby's body will present first, instead of the smooth, round head, and the difficulties that can create!"

"Is that all!" Mrs. Smith exclaimed. "Why, Doctor, a friend of mine had a breech presentation with her third baby, before her doctor even got there. She delivered that baby herself, with no one to help but a student nurse!"

"That's very possible, Mrs. Smith. If, that is, the birth canal is normally constructed; and if the baby's little rear end comes out first, and is smaller than the head. But your pelvis is somewhat like your sister's. It didn't make you much trouble before because the babies were small, and the heads presented first. But this is a bad condition for a breech presentation, especially with a large baby. Because the breech does not dilate the cervix as effectively as the head does. The head, coming after, may be caught by the cervix or its small outlet, with the body already delivered. This may create an impossible situation—and too late for Caesarean."

"Couldn't I at least have a trial labor, as Marie did?"

"I wouldn't allow it if you were my patient. Not with a breech presentation, a big baby and a small outlet. When one doesn't face these extra hazards, a breech may often be given a fair trial. But I wouldn't risk it in your case."

Mrs. Jansen, seeing her sister's distress, said encouragingly, "I was really glad I consented to the operation, Joanna. It wasn't anything like what I expected a Caesarean to be. I had a spinal anesthetic, and was allowed to see and hear my baby at once—while she was still on the cord. It was thrilling! Dr. Frank actually had me push the baby out myself. It seemed almost like having a baby normally, except that it didn't hurt any more."

"The modern, low type of Caesarean that we do now is very close to a normal delivery," the doctor said. "We make a crosswise incision in the uterus. It is so near to the normal opening of the cervix that the uterus can continue most of its normal mechanisms. You might almost say that the uterus doesn't know the difference!"

"I certainly don't see how things could have gone more smoothly in my case," Mrs. Jansen said. "I hardly felt as though I had been through an operation. I had no trouble nursing my baby. And you know yourself, Joanna, what a grand baby she is!"

"I must say that the Caesarean of today is a remarkable improvement over the so-called Classical section that used to be done," the doctor told them. "The incision then was made up and down, and considerably higher up in the uterus, where it's less safe for a number of reasons. Also, many were done too late. Caesarean section is an entirely different business now."

Mrs. Smith said, "But suppose I have more babies? Dr. Frank has told Marie that she will have to have a Caesarean section every time from now on. Would the same thing be true of me?"

"Your case is somewhat different, Mrs. Smith, in that you have already had two normal deliveries. And the breech presentation is more or less of an accident. It wouldn't be apt to happen again. There is an outside chance that you might have your next baby from below fairly safely, if it isn't large. But you would have to be under expert care, and in a good hospital, with everything ready for an emergency. The danger is that the Caesarean scar might rupture, with all sorts of bad consequences.

"The danger of rupture is greater, though, if a patient has not already had a baby through the normal channel. The channel is not prepared, and the strain on the scar is likely to be too much. Most obstetricians stick pretty closely to the old saying, 'Once a Caesarean, always a Caesarean.'"

"Do you agree with the people who claim that a woman can have an unlimited number of Caesareans?"

"Personally I don't like to do more than three Caesareans on one patient; at the most four, provided everything has gone all right. I know of women who have had up to seven babies by Caesarean section. But I believe Caesarean patients would be wiser to stop at three or four."

Mrs. Smith said thoughtfully, "Lately I have been struck by the number of women I know who have Caesareans. If they are going to have to have Caesareans from now on, it seems to me that a condition ought to be really serious for a doctor to suggest the first one. Am I right or wrong about that?"

"You are absolutely right, Mrs. Smith. A Caesarean is indefensible when a baby can be delivered safely by normal channels. I certainly would not start a woman on a 'series of Caesareans' unless there was very good reason for it.

"But you and I might differ in our interpretation of 'serious.' For instance, a woman might be able to deliver the normal way; but the baby might run a risk of being seriously damaged. You are hearing of more Caesareans today, I believe, Mrs. Smith, because we doctors have learned more about conditions which might result in a baby who survives a hard delivery, but is brain-damaged, for instance. Caesareans are much safer, too, than they used to be, for both mother and baby. We have come a long way in combating infection. We can do lots more about the extra bleeding of Caesarean section."

NO COMPLAINT

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

Some glamorous dames
Wed belted earls
Who deck their frames
With mink and pearls.

Unlike the above,
I'm the sort of siren
Who hooked her love
And a new steam ir-on.

Mrs. Jansen said, "Dr. Frank told me that the condition I had—bony disproportion, I believe you called it?—is one of the commonest indications for Caesarean section."

"I would agree with him there," the doctor said. "Another is when the baby has too hard a head. Every once in a while we get what I call a 'bowling-ball head.' It simply won't mold to enable the baby to pass through the canal, even though the canal is normally constructed. Occasionally, too, there are gross abnormalities in the bones of the pelvis in women who have had diseases of the pelvic bones earlier. Or there may be irregularities in the position of the baby; such as transverse or face presentation. These are all fairly common situations and the more pronounced ones can be absolutely sound indications for Caesarean section."

"Are those the only ones, Doctor?" Mrs. Jansen asked.

"There are a number of others. Occasionally it is the mother's supporting tissues, rather than the bony structure, which hold back the baby. Older women with first babies may have abnormally fibrous muscles and ligaments. There may also be spasm of these tissues. This is not uncommon in badly frightened young mothers. Grantly Dick-Read has described this situation very well. We can mostly overcome it by instruction in relaxation, proper breathing, and by giving analgesic drugs. But occasionally it requires Caesarean.

"Then there is so-called inertia of the uterus. For unknown reasons, the muscle of the uterus goes limp and won't contract normally. Labor may be dangerously prolonged. Consultation is indicated in both these situations. The Caesarean, if decided on, in most cases will be done largely for the sake of the baby."

Mrs. Smith said, "A friend of mine had an emergency Caesarean three weeks before her baby was expected. She had had a dreadful hemorrhage, and the doctor said he must liberate in order to save the baby. But the baby was born dead just the same!"

"This could have been one of two very serious obstetrical situations," the doctor answered. "The most frequent is what we call 'placenta previa.' It means simply that the placenta, or afterbirth, has been implanted very low in the uterus. Its roots and blood vessels have invaded the part of the mouth of the womb where muscle must shift about and thin out, in order to open the passage for the baby.

"When this thinning and dilating begins in the case of a low placenta—often long before labor is due—vessels are torn across and there is bleeding. Fortunately the bleeding usually is not serious at first, so that there is some warning. But when serious hemorrhage occurs late in the pregnancy, immediate action must be taken to save the lives of both mother and baby: the mother, because of blood loss; the baby, because the placenta is his source of oxygen and its too early disruption deprives him of life-giving oxygen from the mother. Evidently it was already too late to save the baby in this particular case. But the mother's life may very well have been saved by operating.

"A similar emergency occurs when a normally implanted placenta breaks loose too soon. This is called 'premature separation' and is due to a number of different factors. It, too, involves hemorrhaging, and is as dangerous as placenta previa. Sometimes more so. Caesarean section is almost always the treatment of choice in both these situations."

"That reminds me," Mrs. Jansen interrupted. "I had a friend whose doctor did an emergency Caesarean because the cord came down ahead of the baby. Does that always mean a Caesarean?"

"Yes, that is another true indication for Caesarean. The condition is called 'prolapse of the cord.' We see it most often when stimulation of labor has been used unwisely. The fluid comes out too fast. If the head is not snug in the round opening of the pelvis, the cord is washed down beyond or beside the head. It is seldom possible to put it back and keep it back. When contractions occur after that, the cord is compressed against the pelvic bones and its circulation is shut off. This, too, deprives the baby of oxygen and other things vital for survival."

"May I ask about one thing more?" said Mrs. Smith. "Might not some doctors be tempted to do Caesareans, in certain instances, because they get more money for them? At least, that's what I've heard."

"There may have been a little of that in the early days. There may be some of it even now. But most of the ethical groups of obstetricians and surgeons have agreed that a Caesarean section should cost little more than a ordinary delivery; perhaps no more at all. We obstetricians understand that the hospital expenses of Caesarean section are greater for the patient. Also, a Caesarean section often times is an easier procedure for the obstetrician than a tedious and harrowing delivery from below.

"You ought to ask your doctor, Mrs. Smith, what his fee would be for a Caesarean. It is your right to know this in advance. But you need not worry that your doctor is 'talking Caesarean' because of the fee. Yours is a bona-fide case for operation."

"You've been very kind, Doctor, and I'm convinced. I'll just hope my Caesarean will go as well as Marie's did."

"I am sure it will. For your doctor, like Dr. Frank, has foreseen unfortunate possibilities and is taking proper steps to avoid them."

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses sex differentiation in the unborn.

NORTHAM WARREN, NEW YORK

Treasure of the deep for your fingertips

CUTEX® pearl polishes

Made with essence of pearl! Fathoms deep in the ocean, Nature produces the precious nacre for Cutex pearl polishes. Along Fifth Avenue and the rue du Faubourg St. Honoré its pearly sheen gives a new look to fashionable hands. Because Cutex pearl polishes have a subtle new excitement that makes ordinary polishes suddenly seem dim and lifeless. Whether you prefer a vivid pink or an offbeat green or orchid, Cutex pearl colors have a luminous loveliness all their own. Turn your fingertips into jewels…with Cutex long-lasting pearl polishes!

THE OTHER WOMAN IS HIS EX-WIFE

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

IS HE REALLY OUT OF LOVE WITH JUDITH?

Everything about Judith was subdued. Though her attitude was co-operative, it was hard for her to volunteer information or talk spontaneously. It took several hours to coax her story from her

She had started dating Ted soon after he got out of the service, and ten months later they were married. That was two years ago. Shortly before they became engaged, he told her he'd been married while he was in the Army, to Becky, a secretary he'd known in college. But they separated after four months because Becky had fallen in love with somebody else, and were divorced when he was discharged.

"Until two months ago, I thought we were as happy as any couple could be. We both have good jobs, we're saving for a home, we have no problems. Then I discovered that he's seeing Becky again."

Judith became uneasy after Ted arrived home too late for dinner several nights in a row. She accepted his explanation that he'd had to work, but when the absences continued she decided to leave her own job early a few times in order to watch him. The second night she saw him meet Becky, but she lost them in the crowd, and once they disappeared into an apartment house—it was after midnight when Ted got home.

"I was so hurt I wanted to run away. My first idea was to pack my things and go home, quit my job and try to forget Ted. But I love him, and I was afraid if I just ran off we'd never get together again. So I stayed."

After abandoning this scheme, she considered alternatives. She thought of moving to another apartment. But her hurt gave way to anger, and she decided Ted was the one to move. She would draw the money from their joint account, giving her financial control, and pack his things to send to him. But when she started to pack, she found she didn't want to do that either.

She also considered appealing to Becky, but decided against it, concluding (correctly) that she would probably not accomplish anything, and would only humiliate and anger her husband.

Finally, in confusion, she sought counsel. In all these days of pondering and worrying, she had never mentioned the subject to Ted. When I asked her why not, she hesitated. Finally she said, "I'm afraid to. I think brave thoughts, but I'm not very outspoken and it's hard for me to talk about what I think and feel."

Here was the crux of the matter. Because of her timidity, and her reluctance to reveal her inner self to her husband, she had failed to take him into her confidence, not only in this crisis but throughout their marriage. It was not her lack of feeling but her lack of ability to express her feeling that created the problem. Her reticence and inhibitions had created a barrier between her and Ted from the beginning. Judith was shy, sensitive, ill at ease with strangers, whereas Ted was outgoing, sociable, friendly. Lacking communication with his wife, Ted turned to exuberant, partygoing Becky for relief.

Judith realized that she could not solve the problem by ignoring it, and she agreed to talk it over with Ted. Though he was angry that she had spied on him, he felt himself in the wrong, and he agreed to come with her for her next interview. He shamefacedly admitted that he had been flattered when Becky looked him up and declared her continuing love for him, at a time when his ego needed a boost. But he recognized that Becky was shallow and untrustworthy, that his real love and loyalty belonged to Judith, and he sincerely believed that together they could achieve greater happiness and understanding than before if she would forgive him.

She did, fully and freely, at the same time admitting her share of the responsibility for their difficulty. She has made a deliberate effort to communicate, to overcome her shyness, to think less of her own feelings and more of others'. By lifelong habit a passive personality, she has responded to Ted's encouragement and is gradually developing into a self-confident, responsive young woman. For the first time she feels secure in his love. Now, after five months, they have bought a home, and she told me two weeks ago that they are starting a family.

The experience of Judith and Ted once again illustrates the familiar fact that every marriage problem involves two people. Ted was the obvious guilty party here. But his misbehavior arose from Judith's shortcomings, as well as from his own weakness. Had she not shouldered her share of the responsibility, as honestly and generously as did Ted, their story could not have had such a satisfactory ending—or should we say beginning?

IF HE WERE MORE OF A MAN

Despite the growing influence of women in business, government and other spheres outside the home; regardless of the trend toward so-called equality of the sexes, there are still many wives who want to be dominated by their husbands in the traditional way. The wish may be unconscious, but often it is recognized. Consider two examples from our mail.

One wife writes: "Though our marriage of eight years is successful, there remains in me a sort of primitive rejection of my husband as unmanly. Mentally he is alert, competent and vigorous; but physically he is rather ineffectual and indifferent. He is patient, perceptive and considerate, but I confess I'm attracted to men who are powerful and aggressive. Sexually, I need a mate who makes me feel more like a real woman."

From another letter: "What about the husband who won't wear the pants? My husband is wonderful in many ways—kind, dependable, easygoing and affectionate. But these good points have their bad side too. He's marvelous with the children, but lets them get away with murder—I have to do all the disciplining. I hate managing the money; that's a man's job. He's so casual about household repairs that I've taken over. I see myself turning into a nag and a shrew, the perfect example of the bossy wife with a henpecked husband. I love my husband dearly, but it's harder and harder to look up to him as the head of the family. How can I encourage him to be more masterful?"

The traits these wives mention—kindness, dependability, patience and consideration—are virtues, not faults, and every good husband possesses them or tries to cultivate them. They are of greatest importance in a marriage which both husband and wife regard as a relationship between equal partners. But some wives, consciously or unconsciously, reject the idea of partnership in marriage; they want their husbands to assume leadership, authority and primary responsibility.

Some wives who feel this way were reared in homes where the father was dominant and authoritarian; consequently, they find it difficult to accept an easy-going man as an adequate husband and father. In contrast, there are other women brought up in homes where the mother was dominant figure, who resented her bossiness and identified with the father. They likewise want masterful husbands. Still other women, whose upbringing was tomboyish, or whose appearance is sturdy and ungainly, want a very masculine, man's-man husband who, by comparison, will make them seem more feminine. Among these women are many who will find it difficult or impossible to achieve sexual satisfaction unless their husbands are forceful, demanding, masterful. Note that the first letter we quoted mentions this aspect.

The situations described by the two wives who wrote us do not reflect acute problems. Though they deplore their husbands' submissiveness, undoubtedly their dissatisfaction is to some extent offset by their own position of enhanced authority. But there is some reason for uneasiness, not only because of their own feelings but because their husbands may grow restive.

A wife who feels her husband is henpecked and who genuinely wants to build up his role at the expense of her own may find help in these suggestions:

Accent your femininity. Choose your clothing and hair style to make you look like the woman you are. If a short haircut and slacks make you look mannish, let your hair grow and wear skirts. Avoid masculine speech (excessive slang or profanity) and mannerisms. If you smoke, at least avoid lighting a match the way a man does; wait for him to open the door or ring for the elevator. And don't scorn cosmetics or feminine accessories in dress.

Build up your husband's importance. Ask his advice and treat it with respect. If you and he disagree on a minor matter, defer to him instead of making an issue of it. Quote his opinion to others; he may pretend embarrassment, but he will feel complimented.

Take over responsibilities which you feel aren't within a wife's province.

Let him take over some household responsibilities, even if you can handle them alone. Let him replace the fuse, balance your checkbook, deal with the surly plumber (even if you know how to get the plumber to do what you want). And don't show him how to do it; encourage him to think his way is better than yours.

Teach the children to respect him. The best way to do this is by your own example. If you seek his opinions, defer to his wishes, accept his authority, they, too, will regard him as the wise and powerful head of the family.

Cherish his love. Even the most mild-mannered of men wants his wife to think of him as a vital, forceful lover. The more tender, yielding and compliant she is, the more masterful he will become. But if she allows herself to seem matter-of-fact or indifferent, his self-confidence will be so undermined that he cannot be the masterful male she thinks she wants.

Some wives, often unconsciously, seek to inhibit or minimize their femininity. To do so is to deny their birthright, and very likely to frustrate their husbands. A wife can be feminine without being fragile. So can a man be masculine without being obviously aggressive. If you think your husband isn't "wearing the pants," ask yourself why. Maybe you haven't given him a chance.

DO YOU AGREE?

"Don't all marriage difficulties result from emotional illness and other unconscious factors?"

No; many problems derive from environmental strains and specific factual situations unrelated to unconscious influences.

ASK YOURSELF:

Is my husband meek, or masterful?

Most wives want their husbands to be firm and decisive without being tyrannical. They want to love and respect, but not fear, the men they marry. In marking "Yes" or "No" the questions below, answer in terms of what you think is typical of your husband's attitudes and actions.

Does Your Husband:

1. Help with household chores?
2. Listen to you without interrupting?
3. Telephone when he will be delayed?
4. Gladly stay home when you ask him?
5. Explain fully when he is late?
6. Let people take advantage of him?
7. Appear subdued or ineffectual?

Does He:

8. Usually put his job before your convenience?
9. Expect and get your respect?
10. See that you accept responsibility?
11. At times, speak sharply to you?
12. Make some decisions without asking you?
13. Keep close check on money matters?
14. Take the initiative in love-making?

Make separate counts of your "Yes" answers to Part I (Questions 1–7) and Part II (Questions 8–14). With about the same number of "Yes" answers (four or five) in each part, you probably have a considerate but firm husband. But with five or more "Yes" responses to Part I and three or fewer to Part II, your husband may be on the docile side. If there are three or fewer "Yeses" to Part I and five or more to Part II, he seems to be quite dominant. If he is at either extreme, and if you are unhappy about it, rereading the discussions on this page may give you some ideas on how to have a better marriage.

Win a free New York fashion fling

Nothing to buy,
nothing to write!

15 GRAND PRIZES

$1,500.00 WARDROBES

by Estevez

each with a fabulous trip to New York City for shopping

200 SECOND PRIZES

17 jewel, 14 carat white gold

GRUEN WATCHES
(worth $79.50)

FREE from Kotex napkins

RULES

1. Nothing to buy, nothing to do but fill in entry blank below. Entry blanks also available where Kotex products are sold.
2. Entries must be postmarked not later than midnight March 31, 1960 and received by April 8, 1960. Only one entry per envelope, please.
3. Each of the 15 grand prizes consists of a $1,500 wardrobe and a 5 day all-expense paid trip for two to New York City. Winners will select their wardrobes from a special showing of the internationally famous Estevez line. Any winner who prefers may substitute $1,000 cash award for grand prize.
4. The 15 grand prizes and 200 second prizes will be awarded on the basis of a drawing by name, under the direction of an authorized handling house whose selections are final. All winners will be notified by mail.
5. Any resident of the Continental United States may enter except employees of Kimberly-Clark Corporation, their advertising agencies and immediate families, residents of Florida, Nebraska, New Jersey and other areas where prohibited.

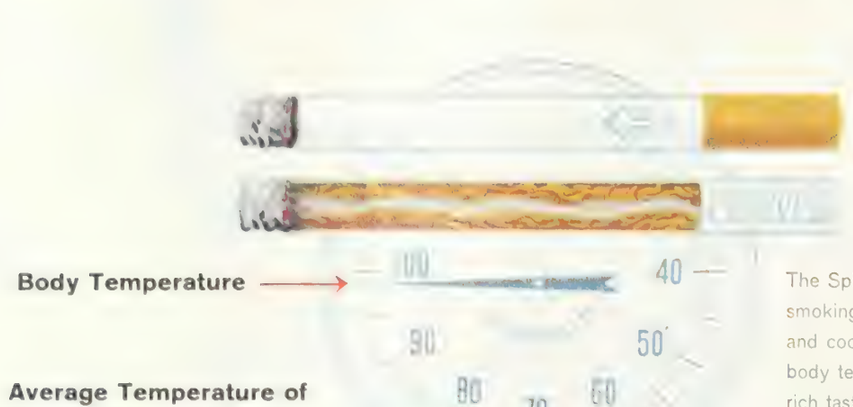
Today it's chic to be comfortable—in fashion and in your personal protection. That's why more and more smart women choose new Kotex napkins. These gentle napkins are softer, smoother than ever. And with the special Kimlon center, Kotex always protects better—more comfortably, hour after hour.

New Kotex napkins—choice of most women

KOTEX and KIMLON are trademarks of the Kimberly-Clark Corporation

FASHION FLING ENTRY

Sponsored by the makers of Kotex napkins
Fill out and mail to: Fashion Fling,
Box K, St. Paul 4, Minnesota



NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE____

STATE_____

Old Gold's Spin Filter spins and cools the smoke to less than body temperature.

The Spin Filter actually improves smoking taste. Every puff spins and cools the smoke to less than body temperature. You get the full, rich taste of fine tobaccos—the best taste yet in a filter cigarette.

and the cooler the smoke ...the better the taste!

THE BEST TASTE YET IN A FILTER CIGARETTE

JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN

WHAT WE DO WHERE WE GO WHOM WE MEET

Pat takes time out from WABC to meet teens.

50 years ago in the Journal

In February, 1910, Thomas A. Edison celebrated his sixty-third birthday. A Waverley four-seater electric auto cost $2250, and there were half a million club-women in America. "Mother Machree" was born on Tin Pan Alley, and America's Winston Churchill wrote a best-selling novel called A Modern Chronicle.

"The feathers shown on hats on LADIES' HOME JOURNAL fashion pages are from birds killed for food," explains Editor Bok, "such as barnyard fowl or pheasant, quail, reedbird or mud hen. You will find no plumes from egrets or birds of paradise which are slaughtered solely for fashion."

Fashion note: "The new spring colors are conservative and subdued and go by the names of walnut, castor, mustard, artichoke and prune."

"Menus for a Family of Two: A week's meals for two come to ten dollars, including the cost of fuel for cooking. Half a pound of chopped meat with five cents' worth of peanuts will make a dinner loaf, with enough left over to slice cold for the next day. One can of tomatoes will make a soup, a sauce and a scallop."

"A whisk broom introduced between the sheets will quickly remove those infinitesimal crumbs so irritating to an invalid," suggests a reader.

"Is it proper for a young man to stay until midnight when making a call on a young girl?" Answer: "Very bad taste. Eleven o'clock is the latest he should stay," rules Mrs. King-land.

"What Other Women Have Found Out: Make round washcloths instead of the usual square ones, and avoid the wet corners."

Writes Annie Russell in a new column called The Stage and Its People: "According to a recent study in longevity, gardeners live longest in America, clergymen next, and actors third. Actors cannot afford to be sick and therefore give careful attention to diet, rest and exercise."

Who's more honest? Girls say boys are. So do boys. When teen editors from coast to coast met here for a conference with Pat Boone and a gala weekend, talk turned from big truths to small ones. In school, teens want: "Truth always—between teacher and student." In entertainment: "Not essential if you know it's entertainment, not fact." In politics: "Desirable—but we have to trust our horse sense." Paradox summed up by one: "Everybody's for truth on public issues, but all use clichés socially." A girl turning down a date has acceptable outs—"My parents won't let me" or "I'm washing my hair." One beleaguered boy told us he fell back on "My doctor says I have a week to live" and hated himself. Group conclusion: "Truth is a strong and essential influence—especially if you have a weak memory."

We went as guest to a convention of 700 Y-Teens and this time learned local colloquialisms. A "boss date" is an evening with a great guy. "It's tough" means it's perfect in some cities. She's "hi-fi" if she's popular, "lo-fo" or "playing left out" if she's not. An absent-minded teen is "OTL" or "out to lunch." But it was a sober group, too, convinced that under the small talk its fate is decided by "politicians and scientists—and we don't know the scientists," and worried in an age when "History is made fast, and so are missiles."

When decorating editor Cynthia Wheatland finds a gem of a room, it's shared by camera. For those who want to record their own, Cynthia found an answer in Muriel King, who used to be a dress designer, is now a room portraitist. She wandered into it. "First I sketched an exterior, next a sitting room as gift for a hostess. Soon I was working in Greece, Long Island, Manhattan." Now she paints steadily for a waiting list of clients who want to reproduce rooms on Christmas cards, hand down still lifes with family albums, or recall favorite scenes in cherished homes. A surprised Miss King thinks the whole new field is expanding—"or you might say roomy."

Cynthia sees Muriel King (left) do a drawing-room portrait.

After the twenty-fifth-anniversary dinner of the Academy of American Poets, we asked Elizabeth McFarland whom she met. "Marianne Moore," said our poetry editor, "told me one of her JOURNAL poems is in her new book, Frost speaks poetically to Elizabeth.

'O To Be a Dragon.' Iowa poet Paul Engle was there; Richard Eberhart, whose work we've published; and JOURNAL poet W. H. Auden with a haunting line—said his dinner jacket had been lost at sea. Robert Frost reminded me we'd published one of his earliest poems—'Inscription for a Garden Wall.' Said that once poets had to sit below patrons. Obviously he prefers sharing a rhyme scheme over the ice cream."

Not only well-fed bridegrooms but Mardi Gras parties are hobbies of charming Margaret Williams, whose recipes are on page 134. She lives in New Orleans, but told Liane Waite how to celebrate Shrove Tuesday anywhere. Be as formal as champagne or informal as po'-boy sandwiches. Gentlemen must give favors to ladies they dance with. (One unusual guest she knows has given diamond bracelets and wrist watches! Rare!) Costumes should be colorful, but keep an eye on tomorrow. "The man I can't forget came as a monk and had realistically shaved his head. I wish I could have seen his face next morning."

A reader writes: "Do you know you can change the world by changing a word in a sentence? Instead of saying, 'Is that possible?' just say, 'That is possible.'"

When Pattern's Bet Hart asked us to see George Washington get a new suit, of course we went. The original wore out after 167 years, has just been replaced for the Chicago Historical Society down to the 72nd button, is on a national tour. Bet's ancestor John Hart signed the Declaration of Independence, but left no suit to study. She was curious. But we saw her shake her head. Washington's took three patterns, special fabrics, a year to make. But it couldn't make her How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing page. "His suit had unfinished edges. Ours never do!"

The stories of Risë Stevens, Patrice Munsel, Rosemary Clooney, Phyllis McGinley, Frances Gray Patton all go to show in our pages that good cooks are artists in more ways than one. Now Jean Anderson has discovered the case of writer B. J. (for Beatrice Joy) Chute, whose best seller, "Greenwillow," will be a musical starring Tony Perkins. "I cook a lot," she told Jean. "So does the heroine. We may have a kitchen on stage. I made up food names—ragged cakes, rowdy buns, bilberry preserves—because it's an imaginary country. Frank Loesser is writing the music. He likes these dabble cookies—try some? I dabble at putting in new ingredients, so even though I love writing I can't write my own recipes."

Success story: Anne Einseden makes many talent discoveries among the 22,000 manuscripts she reads a year, and here's just one. Virginia Layefsky told her, "After my story 'Moonlight-Starlight' ran last October, agents phoned daily. British magazines bid, and I had book offers. My tip for other first-timers? I write after breakfast—when the coffee and I are fresh."

A Few Light Notes on a Rather Dark Subject

If you said Elmo was meek,
Mary implied that he was a tiger;
if you said that he was a tiger (few would),
she described his gentleness.

FREE

DUST

ILLUSTRATED BY JOE DE MERS

By ELIZABETH ENRIGHT

"He always has; it's his way," Mary Raynor said to her house guest, Zaida Burton. "I suppose he always will."

"Who will always what?" asked her son, Timmy, coming into the room with a plate in his hand. Something about himself, probably, he thought.

"None of them have manners nowadays," said Mary, explaining Timmy to Zaida. "Manners are not supposed to be taught any more; they're supposed to develop gradually and naturally like their Adam's apples. Your father," she said, turning to Timmy. "I was telling her how your father always goes out and builds something when he's upset or angry. Builds and swears. Listen ——"

They were silent. From the workshop in the basement came a sound of hammering accompanied by a man's voice. No words were distinguishable.

"That way he's gotten a lot of repairs done," Timmy said.

He went upstairs to his room carrying the plate. He had just made himself five meat-loaf sandwiches because he was going to put Handel's Oratorio on his record player.

"And not only swearing," Mary said, when he was out of earshot. "The words he uses! You know those words. The kind you see in cement."

"Elmo? Oh, I can't believe it. Elmo!" cried Zaida, thinking of him.

Mary bristled slightly. "Just because he looks mild," she said. "I know that. He does look mild. But if you knew him as I do, you'd be very much surprised. Elmo has character traits that no one suspects."

When she spoke of him Mary's conversation became a sort of Procrustean bed for Elmo. If you said he was meek, she implied that he was a tiger; if you said that he was a tiger (few would), she described his gentleness; if you praised his constancy, she hinted at lewdness. And it is possible that there was an element of truth in all these aspects hinted and revealed, since Elmo was, of course, a human being.

"What's he teed off about now?" said Timmy, coming into the room again. He had forgotten the soda pop.

"Dad? Oh, it's the fifteenth, for one thing. He got hold of Hartnett's bill before I could hide it till the right time. He forgot to check the oil in the car and burned out the bearings; and he's trying to stop smoking again. Nothing catastrophic, Timmy; just an accumulation of wrong things."

Timmy went on to the kitchen, whistling against his teeth. These middle-aged people, he thought. Can't see the woods for the dumb little trees. Bills and trying to save money and fixing the roof and stuff like that. I won't live that way. As he slammed the refrigerator door he felt a stab of happiness: here was the cold bottle in his hand, and upstairs the meat-loaf sandwiches and the glorious music were waiting. He was

CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

If I had it to d

I'd do most of it again: be a mad Girl Scout, get involved in the Miss Burbank contest, take the movie contract, fall in love and marry Eddie, have the children; how could I not?

It was such a small thing that changed my life—a white silk sport blouse and green scarf, to be exact. Norma Harris and I were walking down Magnolia Boulevard in Burbank one May day (1948) and we saw the little handbill that said every girl who entered the Miss Burbank contest—just entered it—would receive the blouse and scarf. Well, I never did have many clothes and Norma thought it would be fun, so we went right over to the recreation hall and signed up. There was only one stipulation: you had to be at least sixteen. I made it by a month. We not only received our blouses but were promptly invited to luncheons and banquets and had our pictures taken.

I never dreamed of going through with the contest. I was a junior at Burbank High, knocking myself out playing basketball, volleyball, baseball and speedball, tooting the French horn in the band and participating in the Girl Scouts, Job's Daughters, the girls' athletic association, the a cappella choir and the club that made laws for the student body. At Girl Scout rallies and school assemblies I clowned around imitating Beatrice Kay, the Broadway hillbilly, while her

When Debbie Reynolds was first asked by newspaper reporters if her husband, singer Eddie Fisher, was romancing with motion-picture star Elizabeth Taylor, she denied it because she believed that their marriage was happier than ever. "It is very hard," she says in her own story here, "to find that the person you love doesn't love you."

By Debbie Reynolds as told to Jane Ardmore

JOHN ENGSTEAD

Debbie hopes eventually to work "only for fun," perhaps just the few months when Carrie, now 3, and Todd, nearly 2, are in school. "I don't actually believe in working mothers."

Over again

record played "I'm Only a Bird in a Gilded Cage," or pantomiming Betty Hutton to her "Square in the Social Circle," or doing Red Skelton's bit about the lady driver in the too-tight girdle. You get the idea—a school character. I loved having fun.

But the glamour department was something else. I didn't wear lipstick, I did wear a Girl Scout uniform, I was very unsure with boys. They were fine on a baseball field, but on a date my mouth went dry, I didn't know what to say or do. Six of us had a club we called the NN—Non-Neckers—Club; then one girl went off the deep end and kissed a boy so we changed the name to the NNN—Nearly Non-Neckers. There were a couple of boys who liked me anyhow; they were as involved with athletics as I was, and they'd take me to the proms even if I was wearing a black taffeta dress made over from one that had originally belonged to the next-door neighbor my mother's age, and gold-and-black flat sandals.

Jerry Odens was a boy who understood me and let me be myself; It was he I called when mother insisted I appear on the night of the Miss Burbank contest. I'd given my word, mother said, I'd accepted the blouse and scarf, so I must show up. Jerry not only thought she was right, he thought I'd win.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 126

On a misty day in September, 1906, just after Rosana's seventh birthday, the circus reached a market town in the West Midlands called Leintford, near the Welsh border. To Rosana one place was very like another, for she saw little of them except a muddy field somewhere on the outskirts; they had been on the road since March, moving across England and back in a long slow procession of horses and vans and cages and four elephants, incongruous in the damp or dusty lanes between green hedges, stared at from cottages and followed by children. At Leintford all the town children turned out to watch the setting up and Rosana enjoyed showing off to them, trotting around with empty buckets—though with long-practiced care not to get in anyone's way—and calling the tiger by name as she passed its cage, to make it clear to them that she belonged to the circus and so was to be envied.

When the work was finished and there was an hour to go till the first of the two evening shows, she went to the van she shared with her mother and Carmencita, the bareback rider. To both of them Rosana was a bit of a bore, though even at seven she could make herself useful; and since she would grow more useful as she became eight and then nine, and could soon start training seriously and earn her keep, it seemed hardly worth while putting her in an institution; Rosetta and Carmencita suffered her, not without reluctance. Rosana loved and admired her mother, who took little notice of her but spent most of her spare time sitting on a bunk smoking, or brushing her long black hair, or leaning against the caravan steps talking to men. She was the greatest trapeze artist in the world, Rosana thought.

This evening, when the mist was coming down on the flat water meadows by the river and the flares were being lighted outside, Rosana squatted in the warm caravan with her wooden doll and a piece of bread and jam, while Rosetta and Carmencita yawned and idled over their teacups. All the circus performers had exotic names of that kind, but whereas most of them had started life as Millie or Florence or Maud, Rosana had been given her name (though not christened by it) when she was born. Her mother, whose real name was Agnes Lock, had made it up, and Rosana was very proud of it.

"I better mend my tights; that new boy left a nail sticking out of the saddle yesterday," said Carmencita, padding it out with several adjectives unsuitable for a child of seven, which went in at one of Rosana's CONTINUED ON PAGE 151

© Margaret Bonham 1960

Rosana, swathed in rose velvet, gave a strange proud smile. "Is it really for me?"

Tiger

By MARGARET BONHAM

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT G. H

In Rosana's dreams, Sultana was fierce and bold,
the circus horses gleamed and pranced,
the trapeze artists soared like swallows.
Could they risk letting her learn the truth?

THE WALK

He was seventeen—old enough to be the town's star-spangled hero, young enough not to know what to expect.

By RUTH MOORE

The day the basketball team came home from winning the state championship, old Martin Hoodless was out in his cow pasture cutting down a tree. The tree was a big one, a horse chestnut. For three years it had been dying. The stock sheltered under it in hot weather; his grandsons, Ralph and Carlisle, had a tree house in it. Any time now those big limbs might let go without warning, kill either a cow or a kid.

The tree house was a platform built out over four supporting branches, boarded in on three sides and with a tar-paper roof. It had a secret private look; no matter how far you walked back and craned up, you couldn't see into it. It was a wonder them kids hadn't broke their necks seven times over. When, in deviltry's tarnation time, had they built this contraption? He'd always made it one of their chores to drive the stock to pasture, figuring there wasn't anything up here that they could raise Cain with; but, by tar, you had to keep an eye on everything.

That tree was coming down, and high time too. Carlisle, when he got back from hassling around all over creation with the high-school ball team, would find out there was plenty to do at home. Give him something to use them muscles for, Martin thought, eying with some relish the thick bole of the tree. Saw a little wood. Do a little work for a change.

Down in the town center, a mile away, the fire whistle let go with a long blast. Martin jumped and nearly dropped his ax.

He glanced automatically at his own buildings below the slope of the pasture. He could see only the roofs and the upper half of them, but there they were. All neat. All quiet. No smoke. No smoke anywhere on the four points of the sky, so far as he could see.

At that moment the whistle on the tannery blew and the Baptist church bell began to ring. Almost at once the Congregationalist church bell started, dong-dong-dong. Then somebody apparently put a record on the mechanical carillon in the Methodist steeple and turned it up to "loud," for the chimes began to thunder out.

"What is it?" Martin said, aloud. "The Second Coming?"

He put down his ax and walked across the pasture to the fence. There he leaned out through the alders, so that he could look down the highway.

Then he saw the parade. It was coming toward him, spearheaded by the fire trucks, pumper and hook-and-ladder, covered from bumper to bumper with waving, yelling people. A lot of high-school kids, he saw; but plenty of others.

Winfield Parker was driving the pumper. Leaning forward, Martin drew a sharp breath. Seated beside Win, working the pumper's siren, was Martin's own daughter, Susie.

Susie McIntosh, respectable mother of an eleven-year-old girl and two grown sons—if you could call them young squirts grown. At least they were in body, if not in mind, big boys for fifteen and seventeen. Susie, that he'd left, not two hours ago, washing dishes in his kitchen, here now, riding the fire truck!

There was Jed Wallace, with his wife on the front seat and two-three of the bank people in the back. There was Harry Troy and his

CONTINUED ON PAGE 92

© 1960 by Ruth Moore
THE WALK DOWN MAIN STREET
is soon to be published in book form by
William Morrow & Co., Inc.

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

Debby stared—it was so easy nowadays to say or do the wrong thing. "Come and eat," she said. "I'm starved." Carlisle said, "Go ahead if you're hungry."

DOWN MAIN STREET

A psychiatrist answers 10 Questions parents ask about

HOW MOVIE AND TV VIOLENCE

In the course of many private and public meetings with parents in the last few years I have become increasingly aware of their concern over the amount of violence to which children are exposed nowadays through motion pictures shown on television and in movie theaters.

I have brought together the ten questions parents most frequently ask of me about screen violence, and shall answer them here in more detail than has been possible from the lecture platform or in private consultations.

Let me first define two terms:

By "children" I mean, in this particular case, young people from about the age of three, when many begin to be TV fans, up to about twelve, when it can be assumed that the average child has become less susceptible because better able to differentiate between the real and the unreal, the likely and the unlikely; more critical; his sensibilities and his standards of values better established.

By "violence" I mean people killing each other, hurting each other; I mean arson, torture, beating, knifing, lynching or any other physical action that would shock and frighten a normal child—or adult, for that matter—if he saw it happen in real life.

There is a lack of adventure in the lives of most children today. The world is full of dangers, but not of the kind that children can comprehend or come up against physically. So, adventure stories on television and in the movies can help to fill a need of children for their all-round development. Some violence or the threat of it, handled with respect for children's sensibilities, has always been an ingredient in good children's adventure stories. What has become so prevalent, and what parents are concerned about today, is the movie or TV show in which violence predominates—made more realistic and shocking because it is shown, in live action, rather than merely described.

Now for the questions:

Q "Does anyone keep track of just how much violence there is on TV and in the movies?"

Not in the same way that certain agencies keep track of radioactive fallout, no—and it would be a very good thing if some agency did do this—but interesting studies have been made by an organization called NAFBRAT (National Association for Better Radio and Television), founded by Mrs. Clara S. Logan and having on its board of directors such persons as Dr. Lee de Forest, Dr. Paul Popenoe, Gilbert Seldes, Dr. Dallas Smythe and James V. Bennett.

In the course of its study NAFBRAT compiled the following list of violent acts taking place on various TV shows which were represented as being for children. Nearly all these were half-hour programs:

PROGRAM A: One murder, one robbery, one jailbreak.

PROGRAM B: One murder, three attempted murders, one robbery, one holdup.

PROGRAM C: Two attempted murders, one robbery.

PROGRAM D: Three attempted murders, one jailbreak, one arson.

PROGRAM E: Two attempted murders, one "justifiable" killing, one holdup, two attempted lynchings, two hangings prevented at the last moment, one mob violence, brutal fights.

PROGRAM F: Two murders, one attempted murder, one robbery, threats to kill, man tied up.

PROGRAM G: One attempted murder, one robbery, conspiracy to murder three people, one bomb explosion.

PROGRAM H: Two murders, one "justifiable" killing, one false murder charge, man dumped into well to die.

PROGRAM I: One "justifiable" killing, one attempted murder, one police car stolen.

PROGRAM J: One murder, three attempted murders, one "justifiable" killing, lots of shooting.

WERNER WOLFF

Through moving pictures a child may see more violence in 30 minutes than the average adult experiences in a lifetime. Is this "entertainment" or, as one jurist has put it, "the perversion of young minds"?

FFECTS CHILDREN

By FREDRIC WERTHAM, M. D., author of "Seduction of the Innocent," a study of comic books.

PROGRAM K: Three mass shootings, one holdup, one bank robbery, two attempted murders.

PROGRAM L: Four attempted murders of a twelve-year-old boy, one attempted murder, one fight with guns and fists.

These typical examples (1958) are from such allegedly wholesome programs for children as Wild Bill Hickok, Sergeant Preston, Robin Hood, The Lone Ranger, Steve Donovan, Superman, Sky King, Annie Oakley, Rin Tin Tin, Hawkeye.

NAFBRAT listed the toll of violence for one week in programs shown in Los Angeles before 9 P.M.: 161 murders, 60 so-called "justifiable" killings, 2 suicides, 192 attempted murders, 83 robberies, 15 kidnapings, 24 murder conspiracies, 21 jailbreaks, 7 attempted lynchings, 6 dynamitings, 11 extortions, 2 cases of arson, 2 cases of torture. What could not be counted were innumerable prolonged and brutal fights, threats of killing, sluggings, manhandling of women and children.

In some cities where there are several TV stations, no single station may appear to be dominated by violence during the children's hours, but a child can obtain an almost uninterrupted flow of violence by switching from one channel to another.

I know of no statistical measurement of violence in films shown in motion-picture houses, but the parents I have talked with believe that violence is becoming more common (and more violent) in movies as well as on the TV screen. Some are less alarmed about movies than TV, however, simply because movies have been with us longer, and they assume that anything we have survived this long we must be immune to!

Unfortunately, this does not take into account the improvements in color and sound and screen size that have made movies far "realer" than they used to be, and their violence that much more convincing. Nor does it allow for changes in our moral and cultural atmosphere that have allowed and encouraged film makers to go in for more violence than used to be allowable.

The rather one-sided competition between TV and movies for children's attention has probably had a similar effect on movie makers.

Though the number of children under twelve who go to movies is infinitesimal compared with the number who watch TV, it should be remembered that many movies ultimately are shown on TV; also that the competition works both ways—violent movies stimulate the making of more violent TV programs. The problem of keeping some check on the amount of violence in movie houses has been made more difficult by the fact that adults no longer go to movies as frequently as they used to. They are simply not there to see what is being shown to children. The parents are at home watching TV!

The (British) Association of Cinematograph and Allied Technicians, referring to American movies, had this to say in a resolution: "Beating up, gouging, knifing, flogging of women, and other forms of sadistic excess are too regular a feature of so-called motion-picture entertainment today." It added that in nine cases out of ten there was no artistic justification for the brutality. It made a clear distinction between films that respect human dignity and those that depict violent death as the natural order of things.

Though most of the parents I have talked with are convinced, as I am myself, that there is an excessive amount of violence on TV and movie screens, none of us knows exactly how much. A really comprehensive study seems called for. This would contribute greatly to general understanding of the problem.

Q "Children have survived plenty of violence in storybooks—is it so different on TV and movie screens?"

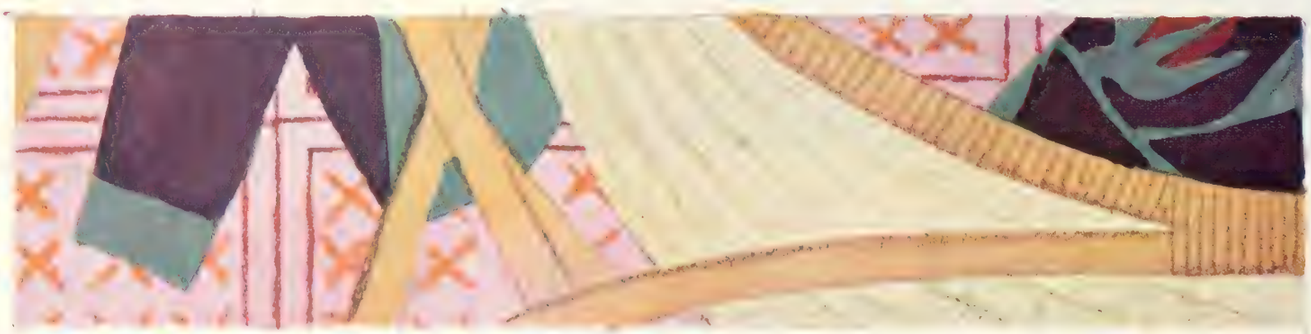
I am convinced that the moving visual image on movie or TV screen, complete with sound, has a much greater



CONTINUED ON PAGE 165

FUEL FOR THE FLAME

By ALEC WAUGH

CONCLUSION

On Friday afternoon Basil returned from lunch to find Ahmed Abrusak standing outside his office door. His features expressed worry, fright, astonishment.

"Terrible thing happen, boss. They arrest my cousin."

"Who arrests your cousin?"

"Police do, boss. They come this morning while we both at work. They search house, break open desk, take papers. When we come back lunch, they take him away."

"They did not do anything to you?" Basil asked.

"No, boss, they do nothing to me."

They were still standing in the passage. "You'd better come in here," said Basil. He had a sense of imminent catastrophe. As he sat behind his desk, he remembered the first time he had seen this man, standing here, an applicant for a post.

"Did the police ask you any questions?"

"No, they no ask me questions," Ahmed told him.

"They must have said something to you."

"No, boss; they say, 'Don't be a nuisance, you'—that all."

"Have you any idea why they should arrest your cousin?"

"Politics, I suppose."

"What were his politics?"

"Very left wing. Freedom of the people. Karak for the Karakis. All that kind of thing."

"Was he a Communist?"

"Maybe, boss. I not know."

"You were living in the same house as your cousin?"

"Yes, boss."

"Your wife and children too?"

"No, they still in town," Ahmed said.

"You told me that you wanted to work here so that your wife and children could live in the country."

"That true, boss. I no find a house."

Basil thought. The pieces of a jigsaw puzzle were fitting into place. "Was it your cousin's idea that you should come out here?"

"Yes, his idea."

"Did he advise you to tell me that you wanted to have this post so that you could bring your family out here?"

"Yes, boss, he say that."

"I see."

He saw too well. Ahmed had been planted here by a Communist or a near-Communist, through the same device with which that misguided Indian had been recruited to make an attempt against the crown princess. There were many questions that he would have liked to ask. But

CONTINUED ON PAGE 136

© 1960 BY ALEC WAUGH. THE COMPLETE NOVEL IS SOON TO BE PUBLISHED BY FARRAR, STRAUSS AND CUDAHY

She looked over his shoulder.
"Perhaps that's why you asked me to marry you,"
she told him.

So ends the day—an easy chair, good reading, friend near enough for a rub-behind-the-ears. Who could it be but the Man in the House, Harlan Miller?

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

. . . When I manage to write a weekly letter to all three of our children,
. . . Or remember to send an artificial fried egg to each of our five grandchildren,
. . . And send a book now and then to those of our family who can read,
. . . Or turn off my midnight background music at my Dream Girl's behest,
. . . Or convince my wife that I genuinely like her new dress,
. . . And treat all my in-laws like kissing cousins,
Then I suddenly feel so popular that I want to hide.

We may organize an anti "comedy husband" society to fight the radio, movie and comic-strip "humorists" who picture us as the laughingstock of every family and the butt of all jokes.

New laurels for our neighborhood's most extravagant wife: she's given away all her husband's suits more than ten years old. Alas, she didn't know he had only two newer than that.

"Shucks, Emily Post and Amy Vanderbilt disagree about women crossing their legs in public," pouts Betty Comfort, hiding the lemon squeezer. "I didn't realize it's still a public issue."

At the bridge table our adventurous doctor's wife reveals they've discussed a trailer caravan trip the length of Africa. "He gets mad," she explains, "when I remind him he's never house-trailered even to Florida."

At $1 a ticket our dauntless women's club arranged a tour of the village's seven most fascinating kitchens. A real bargain, though it doesn't permit a peek at the bathroom or inside the icebox.

A newlywed in Linden Heights confesses a new problem: "If the buttonless coat is downstairs and the button is upstairs," she asks, "shall I take the coat up or the button down?" Problems, problems!

As a music lover I'm irked because the new records come sealed and I can't play 'em before I buy 'em. The record booth used to be one place to hide from life's urgencies.

Our son-in-law is contemplating a Trampoline for his back yard for his three tots under five. "They'd make me bounce," he muses, dreamy-eyed, "enough to guarantee my daily exercise."

Our town's stingiest millionaire can't understand why a whoop went up when, asked to bring meat to a potluck party, he turned up with three pounds of wieners.

Indescribable is the ill-concealed fury of our club's gourmet when he can't get a well-done end cut of roast beef. He has convinced himself that the other members are all goofs who want their meat underdone.

The newest house in our neighborhood has both a garbage grinder and an incinerator right in the kitchen. "Why?" the girls ask. "They always eat out!"

I argue with my Lady Love about what are the best icebox leftovers. She likes fruit compote; I vote for old shaggy meat loaf, though I spoon a pickled kumquat occasionally.

In one week I talked with both Japan and Italy over our bathroom phone; my sharpest glimpse of what a small world it is.

For $4 at our new University Athletic Club you can pile up a smorgasbord-type buffet dinner that makes a meal at the Forum of the 12 Caesars look like an exercise in aristocratic self-denial. Even the assistant professors look well fed.

I'm forced to recognize our three-year-old Suzi as an egghead tease. "What's that yellow thing?" she asks innocently. "It helps me put my shoes on," I explain. "You mean it's a shoehorn?" she asks.

Ha, a clash on which sits in a wedding picture of long ago, bride or bridegroom. If she sat, upper-middle class or over; if he, lower-middle or below—or her costume wouldn't permit a sit-down.

Our son is studying German in school, and we've given him some German-language records for his birthday. He'd gladly have settled for a summer trip to Vienna.

My philosophy on tipping has ripened: It's delightful to share the wealth with a good waiter or hotel maid. But I enjoy giving small insulting tips to surly servants, or none where 18 per cent is added "for service."

"I don't mind giving up our family car to our young for an evening when I need it myself," broods Peter Comfort, shoveling snow off his shuffleboard alley, "if they weren't so stingy about lending me their bikes."

Our two-phone families are in the same boat with our two-car families: their young easily monopolize both; and a brave new world with three cars and three phones is only a futile gesture.

One of our local biggies got stuck with a $585 check entertaining business friends at a New York tourist trap. (And they wouldn't even cash his check.) But the revenue people allowed it as business expense, which it wasn't anything else but.

They invited me to lunch at the nearby university and to see their new electronic computer and their uranium nuclear reactor, campus do-it-yourself toys for the egghead coeds and collegians; twenty-nine dials and twenty-nine colors of electric wiring, and I'm a football fan again.

A busload of our town's nicest Roosevelt haters drove down to see Ralph Bellamy play F.D.R. in "Sunrise at Campobello," and now they can't decide whether they fell for Bellamy or F.D.R.

One of our more sardonic luncheon clubbers has invented a new slogan: "Don't just sit there; worry!" Right after lunch a sign went up in a Main Street store: "Don't just stand there; buy something!"

I'm Lucky! Lucky!

I'M SO GLAD TO BE A WOMAN

It's such a lucky thing to be a woman—a stroke of fine fortune, like being born with double-fringed eyelashes or moving next door to a family of seven boys. Not that boys are all that matters about being a girl. What I'm trying to say is: a woman is a limitless person.

Remember, when we were children, how we all planned to "be" something? Nurse was probably one of your dreams, and if you wear out as many copies of his baby-care book now as I (six in seven years), you deserve a diploma from Dr. Spock himself!
But I had romantic dreams, too, as all girls do.
Dreams like lighthouse-keeper's sweetheart and inspired-power-for-good-in-the-community and indelibly-beautiful-actress-not-long-for-this-world.

Well, along with many "careers" I never planned (cook and laundress and psychologist, for example; gardener, interior decorator and seamstress), all those dreams of mine came true.

Returning from P.T.A. the other night, I suddenly realized that, in a way, our house is a lighthouse—and I am still the keeper's sweetheart.
Of course he found out long ago that my beauty is not the indelible kind—it cold-creams off at bedtime—but he agrees that I'm an actress.
All women are. We play so many roles, our lives are blessed with such freshening variety!
The need for our artistry is endless and the rewards are often immediate: "I love you," for instance.

Today I took pleasure in many small luxuries.
The wedding-ring glow of polished brass,
the wild-fern fragrance of fresh sheets,
the look of serenity I have at last achieved with the new draperies in the living room.
Little things, but eloquent of woman's ever-renewing joy. And I could sing.

I'm like our little boy, who woke up on his fourth birthday to a room filled with the splendor of the promised desk "like daddy's," the toy typewriter of his dreams, and a drawerful of office supplies. At first he made no sound;
then we heard the desk drawer opened; and then,
at last, happiness found its voice. "Paper clips!"
he crowed. "Oh, I'm lucky! Lucky!"

FRANCIS PELLEGRINI

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY
MARGARET HICKEY

Because Women

By BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD

When the population explosion hit her community, Mrs. Bastian, mother of four, started wheels moving for better schools in a way other citizens might copy.

The women on these pages are women aware of the world beyond their doorsteps. They see large issues in deeply felt human terms; they have a generous capacity for caring.

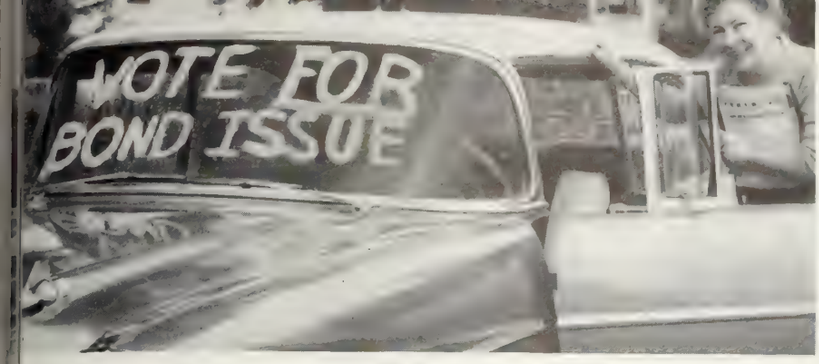
They are women of skill and devotion, intelligence and energy. They must balance—and they do it well—their obligations to vital outside tasks and to the private world of home and family. Of diverse backgrounds, different abilities and interests, each finds her way to be of use.

Mildred Bastian, for instance, has a "wonderful, patient competence with facts and figures," according to Mrs. Aaron Fischer, chairman of the Committee on Higher Educational Needs of Metropolitan St. Louis. "Others can sense her integrity, her liking for people. She has avoided dabbling, which leads to frustration in volunteer work, and has accumulated knowledge and insight on school problems."

She knows, too, the need for study, thoughtfulness, tact. District School Superintendent Virgil C. McCluer's appraisal of Mrs. Bastian and her group is one every citizens' organization might envy: "They've been sincere and reasonable and have stuck to important things; they've never been little or dictatorial."

The influence of women begins in the home, of course, in the guidance of their children. It extends first to the details of community housekeeping directly affecting the home, then broadens as women gain experience. This is the training ground for national and international leadership.

"We can no longer count on the automatic or accidental emergence of dedicated, courageous, imaginative and wise leaders," C. Scott Fletcher has remarked in The Great Awakening, published by the Ford Foundation Fund for Adult Education. "We must educate them purposefully and by design."



Women who, across the nation, are working at the local level for better libraries, schools, parks, social services, political organizations are preparing themselves for great responsibilities. Through hundreds of organizations they learn and act. In almost every town are the parent-teacher association, League of Women Voters, American Legion Auxiliary, Junior League, Women's Club, and others.

We occasionally forget that women can be a primary source of first-rate thinking on difficult public issues. In their discussion groups they create and expand a powerful body of opinion. It is, of course, often quietly influential and privately expressed. Around family dinner tables many of the nation's fundamental choices are made—choices that will elect the next President, shape the policies of legislators and even direct the course of summit meetings.

Vitality in a democracy depends upon individual, personal interest combined with training and conscientious teamwork. We need the talents and capacities of all the people, of women working with men for the public good at every level. We need the woman who, cherishing her own home and family, is impelled to work for a world in which the homes and families of others, too, can be secure—free from illiteracy, disease, delinquency and neglect. We need Women Who Care. END

Mrs. Joseph C. Bastian, of Ferguson, Missouri, is a housewife with a handsome, mobile face, humorous gray-green eyes, and four school-age children. She and her husband live in a comfortable white frame house with three quarters of an acre of back yard under big shade trees—the kind of yard made for bicycles, neighborhood children and (since her three oldest are boys) a clubhouse with "No Girls Allowed" over the door. She spends much of her time keeping house or chauffeuring for Little League. But what time she has left she is apt to spend at a small, crammed desk in one corner of her dining room, where she keeps a store of facts and figures on almost every aspect of Missouri's public schools. She does so because to her "education" is a hard, aspiring, beautiful word.

Ten years ago, Mildred Bastian's oldest son, Joey, an extra-shy, extra-bright child, entered kindergarten. His class was overcrowded, the building was antiquated, and Joey had a miserable year. It was a year when Ferguson's school board was facing the fact that the town's population had doubled since before the war—yet only a few hundred citizens turned out to vote for a new elementary school. Today Mrs. Bastian's school Mildren Bastian was aghast to learn that Missouri high-school students could win a diploma with up to nine out of seventeen courses in nonacademic subjects such as shop, band, home economics. Mother of three boys and one girl (Katherine Emily shown with her at left), she wanted high academic standards as well as enough buildings for St. Louis County schools. Seeking public support, she met often with fellow volunteers (opposite page), with them backed crucial bond issues (above). She says, "My hair has grown gray in the cause—but I can't think of a better one."

Care

istrict (R-2 in St. Louis County) has a parents' group that has given its chool board vigorous support for five years. District Superintendent irgil C. McCluer says, "In 1954 none of our high-school youngsters anted to be classified as an 'egghead.' Now this has about disappeared. Ve're getting higher—much higher—registration in academic courses. lew offerings such as languages are being enthusiastically received. And think it's the town people who can take the credit."

This changed climate is all the more remarkable because it took place gainst odds—a rate of growth that has sent R-2's school population soarng over 400 per cent in the last ten years. As Mrs. Bastian puts it, "We ad all the national problems—and some of them four times worse!"

She was once heard to say, with a touch of indignation, "Parents are wfully good about standing up and saying, 'We want better schools.' What's needed are more who will say, 'and here's how you get them.'" Yet she would be quick to add that this "how" is no magic formula. It s a slow process of persuasion, beginning only when enough parents now clearly what kind of education they want their children to have. By 1952 her own feeling about her local schools was still one of distress bout buildings. Ferguson had just been merged with nearby Florissant, maller but suffering even greater

CONTINUED ON PAGE 130

America is rich in Women Who Care, women who work for their communities as well as their families; who have translated their personal concern into many hours, many years, of service. Five such women are saluted in the JOURNAL this month for the tasks they have accomplished, for the vision they have shown.

MRS. GEORGE W. VAUGHAN Washington, D.C.
President, Association of the Junior Leagues of America

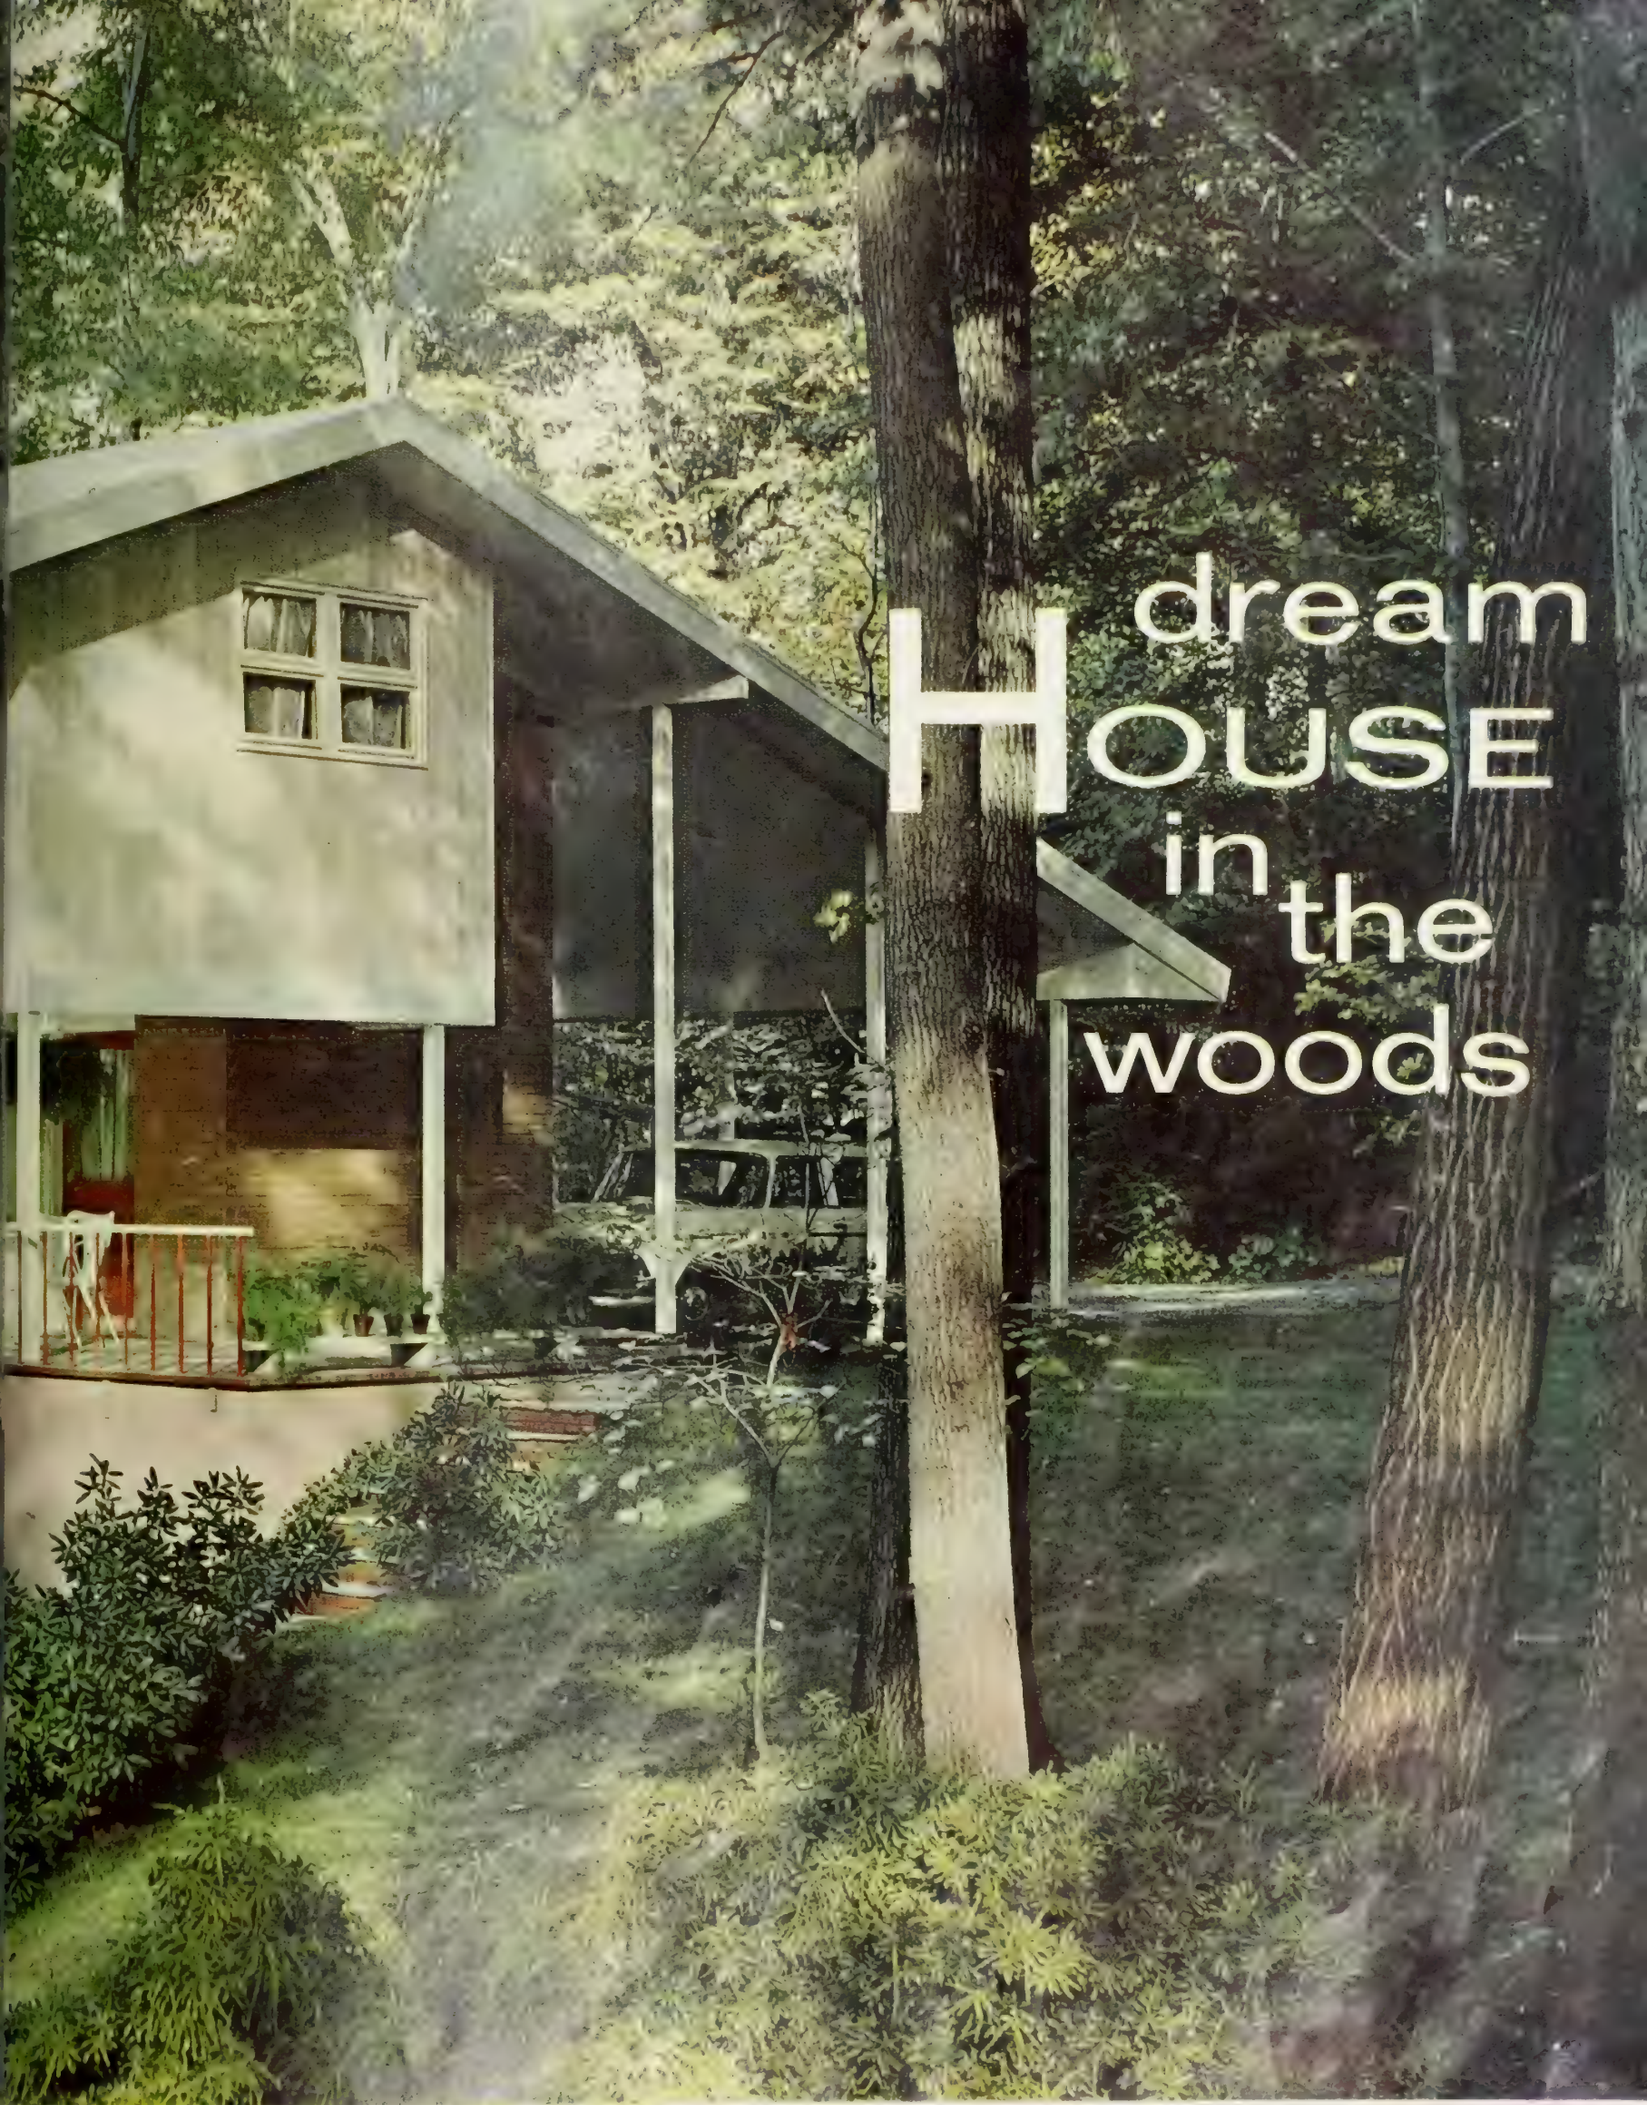
Jean Webb Vaughan is one of those rare women who even when their children are little consistently find the time and energy to add to their list of volunteer assignments. A native of Los Angeles, Jean served her local community as a member of the Child Guidance and Salvation Army advisory boards; on Red Cross, Cub Scouts and other committees. She went through the mill of local Junior League offices, including the presidency, then advanced to director of her region. As national president she represents some 73,000 young women engaged in voluntary community service in 194 cities in the U.S., Canada and Mexico. The Vaughans, with their children, Merry and Bill, now live in Washington, D.C.

MRS. S. PALMER GAILLARD, JR. Mobile, Ala.
Chairman, Council on Hospital Auxiliaries, American Hospital Association.

Laura Gaillard's role this year climaxes the work she began in 1950, when she organized the auxiliary for the Mobile Infirmary, the 340-bed general hospital in her own community. Her knowledge and experience have deepened with each new demand—for state, regional, international action—until now all her skill is used in guiding 2,000,000 volunteer hospital workers, and in bringing more auxiliaries and more volunteers to more hospitals. Her husband is an attorney; her two daughters are married; her son is a Marine lieutenant in Okinawa.

MRS. MAURICE T. MOORE New York City
Chairman, Foreign Division, National Board, Y.W.C.A.

Born in China, of missionary parents, Elisabeth Luce Moore's intense interest is in women as responsible citizens. Her work with the Y.W. program in 70 countries has taken her to Africa and Europe, and most recently on an extended tour of South America. She is chairman of the board of the Institute of International Education (administering exchange programs), the first woman to hold that post. Mrs. Moore is the wife of a New York lawyer; her two sons are just embarking on their careers.



MRS. JAMES O. PARKER Grand Rapids, Mich.
President, National Congress of Parents and Teachers

Karla Van Ostrand Parker has never lost sight of the P.T.A.'s purpose: "To help mothers to be better mothers." She has had a vital part in broadening the concept, however, from the day when her own daughters started school at the Dickinson Elementary School in Grand Rapids. Step by step she went from president of a high-school unit to her present role in the 12,000,000-member organization. Her greatest satisfaction is in the rich relationships with her own family. the pride of her husband and married daughters in her work for children and youth. She thoroughly enjoys her own five grandchildren.

A woman's house is her kingdom, where she reates her own atmosphere of gaiety, peace and respect for growing.

PORTFOLIO HOUSE No. 11

Featuring wide sheltering roof, outdoor dining, hole for tree.

The difficult thing about a dream house, in the woods or in the open, is to make it come true. You do this with a special mixture of imagination and practicality. Journal Portfolio Houses have been coming true, from dream to reality, twice every year—all of them Journal-designed and Journal-built. . . .The one shown on these pages is No. II of the series.

Floor plans will fit most any town or country site.

A SMALL HOUSE, in terms of low cost and easy care, can look large and live large, as you will see here. The entrance points this up superbly on the opposite page. From where you are about to step inside the door, the covered porch seems to be as big as all outdoors. Which it almost is, because a square hole in the roof lets you look right up to the sky like a picture in a frame, and lets a big beech tree of the woods tower up through it twice as high as the house.

GLAMOUR AND DRAMA, in the stairway window-wall, the blue paneling beside it, the tree growing up through the porch, are not customary features of a house as price-practical as this one. It is simply a matter of imagination. Even in the selection of the site, imagination took advantage of the weather-conditioned woods that make the house sunny warm in winter and shady cool in summer. And in such an unexpected place as the second floor, practicality and imagination give you spacesaving wonders—the luxury of a double bath and an upstairs laundry. And why, too, shouldn't there be a fireplace in the bedroom of a basic house when the chimney flue runs right up the wall?

LET THE PLANS further prepare you for the next seven pages of interiors. Follow the point of your pencil on the plan, and see how the house makes a virtue of compactness. And around the whole house make a note of all the porches, galleries and terraces that do so much to enlarge the living from the inside out.

ARCHITECTURAL EDITOR, JOHN BRENNEMAN
HOMEMAKING EDITOR, MARGARET DAVIDSON
CONTRIBUTING EDITOR, RICHARD PRATT
ARCHITECT, JOHN BRENNEMAN, AIA
INTERIORS DESIGNED WITH H. T. WILLIAMS
ARCHITECTURAL ASSISTANT, ANNE FULLER

PLANS ARE AVAILABLE AT $10 A SET FROM STANLEY C. REESE, 70 W. 11TH ST., NEW YORK 11, NEW YORK.

Imagination loads the living room with glamour

GUERRERO

PAINTING BY CARL MALOUF COURTESY VIRGINIA FRANKEL GALLERY

The living room is entered from the foyer and looks into trees and grounds.

COLOR GREETS YOU like an outstretched hand when you step into the living room. Against light pink walls each accent rings clear. The deep blue-green Spanish rug is fringed wool and reversible. A white-and-royal-purple chair of French ancestry stands near a carnation-colored sofa that couldn't be more practical with its foam-rubber cushions and cotton-quilt upholstery. At the fireplace wall we chose a tub chair in white cotton patterned in clear tones of orange, grape, blue, leaf green. Even the fireplace has clear color accent, with bottle-green lamps and vivid ceramic plaque over the deep shelf that hides logs and holds magazines.

THE OTHER FURNISHINGS STAY SUBTLE, with fabrics making a play on color. A seventeenth-century English chest has been painted. A coffee table of the same period has a bleached chestnut top. Accessories are simple, from amethyst glass lamps to rattan portable table. The room offers solid comfort but is graceful, too, from window blinds at one side threaded in yarn to window draperies that are sheer white and washable. Plants and personal touches complete the room. We like here the idea of white ceramic tile as a base for the greenery, and flecked white vinyl tile in the rest of the room. It's all practical and gleaming from wall to wall.

The dining room is like an indoor garden

TERRACES AROUND YOU, trees in sight, glass walls that can be curtained, tubbed greenery at the windows all make for a dining room where meals are pleasant and private at all hours. The room is raised above the grounds surrounding it and faces away from the road. The kitchen adjoins it. A bookcase divider sets it apart from the living room. For gala parties and year-round dining, the sliding glass door provides enclosure or invites guests to settle in weatherproof furniture on the wide porch.

WE KEPT OUR OWN PLAN SIMPLE with ash-topped dining table, white-painted modern Italian chairs and two antique French ones. On the wall adjoining the kitchen we used wallpaper in Portuguese tile pattern. A console of pecan and butternut acts as server and holds party supplies. An unexpected accessory always adds personality to a room—the Spanish garnet hanging lamp provides the imaginative off-beat note. The floor here is a continuation of the white tile of the living room. Dividend: behind the bookcase that acts as a divider or half wall, you find room for desk and chair.

Dining room has two outside views; fourth "wall" is a ceiling-high bookcase.

There's joy in a big kitchen

The kitchen plan reproduced here shows sink and its windows overlooking driveway to see family coming or going. One door leads to hall. Door next to table leads to dining room. Third door leads to outdoor terrace.

EZRA STOLLER

TO BE A CREATIVE COOK sometimes requires nothing more than to walk into a room like this one. Its flame-colored counters, convenience-angled table, stainless fixtures, gold-flecked floor and fun wall designs (listing calorie counts) all proclaim a zest for living.

There's no traffic problem here. No one wanders in unasked, since a foyer separates it from intruders. The table is at a slant to save space and can double as a buffet for a kitchen party. One kitchen door opens onto the wooded rear of the house, so meals can meander out there. Pale pink cabinets, steel and durable, abound below the counter. The oven is a big one that can take a colossal ham or reunion-sized turkey, and its foil lining is replaceable when spattered. Even the freezer-refrigerator is brightly designed with two upright sections side by side and no daily bending called for. Some of the storage shelves, open to save work, are covered by shades of washable vinyl awning cloth in carnival stripes, and during cooking time they can roll up—nothing to mar view or bump heads.

MORE HIDDEN BENEFITS? You find them as you work. The table looks wood-topped but is a new textured plastic that rinses clean. The floor is basically gray-and-black vinyl with extra gleam added by metallic specks. The dishwasher has a new washing cycle to do thorough and sensitive jobs. It's the kind of kitchen where you can say blithely "No trick at all" to compliments, because all the tricks went into your far-ahead planning.

Second-floor laundry lines up with bathrooms

THE ROOM IS SMALL—only 6½′ wide, 10½′ long, and look at all it holds—washer, dryer, big storage space, open shelves, work counters, a plastic basin big enough to wash a poodle, and there's even room for an ironing board that can always be left up, a blessing we wish every home had. To touch up a small ballet dress or press a party shirt calls for no major job of tugging out and re-storing your work tools. Daylight is provided very generously from front windows and the windowed hall beyond. Concealed lighting fixtures on both sides of the room keep it just as bright after sundown.

From up here a homemaker can work out of sight, yet still see into the main hall to keep tabs on who's in or out. The butterfly wallpaper is scrubbable so stays bright and crisp. Washer and dryer have a whole set of cycles to take anything from blue jeans to sheets to silks. And the great advantage is location. Up here you are close to bedrooms, bath, and hampers to collect laundry in one round trip.

The bathroom has three-way luxury

EZRA STOLLE

LINING UP ALL PLUMBING for bath and laundry along one wall on the second floor kept down expenses. The bathroom fixtures are so divided that two lavatories are placed on either side of a private room for bathing, so that several members of the family can have the use of bathroom facilities at the same time—the convenience but not the price of two full bathrooms. (See plan to note how well this works out.) Glimpsed here is one section seen from the master bedroom.

New equipment features add to the value. There's generous wash-up space with a big oval basin that forms its own countertop to one side. The tub, in its own enclosure, has low sides easy for even children to get into and out of, and rippled bottom for safety. We planned the lighting to be flattering but clear. The flecked black floor is practical. So are the walls of plastic tile. The accessories give a sense of luxurious comfort too. Deep purple, clear white and lemon yellow key the bathroom, on the theory that color is as bracing for waking up as it is for pleasant dreams.

BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

"To the degree that parents can hit the right balance between keeping reasonable control over their child, allowing sensible independence, they can have fun with him."

A home rich in laughter and family joy is many women's greatest fulfillment.

You can have Fun with your Children

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

A grandmother wrote to me, long ago: "Why couldn't I enjoy my children the way I enjoy my grandchildren? I love to be a sitter for them, or to have them stay with me while their parents are on a holiday. They are full of wonder about everything in the world, their eyes sparkle. The comments they make on life are vivid and fresh; most adult conversation seems stale by comparison. They are so pleased to be read a story. A small excursion kindles a fiery enthusiasm. They are impulsively warm in showing their affection. They are a delight to be with."

If you're reading this at the end of a day when you've been endlessly harassed, you may be snorting with disbelief. But dozens of other grandparents have made glowing remarks of the same kind to me. (I'll admit there are other grandparents who are driven frantic by being with children for fifteen minutes.)

I said I doubted I could give advice that would enable parents to enjoy their children a lot more—that would be like trying to tell them how to lift themselves by their bootstraps. But I thought I could at least point out some reasons why it is so difficult.

The grandparents can give us some hints. They say they are closely enough related to their grandchildren to feel that they are very much their own flesh and blood. On the other hand, they have no sense of permanent responsibility for them. Of course, while they are acting as sitters they must keep them from serious accidents and get them to bed on time. But that is very different from the parents' constant concern with guiding the child's character development: keeping track of his behavior all day, every day, directing him, correcting him, stopping him, distracting him, approving, disapproving, reassuring. This is the backbreaking part of parenthood. It's not merely the energy expended; it's the never-ceasing sense of responsibility. Mixed in with this are varying amounts of frustration and anxiety and guilt, when the parent has doubts about his success at the job.

Raising the young has probably always been more of a strain for humans than for other creatures. The duration of childhood is much longer than in any other species. Human children have to be taught much more complicated traits and skills. But you can see that even birds and dogs and cats and lions, as parents, worry and fuss about the behavior of their young. You have to go way down the biological ladder, to such species as guppies, to see parents who don't give a thought to their small fry once they are born. But then guppies don't have any of the pride in progeny that parents and grandparents can enjoy. They have so little recognition of their own kind that they see them only as edible morsels.

The balance between the enjoyment and the strain of parenthood varies a lot at different phases of childhood. The early weeks of the first baby are a time of considerable anxiety because the parents have had so little experience to go on. Most of the rest of the first year is more fun than any other period of parenthood. Usually the baby is plump, pink-cheeked, responsive, amenable. Everybody says he's wonderful, and the mother and father glow and swell with pride. It's too bad this stage doesn't last for several years.

But when a child becomes about a year old, he can move around. He gets some powerful injection from Nature which makes him restless, inexhaustible, assertive, opinionated, obstinate. He's apt to rebel against his old diet, his toilet training (if any), his mother's management in general. The experienced mother may start with the idea of guiding him toward a mature personality.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 132

The softly feminine at-home look is for the woman who allows her heart to rule her head, especially when she's dressing for her man. There is understated glamour in the waved sheath of hair, the soft silk shirtwaist. In make-up: use deep pink for lips, golden powder, eye shadow in pale green. A delectable look for entertaining . . . particularly when the "party" is just dinner for two.

HOSTESS GOWN BY SHERRI MALOUF

The everyday, everywhere look is casual, carefree, as appropriately at home in the supermarket as at a supper dance. Near-shoulder-length hair (spring's favorite) is quickly convertible. Tonight or tomorrow, try bangs swept back and tucked under a tortoise or ribbon headband. Brilliants for a brunette: coral red for lips and finger tips; turquoise star pins, turquoise-and-pearl bracelet. All simple—all simply wonderful.

DRESS BY FRANK ADAMS

ROGER PRIGENT

Short hair can look long and beguilingly feminine. Ends of hair are combed to center back, pinned flat and hidden with a glamorous "chignon" of flowers (or ribbons, veiling or yarn). Other lovely-to-look-at touches: the fresh, fresh make-up applied with more care than quantity; the becoming-to-me colors (in this case pink, violet and white); the ABC grooming, clean, uncluttered, unbeatable.

DRESS BY TREVOR SIMMONS

4 Fresh New Looks

try one, try all

To be beautiful for those you love is an expression of love itself. An especially imaginative woman we know refurbishes her appearance as often as Nature changes the seasons—and results are as refreshingly welcome. Here are four lovely hairdos (another one on page 63), all sharing the easy elegance which is high fashion today. At least one can be yours. Use your feminine ingenuity to re-create the way you look, and in turn the way you look at life.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

DRESS BY MOLLIE STONE

The glamorous party look

The new fashions make you feel

NEW EACH SPRING

The blue of a spring sky in a silk-shantung suit with fashion in its collar and double-breasted jacket, by Hannah Troy. Shantung straw brimmed hat, Hattie Carnegie.

Left: Most glamorous of the cape costumes: hem-length checked tweed cape-coat over a mulberry wool-jersey dress with softly tied waistline, by Monte-Sano and Pruzan. Below: Flower pin in emeralds and diamonds by Verdura.

The short-sleeved silk-tweed jacket costume in palest beige, scheduled to run straight through summer. The dress consists of skirt and sleeveless top. By Philippe Tournaye. Wear with beige or white gloves and handbag.

DRAWING BY RICHARD HANLEY

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Around your shoulders there's a new fashion feeling: pretty flaring sleeves often elbow-short, a feminine width of shoulder accomplished with capelets and deep armholes. The word "costume" has new latitude: it may be a cape or a capelike coat and a dress, a dress and jacket or an ensemble consisting of jacket, blouse and skirt. The slightly gathered, the bias-cut and the easy skirt are new. Jacket lengths are above the waistline or down to the finger tips. Mauves and pinks make the most enchanting color schemes, and there's the palest beige you ever saw, often in checks, worn with white. Checked tweeds in both pale and brilliant shades will be among the first—and most important—costumes to appear. By WILHELA CUSHMAN

Fashion Editor

The pompon-button suit in daffodil-yellow wool, light as air, by Harry Frechtel. Wonderful capacious bone-white leather bag with brass corners by Lou Nathan.

Spring costume with another look—three-quarter coat in coral tweed over a matching silk-shantung dress by David Kidd of Arthur Jablow.

The new fashions make you feel

NEW EACH

SPRING

Spring cotton that looks like silk in a blue-and-white printed dress and jacket by Philippe Tournaye. The white rough straw hat by Hattie Carnegie. Handbag by Lederer.

This suit in star-sapphire-blue wool by Vera Maxwell has special appeal because of the flower-printed silk blouse and scarf.
Gold bracelet and ring by Verdura.

Tattersall-checked tweed in a new suit silhouette—its jacket indented slightly at the ribline. By Philippe Tournaye.

Here is the palest beige—chalky beige—in a checked tweed with the greatly loved short young jacket and a waist-length overblouse of white mat rayon jersey by Larry Aldrich. Pumps in soft greige calfskin.

The new fashions make you feel NEW EACH SPRING

The pleated elbow-length cape over a dress in a French silk print—lovely new silhouette and a new costume idea by John Moore of Talmack. The gold bracelet by Verdura, the white handbag by Lederer.

Who can resist the flower-red tweeds of spring? This one with the simple jacket by Monte-Sano and Pruzan. Wear it with white.

PHOTOGRAPH BY HORST

he suit with the capelike jacket ith draped shoulders. important color silhouette and fabric.
mauve-and-white-checked tweed
y Monte-Sano and Pruzan.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Youngest fashion in the fashion world: the pleated skirt, short jacket, navy with red and white, given the current look by Maurice Rentner. Still life: The feminine bow pump in grained calfskin with a smooth calf binding; a gay silk coin-dot glove, and a calfskin bag with the white accent.

STILL LIFE BY RICHARD HANLEY

The Journal's

GEM OF A WARDROBE

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

A red coat is always a bright spot in any wardrobe. This "Easy to Make" design will slip easily over your suit and uses top stitching as a detail. Vogue ETM Design No. 9939.

BAG BY LUCILLE
SHOES BY JULIANELLI

Pale beige tweed is a marvelous basic. The slim skirt, cardigan jacket and fringed stole combine happily or go their separate ways. Add a matching hat, gloves and bag . . . but don't forget the bright flower. Jacket, Vogue VETM Design No. 9800. Skirt, stole, VETM No. 9866.

HAT BY EMME
GOLD JEWELRY BY EDGAR ROEDELHEIMER

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 114.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered. © Vogue

EASY to MAKE

A real "Gem" of a dress which you will want to make in two or three fabrics. An easy-to-get-into wrap blouse plus a four-gore skirt. Vogue ETM Design No. 9941.

The clothes you turn to as favorites season after season, that make you feel pretty and well dressed, are the clothes we define as "Gems." We sift out passing fads and novelties in choosing these fashions in favor of good lines, so that you can look forward to wearing them with pleasure indefinitely. We went one step further on this wardrobe of "Gems." Every fashion you see here is made from an "Easy to Make" pattern.

The designs still have the look we believe in. Our basic oatmeal tweed suit can be dressed up or down. We like its "all beige" look under the red coat.

The two-piece acetate-and-cotton print dress is casual and comfortable. It is a perfect dress doing errands because it slips so easily into and out of a car. A printed short-sleeve dinner dress with its own cover-up jacket can be worn right through the summer.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

A fresh, clean print is like a breath of spring. Our strawberry print on a white silk-shantung ground is topped with a bright pink jersey jacket. It's Vogue ETM Design No. 9940.

"A woman who loves to cook is at peace with herself"

MENU I

Barbecued Ham Steaks*
Candied Ginger Yams*
Zucchini with Garlic Butter
Mustard Pickles
Spinach-and-Celery Salad*
Sour-Cream Dressing
Sherbet Cookies
Tea or Coffee

Planned for 3

STUART-FOWLER

DELICIOUS IN THE SPRING

Four broiler combinations

Nourishing and delighting her family with wonderful food, hot, fresh and flavorsome, brings joy to a woman who loves her home. Here are four spring meals to be done under the broiler. Each has zest and variety—an unusual herb, or an unexpected seasoning.

Spicy sweet-sour marinade bastes a thick ham slice to be crowned with walnuts.

Tender chicken, garnished with little link sausages and glazed golden brown with chutney sauce, nests in curried rice; baby lobsters are broiled and stuffed with buttery almond dressing;

sweetbreads blanketed with strips of bacon are broiled and served with the JOURNAL's Sauce Ménagère!

Lighthearted tempting broiler meals make the most of spring bounty.

STUART-FOWLER

MENU II

Broiled Chicken Temple Bells*
Curried Rice*
Green Beans
Tomato Aspic
Fresh Pineapple Wedges
Tea or Coffee

Planned for 8

MENU III

Broiled Lobster with Almond Stuffing*
Potato Balls
Water Cress
Cucumber and Tomato Salad*
Strawberry Tarts
Tea or Coffee

Planned for 8

DELICIOUS IN THE SPRING

Barbecued Ham Steak

1 cup red wine herb vinegar
⅓ cup salad oil
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
1 tablespoon tomato sauce
1 tablespoon minced onion
¾ teaspoon liquid pepper seasoning
¼ teaspoon meat paste
2 teaspoons sugar
1 teaspoon each thyme and marjoram
¾ teaspoon dry mustard
3-pound center-cut ready-to-eat ham steak—about 2″ thick
16 walnut halves sautéed in a little butter

Mix wine vinegar and oil, add next 9 ingredients and heat to simmering. If needed, trim ham steak and slash fat. Place ham in a pan and pour half the marinade over, forking in well so marinade penetrates deeply into meat. Let stand at room temperature ½ hour. Turn and repeat. Place ham in preheated broiler about 7″ from heat. Broil 25–30 minutes (12–15 minutes on each side), basting often. Place meat on platter, garnish with walnuts. Skim extra fat from surface of sauce before pouring over ham. To serve, slice thin, crosswise. Makes 8 servings.

Candied Ginger Yams

3–3½ pounds yams (at least 4 yams)
½ cup butter
Salt and pepper
⅔ cup brown sugar
¼ cup ginger syrup
¼ cup slivered preserved ginger root
½ cup water

Boil yams in salted water until barely tender. Drain, peel and cut each yam into serving-size pieces, about 4 per yam. Melt butter in very large skillet and stir in brown sugar, ginger syrup and ginger root. Heat until well blended. Add yams. Heat 5 minutes on each side. Add water, sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper. Mix well, but do not break the yams. Cover. Simmer gently about 30 minutes, basting from time to time. When ready, the sauce should be slightly thickened. Do not turn again, as they will be too soft. Makes 8 servings.

Spinach-and-Celery Salad

6 cups spinach leaves, washed and dried ½ large red onion, peeled and sliced
1 cup celery, diced
4 hard-cooked eggs, peeled and sliced
1 teaspoon salt ¼ teaspoon pepper

Tear up spinach leaves. Toss with other ingredients. Dress with 1 package garlic-cheese salad-dressing mix, blended with 3 tablespoons lemon juice, 1 cup commercial sour cream.

MENU IV

Broiled Sweetbreads*
Sauce Ménagère*
Hot Artichoke Bottoms Filled with Peas and Croutons*
Asparagus Salad
Quick Lemon Chiffon
Tea or Coffee

Planned for 8

Broiled Chicken Temple Bells

4 small broilers, split
Softened butter
1 cup salad oil
6 tablespoons vinegar
1 teaspoon salt
2 small cloves garlic, peeled
1 cup chutney

Wash and singe the broilers, sprinkle with salt and pepper and rub generously with softened butter. Put the other ingredients through a sieve or buzz in an electric blender. Heat the broiler. Lay chickens skin side down in the broiler pan about 7″ from the heat. Broil for 7–10 minutes, brushing liberally with soft butter, until lightly golden, then with the chutney sauce. Turn chicken. Baste with butter and broil 3 minutes. Baste with sauce. Continue broiling and basting with sauce until chicken is golden brown. Lower heat to 300° F. and cook until chicken is tender, basting often (about 20–30 minutes). Serve with curried rice. Makes 8 servings.

Curried Rice

2¼ cups long-grain rice
9 tablespoons butter
2 teaspoons curry powder
3 teaspoons salt
4½ cups chicken broth

In heavy pan cook rice in butter until golden color, stirring with a wooden spoon as it cooks. Add curry powder, salt and chicken broth, bring to a boil and cook over low heat until rice is tender and all liquid has been absorbed—about 14 minutes. Makes 8 generous servings.

Broiled Lobster with Almond Stuffing

8 live 1½-pound lobsters
2 quarts soft bread crumbs
2⅔ cups chopped blanched almonds
2 cups butter
2 large cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
¼ teaspoon liquid pepper seasoning
1½ teaspoon dried tarragon
½ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
¼ cup tomalley and all the coral, mashed and mixed, if desired

Prepare stuffing by sautéeing crumbs and almonds in butter until golden brown, stirring and turning often. Add the rest of the ingredients. Have lobsters split and claws cracked. Remove tomalleys and coral and set aside. Wash lobsters well and remove intestines. Place lobsters in broiling pan, shell side down, and brush with melted butter. Broil about 6″ from the heat for 10 minutes, basting frequently with melted butter. Fill cavities with stuffing and place under broiler again just long enough to brown. Garnish with potato balls, lemon wedges and water cress and serve with small bowls of melted butter. Makes 8 servings.

Water Cress, Cucumber and Tomato Salad

7 cups water cress
1 cup diced tomatoes
1 cucumber, peeled and sliced
1 cup sliced celery

Wash and pick over water cress, wrap in a towel and chill. When ready to serve, turn water cress into a large bowl. Add tomatoes, cucumber, celery, dress with a favorite herb dressing. Makes 8 servings.

Broiled Sweetbreads

4 pairs medium-sized veal sweetbreads
Juice of 3 lemons
Salt and pepper
16 slices bacon

Soak sweetbreads in salted water for 1 hour. Drain. Cook about 25 minutes in enough salted water to cover, with the lemon juice. Lift out sweetbreads and plunge into ice water until very firm. Remove tubes, membranes and any fat. (All this may be done the day before.) Sprinkle with salt and pepper, wrap each with 2 slices bacon and secure with toothpicks. Broil a few minutes on each side until bacon is crisp. Serve with Sauce Ménagère. Makes 8 servings.

Sauce Ménagère

2 tablespoons finely chopped shallots or onion
2 tablespoons butter
¾ cup sweet cider (or red wine)
¾ cup red wine vinegar
4½ tablespoons Diable sauce
4½ tablespoons steak sauce
4½ tablespoons Worcestershire sauce
3 tablespoons heavy cream
¾ cup butter

Sauté shallots or onion in butter a few minutes, until tender. Add cider (or red wine if you prefer) and wine vinegar. Simmer until liquid is reduced to half. Add the sauces and cook 10 minutes. Stir in cream and butter and continue cooking gently until butter is melted. Makes 2 cups sauce.

Hot Filled Artichoke Bottoms

8–10 large canned artichoke bottoms
Cooked peas
Toasted croutons
Butter

Place artichoke bottoms in a large skillet, season with salt and pepper and dot with a little butter. Cover and heat gently 10–15 minutes. Garnish the sweetbread platter with artichokes. Fill with hot seasoned peas which have been tossed with toasted croutons. Makes 8 servings.

Campbell proudly invites you to try

2 GREAT NEW SOUPS

. A great old-time soup

Old-fashioned OMATO RICE is soup's so bright

d cheerful, it
rms you just to it! Old-fashioned mato Rice is a opy blend of the ious Campbell To-
to, long-grain rice,
l other vegetables hearty broth. It's reat home-style
p for everybody!

2. A country-garden soup

CREAM OF VEGETABLE

Seven garden vegetables, picked at their sun-ripened best, are simmered till tender, then creamed with milk. A dash of seasoning perks up the fresh garden flavor. You'll serve this soup with pride — to friends, and all the family!

Wonderful for cooking, too!

New sauces! Heat Old-fashioned Tomato Rice with ⅓ to ½ cup water (use milk with Cream of Vegetable). Season as desired. Heat and serve over fish, eggs or meat.

New supper dishes! Heat leftover meat, fish, or poultry in either Old-fashioned Tomato Rice or Cream of Vegetable . . . thin with milk or water, and season as desired.

New soup mate! Make your own new soup from Campbell's 2 new soups. Combine Old-fashioned Tomato Rice and Cream of Vegetable with 2 soup cans water.

Good things begin to happen when you cook with Campbell's 2 new soups!

THE WALK DOWN MAIN STREET

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 56

clerks; must've closed up the supermarket. And Doc Wickham, by tar. And James Goss, the high-school principal, with the teachers.

Head and whiskers thrust out through the alders, Martin stared testily at the next section of the parade, which was the grammar-school children, led by a dozen majorettes in costume, joyously twirling batons.

He leaned a little farther out. The movement in the bushes caught the eye of one of the little girls; she gave a shrill squeal of fright and pointed. For a moment there was a swirl and disarrangement among the ranks, then they picked up the rhythm again; most of them began to laugh.

Well, he did have just his head stuck out of the bushes. S'posed he'd scared 'em. Let 'em cackle, for all he ——

He was suddenly aware that a vehicle had stopped in the road below, and that someone was yelling up at him. It was his next-door neighbor, Hezzie Mooney, in his pickup.

"What you doing up there, Mart?" he was yelling. "Why ain't you up front of the parade with the families of the team? How come you never went? If you didn't want to drive your car, Mattie and me'd been glad to shove the kids together, made room for you. Ralph and Dot could've doubled up — "

"Ralph?" Martin interrupted. "Dot?"

For all he had known, his two younger grandchildren had gone to bed at the usual time. If them kids had sneaked out afterward, they'd get told. He continued to stare down at Hezzie, his face like a block of wood.

"Why, sure, the whole high school went," Hezzie went on, "and most of the grammar school. What's the matter with you, Mart? Your own grandson! Why, he and my boy Jerome was on the TV last night, and they're in headlines this morning all over the state. You won't have a TV in the house, so Susie was over home last night to watch it on ours. 'Course she wanted to see that game—her own boy, she's proud of him. Boy, oh, boy! That Shirttail!"

"Whose shirttail?" Martin snapped.

Hezzie stared. "You are the only man in the whole entire state," he said impressively, "don't know who Shirttail McIntosh is, and him your own blood grandson! Look, Mart, we ain't had a state championship since 1947, when Art Grindle was on the team. We ain't never had nothing to come up to Carlisle. He's a sight better than Art Grindle ever was, and so's my boy, Jerome."

"Art Grindle," Martin said. "Ain't he the one started out robbing filling stations when he got too old to play ball?"

Hezzie straightened up, breathing hard. "Why, you dirty-minded old son of a coot! If you think that Jerome or any of them nice, clean-living young athaletes ——"

"I don't know nothing about Jerome," Martin said. "But I've got a say in Carlisle, by tar! From now on, he's going to settle down at home and do some work. I've had enough of this cussed foolishness!" He pulled his head in out of the alders and was gone as if somebody had yanked him backward.

Everyone had seen last night's game, either on the TV or at the capital, driving a hundred miles there and back. The town was on the map at last—its name in headlines all over the state. What could be better for a tourist town? Jed Wallace was thinking. Of course he was proud of his boy; he was some old proud of Jack, and the main thing was the game, the fun, the excitement. Why, as Jed said to Win Parker, it brought people out into the streets who hadn't seen the light of day for years.

As a matter of fact, the Chamber of Commerce had done a darned good job on the tournament, making sure that local businessmen got their proper amount of credit for helping to sponsor the telecast, arranging the banquet, one thing and another.

He moved through the crowd toward his seat at the speakers' table. "Chet, my boy!" he said. "Let me shake your hand. I shook it last night, let me shake it again today."

Chet Alison, the basketball coach, grinned nervously and stuck out his hand, wincing as Jed shut to on it. Doc Wickham and Win Parker, already at the table, burst out laughing.

"They say the President of the United States keeps a special sawbones to shoot in a charge of Novocain after every five thousand handshakes," the doctor said.

"Well, where's your needle?" Win said. "Nothing that the President's got that this boy ain't entitled to, is there?"

Chet flapped the hand in the air, regarded it ruefully, playing up, as he knew they expected him to. Last night, when everybody had jammed down onto the auditorium floor around Chet and his team, Jed and the doc, Win and Harry had been Johnny-on-the-spot all over the place—the smart citizens who had hired the best coach of the best ball team in the whole state; they'd had their pictures taken with all the bigwigs, the president of WORS-TV, and the governor; they were in all the newspapers this morning.

Well, where was his squawk? What he was having right now ought to be what any sports coach needed to get where he was going—to a big university somewhere, on the way to coaching pro ball. The big time, the big money.

Chet was aware that Win Parker had nudged him. "Look at old Goss," Win was saying. "You'd think he was at a wake."

James Goss, the high-school principal, sat at the head of the table where the rest of the teachers had been seated. This table was somewhat quieter than the others. Goss, a stocky man of around forty, in a well-worn dark suit, sat carrying on a sober conversation with Alfred Berg, the science teacher. James was bald, with a neat, clipped sandy mustache. As he talked, his fingers twiddled with various objects—a spoon, a salt cellar, a water glass.

"That music teacher Berg's sweet on, she's quite a dish. What's her name—Callahan?" Win was saying.

"Callander," Chet said.

"What nationality's that, ya know?"

"No idea."

"I see on her record when we hired her, she was brought up out west somewhere—Illinois, Indiana, some such place. It never said nothing about her being part kike. She sure don't look it, but going out with Berg, I guess she must be. They don't intermarry, do they?"

"I wouldn't know," Chet said.

He had not missed the sidelong glance, the glint in Win's eye. Town gossip passed through Win's garage like sand through a screen; and the whole town knew that both Chet Alison and Alfred Berg had been going out with Ellen Callander. Win, actually, was making book on which one would win out with her, or so Chet had heard through the grapevine of his ballplayers.

Chet was well informed. He knew, for example, that of all the smart citizens, Win Parker was the one to keep on the right side of. Win was not noticeably active in town affairs; he was not even chairman of the school committee, though he had been for many years a member of it. He always said he didn't want to be chairman; he had too many other fish to fry, let Harry do it. Since Harry Troy was Win's brother-in-law, most people in town figured it was all the same thing.

Win never ran for any office. Yet if any man wanted to carry weight in town politics or swing a project, he had better not waste time or money on it until he found out what Win Parker thought.

"I hear around that you and Berg have had a few chews," Win said. He paused. "Over the ballplayers' keeping their marks up, I heard."

Chet said, "Oh, not much. I hold my own." And wouldn't you like it a lot, he thought, if I dropped something about the pretty-music-teacher situation that you could peddle to the boys? Well, bud, you can go fry.

So far as Ellen Callander was concerned, she was pretty. She was nice. A woman. One woman out of ten you might remember; the rest, you forgot tomorrow. Unless you fell in love, of course; which was another matter, and one with which Chet, at present, was not overly concerned.

He had been married once and was now divorced; he supposed he had been in love. In the beginning, at least. He would willingly have gone back to that time when certain spiritual satisfactions combined with physical ones to make the whole experience memorable; but the time that followed, after the first six months or so, was nothing any man would care to have repeated. So they'd called it a day. Now he didn't even know where she was.

"Why did you let me do it?"

"Well, pass along word, if Berg bother you," Win said. "I guess he'd give a nice piec of change to be sitting up on top like you an on your pay."

"Could be," Chet said.

Alison was, he knew, a high-priced coac for a town of this size. He was paid more tha any of the teachers, including the principal the town, being interested in ball, saw to that and no one grudged Chet a penny.

Win had just caught something that Di Wickham had said, across the table. "Wha was that, doc? What were you saying abou Shirttail's knee?"

Dr. Wickham pursed his lips. "Nothin much. Kid's got a slight sprain. Be all righ after he rests it a day or so."

"You know, it was a wonder them Boon fellas hadn't killed him. I counted four on to of him, and I see that tall fella, that Jones give him the elbow. Referees must've bee asleep on their feet."

"Harry said he saw that too," Doc Wick ham said.

"Where is Harry?" Jed Wallace asked.

"Harry's over by the door. Or was, when come in." Win craned up and looked. "Wha gives over there? Seems to be quite a towse."

Harry Troy broke out of the crowd an came hustling up to the speakers' table "That fool of a Hez," he said. "He's got ol Mart Hoodless all stirred up. Won't let Shirt tail go to Boston. If we don't stop it, there'll b twenty-five fools out there arguing with him."

Jed Wallace smiled. "Harry, cool off. anybody has reason to argue with old Mar Hoodless, I will."

Harry mopped his face with his handker chief. He and the others glanced at one an other with understanding grins. Sure. Sur enough. If Mart Hoodless would listen t anybody, it would be to a banker.

Jed got to his feet, picked up a table knif and banged resoundingly on the table. Hi voice boomed out over the hall: "Hey, there All you jokers sit down!"

In the close-packed crowd by the door, peo ple glanced around, hesitated, then started t move to their seats.

"Time we got down to the eats," Jed said.

There was still some bustle in the room. s he rapped with the knife on a water glass.

He leaned forward to deliver his punch line: "Them rumors you ben hearin', the ain't nothin' but gossip. Nothin' to worr about, folks, nothin' in the world. So eat drink and be merry."

His last words were lost in a clamor o cheering and clapping.

By dinnertime Martin Hoodless had th rubbish cleaned up under his tree, the dea limbs chunked into firewood, the waste pile for burning. After dinner he could start saw ing down the tree, but now he was hungry.

And there'd better be somebody home an dinner ready, he told himself as he walke toward the house.

He was almost disappointed, coming int the shed, to smell dinner cooking. He hadn figured Susie would be back; and she wasn't But a fine fire was crackling in the range, ket tles were bubbling, and Dorothy, his eleven year-old granddaughter, was slicing bread.

"Hi, grampa," Dot said. "Dinner'll be o the table just as soon's you get washed up."

In silence, Martin washed at the sink combed his hair at the mirror, plumped him self down at the table.

"Where's your mother?" he demanded.

"Oh, she's just stepped out," Dot said. " guess she'll be back pretty soon."

Stepped out, hanh? Well, that was a lie. I was going some, when a mother got a littl kid to lie to cover up for her.

He stared at Dot as she began bringin dishes to the table. "Stew again, eh?"

Dot set the platter in front of him. "Why you always say a stew or a chowder's better o the second day, grampa. This one ought to b just right."

The fragrance of the stew hit him full in th face. It was exactly as he liked it. He cast

CONTINUED ON PAGE 74

3 New easy-chicken recipe ideas

ade with SWANSON Chicken and PILLSBURY Hot Roll Mix

CKEN TURNOVERS (with Mushroom Sauce)

kg. Pillsbury Hot Roll Mix ans Swanson Boned Chicken, diced up finely chopped celery
2 hard-cooked eggs, diced
2 tbsp. chopped onion
2 tbsp. chopped pimiento
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
½ tsp. poultry seasoning hroom Sauce

ans Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup
1 cup milk (or 1 cup sour cream, ½ cup water)

pare basic dough as directed in roll mix package; ise. In bowl, combine chicken with remaining edients; set aside. Divide dough in half; roll into 16 x 12 in. rectangle; cut into twelve 4 squares. Place 12 squares on greased baking ets; moisten edges with water. Place 2 tbsp. ken filling on each; top with remaining squares. seal, press edges together with fork; prick tops. ce in hot oven (400°F) 15 to 20 min. or until wn. In saucepan, stir cream of mushroom soup il smooth; add milk (or sour cream and water). at; serve over turnovers. 12 servings.

NOTE: Store any remaining turnovers in refrigerator and reheat by wrapping in aluminum foil.

Chicken 'N Dressing Casserole

Delicious one-dish meal features Swanson Chicken Fricassee and spicy-good puffs baked with Pillsbury Hot Roll Mix. (See recipe in Pillsbury package.)

Chicken 'N Cheese Ring

Heat Swanson Chicken a la King. Serve over warm slices of cheese snack ring (follow directions in package of Pillsbury Hot Roll Mix).

Save!

on any Swanson Chicken product, including Boned Chicken, Chicken a la King, or Chicken Fricassee. Save 6¢ with coupon in specially-marked packages of Pillsbury Hot Roll Mix.

Perfect partner for convenient Swanson Chicken products: versatile Pillsbury Hot Roll Mix. Tender Swanson Chicken deserves the best setting, because this pampered poultry is rich in flavor, slow-cooked the special Swanson way. Try these exciting new recipes now, and see what hearty, delightful dishes you can make.

SWANSON IS A TRADEMARK OF Campbell SOUP COMPANY

linens gray

colors dull

towels scratchy

PHOOEY!

don't despair

...CALGON* rinses gray clothes white and soft again, or—double your money back!

*Reg. T.M.

Try this prove-it-yourself test

1. Wash and rinse a load your usual way—leave in washer.
2. Refill with hot water . . . add a cup of Calgon water conditioner . . . then agitate 5 minutes.
3. Surprise! A layer of old, left-in suds and dirt appears! Calgon itself does not make suds. They were embedded in the clothes during previous washings. Calgon rinsed out the suds and dirt.

Regular use of Calgon will remove the gray . . . restore brightness . . . keep fabrics naturally soft and new looking.

Not soap, not detergent, not bluing, not bleach. No other washday product does what Calgon does for white and colored clothes, diapers, wash 'n wear. And safe, gentle Calgon water conditioner can't harm the most delicate fabric. Here's our guarantee:

Try a box of Calgon. If you're not satisfied that Calgon is all that we say it is, send the box top to Calgon, Pittsburgh 30, Pa., and get double your money back!

RINSE AWAY THE GRAY WITH CALGON

calgon WATER CONDITIONER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 92

critical glance over the table. There wasn't a thing out of line that he could see. Fresh, clean tablecloth, everything necessary in its place. One thing about Susie, she was sure teaching that little kid how to housekeep.

Seated across from him, watching his eyes go over the table, Dot knew quite well what he was doing. She kept her face polite and pleasant. Inside she was boiling.

Times, she liked grampa all right, but when he was put out he could make you mad just by looking. It didn't mean anything to him that she'd stayed home today to get his dinner, when home was the last place she wanted to be. The whole town was down at the parade and banquet.

But this morning Ralph had come into her bedroom before she was even awake. "Look, wake up, will you?" he said. "Somebody'll have to stay, get gramp's dinner, or he'll tear the house down."

"So what? Ma'll be here."

"Ma will have to go, or it wouldn't look right. She's Carlisle's mother," Ralph said.

"Let him get his own dinner. It wouldn't kill him. For once."

"Look, Dot, you know we've got to keep him smoothed down till Carl gets gone to Boston. You know we have."

"Well, you don't help do it," Dot said. "What if he caught you, sliding down the piazza post, nights? I guess you know who'd ever get to go anywhere then."

"Yare," Ralph said. His jaw hung down a little. "I know all that. I'd stay home myself, if I knew how to get the darn dinner."

Boys! They always slid out from under. Ralph good and well knew nobody'd expect him to stay home today. "Oh, all right," she said disgustedly.

Susie, at first, had said no, of course she wouldn't go, leave Dot home to get dinner, with grampa probably as cross as a bear.

But it was the way it looked, Ralph said. If some of Carl's family weren't at the banquet, everybody would think it was funny.

"Look, ma," Ralph said, "there's only the Boston games left, but they're the big ones. If grampa really shut to —— If Carlisle—if Shirttail McIntosh couldn't play ——"

"Of course he'll play," Susie said briskly. "The last ball game! That is certainly the one I've been looking for. Maybe this house can simmer down again and we can all get a little work done."

"Okeydoke," Ralph said. "But will you go to the banquet, ma?"

"Yes, I'll go, if Dot thinks she can manage. Or maybe I'll just go to the parade. Then I'll scoot back here and you can run down to the banquet, Dot."

Well, the promise of that had helped some. She sat now opposite Martin, praying that Susie would hurry.

That kid, Martin was thinking, looks just like a cat with its whiskers covered with cream. He felt the back of his neck start to bristle. There weren't no womenfolks, no eleven-year-old kid going to get ahead of him. Dammit, there must be something. His glance, coursing the table, fell on the plate of freshly sliced bread. That wasn't homemade bread, by tar! That was store bread.

He reached for a slice, buttered it, took a big bite and began to chew. Then he stopped in mid-chew and stared at the slice in his hand as if it had bitten him back. He got up, str to the stove, yanked off a front cover and sp the mouthful into the fire.

"I buy flour," Martin began. "I sup fresh milk and butter. If your mother h time to run to the store for bread, she had ti to make some."

Dot blinked. "That's the very best bre there is," she said. "It tastes good."

"I don't care what kind it is or how it tast It's store bread. Where's the biscuits?"

"There aren't any."

"Any pilot bread?"

"I guess so, if you want some." She se plate of pilot crackers at his elbow. "Th came from the store too," she said.

Martin glared up at her. He smashed fist down on the plate of crackers, sendi crumbs flying in all directions. Dot burst tears, and at that m ment Susie walked through the door.

"For heaven's sak pa!" she said. "What earth do you think you doing? I just got t kitchen floor washed a swept."

"When? You ai been home since yest day!"

"All right," Susie sa Her eyes took in the s uation. "Get into yo coat, Dot, and sco There's lots of tim they're not near throu yet. Simmer down, and eat your dinner. I brought a fresh pumpk pie for dessert."

"Which you boug at the store, too, I'll b a diamond!" Mart said. "You ain't h time to make one."

"No, I haven't. Tha one of Bessie Maitland pies," Susie said serene "Hazel gave it to me bring home to you."

He had resumed e ing, and since stew, his way of thinking, w no good without brea he had buttered anoth slice of the store bre and was putting th down too.

"Don't let on to t that where you beer down to see Hazel," grumbled. "For I kno better."

"I know you do. I know what's the matt don't bother to go into it."

"Learning your kids to lie, by tar!"

"Oh, shoot, pa! I had to go down to t parade. I promised the kids. Hazel said wh she gave me that pie she hoped it would pac you."

"Well, it's a poor bird that'll befoul its ow nest! When a man's own daughters get t gether and run him down ——"

"Oh, pa, don't be so foolish!"

"—— let alone telling him a passel of li When all your life I've supported you a them sprouts of yours ——"

"All right," Susie said. "I thought we'd g around to that sooner or later."

"Something ought to remind you, once in while. When all I ask in return is my hou kept decent and maybe a batch of bread on in a while."

"You can have homemade bread any ti you bring home a yeast cake. You didn't b any, remember? I lay in some every time I down street. If you'd let me shop for t groceries instead of insisting on spendi every penny yourself, I could save us a goo many times the cost of a few yeast cakes, me tell you!"

"That'll do. Any money that's spent arou here, I'll spend."

"All right. But don't you dare to kick to about my housekeeping. You know you do

ON THE COLD SIDE OF THE HILL

By ETHEL FAIRFIELD WHITE

The gnarled wild crab-apple tree in the pasture
Seems graceless, huddled in snow and gloom,
But when tardy spring sets gay
buds free,
All the beauty denied the tree
Is lavished on the bloom.

The thicket's transformed—a rose-pink cloud
Moored on the hill! Our lagging feet
Quicken their pace as we catch the fragrance,
Fresh, and spicily sweet.

We have no need of the small,
hard apples,
Enough that the faithful trees fulfill
Our hopes for this hour which tides us over
Bleak days of wind, when storm clouds hover
On the cold side of the hill.

Homemade fresh! Makes 3 to 4 dozen!

NEW! Pillsbury refrigerated Chocolate Chip Cookies

Try America's new way to bake Chocolate Chip Cookies! Rich, fresh dough with real chocolate nuggets (lots of 'em!). All mixed, shaped in a roll, and refrigerated. One package makes 3 to 4 dozen.

Just slice into chunks, and bake. So easy, and such cookies! Like magic, the chunks bake into perfect, round cookies. Tender, wonderfully delicious, chewy or crisp, as you prefer.

Never before such wonderful chocolate chip cookies made so easily! New Pillsbury refrigerated Chocolate Chip Cookies—now at your grocer's. Treat your family to some—fresh-baked—tonight! More kissin' cousins of America's most popular biscuits...

...at your grocer's dairy case.

Don't forget Pillsbury's 4 other "homemade fresh" Slice 'n Bake Cookies . . .

- Butterscotch Nut
- Toasted Coconut
- Crunchy Peanut
- Sugar Cookies

Fresh cookie dough all mixed and shaped. All you do is slice . . . and bake! In just minutes you'll have 3 to 4 dozen wonderfully delicious cookies.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

mean a word of it, anyway." She cut a big wedge out of the pie and set it in front of him. "Eat it," she said. "And for heaven's sake, enjoy it. It's lovely pie."

"I'll enjoy it, don't worry. It's the first thing brought into this house in years that hasn't cost me money."

Susie said nothing to that. She was eating her own pie with relish, and presently Martin tried again.

"It ain't right on an old man," he said. "The work there is to do around this place and them great lazy sods of kids, and you with all that insurance money put by."

Susie sighed. "Yes," she said patiently. "In the bank. Till the kids get ready for college. And you'd be the first one to set up a squawk if I took it out and used it for anything else."

Martin snorted. "College! It's no use to put by money to send kids to college that don't know how to read and write, ain't trying to learn. They don't help me. I'll have to use that money for their board. I can't support 'em free and clear. I'm a poor man."

"I do a lot of work around here, remember. The kids do too. Most of the time, if we worked some other place as hard as we do here, it would pay our way."

"Hanh! Well, let me tell you, right here and now, either them kids start working or —— Where do you think you're going?"

Susie had gone to the entry and was putting on her hat and coat. "I give up," she said. "I'm going down to the banquet. I wish I'd never come away from it. If you've cooled off enough by suppertime to let me in the house, I'll be home to get supper."

Martin started back for the pasture, feeling quite soothed and calm. He'd had a good, rousing row, a hot dinner under his belt, and now there was a nice, hard job to do. It was no more in his mind than in Susie's that she wouldn't be back by suppertime.

Out in the pasture, he went to work. Back and forth, back and forth. It was a pleasure to work with that old crosscut. That was good steel in that blade. You couldn't find steel like that in any blade nowadays.

By midafternoon Martin was three quarters of the way through the tree. He stood up to uncramp his muscles and saw that two people had come into the pasture—his grandson, Carlisle, and Hezzie's boy, Jerry Mooney, still in their Sunday suits from the banquet. Apparently they hadn't seen him.

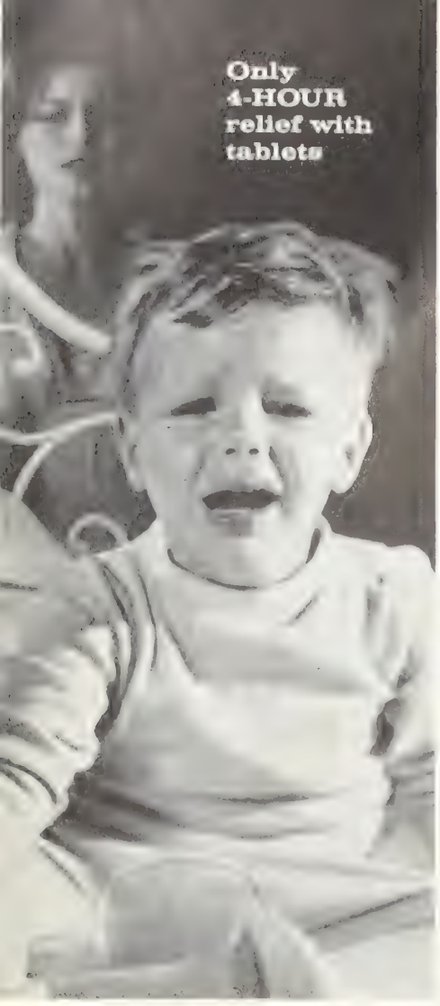
They came, one behind the other, across the pasture. Carlisle, he saw, was limping. He saw them come to a stop, facing each other. Martin made sure they were not in the way of the tree, in case it came down, and still said nothing.

"All right," Jerry said. "Take your coat off."

Carlisle said, "Gladly."

Before Martin's astonished eyes, they proceeded to take off not only their coats but their Sunday pants as well. Then they squatted off and silently laced into each other.

Well, if kids nowadays didn't beat the devil. Mad enough to fight, but took time to strip down to undershirts and shorts. On a February day too.



It didn't seem to be much of a fight. A flurry of waving arms and clinching. Both their noses were bleeding, but neither one seemed to have the steam to put behind a good punch. Carlisle, Martin saw, had a banged-up knee. It had been bandaged with some kind of elastic strap which had come loose.

Right now they were clinched, rocking around, no one making a mite of headway. Then he looked, they collapsed to the ground, rolled a little way from each other and lay there.

What in —— Out, and they hadn't been fighting five minutes. Then he realized that they were both crying.

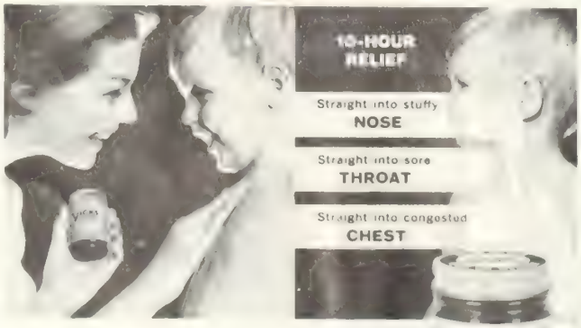
Martin stared. He snuffled disgustedly, pulled his handkerchief out of his hip pocket and blew into it, a prolonged toot. Nobody heard it, apparently. So he leaned down to his saw and began to work again. Back and forth. Back and forth.

It took only a few more strokes. For a moment the tree stood upright, then the split track in its bole began slowly to widen. The chestnut shuddered; its summit leaned again the sky. Two hundred years came down with a scattering smash that shook the pasture.

NEVER GO TO BED WITH A COLD

...without Vicks VapoRub

Only the VapoRub way gives 10-hour "sleep-thru" relief in nose, throat, chest... works more than twice as long as aspirin or cold tablets



Don't wait for that sick cry in the night when your child has a cold.

Give him all-night relief...not just the four-hour action of tablets.

Rub your child's chest, throat, neck and back with warming Vicks VapoRub at bedtime. Starts easing muscular soreness and chest tightness instantly. And for 10 full hours, penetrating vapor medications go straight inside stuffy head passages, inside sore throat, deep inside congested bronchial areas.

All night long, VapoRub works to clear away mucus, break up bronchial congestion, calm coughing... makes breathing easier. Helps your child sleep the night through and wake up feeling so much better.

So for every cold . . . for all the family . . . never go to bed with a cold without Vicks VapoRub.

Medicates cold congested nose, throat, chest all at once . . . all night long. VapoRub's penetrating vapor medications start relieving in 7 seconds, keep relieving for 10 full hours. And no internal dosing . . . no stomach or emotional upsets.

VICKS VAPORUB®

VAPORIZING OINTMENT

World's most widely used colds medication . use as a rub, in steam, in the nose

By MUNRO LEAF

Nobody likes a Sneaky of any kind, but a Sickbed Sneaky shouldn't even like itself. It cheats itself and makes life unhappy for those people who want to help it get well. This Sickbed Sneaky was told by the doctor and its parents to stay in bed and keep quiet and warm. You can see why people call it a Sickbed Sneaky—very, very foolish.

WERE YOU A SICK BED SNEAKY THIS MONTH?

Martin walked in silence past the fallen warrs, who, sitting up now, were staring at the e in amazement.

Well, it hadn't fallen very far from where ey were. It had, as a matter of fact, fallen, k-on-the-nose, on the spot Martin had ant it to. They hadn't been in any danger; hey had, he'd have hollered to them to get t of the way. But it scared 'em, by tar. He lked away, not looking back.

Jerry stared, horrified, after Martin's back. 's that old coot crazy? Looks like he tried to ll us!" He started to get up, thought better it and flopped back onto the ground.

It's the old chestnut tree, Carlisle thought. ampa's cut it down. It didn't seem to mean ich, one way or the other. Later on it ght. His whole Indian collection was in the e house, among other things. Now he was o tired. He and Jerry both had been too oped even to fight.

He sat on the ground, beginning to sense ds and ends of discomfort. His nose stung. e whole middle of his face felt stiff. Worst all, his knee was beginning to feel as if meone had stuck a hot stick up through it o his thigh. If he'd sprained that some more coach would really tear his head off.

He said tentatively, "Jerry?"

Jerry didn't move. He lay there on his back, arms over his eyes. After a moment he uttered, "Oh, shut up!"

Carlisle got up. It was like unfolding a unk of cardboard. He could bend his knee, found; he limped over to the neat pile of clothes and began to dress.

Jerry suddenly rolled over onto his hands d knees and got to his feet. He stalked over his clothes. His teeth were chattering and the ite around his mouth had turned bluish.

"You better wash your face in the brook be- e you put your shirt on," Carlisle said. 've can't let it get around that we've been hting."

"Your grampop knows." Jerry slid down e sloping bank, dipped his fingers gingerly the icy water and began, with great tenderss, to wash the blood off his face.

"I don't think he saw us fighting. If he had, 'd have yelled to us to get out of the way be- e he let that tree go."

"Yare? Well, the way he acted, he was sorry didn't clobber us. Probably been glad if it d, the way he seems to feel about the ball m."

"Oh, shut up!" Carlisle said. His knee hurt, d he was sick of Jerry.

Carlisle reached for his jacket, took an wary step and just managed to keep himself m going down. Jerry stared, his exhausted e lengthened with horror.

"Oh, your knee! Is it worse? Gee, if we've bbered that knee —— Look, I'll go get oc Wickham ——"

"Take it easy," Carlisle said. "I just slipped a patch of ice. Doc Wickham, that old abbermouth! He'd run right to Alison."

"Yare, he would. That's right, he would." rry came up out of the brook, mopping refully with his bloody handkerchief. 'ou've got a black eye."

I have?" What with other discomforts, arlisle had forgotten about the stiff feeling in s face. He fingered it cautiously, feeling the mp on his cheekbone. "Gee, so've you."

They stared at each other lopsidedly.

"We can say we had an accident with a r," Carlisle said.

"We haven't had anyone's car. It's got to be tter than that. We can say old Mart Hodss dropped a tree on us."

"Nobody'd believe that either. Lay off amp, will you?"

"Ah-h, everybody knows he's a woolball."

"Oh, go on home," Carlisle said "We had a ght, so we had a fight. Go on! You know hat happens if you get chilled after you been veating."

Jerry apparently was thinking along the me lines, for he turned and set off across the ld toward home.

Carlisle set his weight on his sore leg, found was bad but not so bad as it might be, and mped off across the pasture.

His grandfather met him at the door. "Come me, did you? That was some fight. Who eat, finally?"

"Nobody. We were too pooped to fight."

"Well, you better get your overhauls on and come out to the barn. Or are you too pooped to milk a cow?"

I'm too pooped right now to tell him to keep his trap shut. Carlisle thought. He pushed past Martin and limped wearily up the stairs.

He heard water running in the bathroom and saw that Susie was in there filling the tub. She grinned at him and pointed to the tub. "Ralph'll help grampa," she said. "Your clean pajamas are there on the hook. When you get washed, hop into bed. Are you hungry?"

Carlisle shook his head. Later he would be. Now all he could think about was sleep.

Susie clucked at the sight of his knee. She didn't say anything, though—didn't even ask if it hurt when she cleansed it, dressed it in soft gauze that felt a lot better than Doc Wickham's tight bandage. She hung his good suit in the closet, picked up the soiled bandage from the floor.

She went out and shut the bedroom door. He heard the key click in the lock and be softly withdrawn, and thought, with a grin, Good old ma, he won't kick the door down; then he rolled his aching face into the clean, sweet-smelling pillow and went to sleep.

Carlisle slept the clock around twice. He might even have slept longer if, in the late afternoon, Dr. Wickham hadn't dropped in to look at his knee.

Susie had been cleaning house. "He's still sleeping," she said. "Did pa call you, Dr. Wickham?"

She didn't think it likely that Martin had; though he might have, as a sarcasm, to point out to her that if anyone stayed in bed all day, he must be sick.

"Oh, just thought I'd drop around. This town can't take any chances with that ball team." The doctor wagged his head, grinning. "Where is this hero?"

"He's been asleep since yesterday. He did seem awful tired, doctor." She unlocked Carlisle's door.

At some time or other, Carlisle had been awake enough to yank off the top of his pajamas, which was tossed over the foot of the bed. His face was rolled into the pillow. He had thrown back the covers, so that the upper half of his body was bare. Susie could see the bruises. There was one, a spectacular greenish purple, that covered his shoulder.

"Sweet Almira!" Doc Wickham said. "He sure had one peach of a workout!" He nudged Carlisle's shoulder. "Hi, fella."

Carlisle rolled over. His nose, also, was black and blue and slightly swollen; he had a magnificent black eye.

"Holy cow!" The doctor bent down for a closer look. "What hit you?"

"Whassa matter?" Carlisle mumbled. He stared upward glassily. "Oh. Am I sick?"

"Sick? A root'n'-toot'n' ring-tailed heller like you, sick? Poopsie!" said the doctor. "Yank that leg out of the pajamas and let me have a look at your knee. Hey, what's the idea, taking off the dressing?"

"It was filthy," Susie said. "I had to redress it, wash out that thing you put on. It didn't seem to me that was doing much good."

"Oh, sure. Take off the elastic bandage, sure. But I told him not to touch that dressing." The doctor was poking at Carlisle's knee, which was swollen, but didn't look so bad to her as it had last night.

"What's the matter with his knee?"

Dr. Wickham grunted. "Why, nothing. A little skinning here and there, a slight sprain."

He began painting the knee with disinfectant which apparently stung, for Carlisle winced.

"Now, he's got to stay off this all he can for a couple days. Walk to the bathroom and around the house, if he wants to. But no traipsing, understand? In a couple of days Alison's going to start to work the mischief out of you. You've still got some more games to play. So you stay put."

"O.K.," Carlisle said. He stared down at his knee. "That's all that's the matter with it, is it? That's for sure?"

"That's for sure. Couple days, you'll be as good as new." He snapped his bag shut, got to his feet.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 99

ARE YOU BREAKING YOUR OWN HEART?

The normal heart is a remarkably strong and durable organ. But to protect and conserve its strength for years to come, you should guard against certain "enemies" of the heart.

Above all, control your weight. Overweight is probably the worst and most insidious enemy of your heart. Excess weight serves no useful purpose. It is simply a burden—and the more overweight you are, the more likely you are to impair your heart's efficiency.

Eat sensibly. If you do put on unnecessary weight, let your physician prescribe a diet that will take it off slowly and safely. And after you've brought your weight down to normal, make every effort to keep it there—permanently.

Work off tension. Many people who develop high blood pressure—which puts a strain on the heart—are tense, hard-working individuals. They should learn to work off tension.

When you feel tensed-up, try physical activity—work in the garden, take a long walk or do something that you really enjoy. Any diversion helps relieve tenseness. In fact, anyone who works under constant strain should probably have a definite schedule for daily relaxation.

So, get enough rest and try to take it easy. Every bit of relaxation you get gives your heart a chance to relax, too.

Avoid over-exertion and fatigue. After middle-age, it's wise to avoid sudden or strenuous activities to which you are unaccustomed. But reasonable activities—things that you enjoy and that don't leave you huffing and puffing are usually good and safe for your heart.

Even when the heart has been damaged, it usually mends itself through rest and skilled medical care. In fact, about four out of every five people recover from their first heart attack—and many of them recover fully enough to enjoy many useful, active years.

If you give your heart the care that it deserves—including regular health examinations—it may serve you well for many long years.

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY©

A MUTUAL COMPANY

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTCARD

Metropolitan Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10, N.Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "Your Heart," 2-60-J.

Name (PLEASE PRINT)

Street

City & Zone State

There's no other dog in the world like yours:

Get 16 oz. cans in handy 6-Pak—

For 8" x 10" print of picture alone, send 25¢ in coin to Dog Picture 10, Box 7366, Chicago 77, Ill.

There's no other dog food like Ken-L-Ration with Lean Red Meat*

Here's what Ken-L-Ration does for your dog. It provides the kind of quality meat he is known to need most—Lean Red Meat—*steaks, chops and roasts of Gov't. Inspected Horsemeat. This high-protein diet plus other essential ingredients helps to keep your dog fit, not fat . . . in continued good health and good spirits. It's so wholesome the Dept. of Agriculture Seal appears on every can. So good that it's America's largest selling dog food. PUT YOUR TRUST IN KEN-L-RATION...MORE PEOPLE DO!

INSPECTED ... CERTIFIED ... U. S. DEPT. OF AGR. AS A NORMAL MAINTENANCE DOG FOOD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 97

Susie followed him to the front door. "It eems funny to me, your coming way up here or a skinned knee, when we didn't send for ou, unless that knee is worse than it looks."

"I told you. Just checking. If it's the money hat's worrying you, this is for free. We're tak- ng doggone good care of those boys until fter the Boston play-offs."

He got into his car and drove off down the ill.

Susie sighed. She went back into the kitchen o get Carlisle's breakfast. She was rewarded y seeing his eyes glisten at the sight of grape- ruit, toast and bacon, scrambled eggs and ilk.

"Gee," he said. "I'm starved."

"Could you eat a steak, if I fixed it?"

"I sure could."

Susie nodded. "I'll bring it up," she said.

By the time Susie got back upstairs with the teak, the first breakfast was as if it had never een. Coming through the door, she was truck anew by the awesome face, beaming at er from the pillow.

"How on earth do you do it?" she asked.

"Huh? Do what, ma?"

"Why, same old routine, day after day, oing nothing but play ball. And you come ut of it all pounded to pulp. It isn't as if you idn't have a brain. You do."

"So they tell me, down at the school. I'm mart. I could do anything, be anything, with he brains I've got. Quote. Old Bugsy."

"Who?"

"Bugsy. Mr. Berg."

"Well, for heaven's sake, if that's his name, all him by it."

"Yare. So it does me good to hear a lot of ld has-beens and never-wases gobbling round fixing up my life. Be a lawyer, be a hemist, be a doctor. Heck, I know what I'm oing to be. I'm going to be a pro ballplayer."

"What?" Susie said. "I thought we—I hought you were going to college."

"I am. Even a good high-school player don't et much of a break with the pros till he's had our years on a college team."

"But how are you going to get into college, f you don't keep your grades up?"

"Oh, they pass you," Carlisle said. "Look, na, you ever know a good ballplayer not to ass, down at the school? And I'm Shirttail McIntosh. In like Flynn."

"That isn't right. And you know it."

"Ma, you worry too much."

"Maybe I've got cause to. There's been a ig change in you in the last year."

She brought up short, aware of her anger, nd of Carlisle's too. The discussion had got ut of hand, slanted off in the last direction he'd ever expected it to take. She picked up he tray and carried it down to the kitchen.

After his mother had gone, Carlisle lay star- ng moodily out the window. Ma was sure on he warpath.

He yanked a pile of textbooks over onto the overlet beside him, opened Hamlet. Picture f William Shakespeare, baldheaded guy with hiskers. Funny-looking.

Almost all great men, if you believed the ictures in the books, looked funny. How far ould they get today? Stack them up along- ide of Elvis or Jimmie Rodgers. Even old ack Benny looked better than this guy hakespeare.

This stuff. This Hamlet.

SCENE I. Elsinore. A platform before the castle. FRANCISCO at his post. Enter to him BERNARDO.

Ber. Who's there?

Fran. Nay, answer me: stand, and unfold your- elf.

From somewhere an automobile horn ounded, three short, three long, three short, nd Carlisle rose up in bed, galvanized. That as Debby. She was parked out in the high- ay beyond the back pasture, blowing their rivate signal.

He got out of bed, testing his knee. Not ad. Stiff. A little exercise would limber it up. Carlisle dressed, taking care not to make any oise that Susie could hear. He opened the oor to the back stairs and tiptoed down.

His knee bothered him on the rough ground p through the pasture, but it was feeling bet- er with every stride. He crossed the brook, cut nto the alders and slid down the embank- ment, coming out into the highway a few yards from Debby Parker's car.

Debby saw him and began to laugh. "Oh- oh," she said. "You ran into a tree."

"Nope."

"Jerry?"

"Uh-huh."

"That goofball. He's telling his side around town. Your grandfather cut a tree down on you."

"Thereby fixing the ball team, because he doesn't want me to go to Boston. Tell Jerry to be my guest. I'll go along."

Debby glanced at him. "People are all ready to fight. My father was ranting around the house this noon."

"Tell 'em all to go fry. Where'll we go?"

"Fairport? Want to eat?"

"Nope. Just ate. Anyway, no money."

"I've got some."

"Nope."

Debby always had plenty of money, a lot more than he did. Her father was Win Parker, the garageman; he was loaded. She was a pretty girl, smart in school. Win saw to it that she had nice clothes, money to spend; he had even given her a car—a small, English-made car, which she loved and talked to as if it had been a person named Katy.

"O.K., let's just ride," she said, letting in the gears. "Look at that little old doll! Look at old Katy! She'll pick up like that right in the middle of a hill."

"Little but mean," Carlisle said. He grinned lopsidedly, settled back, relaxing, on the seat.

They went a long way. Beyond Fairport, the highway angled off northwest toward the new turnpike. Katy's speedometer crept up past sixty; to sixty-five.

Sixty miles or so up the river highway, Carlisle came out of his silence. He stretched and yawned loudly. Debby felt his elbow brush her cap. "Phew, I feel better," he said, blowing out his breath. "I was all ready to flip."

"I thought you might be."

Debby was watching the road ahead, and presently saw what she was looking for, a side road off the main highway. She turned the car into it.

"Hey," Carlisle said, "we'll get stuck down here, maybe?"

They knew the road well, having come here often, but not in February. It was a discontinued river road that led down to an old lumberyard on the bank. As with any gravel road, the bottom was likely to go out after a winter thaw.

"Ho!" Debby said. "Katy can go places the big old bathtubs can't. Watch this little old doll!"

He watched while she put the car down the road. The steep ruts ran with water, mud sloshed under the tires; now and then the transmission housing scraped along the high crown of the road, and Debby eased off, careful, avoiding rocks, searching for traction with the wheels. They stopped on the riverbank at the road's end, and Carlisle grinned.

"Pretty cool dolls," he said. "Both of you."

He kissed her, letting his lips linger, feeling the tiredness and the tension drain away. This was always the way it was with him and Debby. After he'd been with her awhile, whatever had been stewing around, clobbering him up, was gone. After a while there was just Debby.

Reminded suddenly of something, he lifted his face from Debby's cap. "Did you get the chem paper done, honey?"

Against him, Debby stirred. "Yes. It's in the glove compartment."

"Good. don't let me forget it, will you? I'll have to copy it tonight, so the fellas can hand it around tomorrow. Hey, what's the matter?"

He reached for her, but she caught both his hands in hers. "No, wait. Let's talk. You know I don't mind doing your science papers, because you've got more to do than you possibly can, but ——"

Carlisle drew back. "Why yak about it now? The ball season's almost over."

"Mr. Berg knows about the phony papers. He's known all along."

"So what if he does? Pack it up, honey. I'll pass. They slide you through, and you get a scholarship if you play good ball."

"I know all that. But Mr. Berg says a scholarship, if it's on phony grades, you can't keep it. If you don't know your math or science, you'd be lucky if you lasted a semester."

"What is this?" Carlisle said angrily. "That greaseball doesn't know anything about athletics. The colleges do what the high schools do. They don't flunk out a ballplayer."

Debby gave him a long look. "I like Mr. Berg."

"O.K., I'm sorry I called him a greaseball. Except he is, you know."

"Oh, Carl, stop it! We always said we'd go to college together."

"I still want to. So what gives? You've got to remember I've got some games to play."

"Oh, the game," Debby said. "The game, the game!" She beat her hands softly, impatiently, against Katy's steering wheel, and Carlisle stared at her astonished.

"What's the matter with you? You can tell old Bugsy from me that it isn't his kind of stuff will get me to college. Playing ball will."

"What if you lose, down in Boston? What if your knee bothers you, or ——"

"My knee's O.K. If it bothers, a shot of Novocain'll fix it."

Debby said nothing for a moment. Then she leaned down and started Katy's engine.

"What am I?" Carlisle said. "How much do people think I can do, for Pete's sake?"

Modern women can be fiercely sensitive about pride and about sacrifice, for they feel that giving is giving only if one is free to withhold. When it is assumed that sacrifice is our natural role, that we even like it, and that as it is part of our nature a little further sacrifice here and there is no trouble to us at all, we are angered.

FLORIDA SCOTT-MAXWELL
Women and Sometimes Men
Alfred A. Knopf

"I know you can't do any work now," Debby said. Her voice came, clear, over the slow throb of Katy's engine. "The way things are. I want to help. I only tried to tell you ——"

"So what's to be scared about? I'll make college. If I don't, I can always go out for pro ball."

"And just be a big, beautiful hunk of ballplayer for always and always," Debby said.

"So you don't like a big, beautiful hunk of ballplayer?"

"That's the trouble," Debby said. "I do."

Out behind Martin Hoodless' third broiler house was a grove of young spruces. In the middle of this grove, hidden in an underbrush-surrounded clearing, Ralph McIntosh had made a place to practice basketball.

He had nailed up a wooden backboard to a tree and fastened to it an iron barrel hoop. The basketball he was using belonged to the high-school gym.

On a day early in the season, when the air in the gym was full of basketballs, Ralph had tried a long shot from the side, a wild one, which had struck the floor and bounced straight out the open window. He'd thought someone besides himself must have noticed it, but nobody had, and he was about to leave the floor to go after it when the coach stopped shooting practice, and laid out a game. Ralph, being the center of the second-string team, couldn't leave.

Ralph had been made center only because he was tall. At fifteen he was six feet four, taller than Carlisle by an inch or two.

Ralph was at once the hope and the despair of Alison: the hope, because of his towering height; and the despair, because he could not learn to handle his hands and feet.

Nothing Alison said seemed to make an impression on him. He never got mad. He took a lot of kidding about this. Around school, occasionally, he was known as the Witless Wonder. He seemed not to mind kidding.

After that particular practice, Ralph had had to hurry home to help with chores; he'd piled into a friend's car, forgetting the ball. Just as he was going to bed, he remembered.

A basketball, to Ralph, was a treasure beyond price. Grampa refused to have one on the place, wouldn't let either of the boys spend money to buy one.

Ralph put his clothes back on, listened at his bedroom door to make sure nobody was around to stop him, and slid down a post of the porch outside his window. It was a moonlit night in December, crisp and cold; snow on the ground was frozen stiff.

Ralph went loping down the hill, tall and gangly in his wool coat and cap with the ear flaps pulled down, his knitted mittens flopping on his hands as his elbows jerked with every stride.

Main Street was deserted. The drugstore went dark as old Mr. Warren shut up shop for the night. Two men came out: one of them the chemist; the other, Ralph could tell by the cane, Charles Kendall.

Charles lifted a hand. "Hi, Ralph. Going somewhere in a hurry?"

"Not specially," Ralph said, grinning. "Got to go over to the gym a minute. Just running to keep warm."

Charles said, "You too cold to eat some ice cream?"

"I sure am not," Ralph said.

"George sent me over after some," Charles said. "And Hazel's got a marble cake she said wouldn't keep till morning. Grover, would it be too much trouble to open up again, let me have another quart of ice cream?"

Grover Warren, who had been locking the door, snapped his key in the opposite direction. "No trouble," he said. "But a whole quart? You want to kill the kid?"

"Got to allow for contingencies," Charles said "What kind, Ralph?"

"Strawberry," he said blissfully. "Maple walnut. A pint of each, if he's got 'em." Heck, he could pick up the basketball on the way back.

He followed around into the side street where Charles had parked his car. Charles never had any trouble with driving; he had special gears built into his car. Ralph always marveled at the way Charles handled himself on his one leg—at least, his one good leg and what he sometimes referred to as his "prosthesis."

"My prosthesis is giving me trouble," Charles would say.

He had had plenty of chance to learn medical terms with regard to his disability, in the military hospital. Charles had been in the Marines; he had left two fingers of his left hand, as well as his leg below the knee joint, at Anzio.

"Why, they scooped me up like a jigsaw puzzle in a shovel," he would say. "I wouldn't be surprised if I was two or three people. Whatever they needed, they grabbed it up and sewed it on."

Hazel Whitney—wife of George, and Susie's sister—would put her fingers into her ears. "Stop it, Charles, you're giving me the horrors."

"It gives me the horrors," Charles would say. Grinning, he would wink at Ralph. "All I had left was my head and two ribs. The rest of it's shopped around for from all over."

Hazel, with Bessie Maitland's help, ran the kitchen and housekeeping at Charles' motel. George did the heavy outdoors work, while Charles himself handled the business end. Unless he happened to be tired, his disability was not apparent. He held his wide shoulders straight and walked without a limp. He carried a cane only when the ground was icy.

The motel, of course, was closed in wintertime. Seasonally Charles hired a good deal of help, but Bessie Maitland, head waitress, caretaker, and a good deal more, was permanent. Bessie was tall, rawboned and tough. In wintertime she lived in one of the motel units which Charles had had winterized for her use.

When he drove abreast of her motel unit, with Ralph in the seat beside him, they saw Bessie through the window, watching TV.

"Whew-we!" Charles whistled, stopping the car. "Bessie! Want some ice cream?"

Bessie did not move nor take her eyes off the TV, but she waved a hand.

"Want to come over with us, or shall I bring it in?"

Bessie waved the hand again; she got up and emerged, tying a shawl over her curlers. She got into the back seat, cheerfully banging the door. "Well, if it ain't old Ralph."

Charles started the car, let it roll down the road toward his house on the headland overlooking the water

The big old Kendall house was all that was left of the original stand of buildings put up by Charles' grandfather, which had been famous all over the county as "The Emporium." When Charles had come home from the war, his neighbors had expected he would run The Emporium, as his father and grandfather had done before him. That the old store was losing money made no difference.

Charles tore down The Emporium. He kept his grandfather's big house to live in; but along the shore he strung twenty units of modern, well-equipped motel. Since he was still shaky from illness, he needed help; George and Hazel Whitney helped him, and, after an interval, Charles offered them a partnership.

Charles had grown up, gone to school with George and Hazel There had been a time when two couples, George and Hazel, Charles and Susie, had gone everywhere together. But Susie, out of a clear sky, had married Brant McIntosh; and Charles found necessary a rearrangement of his plans George and Hazel made him comfortable; the three lived as one family in the old Kendall house.

Bessie got out as the car came to a stop by Charles' back door. She went through the kitchen toward the living room, Ralph and Charles following

Hazel, coming out to the kitchen and seeing Ralph, pounced on him with a little yip of welcome. "Oh, Ralphie! Isn't this nice! How's Susie? How'd you get let outdoors, this time of night?"

"Slid down the piazza post," Ralph said.

"Good for you! Go right in and sit down while I dish. Charles, do you want some coffee?"

A bright fire was burning in the fireplace, and Ralph made a beeline for it, settling in a big wing chair, feeling, as he always felt in this house, relaxed, happy.

George Whitney, slumped in an easy chair in front of the TV screen, lifted a hand to Ralph, but otherwise did not move or speak. Nothing ever interrupted George listening to one of his programs.

Bessie said, "My, Hazel, that's a swell-looking cake Is it a mix?"

Hazel, guiding a laden tea wagon in through the living-room door, smiled and shook her head. "That's ma's recipe."

Bessie leaned over and began to cut the cake while Hazel poured coffee.

Ralph sat digging into his big mound of ice cream. He could hear the clock ticking in the hall, the quiet falling of the fire, the occasional clink of a spoon on a dish, against the muted background, the yo-hoing, of George's TV Indians.

"How's basketball this year, Ralph?" Charles asked.

"Pretty good."

"That Mooney boy's quite a star," Bessie said. "They say, around town, that our team's got a chance for the state championship. My, that'd be something I'd certainly like to see. Why, this town never had but one. When was that, George? That Grindle boy, the one they put in jail, he was on the team."

Over by the TV, George stirred slightly. "Must've been nine-ten years ago" he said. "That boy's getting out, next spring"

"You know, that was one living shame." Bessie said. "I don't know what on earth could of come over that boy."

Reluctantly, Ralph got up. It was getting late; everybody would be going home from the gym, and somehow he had to sneak that basketball back in before the janitor locked up for the night.

"I guess I better be on my way," he said. "That was swell cake and ice cream, Aunt Hazel."

Charles said, "Want some of us to ride you up the hill?"

"No, thanks," Ralph said. "If I get over to the gym in time, I can hitch a ride."

"Well, take it easy. And come again," Charles said.

Hazel went with him to the door. "Tell your mother I'll be up sometime soon," she said.

Ralph pelted along the moonlit street. With dismay, he saw as he turned the corner that he'd stayed too long. The gym was dark, the door locked; the windows of the long, low high-school building glittered blank and deserted under the moon.

He found the basketball under a bush. It was icy cold as he snuggled it into the crook of his arm

Now what to do? He'd have to take it home; and not back through town either. Somebody might see him; word might get around that he'd stolen a basketball.

He went through the bushes back of the high school, cut across to the highway, and set out up the macadam at a long lope.

Ralph climbed the embankment into Martin's back pasture. He waded the snow to the foot of the horse-chestnut tree, shoved the ball into the front of his coat and managed to get the zipper closed part way, enough to hold it. Then he went up like a squirrel.

There wasn't any place up here out of sight to stash the basketball. But nobody ever came here but Carl; and Carl didn't come any more. Last spring, when they'd built the tree house, he'd spent a lot of time here. Now he was too busy.

Since that night in December, there hadn't seemed a safe time, to Ralph, when he could get that ball back to the gym. After a while, he brought it down from the tree house. He kept it, now, in the havloft dug deep down into the hay. Secretly he had set up the backboard out in the spruces; and whenever he could sneak away, he was out practicing set shots.

So far, Alison hadn't said that he was getting any better. So far, Alison hadn't taken him, even as a sub, to any of the out-of-town games. Now, of course, with the season nearly over, there was only one more chance; but so far the list of subs, the ones who'd be going to Boston with the team, hadn't been posted.

When ten boys of senior chemistry did not show up for class, Alfred Berg started for the principal's office This is it, he told himself between set teeth. As he went by the entrance to the gym, two of his class, Carlisle McIntosh and Dick Wickham, flashed past the door, passing a ball down the floor.

Alfred stepped through the door as the team raced back from the far end of the gym. Jerry Mooney had to pivot fast to avoid running into him. The ball rolled into the side lines, and Alison let out a strangled blat. "Watch it, Berg, will you?"

"Sorry," Alfred said. "But my chemistry class began fifteen minutes ago. I came in to remind these fellows of the time"

"Well, go and see Goss," Alison said. "Goss has got it taped—he'll tell you."

"He hasn't so far," Alfred said. "Until he notifies me about class cuts for ball, this period's still chemistry."

He was a little astonished, a little shaken. He and Chet Alison had never been particularly friendly. True, relations between them had slipped a little since they had both begun to go out with Ellen Callander.

Now Alfred walked thoughtfully along the corridor toward the principal's office.

James Goss was behind his desk, dictating a letter to his secretary, Sally Ames, who wasn't a professional stenographer; she was a senior in the Commercial Department whose shorthand and typing were only fair. She and another senior, Josephine Conway, worked spare time for Mr. Goss.

Al said, "Jim, there's a mix-up. Most of my chem class is in practicing ball."

James turned in his swivel chair. "Sally, didn't that note go up to Mr. Berg's room?"

"Oh, yes, Mr. Goss! I typed it. Jo took it up right after." Her round blue eyes with their heavy fringe of dark lashes swept a wide, innocent glance over Mr. Berg. "Could it have slipped under some papers on your desk, maybe?"

MORE HOME-COOKED TASTING than ever, actually twice as much real chicken goodness. And it takes mere minutes to fix.

New from LIPTON... Chicken Noodle Soup with livelier-than-ever taste

Lipton's done the impossible!

Newly improved Lipton Chicken Noodle Soup tastes richer, livelier, more home-cooked than ever... has a super new kind of enriched egg noodles that just won't go soggy.

What astonishment that such brawny old-time eating should come this modern mix way!

You'll love this fine chicken soup as is—everybody does! But, Madam, why stop there?

With livelier Lipton Chicken Noodle Soup on hand, you'll turn into the best Soup-Supper cook for miles around!

LIPTON—home-cooked taste the new mix way.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

." Al said. "Well, just so you know, nes cleared his throat. "I know it's— unorthodox, but Alison feels the team extra practice time, before Boston. ially now that we're having some diffi- with Carlisle McIntosh's grandfather."

d Mr. Hoodless?" Al asked.

e says Carl can't practice nights after l." Sally burst out. "He's crazy!"

razy?" Al said. "I hear that McIntosh is g ball with his knee shot full of Novo- Am I right, Jim?"

nes nodded. "Dr. Wickham doesn't think hurt him."

n sure he must know," Al said. "Even w would you feel, if it were your boy?"

nes har-rumphed. "I understand it's a question of keeping the boy home to n the farm."

aybe he's still got something. He's an an and that's a big farm. Needing help n't make him crazy, Sally."

e cut down a big tree on top of Carl and " Sally said fiercely. "He tried to fix so they couldn't play ball."

hat's an odd story," Al said "I don't be- old Mr. Hoodless would ——" ly stood straight up. "If you're calling a liar, Mr. Berg, all you've got to do is in old Mart's pasture and look at the stalked out of the room. She was Jerry's he had been going steady with him ever grade school.

he ball season," Al said, looking after is rugged, Jim."

nes nodded. "I'll speak to her. She'll gize."

on't bother. The poor little devils are so l up they don't know what they're doing. I can't possibly grind enough chemistry hose kids before June so that they can decent examination."

ar," James said. "Do what you can, d. After twelve years here I have had to ude that the town wants a school. They gone to considerable expense to build a fine one, and any citizen, if I asked him that question, would consider me crazy. Of course his children must be educated. If you should suggest to him that this is not a school, but a ball club, he would think something was wrong with you."

"Well, isn't it?" Al said angrily.

"Isn't it a ball club?" James hesitated. "No. It remains a school because of the five out of twenty whom you and I are able to teach. We have turned out a few doctors, lawyers, teachers to balance"—he paused with a wry smile—"to balance Arthur Grindle. Look, Chet Alison is paid more than you are. He is paid more than I am. Because the town wants to insure the prestige it gets from having a good ball team. The real reason for a school is its gym."

The rare individual who has learned to govern himself is too fed up with the labor of it to want to govern anybody else. HENRY S. HASKINS

Alfred said, "I think you're putting it too strongly, Jim. I don't think you can ——"

"Harold Saville," James said. "You've heard of him?"

"Sure. Who hasn't?"

"Harold Saville. The head of a great clinic," James said. "He has carried on some of the most exciting research in modern medicine. He was born in this town, graduated from this high school. He visited here last summer, but, outside of a few who said, 'Oh, yare, big doctor somewhere, ain't he?' nobody flipped so much as a button. No. What they get out the fire engines for is the basketball team. You think you can buck that, Alfred? You can't. Slide Alison's boys by."

"Is that an order?"

"No," James said. "I can't order you. But you're starting your career and a black mark is—har—a black mark. Don't make it possible for our triumvirate, Mr. Parker, Mr. Troy and Dr. Wickham, to discredit you."

"No," Alfred said. "Thanks, James."

"Are you seeing Miss Callander tonight, by the way?"

"Why, yes. I'm having dinner with her."

"Ask her to call my wife about the heart drive, will you?"

"Why, sure, Jim."

Al went down the corridor toward his lab. He was passing his empty classroom and turned in at the door. Better sit down at the desk, cool off. James Goss had gone the long way around to tell him that he wasn't going to back Al Berg against Chet Alison. Rationalized it pretty well too. Under the circumstances, I suppose you can't blame him. He needs his job; he's got a family. Still, it was a mouthful to swallow.

James' note had turned up, he saw. It was there, a white oblong, conspicuous in the middle of his blotting pad. He tore open the note, reading James' precise, apologetic phrases about Chemistry IV being excused this afternoon from class, and was about to toss it into his wastebasket when he saw that someone had been playing a paper-and-pencil game on the envelope—the ancient game, known to any school child, in which the names of a boy and a girl are written down, one under the other, and identical letters canceled, then the rest counted according to traditional formula.

Only Al's name hadn't been paired off with a girl's.

~~ALFRED BERG~~ ~~DAMN KIKE~~

it read.

The things they think of! he thought.

Well, of course, something like this might have been expected to happen sooner or later. Kids picked up stuff from their parents, and he'd known there was some feeling against Jews in the town.

Side by side, on a quiet residential street, were the two houses which Miss Eloise Marcy had inherited. One, in which she lived, was a mansion three stories high built by her great-grandfather, Capt. Jethro Marcy. The other was an aged salt-box.

Miss Eloise lived on the tag end of Captain Jethro's fortune and eked it out by renting the salt-box in summer to tourists and in winter to schoolteachers. She usually refused to rent to one young single lady because, if the single lady was pretty, there was always the problem of gentleman friends.

Gently and delicately, Miss Marcy had told Ellen Callander this on the day Ellen asked to rent the house.

Ellen had said, "I do see your point, Miss Marcy, but, you see, I'll be giving music lessons or tutoring sometimes evenings at home. I'll have band and glee-club rehearsals, and I really need the house."

"Well, I don't know as I'd think much of having a passel of young ones traipsing around through that house," Miss Marcy said. "That's a real, old-fashioned, genuine antique, that house is."

Ellen smiled. "Anyone can see it is. I should, of course, take care of it, knowing how highly you value it."

Well, there, Miss Marcy thought. I do believe she would. She's nice. Not like them rackety young twippets that go thistledowning around, all they think about is men, men, men.

She said, "Well, I guess you can have it, then," not knowing that she was not the first to yield to the charm of that smile.

Alfred Berg sat on the divan in front of Ellen's fire. Dinner had been wonderful—steak and a green salad, exactly what he liked. Now he sat watching Ellen while she crumpled up the envelope from James Goss' note, tossed it into the fireplace.

"Well," she said, "you would be a teacher, you dope. Are you bitter because someone's called you a kike?"

"Uh ——" Alfred began. He glanced over at her, surprised, and Ellen laughed.

"I should tactfully not speak the word?" she said. "You're a kike, so you're a kike. So what? I'm a mick. A black-Irish mick. Try that over on your harmonium, old Bugsy."

FOR A WHOLE-MEAL Lipton Sunday Supper, you just add a cup of cubed ham, some toasted croutons, a sprinkling of cheese.

LIPTON'S GOOD CHICKEN SOUP INGREDIENTS go partners with corn and beans to make a nourishing, tasty chowder.

$1,000,000 IN LAUGHS FREE 20 HILARIOUS studio|cards PLUS BEAUTIFUL SAMPLE KIT

earn EXTRA MONEY EASILY!

From junior miss to senior mrs., our unique assortment of delightful Studio Cards is yours absolutely FREE! Yes, you too can have fun and earn big money with the greatest ease. Just show your neighbors and friends —

FAMOUS SUNSHINE CARDS

For All Occasions — All Beautiful

Earn lots of cash in your spare time, and stretch your allowance or budget with our

MILLION DOLLAR STUDIO ASSORTMENT

And we'll send samples on approval of other fine assortments, too. Plus an exciting Free catalog of outstanding stationery and exquisite gifts. Bring SUNSHINE into everyone's life — bring more money into your own!

Paste this coupon on a Postal Card and mail today. Get your FREE GIFT BOX plus a Sample Kit. Costs nothing to try. But act promptly. This offer is good for 30 days only.

ACT TODAY! HAVE CASH TOMORROW!

MR. W. S. ROBBINS
SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS
45 WARWICK STREET
SPRINGFIELD 1, MASS.

Western Office EL MONTE, CALIF.
(West of the Rockies Mail to California Office)

RUSH my FREE box of STUDIO CARDS, FREE CATALOG and SAMPLE KIT.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ ZONE___ STATE___

☐ Check here for Organization Fund Raising Plan.

Top Values in Kitchen Helpers

Polly Flex™

POLYETHYLENE

Dishpan, Drainboard

Long Lasting—In Lovely Colors

Won't become soggy or fade. Insist on Republic's Dishpan and Drainboard for top value. At Hardware, Housewares, Variety, Department Stores.

Write for FREE CATALOG

REPUBLIC MOLDING CORPORATION
6465 N. Avondale • Chicago 31, Ill.

GROW Brilliant Colored GERANIUM

PLANTS FROM SEED. New double and Semi-Double varieties, all shades. Described in New Seed & Nursery Catalog. Send 10c in coin for 50c Pkt. or 3 Pkts. for 25c and Catalog FREE

CONDON BROS. SEEDSMEN . . . Now Combined With
R. H. SHUMWAY Seedsman, Dept. 365, Rockford, Illinois

Alfred grinned. "At least I've got a nickname."

"I know, Bugsy. That's lovely. Good nicknames are one of the pleasanter customs of St. Trinian's, and Mr.-Parker-the-school-committee's stock in trade. By the way, you should have seen us all down at his garage the other day—Miss Eloise, Mr. Parker and me."

"Oh? What happened there?"

"Well, Mr. Parker, it seems, admires me."

"He does, does he?" Alfred glanced over at her and Ellen, who was in the act of fixing the fire, looked at him and grinned.

"Mm-hm. All this business of tending to my car servicing personally, himself. You know? And looking for the proper spot in the conversation to declare intentions? I mentioned it to Miss Eloise, and she said he does that with all the girls. Member of the board or no. So the last time I needed garage work done, I took Miss Eloise with me. You should have seen the three of us, Mr. Parker poking around in the car's innards and sneaking an ogle at me, and Miss Eloise standing there, putting the double whammy on him ——"

Alfred roared. "Good for Miss Eloise!" he said. "How is she?"

"As you see," Ellen said. She gestured toward the living-room window; thirty feet away, Miss Eloise sat facing her own window, busily writing at a table. "My life is an open book," Ellen murmured.

"Why don't we pull down the shades?"

Ellen gave him a sidelong glance. "You know perfectly well why. If she can't see everybody, every minute, she comes over. The other night when Chet was here ——"

"Oh, he was here again, was he?"

"Certainly. I'm sociable. I have lots of company. Well, Chet was down cellar, fooling with the plumbing. It's terrible plumbing. Chet thought he might be able to fix it. I was down there with him holding the flashlight, and Miss Eloise couldn't see a soul in the living room or the kitchen. So over she came. Said she was sorry to barge in, but Mr. Alison ought to know that his car was parked too near the fire hydrant. So Chet had to go out and move it. He was huffy. And what's more"—Ellen's eyes began to dance—"Miss Eloise stayed to dinner."

"She did! Why, God bless her little pointed head! Did you invite her?"

"Oh, she wangled it. And then she settled in for a nice visit. Told me about this house, how it was headquarters for colonial troops and they brought in the wounded and laid them out over the floor. Over this floor," Ellen went on, with a wave of her hand at the aged, white pine boards. "That was why, Miss Eloise said, she was still thinking twice about letting me use the fireplace ——"

"Eh? The fireplace?"

"Oh, we have had a real go-round about the fireplace, Miss Eloise and I. And then, of course, there was Elinor Glyn."

"Elinor Glyn? 'Three Weeks' Glyn? That one?"

"Mm-hm. I couldn't think why these books kept turning up on the living-room table. 'Three Weeks.' 'One Day.' 'High Noon.' Finally, Miss Eloise dropped something that let me know why. It seems a fireplace abets immoral ladies. At least, it's an accessory. You lie on a leopardskin, she says, in your shape. In front of a fire, to entertain gentlemen."

Alfred shouted. "Well, remind me ——" He choked, and pulled out his handkerchief to wipe the tears of laughter from his cheeks. "Remind me to bring you a leopardskin."

"Thanks," Ellen said. "I'd love one."

"Well, she likes me," Alfred said. "At least I've got that edge on the competition."

"She certainly does. You know, I haven't seen her writing before; she usually sits and watches. She wants you to come over, boy. Hey, do I have competition!"

Alfred glanced over at her thoughtfully. "You know, I might just do that, after a while." He was pleased to see that Ellen looked a little dashed.

"Go and leave me with all those dishes?" she asked.

"Let's do 'em." Alfred got up, caught her hands and pulled her to her feet. "And then maybe both go over for a while."

"Mm," Ellen said.

In the kitchen she began washing the dishes. Standing a little behind her, industriously wiping, Alfred noticed as he had before how her hair grew at the nape of her neck, neat, clipped and silky against the creamy skin. Ellen had black hair, naturally curly, the short, crisp ringlets covering her head like a cap; she had the Irish complexion, with blue eyes that could turn gray green in moments of temper.

"Limey," he said, under his breath. "Black-Irish mick."

"Mm-hm," Ellen said. She flashed him a grin. "Kike. Old Bugsy, for heaven's sake! Oh, Al, darn those kids! You know you're really doing a terrific job up there."

Her eyes, he saw, were not gray green at all, only blue, direct and friendly.

"You've been stewing over this," Alfred said. "I shouldn't have told you. Look. The fact that nobody's thrown any rocks means that civilization's come at least a little way from the savages."

"Humph!" Ellen said. "Sometimes I think if all the money spent on educating ignorance out of people were laid end to end, it would make a four-lane highway from here to Plymouth Rock. So what happens? We have to buck sports, as big business. Every school child a champion at the age of twelve."

"Yes, but Ellen, there are some changes being made. For instance, did you read about the high school near the ski resort, the one that got written up in a news weekly?"

There's little doubt that lots of girls would make better wives if they weren't trying to make better husbands.

From The Bedside Bachelor
Lion Books, Inc.

Ellen shook her head, smiling a little, watching his absorbed face.

"This ski-resort town, all the kids wanted to do was ski. The school board decreed that all athletes, to be eligible for games, had to get at least a C average; and the school's math instructor took this seriously. He handed out a whole batch of D's, E's and F's to the ski team."

"What happened?"

"Oh, my," Alfred said. "The glue schussed into the slalom. The chairman of the school board's daughter was just about to enter the nationals; and she got an F in math. So on the day of the races, her father took her out of school and sent her up to ski, with his blessing. She won. She got time on TV and headlines in the papers. The next week, fifteen kids got their parents' consent to go up the mountain and ski on school time.

"The school didn't take it lying down. I don't know what happened to the math instructor, but the superintendent of schools resigned. So the townspeople took that in a holiday mood; they hired another one. And guess who? The new superintendent of schools is the coach of the ski team."

"Oh, great," Ellen said.

"Well, there was a gimmick," Alfred went on. "Thanks to, of all people, the Russians. A few years ago nothing would have happened. But this year, Sputnik. So our story gets noised abroad. It made, for instance, a national news magazine. And papa has been made pretty ridiculous in the eyes of some people whom he probably respects."

"Wonderful!" Ellen said. "And so you think you'll keep on being one of the dopes."

"I expect so. I like the kids. I've got a few up there I've done something for. Debby Parker, for instance, and young Ralph McIntosh. I wish I could make some time with his brother. The ballplayer they call Shirttail has probably got the best brain of anybody in the school. But I can't get to first base with him."

"I think he's awful," Ellen said. "All that conceit ——"

"Yes, poor little devil, he's been pumped up out of all reason. It's too bad. With some, it wouldn't make a difference—Mooney, for example. Mooney doesn't know A from I the only reason he's in school is to play ba Incidentally, I learned today that I'm goi to have to weasel along with James Goss, gi everybody a passing grade."

Ellen nodded. "It seems to be the custo You're going to do it?"

"Well, I hadn't made up my mind, reall But, yes, I guess I am. I expect I sound like prize heel, and I know I sound dull."

Ellen looked at him. She leaned over, su denly, buried her face in the front of his shi and bit him, hard.

"Ow!" Alfred said. He stared, astonishe

"All right," Ellen said. "Just don't ta bunk to me, that's all. I'm on your side, r member? I like to see brawn fought wi brains. Or do you ——" She faltered a fit noting the expression in his eyes.

"Good," he said briskly. He reached acro and took her by the shoulders, holding h firmly as she twisted, trying to get away. I put his lips down over hers.

The silence in the room was not long. Su deep, his head spinning, Alfred did not he a sound; he became aware merely of a tens ness in Ellen, and lifted his face from he Then he heard the knock, the delicate ta tapping at the door.

"Miss Callander? Miss Callander? Are y all right?"

"Yes," Ellen said. Eyes suddenly brimmi over with mirth, she touched her finger to h lips. "Sh-h, it's Miss Eloise."

Alfred grinned. "With a leopardskin," said. "Tell her to bring it right in."

On a night toward the end of February magnificent display of northern lights dazzl the town. It appeared first in the east, strange red glow against the sky. As the nig deepened, its place was taken by an arc cold light, widening until the northern sky w filled with flickering red, blue, green, viol shifting and changing like colored curtains some celestial window behind which blew mighty wind.

Ellen Callander had settled down at h desk when Alfred's knock sounded at t door. He seemed excited as he came in, r stopping to say hello. He strode to the de turning off the light.

"Look," he said. "Look out the window

Bewildered at first, then seeing, as her ey became adjusted to darkness, Ellen gasp "Oh," she said, "isn't that lovely!" She sto beside him at the window.

"I've just been on the phone to the observ tory at Boulder," he said. "Doc Wellm says they've been keeping an eye on the su spots. There's been a terrific solar flare. Ell what I came in for, can I use your phone want to get in touch with some kids in r physics classes, make sure they get a go look at this. Then get into something war so we can go out and catch this from the t of a hill somewhere."

Down at the gym, Chet Alison was putt the finishing touches on his championsh team; he had neither the time nor the inclin tion to look out the window.

In the past week and a half, Chet had tak his team apart and put it together aga They're better than they were, Chet thoug his eyes carefully on the racing, swiftly cha ing scene out across the floor. And the sec team is darned good by itself now. If I live l enough, I might even make something out Ralph McIntosh.

He watched, with a creator's eye, the wo ing out of a diagrammed play. Mooney t just received the passed ball. He faked, pivo and threw, all in one sustained, effortless m tion. The ball rose in a beautiful, clean cur dropped through the basket without touch the rim.

That's a work of art, Chet told himself work of —— Oh!

Bearing down full tilt, unable to stop, Ra had plowed down on Jerry. Jerry, seeing h coming, side-stepped, neatly, efficiently, l one of his long legs stuck out just enough trip Ralph, who turned a couple of som saults, slid along the floor on his stom and brought up against the wall, where he s blinking his eyes. It was as neat a job

CONTINUED ON PAGE 105

Peach Raisin Tarts . . . perky, pretty and perfect with Del Monte Peaches, sun-mellowed on the tree

Fill your kitchen with the fragrance of this spicy raisin filling – spoon out the sunny and oh-so-tender DEL MONTE Peaches – this is fun!

You can always count on these glowing, mellow peaches to cheer things up – they're bright as summer itself, juicy and luscious as can be.

Know why? DEL MONTE Peaches are tree-ripe. Extra hours on the tree give them color, flavor and tenderness they couldn't get any other way.

That's what makes DEL MONTE the best-liked peaches in the world – peaches to be proud of, every way and every time you serve them.

PEACH RAISIN TARTS

- 6 baked 4½-inch tart shells
- 1 can (1 lb. 13 oz.) DEL MONTE Brand Peach Halves, drained
- 1 cup syrup from peaches
- ¾ cup hot water
- 2 cups DEL MONTE Seedless Raisins
- ½ cup sugar
- 2 tablespoons cornstarch
- ¾ teaspoon cinnamon
- ½ teaspoon nutmeg
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- 2 tablespoons butter or margarine
- ¼ cup orange juice
- 1 teaspoon grated orange rind
- 2 eggs, slightly beaten

To syrup add water, raisins. Heat to boiling; cover; simmer 15 min. Mix next 5 ingredients, stir into hot mixture; cook, stirring till thick and clear. Add butter, juice, rind; stir till butter melts. Stir hot mixture into eggs, return to pan and cook, stirring, 2 min. Cool. Fill tart shells ¾ full, top with peach halves. Serve warm or cold (with cream, if desired). Serves 6.

Halves or Sliced

Del Monte® Peaches

Quality at your feet...

BROWN SHOE COMPANY

Fashionable choice in patent: tapered or rounded toe

These light, flexible patent pumps give you a choice of gently rounded or tapered toe. The combination last insures perfect fit, the cushioned sole puts comfort in every step. If activity is your kind of living, Air Step is your kind of shoe.

SALLY (rounded toe)

DORRIE (tapered toe)

SIZE RANGE
AAAA 6-11
AAA 5½-11
AA 5-11
A 5-11
B 4-11
C 4½-11
(sizes 10½ and 11 slightly higher in price)

Shoes illustrated, 13.99
Other styles, 8.99 to 14.99
Matching handbags available

HIGHER DENVER WEST and CANADA

Air Step®

Air Step Division, Brown Shoe Company, St. Louis, Missouri. Also manufactured in Canada by Scott Shoe Company, Ltd., Galt, Ontario

In your area these stores feature Air Step shoes

ALASKA

FAIRBANKS	Crocker's Shoe Mart

ARIZONA

PHOENIX	Davids (both stores)

CALIFORNIA

ALAMEDA	Goldman's
ALAMEDA	Grande's Shoe Store
ALHAMBRA	Mandel's
ALHAMBRA	Prober's
ARCADIA	F. C. Nash Co.
ARCATA	Hornbrook's Shoes
BAKERSFIELD	Ricards Bootery
BARSTOW	McQueen's Shoes
BAYFAIR	Macy's
BELL	Ricard's Shoes
BERKELEY	Hodgson's Shoes
BEVERLY HILLS	Mandel's
BEVERLY HILLS	J. W. Robinson
BRAWLEY	Desert Shoes
BURBANK	Burcal's
BURLINGAME	Smith & Heller
CHICO	Burton's Shoe Store
CHULA VISTA	Recht's Shoes
CRESCENT CITY	Del Ponte Shoes
DELANO	Ricards Bootery
EL CAJON	Dunlap Dept. Store
EL CENTRO	Desert Shoes
EUREKA	Hornbrook's Shoe Store
FILLMORE	Fillmore Bootery
FORT BRAGG	Adams Shoes
FRESNO	Cashions Shoes
FRESNO	Gottschalk Co.
GARDENA	Ritchie's Shoes
GLENDALE	Mandel's
GRASS VALLEY	Collier's Shoe Store
HAYWARD	Goldman's
HILLSDALE	Macy's
HOLLYWOOD	Mandel's
KING CITY	Daley's Shoe Store
LIVERMORE	Burton's Shoe Store
LODI	Burton's
LOMPOC	Conrad's Bootery
LONG BEACH	Mandel's
LOS ALTOS	Rancho Shoes
LOS BANOS	Marchese's
LOS ANGELES	Asahi Shoe Co.
LOS ANGELES	Holtzman's Boot Shop
LOS ANGELES	Hyde's Shoes
LOS ANGELES	Lee's Shoe Store
LOS ANGELES	Mandel's (5480 Wilshire & 518 W. 7th)
LOS ANGELES	Quality Shoe Store
LOS ANGELES	J. W. Robinson
LOS ANGELES	Vermont Bootery
LYNWOOD	Fuhrman's Lynwood Bootery
MARTINEZ	Grande's Brownbilt Shoe Store
MARYSVILLE	Burton's Shoe Store
MODESTO	Dunlap's (McHenry Village)
MONTEBELLO	Sandler's Shoes
MONTROSE	Elson's Shoe Store
NAPA	Grande's
OAKLAND	Hill's Shoes
OAKLAND	Goldman's
ORLAND	Johnson's Shoe Store
OROVILLE	Burton's Shoe Store
OXNARD	Linnetts Shoe Store
PANORAMA CITY	Mandel's
PASADENA	Mandel's (Lake St. & 576 E. Colorado)
PASADENA	J. W. Robinson
PASADENA	F. C. Nash Co.
PATTERSON	Pedroni's Shoes
PITTSBURG	Grande's
PLACERVILLE	Cash Merc. Stores
POMONA	Thornton's
RED BLUFF	Carl's Shoe Store
REDDING	Burton's Shoe Store
REDLANDS	Harold's Shoe Store
RICHMOND	Macy's
RIVERSIDE	Carroll's Shoe Store
SACRAMENTO	Nordstrom's Sacramento
SACRAMENTO	Tobias Shoe Store
SALINAS	Daley's Bootery
SAN BERNARDINO	Howe's Shoes
SAN DIEGO	Muehling Dept. Store
SAN DIEGO	Recht's Shoe Store
SAN DIEGO	Walker's
SAN FRANCISCO	Macy's
SAN JOSE	Herold's
SAN LEANDRO	Macy's
SAN RAFAEL	Macy's
SANTA ANA	Mandel's
SANTA ANA	Sabastian's Shoes
SANTA BARBARA	Penninger's
SANTA MONICA	Matchetts Shoe Store
SANTA ROSA	Smith's Shoe Store
STOCKTON	Stanley M. Girsh & Co.
STOCKTON	Hannay's Shoes
SUNNYVALE	Grande's Shoes
SUSANVILLE	Gene's Shoes
TAFT	Ricards Bootery
TRACY	The Mart
TUJUNGA	Foothill Bootery
UKIAH	Davis Shoe Store
UPLAND	Diers Shoes
VACAVILLE	Grande's Shoes
VALLEY FAIR	Macy's
VENTURA	Bushell's Shoe Store
VICTORVILLE	McQueens Shoes
WALNUT CREEK	Goldman's
WALNUT CREEK	Grande's Shoe Store
W. COVINA	Lee's Shoes
WHITTIER	Greenwood's Shoe Store
WHITTIER	Nash Dept.
WILLOWS	Johnson's Shoe Store
WOODLAND	Burton's Shoe Store

COLORADO

BOULDER	Smith Shoe Co.
BRUSH	Salzman's Bootery
COLORADO SPRINGS	Ramsey's Shoes
COLORADO SPRINGS	Vorhes Shoe Co.
DENVER	Fontius Shoe Co.
ENGLEWOOD	Fontius Shoe Co.
FT. COLLINS	Andersen Shoe Store
GLENWOOD SPRINGS	Bullock's Dept. Store
GREELEY	Randalls Shoe Store
HOLYOKE	Scheunemann's Dept. Store
JULESBURG	Sullivan's Dept. Store
LOVELAND	Mock's Shoe Store
PUEBLO	Breetwor's
PUEBLO	White-Davis Co.

IDAHO

BOISE	The Cash Bazar
IDAHO FALLS	Carrolls
LEWISTON	Miller's Dept. Store
MOSCOW	Myklebust Shoe Store
REXBURG	Ashliman Shoe Store
TWIN FALLS	Idaho Dept. Store

MONTANA

ANACONDA	D & D Shoes
BILLINGS	Todd's Shoe Store
BOZEMAN	Egbert's Shoe Store
BUTTE	Taylor's Shoe Store
DILLON	Eliel's
KALISPELL	Leslie's Shoe Store
LIBBY	D & D Shoes
LIVINGSTON	The Shoe Fair
MALTA	Trafton-Dorr Co.
MISSOULA	Savon's
POLSON	D & D Shoes

NEVADA

RENO Folk & Campbell Brownbilt Shoe Store

NEW MEXICO

FARMINGTON	Rouse's Shoe Store

In your area these stores feature Air Step shoes

OREGON

A ANY	Long's Shoe Store
A ORIA	Buster Brown Shoe Store
B VERTON	Arnold's Shoe Store
B ID	Moore's Shoe Store
C S BAY	Buster Brown Shoe Store
C RVALLIS	Leearts Shoes
C TTAGE GROVE	Hoover's Shoe Store
E GENE	Hoover's Shoe Store
F REST GROVE	Gimre's Shoe Store
G NTS PASS	Buster Brown Shoe Store
G SHAM	Adams Shoe Store
H PPNER	Gonty's
H LSBORO	Eric Marggi's Shoe Store
K MATH FALLS	La Pointes Shoes
L EVIEW	Maxwell's Shoe Store
M INNVILLE	Buster Brown Shoe Store
M FORD	Buster Brown Shoe Store
M FORD	Mann's Dept. Store
M WAUKIE	Nickles Shoe Store
O EGON CITY	Nickles Shoe Store
P RTLAND	Bedell's
P RTLAND	David's Shoe Store
P RTLAND	Lipman Wolfe & Co.
P RTLAND	Miller's "Hollywood"
R SEBURG	Pavi's Shoe Store
S HELENS	Don's Shoe Store
S LEM	Lipman Wolfe & Co.
S LEM	Marilyn Shoe Store
T E DALLES	Van Buren's Shoe Store

UTAH

B GHAM CITY	Forsgren's Shoe Store
P VO	Randall's
R HFIELD	Grant's Bootery

WASHINGTON

A BURN	Kettman's Shoe Store
B LLINGHAM	Spenger & Pancoast Shoes
B MERTON	Spellman's Shoes
C NTRALIA	Glen Freeman's Shoes
E NSBURG	Mange's Buster Brown Shoe Store
E RETT	Gish's Shoe Store
K NNEWICK	David's Shoes
K NT	Van's Shoe Store
L KE CITY	Dahl's Shoe Store
L NGVIEW	Zimmerman's Shoes
M VERNON	Gish's Shoe Store
O MPIA	Miller's Department Store
P RT ANGELES	Riedel's Shoe Department
P SSER	Rodman's Shoe Store
P YALLUP	Spellman's Shoes
R HLAND	David's Shoes
S KANE	Galloway's
S KANE	Rusan's
T COMA	Pessemier's Bootery
T COMA	Spellman's Shoes (2 stores)
V NCOUVER	Spellman's Shoes
W LLA WALLA	Wilton's Shoes
W NATCHEE	Trosper's Shoe Store
Y KIMA	Wilton's Shoes

WYOMING

C SPER	Casper Commissary
C EYENNE	Cheyenne Shoe Store
C EYENNE	Dick's Bootery
C LETTE	Lipman's
G EYBULL	Greybull Shoe Store
L NDER	Gibson Shoe Store
R CK SPRINGS	Miner's Mercantile Co.
S HERIDAN	N-Z Shoes

CANADA

ALBERTA

C LGARY	Bata Shoe Store
	Nowak's Shoes Ltd. (5—49th Ave. S.W. and 1432—17th Ave. W.)
E MROSE	Delorne Shoes Limited
E MONTON	Cochlan's Town Talk Footwear
L THBRIDGE	Camm's Shoes
M D DEER	Elgin Shoes Ltd.
W ETTLER	Mel's Shoe Store

BRITISH COLUMBIA

C MLOOPS	Kennell's Shoes Ltd.
E TIMATE TOWNSITE	Hudson's Bay Company
K LSON	Hudson's Bay Company
K NTICTON	Hudson's Bay Company
P INCE GEORGE	Hudson's Bay Company
R CHMOND	Arnell's Footwear
T AIL	Hudson's Bay Company
V NCOUVER 14	Arnell's Footwear
V NCOUVER 9	Dexall's Shoe Store
V NCOUVER 13	Kerrisdale Bootery
V NCOUVER 2	Stacy's Limited
V RNON	Hudson's Bay Company
V CTORIA	Munday's Shoe Store

MANITOBA

B IN FLON	Hudson's Bay Company
P RTAGE LA PRAIRIE	Callan's Shoes Limited
W NNIPEG	Bata Shoe Store
W NNIPEG	MacLeod's Shoe Shop

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

C HARLOTTETOWN	R. T. Holman Limited
S UMMERSIDE	R. T. Holman Limited

SASKATCHEWAN

R EGINA	Loggies Limited
S ASKATOON	Stephenson's Limited

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 102

intentional dumping as Alison had ever seen, made of course to look completely accidental.

He hustled down the floor to where the other players were gathering around Ralph. "You hurt?" he barked.

Ralph shook his head. He was beginning to pick himself up.

"What the heck were you doing?" Alison demanded. "Every player on the floor practically standing still, and here comes old Delayed-Reaction McIntosh, flapping like a windmill! Well, get on your feet! The rest of us can't hold up action every ten minutes while you come unshackled and fall down."

Ralph stared at Alison for a moment. He said, "But I didn't fall down. He tripped me."

"Tripped you!" Alison said. "You caught your big flat feet over his heel."

Not a player on the floor, including Ralph, but knew what actually had happened. Everybody got tripped every once in a while. You learned how to handle it, was all.

The teams trotted back to their positions. All except Ralph. He stood staring around for a moment, then he spun on his heel and walked off the floor.

He went to the locker room, got out of his gym suit and dressed. He was lacing his leathertops when Carlisle came tearing down after him.

"Hey, what do you think you're doing?" Carlisle said. "Get on back up there!"

Ralph said, "I was doing it for fun. It isn't fun ——"

"Well, it's about time you got that through your thick head," Carlisle said. "Hurry up. Get your suit back on."

For answer, Ralph hauled back his foot and kicked the sweaty gym suit as hard as he could, out of sight under the lockers. He walked past Carlisle, went upstairs and out of the building.

Susie was putting bread to rise, working at the kitchen counter, when Ralph came in. She glanced up at him, surprised. "Hi," she greeted him. "You're home early. Practice over?"

Ralph said nothing. He headed for a chair beside the stove, began taking off his leathertops.

Susie turned around, startled. "I suppose it isn't any use to offer you cake and milk," she said, "seeing you're in training. But there's half a layer cake in the pantry."

"Yes, it is," Ralph said. "Darn right it is." He headed for the pantry, reappeared, carrying the cake plate and a full pan of milk. "I've quit the gol-darn ball team," he said. "They can all go fry."

Susie was putting a clean white towel over the bread, setting the pan on the warm shelf back of the stove. "Have you?" she said, and was about to go on when Dorothy appeared at the kitchen door.

"Ralph McIntosh!" Dot said. "You have not!"

Ralph, whose mouth was full, said nothing for the obvious reason.

"Dot!" Susie said. "Now, that's all ——"

But Dot was too shocked and horrified to stop. "Why, you awful, nasty sorehead!" she said. "All you are is sore because you can't go to Boston. You're a quitter! With a capital KW, is all you are. With a capital K ——"

"Dot!" Susie said. "You kids cut this out!"

At that moment the telephone rang, and Susie jerked her head at it. "Answer that, Ralph. Dot, go back to your arithmetic."

Ralph got up. She heard him speaking at the phone.

"Yare, Mr. Berg. . . . There is? . . . Yare, sure. . . . Thanks, Mr. Berg. G'by."

She heard the phone click back into place. Then she was aware of Ralph's presence behind her.

"Well, what did he want?" she asked.

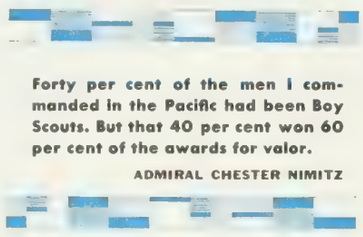
"Says to go out on the back step and look at the northern lights. Says he wants to talk about them in class tomorrow."

Past his immobile shoulder, she saw the square of the kitchen window, with a section of sky, and on the fields the icy, green mysterious light, not moonlight.

"Oh, my goodness!" she said. "Oh, look, Ralphie, isn't that pretty!"

Together they stood on the doorstep, watching the shimmering, shifting reds and yellows, green colder than the depths of ice, creating pale light over the trees and the diminished black roofs of the town.

Ralph said, "Bugsy says, been a terrible explosion on the sun. Geez-Louise! I guess all hell's broke loose in the old ionosphere tonight."



Ralph had quit the team on Thursday. On Friday, at school, he found himself unpopular; most of his friends thought he was a sorehead, and said so. The only person, it seemed, who thought kindly of him at all was Mr. Berg, who, after his lecture on northern lights and magnetic storms, went to some trouble to explain further to Ralph, who had asked a question.

"Now, that's intelligent," Alfred said. "See, what we know, which isn't a whole lot, goes like this." He went into detail about Ralph's question, and remarked, as he finished, "You've got a logical brain, McIntosh."

Ralph was embarrassed, particularly since, out in the corridor after class, a couple of classmates addressed him jocularly as "Old Brainsy."

Debby Parker, however, coming out behind him, stopped him, holding out a paper. "Is this what he meant, Ralph?"

Ralph looked at the diagram. "Well, yes, all but this, right here." He pointed. "I thought it went this way ——" He sketched a light line on the paper.

"Oh, yes, of course," Debby said. "Thanks a lot, Ralphie." She went on her way with a friendly wave of the hand.

Ralph went loping along the corridor and at the door to the locker room bumped into Carlisle and Jerry Mooney, dressed for gym.

Carl grabbed Ralph by the front of the shirt and twisted. "Practice this period," he said. "You be there, or I'll bust you in two."

"Hey," Ralph said. He was big enough to yank Carl's hand out of his shirt front, but the shirt tore and two buttons popped off.

Then Jerry, behind him, pulled his shirttail out. "You heard the man," Jerry said.

"Cut it out!" Ralph said, spinning around; but they were strolling away down the corridor.

Ralph surveyed the damage. That was his good shirt, the one he liked.

He banged into the lavatory. What to do now? Couldn't go to class, have everyone hoot at his shirt, gapped open down the front. Show his underwear. He could put on his jacket, zip it up, and die, sweating, in the warm classroom.

He could, he thought, go to ball practice, wear a gym suit for the rest of the afternoon.

And listen to all the yak. "Well, here's old sorehead back." No, he said to himself, I don't think I will.

He pried up the lavatory window, squeezed through and dropped; then slipped silently and expertly out of sight behind the barberry hedge. Crossing the highway, he got safely into the woods behind the Union church. There was a path he knew which came out in Martin's upper pasture. Up there, he could find something to take up his time till he could go home.

Gee, the woods were nice. No yakking, no trouble. Only trees and bushes that couldn't yak back.

The first thing he saw when he came into the pasture was the wreck of the chestnut. He'd heard the silly talk about why grampa had cut it down. Nuts; those two dopes, Carl and Jerry, they'd had a fight—everybody knew that. Ralph guessed he knew why grampa had cut down that nice old tree. The tree house, he thought, staring moodily at the ruin. Got a day when he felt too mean to live, so he whacked 'er down.

Carl was going to let all that Indian stuff go. When Ralph had mentioned it, he'd said to heck with it, what was the good of it?

The collection had always fascinated Ralph. He had started out collecting Indian things, too, but he'd had to give that up. Carl had made it clear that he wasn't going to have anybody glomming around the shell heaps with a clam hoe; he had emphasized this with a good licking one afternoon, when he had caught Ralph down on Tanner's Island. Of course Tanner's Island was his prize dig.

Ralph stood now, looking speculatively down. That Indian stuff was too good to lose. He went cautiously down the hill, brought back some old bushel baskets.

By dark, he had salvaged the collection; flints packed in one basket, bone tools laid carefully in the other. He hid the baskets in a place he knew behind the grain bins.

Saturday afternoon, after lunch, Ralph wandered about aimlessly downtown. Everywhere he got the same reception. At the poolroom the gang was gathered. Melly Hitchcock looked up, saw Ralph.

"Fine old bull-sorehead you are, quitting Alison at a time like this!"

And someone else: "A day and a half left to practice, and you quit! Boy, that's loyalty!"

At the drugstore it was the same. Ralph had planned to buy himself a banana split, but he got out fast without ordering one.

Heck, Joe Galt and Billy Kinney, the countermen down at Joe's Lunch, were his friends. He'd go down there and have a sandwich and a milk shake.

But as he sidled up to the counter, Joe wouldn't even look at him. Joe said to Billy, "Hey, look who's here. Old John Leprosy."

Ralph's half-apologetic grin of greeting froze on his face. "Hey! What's the matter?"

"You know what's the matter," Joe said sourly. "I don't want to look at you. I don't know as I even want your trade. Well, give your order. I ain't got all day."

Silently he banged Ralph's sandwich down on the counter in front of him.

"Well, hey," Ralph said. Red to the ears, embarrassed, he sat looking at the sandwich.

"Fell down in the gym, by Judas Priest!" Joe said. "I heard the fellas talking in here last night. So you quit! What are you, yeller? Can't you take it?"

"Yare," Ralph said. "I hear you talking. Yare."

Joe turned to Billy. They moved to the other end of the counter.

Ralph slid down from the high counter stool and went out the door.

He came out of the alley into the back yard of the supermarket, which was stacked high with old empty cartons and slippery with mud. He skidded against a pile of boxes, knocking it over, but he did not see it fall, only heard the empty rustle of the corrugated cardboard crushing as it went down.

To hell with it, he thought bitterly. To the lowest, deep-down bottom of the lowest hell there is with it.

Allen's Lane, a back street, led down to the river. He came out on the riverbank at the rear of the tannery, and kept on down the path toward the harbor.

The crisp wind flowed backward against his cheeks. Cold but not cold, half warm from the sun, and smelling of salt from the harbor. It went deep into his lungs, stinging and clean.

The river path was hard and beaten down. Some way below the tannery the river divided, its main channel going on to the west of a small island, Tanner's Island. To the east was Tanner's Brook, which was not a brook at all but a long arm of the sea. Long ago there had been a footbridge across the brook. The woodwork of the bridge was long gone now except for an occasional water-hardened timber. The causeway could still be crossed when the tide was down, though the gap in the middle was a good stiff jump. Ralph crossed it, heading down a field toward the woods.

If he had stopped to look, he would have seen that this was not the best time to go over to Tanner's Island, or, at least, to stay there long, because down at the far end of the brook the flood tide was beginning to come in over the ice. But he made a flying leap toward a fringe of thick bushes and ducked out of sight.

He went along, following an old wood road partially overgrown with alders. Ralph knew Tanner's Island pretty well. When he was a kid, he had spent a lot of time here, and of course it was on Tanner's Island that Carlisle had dug up most of his Indian stuff. The shell heap here was six feet deep and ran two hundred yards back from the shore. The tribes had lived here for thousands of years and had left a lot of their things lying around.

Wandering along, Ralph came out on the bank at the top of the shell mound. He jumped down the bank.

Here was Carlisle's dig, marked off with neat, whittled stakes. At the bottom of the bank the bluish glacial clay was covered with ice, wet with runnels. The ground was frozen, too hard to dig. Of course Ralph didn't mean to dig; it was Carlisle's place. But he could look, couldn't he?

There were layers of ashes, pearl gray, mixed with charcoal; layers of shells; layers of beach gravel. Ralph could count the edges of three fire pits, one built on top of another. That told how old the place was.

Concentrating, Ralph leaned forward a little too far. His feet skidded on the slippery slope, throwing him off balance. Arms flailing wildly, he toppled face first into the bank; then a whole section of the bank, undermined by the thaw and frost, came clattering down on top of him.

For a moment all he could do was sneeze. His nose was full of lime dust and ashes. His shoulder ached a little and his nose was bleeding; otherwise he wasn't damaged.

Cautiously he dug himself out. Quite a chunk had fallen, he saw. Carlisle's careful dig was as if it had never been.

Horrified, Ralph stood looking, mopping at the scratch on his nose. His eyes narrowed suddenly and sharpened. He leaned forward, looking at the cave-in.

One of the fire-pit stones that had fall left a hole, the imprint of itself in blac and pressed down into the place where lain was a triangular piece of flint.

Something, he thought; some kind of He reached into the cavity, poking and until the thing loosened and came away hand.

It was a knife blade, chipped fron green stone flecked with white. It was fully made. Ralph turned the blade his hand. On the back was a diamond carefully chipped in relief.

Hey, the guy marked it! Maybe so would know it was his.

Ralph stepped back a little, staring mound. There might be something else hole. No reason why he couldn't dig n couldn't do Carl's place any more d than he had.

Three hours later, in a hole big enough hold a good-sized bear, Ralph sudden ized that he was cold, that he had hard enough to see. He hauled himself bac into the world, astonished to find th afternoon was gone.

He had a haul. Stuff that, by golly, make Carlisle look up and take notice. H a harpoon made out of the leg bone o big animal; a needle, like a darning only made of bone, and somebody had job, cutting that little tiny eye in it; he h flint arrowheads; and a tin can full of of a broken Indian pot.

Brr-r! It was cold. Thermometer dropped twenty degrees since this afterno

He stowed the small flints in his p The needle, which was fragile, he laid a little block of driftwood, wrapped fully in his handkerchief and buttoned side the breast pocket of his jacket.

Is ma going to flip when she sees thought. His hands and the sleeves jacket were coal black from dirt and ash pants were black, too, and one kne shredded through from kneeling on the Even his boots were full of that black st

Holding the tin can in one hand and bone harpoon in the other, he went bank like a squirrel.

The air was peculiar with a heavy st almost like before a thunderstorm, thou only cloud in the sky was one smal woolly job over in the west, fading fast. head, the sky was a deep blue, ice cold. ing moved. Not a sound.

Ralph trotted across the narrow field

When Ralph didn't come home to Susie didn't worry. She thought he'd g and had gone back to the gym to pr Then, at seven, the phone rang and Alison.

"I wonder if I could get you to help m suade Ralph to come down for these las tice sessions, Mrs. McIntosh. I really d him."

"Why," Susie said, "isn't he there? I th he was. He isn't here, Mr. Alison."

"Oh," Alison said. "I see. Well, than Mrs. McIntosh." He hung up with a and Susie thought, obviously, he had lieved her.

She shrugged a little. Plenty of times hasn't got home before this. He could b where around town. Watching TV, n like Dot, who was over to Mooney's t Mattie Mooney's niece from upstate wa ing over there.

Well, she'd call Mattie. Maybe Dot know where Ralph would be. She dial Mooneys' number.

"Dot?" Mattie said. "Why, she ain't Hez drove her and my niece Paula do the gym to watch the ball practice. He to lodge meeting, said he'd pick them the way home."

"What time will that be?" Susie "Dot has to be home by nine o'clock."

"Oh, does she?" Mattie said. "I don't as I'd count on it. Them little scamps, t just got stars in their eyes over that ball bless their hearts. Just stars in their eye

"I guess they're not the only ones," said.

"No, I guess not. Most of us do valu boys pretty high, though there's so

Homemade Coffee Cake

(Yes, really homemade)

Mixed in seconds...no bowl or pan to wash!

Luscious texture . . . fragrant cinnamon topping . . . and no bowl or pan to wash! The reason? There's a throw-away Mixing Bag and Baking Pan in every box of Aunt Jemima Coffee Cake Easy-Mix! Cinnamon topping, too. Add only egg and milk, blend in the Mixing Bag and bake in the special pan. For Toasted Almond topping, Honey Butter and others, see the recipe insert.

For perfect corn bread, light, non-crumbly, Aunt Jemima Corn Bread Easy-Mix. Comes with mixing bag and baking pan.

For spicy oatmeal bread, fruit or nut breads, Aunt Jemima Oatmeal Bread Easy-Mix. Comes with mixing bag and baking pan.

Aunt Jemima Easy-Mixes

Good boys make good citizens . . . support the Boy Scouts.

Worship together this week

ttie's voice began to drip ice—"there's ne, I guess, who ain't particularly careful ut their life and limb."

"What?" Susie asked.

"I'll tell you right now, Susie McIntosh, it's ut time you had that crazy old man looked o. Hez is some old mad, I can tell you, and erry'd been worse hurt Hez would of sued, d he may yet."

"For heaven's sake," Susie said. "I haven't notion on earth what you're talking about."

"Well, if you don't know, you're the only e in town don't," Mattie said. "And you n tell Mart that it ain't a mite of use his ing to sell aigs to Harry Troy's market, be- use Harry called up today and took every ; we had on the place. And what's more, he t a standing order."

"That makes it nice for you and Hez," sie said. "But I——"

Mattie had not stopped at all. "So the next ne that old snapper-jaw drops trees with uses in 'em on a couple of defenseless ung ones, maybe he'll think before he does "Trees?" Susie said. "Mattie, will you ease make sense?"

Your Contribution

of a new or used blanket or the money for its purchase may mean the difference between life and death for a homeless person on the Tunisian border. There are 250,000 such Algerian refugees in grave need—according to Quaker field workers, long acquainted with the shock of refugee conditions, "the gravest we have ever seen." Gifts should be sent for shipment abroad to

AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE
23rd and Arch Streets
Philadelphia 7, Pennsylvania

But Mattie, having said her say, hung up ith a resounding crash.

Susie also hung up. She hadn't got anyhere at all in the hunt for Ralph.

Susie spent the next half hour telephoning. he called Hazel, but Ralph wasn't there. She alled all of Ralph's friends she could think f—they weren't home, they were down at ne gym.

Susie finally got Joe Galt, down at Joe's unch. "Naw, he ain't here," Joe said. "He as, earlier, but Billy and I tried to talk him nto going back to playing ball, and he went ut of here like a shot out of a gun. You tried he drugstore? Maybe he's up there, cuddled own with a raspb'ry soda."

Susie exploded. "What's the matter with ou? If Ralph doesn't want to play ball, he oesn't have to." She hung up with a snap.

George and Hazel would help. Charles would know what to do.

She put on her winter coat, dressing warmly gainst the cold night. It took a little while to et the engine of Martin's old car to fire, and hen she had to wait while it warmed up. When t last she found she could back up without talling, she swung the car around the turnround and headed down the hill.

Charles and George, at first, were inclined not to take Susie's worry too seriously. It was arly yet, they said comfortingly. Ralph might e home any time.

"He's probably there now," Charles said, getting up from his chair. "Come on, George. We'll drive up behind you, Susie, and see."

But he was not there. The kitchen was empty, the light burning, just as Susie had eft it.

"All right, George," Charles said. "Let's ake a look around."

"I'm going with you," Susie said. "Pa'll stay here by the phone."

For Martin, always a light sleeper, had got dressed and come down. He was in the chair by the stove now, pulling on his felts-and-rubbers.

"Now, don't be a fool," he grunted. "You stay in the house here, where you belong."

For answer Susie turned, marched out the door and climbed into the front seat of Charles' car.

Charles said cheerfully, "Now, Susie, think. You've pretty well checked the town. Where are Ralph's places? Where, outside the town, would he be likely to go?"

Susie tried to think. "Anywhere," she said. "And everywhere. He likes to wander around, poke into old houses."

"Beachcombing," Charles said. "Let's try Avery's Beach."

The beach was easy to explore; the shore road led along, just back from the beach rocks, so that Charles was able to drive its full length.

"Nothing here," Charles said, turning the car around. "You still with us, Susie?"

"Yes, I—I guess I am, Charles."

Unexpectedly, he reached across and patted her on the shoulder. "Take it easy. We'll find him. He's somewhere, that's for sure."

"Yes," she said. "I know. Of course."

Under the thick material of her coat, she could feel a warm spot where Charles' hand had tightened briefly. The spot lingered, seemed to loosen a little the cold lump in her throat.

Charles—Charles would find him. We always go to Charles, she thought. And he always knows what to do.

All that night the entire town hunted for Ralph McIntosh. Over the phone Charles organized search parties, sent them out over the countryside by automobile and on foot.

It was three o'clock before anyone thought of Tanner's Island. It was such an out-of-the-

Spend less time on laundry than ever before!

1960 PHILCO-BENDIX DUOMATIC COMBINATION WASHER-DRYER does everything separate units do... cuts working time in half

Now you can do your laundry faster and easier than ever before — with the new Philco-Bendix Duomatic.

Simply toss in clothes, set the dials, and walk away from washday. No more "washer-watching." No more time wasted lugging soggy wet clothes from one machine to another. The Duomatic washes and dries in as little as an hour, in one continuous operation.

Best of all, this time-saving machine costs less than many washers alone. And look at what you get for your money.

• Compact cabinet only 26¾ inches wide ... fits anywhere a washer will • Flexible controls let you wash only or dry only • Full 8-lb. capacity • Wash 'n' wear cycle • Automatic power soak • Trouble-free performance — proved more dependable than washer and dryer pairs.

No wonder there are more Duomatics in use than all other washer-dryers combined. See your Philco dealer today!

Even adds bleach automatically! Simply load the dispenser before washing. It releases the right amount of bleach at precisely the right time for snow-bright results. Automatically dispenses fabric conditioners, too.

DUOMATIC LIST PRICES START AT $329.95

PHILCO
Famous for Quality the World Over way place; no one in his right mind would ever think of going there in the winter.

"Well, Carlisle used to go there a lot," Susie said. "To dig in the Indian shell heap. Sometimes he'd let Ralph go too."

Charles started the car with a jerk. At the tannery, where the hardtop ended, he turned the car sharply, sent it scrabbling and skidding along the shore path, two wheels on the hard surface of the path, the other two finding what traction they might in the tough grass.

"Holy mussel banks!" George said. "You ain't thinking of driving down here, Charles! You'll bust every spring you've got."

"Somebody has," Charles said.

Certainly, from the dim track in the crushed underbrush, it looked as if a car had been along here.

"Maybe someone had the sense to come down here and check this place first," George said. "Ought to have thought of the shell heap first off."

"Oh, I know," Susie burst out. "I should have! Only they never have come here in the winter and it didn't enter my head."

Her voice had started up and she stopped it, realizing that if she didn't the voice, which didn't sound like her own, would start to scream.

Charles said sharply, "Cut it out, Susie. No one could have —— Hey, look!"

Over on the shore of Tanner's Island, a fire was burning; at least, it had been burning—it was now only a big pile of embers and a thin trail of white smoke.

Charles swore suddenly and jammed on his brakes just in time to avoid hitting the back end of another car, parked on the riverbank.

A familiar back end, Susie saw, as she opened the door and jumped out. It was Martin Hoodless' old car.

"Pa," she said. "What's he doing here?"

Charles put back his head and let out a bawl. "Hey, over on the island! Martin! Ralph!"

There was no answer.

"Martin must be over there," Charles said. "If that's Ralph's fire —— But no, if Ralph had built it, they'd be around there. They must be back in the woods somewhere. George, can we make it across that causeway?"

It was going on for three-thirty in the morning; the tide was rising now, not yet over the causeway, but already beginning to flow in slick-looking coils across the rocks and old timbers running through the gap in a millrace.

George stood looking down glumly; and in the silence Susie heard the louder-growing chuckle of the water.

"I dunno," George said. "I guess so."

"Come on, then," Charles said.

He had fished his cane out of the front seat of the car and started for the causeway.

"And what do you think you'll do," George burst out, "out there on them slippery rocks on that cussed brass leg?"

"I've seen worse," Charles said cheerfully.

"You cussed fool!" George said. He went past, grabbing the cane as he went, leaving Charles teetering precariously at the edge of the bank. "And I'll have you all know," George said, his voice rising as he contemplated the slippery, uncomfortable passage ahead of him, "that I can't swim one stroke."

Gingerly he lowered one foot into the icy water, yanked it out with a yell. Then he proceeded, muttering and stumbling. From the bank, Susie and Charles watched his dim figure advancing slowly across the causeway. Suddenly there came a loud splash as George fell down.

"Oh, Charles," Susie said, "will he be all right? What if he falls off of there?"

"Well, the ducking wouldn't do him any good," Charles said. "But I could pull him out, Susie. He doesn't think so, but I can swim with one leg better than he can with two. As soon as he gets across, we'll go for more help. But I expect we'd better stay here till he makes it." He glanced down at her. "You're shaking all over. Go and sit in the car. I'll put the heater on."

"I'm—I c-can't," Susie said. "I've got to see ——"

"Well come here, then." Charles' arms tightened around her. "Susie," he said, under his breath, and stopped. "Looks as if George had stalled out there." He called, "Hey, George?"

On the causeway George's blurred figure was motionless, and his complaints were silent.

"Hey, George, what's with you?"

"Hey, yourself, and see how you like it!" George's irascible bawl boomed out across the water. "Go git a boat! Don't stand there, git help!"

"What's the matter? You stuck?"

"Yes, I am!"

"O.K." Charles freed himself from his overcoat, draped it around Susie's shoulders. "Get in the car," he said, "before you freeze."

He took a few careful steps along the top of the bank. He had not gone far when, suddenly, he turned and came back.

Charles said, "Susie, your old man's coming. He's got a boat."

"Ralph ——" Susie said through dry lips.

"All I can see is someone moving and the white sides of the boat," Charles said. "But if Ralph was over there, he's probably found him."

Straining her eyes, Susie could make out the vague shimmer in the darkness which was the white punt moving on the water. George, apparently, had seen it, too, for he let go with a hoarse bawl.

"Hey, you with the boat! Get me off o here!"

They saw the boat veer downstream. Ther it turned and circled. They heard the thump and squelch of George's shoes as he jumped down into it, George's voice and Martin's grunted reply.

Susie pulled away from Charles and hall ran, half slid down the bank. She called, "Pa! Is Ralph with you?"

Martin did not answer. He kept on rowing, and then George spoke out of the darkness.

"No, Susie. He ain't found him."

Martin drove the boat onto the narrow beach; it stopped with a jerking crunch. George stepped out to haul up the boat, but Martin was having none of that. He stamped overboard into the shallow water, splashed ashore and started up the bank.

"Where've all you blasted fools been all night?" he demanded.

His familiar bawl was reedy, a little breathless, but he got to the top of the bank before Susie did, and far ahead of George, who came up ponderously, his wet clothes crackling with ice.

"Get into the car, George," Charles said. "Get the heater going. Martin, didn't you find anything over there?"

"Well, I found where the crazy little fool was all day," Martin said. "He's rooted out a hole in them old Indian clamshells big enough to hold a walrus. There was a cave-in over there, but he ain't under it. I moved it."

"You're sure?" Charles said. "We'd better get a crowd over there, hunting ——"

"What do you mean, am I sure?" Martin breathed deep, went on: "What d'you think I've been doing since twelve o'clock when I seen that fire over here? I built it up again. You can round up your sheepherders and hunt over there if you want to. But Ralph ain't there. I found every track he made."

Martin started for his car, staggered, and would have fallen if Charles hadn't caught his arm.

Martin shook him off. He straightened up. "I'm going home. Tomorrow we'll get a crowd to drag that brook. That's all we can do now."

"Get in the car, Susie," Charles said. He helped her, unresisting, into the front seat, got in himself on the driver's side, and backed up so that Martin could get by.

"I've got to get to a phone, get a crowd down here," Charles said steadily. "Your father can't be sure. We've got to get some help."

Numbly Susie saw the lights of Martin's car go jigging erratically up Allen's Lane, ahead of them, turn the corner into Main Street. Yes, Charles was right.

Then George, sitting chattering in the back seat, gave mournful tongue. "Well," he said hollowly, "all in or no all in, you good and well know Mart wouldn't of give up till he was sure. You know, I betcha what he thinks, he thinks that kid fell off the causeway. Tried to get acrost there when the water was too high, same as I did. Charles, that water hole, that's no joke! Another five minutes, I'd been into it myself, and I'd never got out!"

Martin had the kitchen fire roaring when they got there. He had the coffeepot on, and he was sitting with both feet thrust into the oven. He did not look up or speak when they came in.

Charles made a beeline for the telephone.

Susie went about the house collecting dry clothes for George. On the way she looked in on Dot in the small bedroom off the kitchen.

It seemed to her that she was two people, one standing here quietly, making sure that Dot was safely asleep, the other curled into a great numb knot, shaking deep down inside and screaming.

Oh, hurry, George needs these clothes, she told herself; but it took a minute or so before she could make herself move.

She handed the clothes to George, shut him in the living room to change behind the big, hot airtight stove.

As she closed the door to the living room, she heard the tannery whistle start to blow, calling in the search parties. Charles had got

YOU'LL BE PROUD TO SERVE

Kathryn Beich CANDIES...

and even your most important guests will enjoy them because they're more than good. For Kathryn Beich Candies have the matchless flavor that goes hand-in-hand with truly fine quality.

Take GOLDEN CRUMBLES, for instance . . . they're hand-pulled to just the right satiny texture before the delicate nut butter filling is folded in. No wonder each bite is crisp and tender . . . with a distinctive "tastes like more" flavor.

Or if chocolate candy is your favorite, you'll love the taste thrilling combination of fresh pecans, creamy soft caramel and thick, smooth milk chocolate found in KATYDIDS—an old-fashioned "home-kitchen" goodness that is distinctive in all Kathryn Beich Candies.

Kathryn Beich Candies are available only through recognized clubs and organizations, which sell them as a fund raising activity. If a friend or neighbor gives you the opportunity to buy Kathryn Beich Candies, do yourself a favor and stock up with several tins . . . Kathryn Beich Candies make wonderful gifts, you know.

If you are a member of a group interested in fund raising for worthy projects, fill in the coupon below for a full color folder describing the Kathryn Beich fund raising plan and offering you a free sample.

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Kathryn Beich's

Dept. 1170
Bloomington, Illinois

I am interested in fund raising with Kathryn Beich Candies. Please send me complete information.

NAME OF ORGANIZATION _____

SEND TO _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

o the night watchman. In the kitchen as ill at the telephone. Martin was up, in coffee.
o am, Susie thought, glancing mechaniy the table. She had a full pitcher in the ox ut away for breakfast.
he aded for the pantry, snapping on the t e went in. There, on the white enamel ne box door, was a great, sprawly, soot-k ndprint.
he pened the door, reached for the m tcher. It was empty.
he were smudges on the inside of the r o, and somebody had torn great nk out of a cold chicken. More than half w gone—both drumsticks, both second ts.
ut natically, Susie picked up the empty m tcher. She closed the icebox door. She li way across the kitchen before what hi seen hit her squarely, like a blow at he t.
he ve a gasp that was half scream and py the pitcher. It smashed on the floor; sh tore out of the kitchen and through liv g room, not seeing Charles and Mar-sp ing around staring after her.
Wh she did see, upstairs, as she thrust th door of Ralph's bedroom and turned hi ght, was the tremendous bone on the flo —some kind of great, sooty-black anima e, notched into a spear—the pile of kn ed clothes on the floor . . . and on the pi illow the innocent, sweetly sleeping fa h the scratched nose in the middle of fa as a coal.

NATIONAL SOCIETY
D·A·R OBSERVE AMERICAN HISTORY MONTH

a had arrived home at around nine-ju ust before Susie had driven down to H house. He had seen her, sitting at the en the kitchen, and had thought, first re ief and then with resentment, Nobody's ev ome.
Co uld have horrified George to know ho ich water had been running down over ga seway when Ralph had crossed it;
ju to Ralph it hadn't seemed like much of he ordinary—a longer jump than usual, of course he'd landed in water and got wa to the skin. He had run nearly all the wa me; so that outside the window, peer-in t Susie, he wasn't even cold.
Se sees me, how I've racked out these pa she'll cream me for keeps, Ralph th t. I'll go up the piazza post and clean off of this crud in my room and then I'll go do airs and root out some supper.
Ra alph took his Indian harpoon in his an nd shinnied up the piazza post. He sile iptoed along the roof to his bedroom wi w; and he had just laid the harpoon on n the clean white scarf on his bureau he he heard the front door slam. He saw go go along the walk to the garage. He th he car's starter whine and start to slap
Th hen it was out of the yard and rolling th he hill toward town.
Go d; now he wouldn't have to wait to ea up, and it was a lucky thing, because in an r minute he'd be dead, starved to death.
He had a fine meal of chicken, cream and po otatoes, and he found a great wedge of ca ake cake. He drank a pitcher of cream.
Wh hen it didn't seem as if he'd had quite en n; so he went back and tore off another leg m the chicken.
A kitchen clock said nine-forty.
Jo h washed in the laundry. He left the bl lack, the set tub black, and a black in n towel. He found he could not wash ea e; it was too sore. So he washed around
Th en he stole back upstairs, undressed, fe ll into bed. He fell so dead asleep that he ard nothing—not even the commotion do tairs; not even the tannery whistle ni ng.

Shirttail McIntosh went to Boston. The team left by bus Monday afternoon.

At breakfast that day, Martin had delivered a speech. It was school vacation, he said. There was work to do. Among other things, he had that big horse chestnut to cut up. The boys could start on that after they'd helped him load the truck with the weekly orders of eggs and broilers, for downtown.

"You fellers can use my big crosscut saw," he said. "You better get going. That job's going to take a couple of days."

"No, I don't think so," Carlisle said. "I figure about two hours. I know where I can borrow a power saw."

Martin let out a strangled blat. "You know I won't let one of them things onto the place. No, sir, by tar, you get on up there and cut up that tree with a crosscut. A little hefty work ain't going to hurt you one mite."

"O.K.," Carlisle said. He shrugged. "If you don't want it done in a quarter of the time, it's all right with me."

"Trying to get through so's you can go traipsing off again with that ball team, are you?" Martin said. "Well, let me tell you, you ain't."

Carlisle said nothing more. A little later Susie saw him, with Ralph, helping Martin to load the truck.

Of course he's got to go, she thought. I'll have to do something.

The next time she looked out the truck was loaded and Martin was over by the toolshed. She watched him dole out axes and the big crosscut saw to the boys, and then turn toward the house while they trudged up the hill toward the pasture.

She started to say something as Martin came in, but he gave her no chance. He went past her upstairs into his bedroom. On bank morning he always put on his dark-blue Sunday suit and his overcoat.

He came downstairs, went past Susie as if she weren't there, banged the kitchen door,

Make happy meals with Prunes

There's a happy versatility about prunes—they're good so many ways. On cereal for breakfast, in a light shrimp salad or sunny sundae. And they're naturally good for you. Plump, tender, tree-ripened California Prunes are chock-full of natural fruit sugar, vitamins and minerals...all the things that make you feel happy and healthy. Treat your family to prunes often. Your grocer has them in bags, cartons, ready-cooked in jars or cans...and as appetizing prune juice.

SEND FOR YOUR SUNSHINE JAR

Prepare a good supply of tempting, tender California Prunes this new, easy Sunshine Jar way, without cooking. Get your colorful, unbreakable Marlex jar, $2.50 value, for only $1.25 and label from any brand of prunes. Send check or money order to Sunshine Jar, Box 19, San Francisco, Calif. Offer good only in U.S.A.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

J-3

Get that happy feeling with Prunes—the California Wonder-Fruit

CALIFORNIA PRUNE ADVISORY BOARD

banged the truck door and sent the truck roaring out of the yard.

Oh, Susie thought, peace at last. She sat down for a moment and covered her face with her hands. She didn't even hear Charles Kendall's car drive up. The first thing she realized, Charles was standing there in the door.

"Hey, Susie! Oh, come on now. Nothing can be that bad." The next thing she was crying, with her face buried in his coat.

Up in the pasture Carlisle whirled the ax a few times around his head, and sent it flying high in the air in a mighty heave.

He said, "Tell grampa love and kisses," and trotted away across the pasture, ducking out of sight into the alders above the highway that led to town.

Martin enjoyed the bank. He liked looking around at the busy desks behind the grille; he liked the typewriters, the adding machines. The bank said to Martin "order," "responsibility"; serious people taking care of money.

He was turning to leave when Jed Wallace, inside his glass cubicle, came to the door. "How are you, Mart?" Jed said. "Come in for a minute. I notice you get down here once a month, regular's a clock."

"I'm making out," Martin said.

"That's good. That's what we like. Well, you're busy making it, Mart. I'm busy keeping it for you. Are you folks planning on Carlisle's going to college?"

Martin glanced at him. "Susie's talking of it," he said.

"Well, the reason I ask, there'll be some athletic scholarships coming through for outstanding youngsters. No reason why Carlisle shouldn't have one. Costs, to keep a boy in college nowadays. Around fifteen, sixteen hundred a year."

"Mgh," Martin grunted. "Who's giving away that much, free?"

"Well, I'm glad you asked that, Mart. You know, when you and I was kids, we had to flivver along, best we could. Most of us didn't get nowheres near where we wanted to go. Right?"

Martin nodded. He said nothing.

"Had to work so doggoned hard, never did get a chance at schooling. Times have changed. It's got back to me that you're kind of set against the sports program up at the school. It's got me to wondering if you realize just what being an outstanding athlete can do for a boy."

"I know what it's done for Carlisle," Martin said. "It's made a fool out of him."

"Oh, now, Mart, wait." Jed held up his hand. "Hear me out. I know you think ball's nothing but a game, and by cracky, you're right. It is nothing but a game. But there's a little more to it, if you stop to think. A good ball team, now, that's a healthy thing for a town. Mart, the season's almost over. Carlisle's done a good job. Why not relax, let him finish it out? Couldn't do no harm, could it?"

"Let him go to Boston? Look here, Jed, is that what this is all about?"

"Now, Mart, don't get me wrong. I'm not after one single, solitary thing. But just for your own good, there's a lot around town don't feel the same way I do. Quite a head of steam backs up behind these ball games. Take, well, take Harry Troy. He's nuts about the team. His boy's on it. He takes eggs of you, doesn't he? For the supermarket?"

"Always has.'

"Well, try and sell him some this morning. You can't buck a whole town without coming out black and blue. If you bust up that ball team, people won't buy any more eggs."

"Have they gone crazy? Grown men!"

"That's right. And grown women—the women's worse'n the men. They've got this story going about you. No man in his right mind would ever believe that you cut down a tree, let it fall on a couple of kids, on purpose."

Martin stared at him. "What's that you say?"

"Ah-h, nobody really believes it. But, honest, Mart, if I was you I'd let that kid go to Boston. If you don't, and the team loses, you'll lose every atom of town trade you've got."

"Why, I cut down a tree," Martin said. "Wasn't no kids around, only Carlisle and the Mooney boy. They was over in the field having a fight. That tree never fell near enough to them to make a towse over. Never come nowheres near 'em."

"Well, you know gossip."

"By tar, somebody made that yarn up!" Martin rose to his feet. "I'll take a hoe handle to Carlisle, and to that Jerry too."

"Don't do it, Mart. Kids'll fib. It's in their nature. Carlisle just wants to go to Boston."

"Well, let him go to Boston, all I care. I don't care what he does, if that's the kind of ——" Martin stopped. His shrewd eyes focused on Jed. "How much have you got bet on that ball game?"

"Shoot, Mart. Just friendly advice, that's all. Don't get all haired up over a kid's towse."

"And, by tar, that's just what it is, too, the whole cussed works of it. Carlisle's seventeen, but kids don't grow up so fast, I guess, as they used to. And some of them, by tar," Martin said, glaring at Jed, "some of them never do!"

He started for the door. Jed, leaning forward to look out the bank's plate-glass window, watched him go down the steps, get into his truck.

Up at the farm Martin changed into overalls, went out to the henhouses to get through his work for the day. He left his truck standing in the barnyard; didn't even bother to unload. Nobody wanted his eggs, let them sit there and rot.

Martin grabbed a sack of grain, heaved it furiously off the floor of the henhouse. He carried the sack and upended it over a feeder. Dust from the grain rose in a cloud. He felt it settle dryly on his hands and face, tasted it as it ran down onto his lips with his sweat.

The hens came edging closer to him. They formed a circle, cackling over this big event of their day. One of them, a brash young red pullet, came mincing out to the feeder to grab a mouthful and Martin flapped his elbows to scare her out from underfoot. He was starting to fold the sack when he noticed her again. Standing there, head cocked to one side, she was looking at him in a you-go-to-blazes kind of way.

By tar! One thing more was too much.

Martin should have known better, but he wadded up the empty sack and let it fly. It unfolded and came down over the pullet like a tent. She let out a shriek.

The rest of the hens, seeing this animated, unfamiliar object, the sack bobbling upright as if by itself along the floor, exploded into panic. For a moment Martin stood in a gale of feathers, legs and squawking, wide-open beaks.

Whatever had got into him? The cussed things would kill each other—he could count on half a dozen dead hens for sure, ten or twelve dollars' worth, by the time they got settled. All these years he'd raised hens, didn't know any better than to pull a fool stunt like that in a jam-packed broiler house. And now, for the next three weeks, every time he went through the door they'd go up in the air; like as not kill two-three more, every time they did it.

He'd have to let Ralph tend this particular house for a while. Ralph had a good way with hens.

Martin went out past the barn and hollered, "Hey, Ralph!" but his voice seemed hoarse and rusty. Hen dust had got into his lungs. He'd have to walk all the way up there.

But there was nobody up in the pasture when he got there. The two axes leaned against the trunk of the chestnut; one end of the big crosscut blade was buried a little more than its width in the tree, it had been left dangling there.

Martin did not make a sound. He had stopped dead still. Then moving, it almost seemed, casually, he went over and laid his hand on the saw. Jammed tight, it was. The cut had been started crooked.

He picked up an ax, and with a few careful strokes hewed out chunks of wood on either side of the blade, freeing the saw. Then with the axes in one hand, the saw over his shoulder, he went back down the hill.

Darned if he didn't feel kind of sick. Well, he had better snap out of it. There was too much to do around here. He hung the tools in the shed, got the handcart and wheeled it slowly toward the barn. Have to finish feeding the hens.

It was warm in the barn. Sunlight poured through the windows, fell across the brown planks of the floor. The two heavy work horses and the three cows stood peaceably in their stalls; Betsy, the barn cat, slept curled in a corner on a few wisps of hay.

Martin came to a full stop, realizing suddenly that the place where Betsy was sleeping was where the day's supply of hay for the stock should be, and there wasn't any. Ralph was supposed to do that, fork down that hay out of the loft. Well, the old man would have to.

Stiffly, he climbed the ladder into the hayloft. He drove his fork into the fragrant stuff, pitched a huge mound over the edge of the loft.

Martin pitched down a lot of hay. The idea was to show Ralph how much was enough, just in case he thought he could get away with a few wisps. His fork struck something hard and slippery, buried in the hay. He jabbed again and felt the thing slide away under the tines. A big, round leather ball shot suddenly into the air, struck a rafter and fell to the barn floor.

By tar! Even in your own barn, you couldn't get away from it. Martin sat down, suddenly, in the hay.

He came to, with a start, to hear Susie somewhere, hollering dinner. What was the matter with her? It wasn't near dinnertime yet.

Here he was, lying down in the hay . . . been so cussed tired he'd just slid down here and had a nap . . . maybe it was dinnertime . . . he wasn't hungry.

His mind took up suddenly where it had left off.

Well, let 'em . . . he was sick of it. . . . Let 'em do what they wanted to, the whole kit and kaboodle ——

"Don't pull that 'insecure' stuff on me. You're an ornery little brat, and you'll get on the ball or else, understand?"

Susie, coming into the barn, saw hi
ing slowly down the hayloft ladder. S
"For heaven's sake, pa, is that where been? I've hunted the place over."

But Martin just walked by her a hadn't been there.

"Pa!" she called after him, hust catch up as he crossed the barnyard come straight in and have some dinn after that you're going to rest! This is ishness, after that awful time you had day night ——"

Martin kept on across the yard to hi
At the truck, he turned and stared at h moment. "That'll be the day," he said,
I slow down in the daylight."

With some effort, he got into the started the engine, and drove off do road toward town.

Well, I guess he must be all right, she t doubtfully. There had been plenty o times when rage had made him white face; and today he had reason. *He mu that the boys aren't up in the pasture.
he found out downtown that Carlisle's Boston.*

Ralph had come in, wall-eyed with
He had tried to use grampa's big saw and got it stuck in the tree. Susie, seein put her arms around him and let him cry her. He was worn out, apparently gettin kind of delayed reaction from Saturday
Susie sent him upstairs to bed.

At two Ralph got up, feeling fine. He warmed-over dinner, and then went ou barn. A little later Susie saw him w handcart loaded high with grain sacks, for the far chicken house to fill feeder

Around four she heard Martin's truck back. She saw from the window that somebody with him. A big man, carr suitcase.

In a moment Martin came throu door. The stranger, she saw, was going t the barn.

"That's Melvin Hitchcock," Martin
"I've hired Melly to help me here on the and I want you to move Carlisle's things
the kitchen chamber."

"What?" Susie said. The thing was expected that it took the wind right out sails. "Move Carlisle's things? Wh for?"

"So's Melly'll have a warm place to s

"Oh, pa!" Susie said. "What do you to be this way for? If you've hired some it's a good thing. You ought to have d months ago." She stopped. Martin was right on, out the door, not listening. " do you suggest I move Carlisle's things to asked.

"I don't care. Throw 'em out the wi Put him in the spare room. That's the
for a boarder."

Inside, Susie felt fury starting to boil kitchen chamber had been Carlisle's since he'd been a little boy. The accumu of his things would take hours to move the spare room had been unheated, u all winter.

"And you can keep your kids away
my barn and henhouses," Martin said.
all their traps and trash and their baske
I won't have 'em around. I don't need
They don't need me."

He went out, shutting the door with a which was just short of a slam.

All right, Susie said to herself. *That d
I've had it.*

Down at the motel Susie had been comed with open arms. To have her an kids with them was what Hazel and G had always wanted. They loved Susie and had no children of their own.

Hazel listened to Susie's distraught with a grim face. "He's our own father said. "And I hate to admit it, but not o us but was glad to get out of there. Don honey, we all did the best we could."

"I feel so mean," Susie sobbed. "He's Hazel."

"I know he's old," Hazel said. "But don't you forget that, Susie. He's able he's got money enough to buy and sell u
Let him hire what he's always talking ab

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

This sheet was washed in blue Cheer*

*If you want your sheets . . . your wash . . . this white, Cheer is for you.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 110

a good strong woman who'll never go outside the kitchen, nor want to."

"He's done so much for the boys and me—he's got an awful lot on his side ——"

Hazel got up, put her arms around Susie. "George and I are going up there and make sure pa's all right," she said. "If he wants a housekeeper, we'll hire him one. You and the kids are staying here with us from now on."

"I don't know what to do—I can't just plunk in here on you with my whole family. And Charles ——"

"You good and well know you'll be a godsend. We're always desperate for help here at the motel. And as for Charles"—Hazel gave her a straight look—"Charles'll be delighted, and you know it."

Charles was. At suppertime he beamed around at them all. "Well," he said. "George, take a look at my family. Set fire, I've done pretty well for a single man."

The bus bringing the team home from Boston pulled into town at four-thirty in the morning. It stopped at the embankment by Martin Hoodless' pasture to let off Carlisle and Jerry Mooney, and then went grinding on down the hill.

Carlisle glanced after it, thinking, I'm some glad to see the last of that.

He heard a scrunch on the embankment as Jerry went up, the click of bare alder branches as he pushed through and out of sight, not saying anything, not even "So long."

All right. Alison hadn't so much as lifted a hand to him, either, when he'd got off the bus. Carlisle looked wearily at the steep embankment. Heck, it looked a mile high. His knee ached; the Novocain which had got him through that last game had worn off. The ache had kept him awake, tuning up like a toothache as the night wore on.

Carrying his suitcase, he scrabbled up the bank, sideways like a crab, favoring his knee.

Gray light was beginning to filter over the pasture, over a dusting of new snow through which old grass showed in patches. Over at the house he could see smoke from the chimney. Grampa's breakfast fire. And there was a light in the kitchen.

He eased carefully down the hill, climbed through the fence by the barnyard. The henhouses were waking up too. He could hear an occasional cut-cut; in the cockerel house a young rooster let go with the hoarse, adolescent craw-aw-kk.

Carlisle opened the back-entry door, set his suitcase down. He stepped into the lighted kitchen.

Grampa and some man were sitting at the table over plates loaded with ham and eggs, baked beans, fried potatoes. The sink was piled with dirty dishes.

For a moment, Carlisle could only stare around at the wreck of his mother's neat kitchen.

Martin turned around with a jerk. "What you want?"

"What?" Carlisle said. "Why, I guess I want mostly to go to bed, grampa."

"Not here, you don't go to bed," Martin said. "You ain't got any bed in my house."

He turned back to his breakfast, shoveled in a big forkful and began chewing.

Carlisle stared at Martin's back—the shoulders, angular, set with the stubborn slope of age, the broad, flat planes of the shoulder blades showing through the blue work shirt.

"Well?" Martin demanded. "What are you hanging around for? Take off, I said."

"But where? Where to?"

"What do I care, where to? Melly, why don't you shove that coffeepot back a little? The coffee's done."

The other man got up, and Carlisle realized that he was Melly Hitchcock, whom he knew as a kind of hanger-on at the poolroom downtown.

"All right," Carlisle said. "I'll go up and tell ma I'm back Then I'll shove."

He took a step. Martin pushed back his chair with a scrape. "You want to talk to your mother, go where she is. She ain't here."

Carlisle's head cleared. He could almost hear the click. The old devil. So he couldn't have his own way, he took it out on ma. Well, if she was gone, she'd be down with Aunt Hazel, she and Ralph and Dot. He went out, grabbing up his suitcase, slammed the door and started across the yard.

Tonight Ellen had a music lesson to give. She should be finished by now, Alfred thought, but he saw that a car was parked in front of the salt box.

It was no music pupil's car, he realized, taking a closer look. It was Chet Alison's. He had not seen much of Alison since his return from Boston. The ballplayers were all back in their classes, trying to make up lost work. Chet was not much in evidence around the school.

All seasons come to an end, Alfred thought, punching Ellen's doorbell. Nobody came, but the front door was seldom locked. He pushed it open and went in. He called, "Hi, Ellen, are you here?" before he saw the tableau in the living room: Ellen backed against the wall; Chet, one hand braced on either side of her, holding her there.

"Oh, Al!" Ellen said. "Come in!"

At the sound of her voice, relieved, near-hysterical, Alfred felt his neck bristle. "What the ——" he began and Chet spun around.

"What's the idea busting in here?" he demanded.

Alfred moved forward. "I bust in here quite often," he said, and stopped, staring in consternation and unbelief. Ellen's hair was rumpled, her dress torn. She was looking back at him with a kind of desperate humiliation

Let us dream. We begin with dreams, we end with dreams; and when dreams are no more we shall be animals again. WILL DURANT

Chet had stepped back. He was regarding them both with amusement. "You've got no kick coming," he said to Ellen. "You've been stringing me along all winter."

"I have not!" Ellen said. "You've no right—you had no reason to think ——"

"Uh-huh. So when I think a gal would like to stop playing footsie and have a little bit of the real, I try a little bit of the real," Chet said. "So you don't like it. Is that my fault?"

"Beat it," Alfred said. "Get out of here!" And he hauled back his fist and let go, and knocked Chet flat.

Chet landed on his back; he seemed to bounce. He advanced on Alfred, fists cocked, poised on the balls of his feet.

Alfred saw Chet's punch coming. It smacked against his jaw with a solid, meaty thwack, and Alfred went over backward, an almost complete somersault.

"Come on," Chet said. "Get up!"

Alfred scrambled to his feet. Chet's second blow steamed past his guard, landed in the same place on his jaw, only this time Alfred's reflexes functioned. His head jerked aside a little; the blow glanced, so that this time he was knocked down but not out.

He shook his head to clear it, working his jaw painfully to right and left.

This is, obviously, a shellacking, Alfred told himself. What I need is a club. He got up; but this time he could not even lift his fists.

He had been lying on the floor, he thought, for a long time, probably two weeks; because it would surely take two weeks for his head to swell to such an enormous size.

Someone slipped a hand under his head.

"Don't do that." Alfred said "Don't touch it. it's ——" There was no word to say what his head was. He opened his eyes. "I didn't see red " he said. "I saw blue. Eggheads see blue."

"Yes," Ellen said. "Oh, darling, are you all right?"

"It's just a matter." Alfred said, "of being an all-round guy. I don't know his specialty any more than he knows mine " He lifted his hand and felt gingerly along the edge of his jaw. "Ooh! What a wallop! From most things, I could probably protect you. From brute force, it doesn't look as if —— No. But will you marry me?"

Susie McIntosh had found it wonderful to live for the first time in a relaxed, happy household. She couldn't get used to being paid for doing work she enjoyed, and which seemed like child's play, for Charles' house had modern appliances; the equipment in the motel was up to date. Susie was feeling wonderfully at home, settled in, when the real trouble began with Carlisle's knee.

It had, seemingly, got better; at least he had stopped limping when one night she woke up to hear someone prowling around in the bathroom. She got up to see what the matter was.

"Ma, haven't we got any aspirin?" Carlisle asked. "My knee's giving me the devil."

Susie found the aspirin for him. But next morning the knee was puffy and red, and Susie made him stay in bed.

"I think he ought to have the doctor," she said, with concern, at the breakfast table. "I expect I'd better call Wickham."

Wickham turned out to be away. A medical conference, his wife said. He wouldn't be back for a week.

While Susie was putting on compresses, Charles strolled in. He kidded Carlisle along, sat by the bed cheerfully, but later when Susie came down to the kitchen he said, "Look, I don't think we ought to fool around with that knee. You pack a couple of grips for us, and Carlisle and I'll take a run down to the city to the clinic."

Susie stared at him. "You think ——"

"I don't think or know. But we mustn't sit around waiting for Wickham. Carlisle can travel now; if he gets worse, he won't be able to."

Susie hesitated no longer. She flew to pack suitcases: and after the two had driven off, she suddenly remembered that she hadn't even thanked Charles for his kindness.

Charles wrote to say they had arrived safely. A day later he telephoned. Carlisle was in the clinic hospital. The knee was infected. The doctors expected that antibiotics would arrest the infection, but they also said there'd been an injury to the knee, inside the joint. As soon as the infection was cleared up, they would have to operate. He would stay, Charles said. If Susie felt she wanted to come, then she must come.

Susie took the first train to Boston. Charles met her at the station. There was no question of his leaving her here alone, he said; he would stay.

A week later while she waited at the hospital for Carlisle's operation to be over, she was glad he had. She didn't know what she would have done without him.

He hadn't let her be by herself, to worry—outside of visiting hours at the hospital, he'd had plans for every day and evening. The first day Charles had asked if she'd come with him to help pick out a new suit.

"I need one," he said. "I've always been kind of a fool about such things. Left alone, I'm likely to pick me out a purple tweed."

Mildly surprised, because she had never seen much wrong with his quiet, conservative suits, Susie went; and, sure enough, his choice was unerring. He went to a tailor shop where it was obvious he had been before and concluded the whole business in twenty minutes.

"There," he said, emerging from a dressing room. "That's over. Now I'll do the same for you. You can't come to the city and not buy new clothes, can you?" He grinned.

"Oh, Charles, I mustn't. I can't afford it," she told him.

"You can't afford not to, at a time like this," he said. "A time like this is when. Come on. I know a good place."

In a new dark-blue suit, white ruffled blouse, new shoes and a foolish hat, Susie did the town with Charles. She had hesitated over the hat. It was expensive—far too much, she thought, for such a silly thing; but Charles made up her mind for her. He took one look and let out a delighted bawl.

"That's great, Susie! Buy it."

"But it's so high ——"

"High, nothing! You look like that in a hat, you've got to have it! Here, how much?" he said to the salesgirl. And he pulled out h wallet, paid for the hat, and hauled Susie ou of the shop.

She protested until Charles came to a sto in the middle of the hurrying crowd. "I use to bring you fancy chocolates," he said. "An valentines. Once I brought you a live frog."

Susie laughed. "You were ten years old You handed over that frog as if it were treasure."

"It was a treasure," Charles said. "To me, was. Right now, I'm fresh out of frogs." H sobered suddenly. "I've got a gall," he sai shortly, glancing away. "But keep it, Susie Let's go places."

Oh, dear, Susie thought as she walked alon beside him. He must know that she couldn accept an expensive present from him; ye obviously something about her refusal ha hurt him deeply. His eyes, for a moment, ha looked bleak; his voice had carried an under tone that sounded forlorn. Well, I'm not go ing to have that, she thought.

She said aloud, "Thank you for the hat Charles. I'll make it up to you this summer a the motel."

"Be sure you do," he said.

He was quieter than usual for a while. Then he seemed to forget all about it as they went here and there, seeing the sights in the old brown town.

Susie thought that the sight of her new clothes might cheer Carlisle up; she tried t interest him with stories of what she an Charles had been doing and seeing. When h seemed not to care, she remembered wha Charles had said about shots—maybe th medicine they were giving him was makin him feel fuzzy. The infection was clearing up the doctors were pleased about that. It ha been a strenuous treatment, they said.

"Would you rather I didn't talk?" she asked one evening. "Shall I just go away and let you sleep?"

"Oh, sure," Carlisle said. "Go on away, i you want to, ma. Have fun."

"Oh, hey," Susie said. "What does tha mean, honey?" She leaned down and kissed him. "I'm just killing time, you know that. I'm not really having fun."

"Uh-huh," Carlisle said.

Now, waiting for the operation to be over she kept wondering about him; what wa going on in his mind.

"Take it easy, Susie," Charles said. He smiled at her.

"Oh, Charles!" Susie burst out. "Wha will I ever do if he's lame? I don't think could stand it if ——"

"You could stand it," Charles said. "And so could he."

Something in his voice—an abruptness no usual with him—made Susie glance at him startled. Suddenly she realized what she had said, and to whom. For years she hadn't thought about Charles' injury. He kept it concealed too well, most of the time.

"Oh, Charles," she said. She felt her voice thicken a little, and paused until she could be sure it was steady. "I'm so buried up in my own troubles."

Charles grinned. "It's all right, Susie. I've had this gimp a good long time. A gimp is something you learn to live with as soon as it gets home to you that you've got to."

"People are so—I'm so ——"

"No you aren't. Half the time I forget about it myself, unless I run afoul of one of those blasted chairs or something." He stopped, then went on, his voice deepening. "I get by," he said. "I miss out on some things, like I've always felt it would be an imposition to ask a woman to marry me. Couldn't help wondering how she'd feel, seeing me take this contraption off every night before I could get into bed."

"Why, Charles!" Susie stared at him. "Any woman—any woman would be lucky."

"Would you?" Charles said. He did not turn around. "Would you feel lucky, Susie?"

"Yes, I would," Susie said. "Why, Charles, I'd—I'd marry you tomorrow, if only you would ever ask me."

She stopped, flushing red, appalled at herself; but thinking as he came toward her that

CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

"PUPPY PRINT" PLAY PAJAMA SET. Azure blue yellow. S M L $3.00

P...is for Pleep

which means being able to play and sleep in my Carter's play pajama! Mother says my play pajama is made of soft cotton knit terry, and it goes in and out of the washer and dryer and never needs to be ironed! It's full-cut to give me plenty of room—has elasticized openings for easy dressing, too. That's why Mother thinks P is for Perfectly-wonderful-Carter's-knits-that-are-so-good-to-give-and-get-as-gifts!

INFANTS' SACQUE SET
Plasticized pant, snap-fastened front. Azure, pink or yellow rosebuds. Layette size. $2.50

INFANTS' CREEPER
Nevabind sleeves, plasticized pant with snap fastened crotch. Blue, red or yellow. Sizes 6 mos. 2 yrs. $3.00

LACE-TRIMMED PANTI-DRESS SET
Nevabind sleeves, plastic lined matching pant. Azure, pink or yellow. Sizes 6 mos. 2 yrs. $3.00.

Carter's
THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS

Tek®

2 FOR 1 SALE

A $1.38 TEK VALUE ONLY 69¢

Get TWO Tek 69¢ deluxe tooth-brushes for the price of ONE!

Luxury quality Tek deluxe toothbrushes. Dentist-designed to clean your teeth thoroughly. Finest all-nylon bristles. Choose the firmness, shape and color you like best. Look for special twin-pack at your dealers. Stock up while they last—and save!

Tek deluxe toothbrushes in special twin pack everything was all right; there was no doubt of that.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112

"Susie," he said huskily. "After all this time." And a little later, lifting his lips from hers, "Not tomorrow, honey. As soon as we know, as soon as we find out how the youngster is. This afternoon."

The operating surgeon, coming in after Carlisle's operation, explained that he had removed some tabs of dislodged cartilage and repaired as much of the damage as he could. Carlisle would be in the hospital for a while for healing and manipulative treatment. As to whether the knee joint would be permanently stiff, they would have to wait and see.

The first of June was lilac time. Around the houses, in farmyards, the perennial bushes bloomed, sending forth perfume on the crisp spring wind. At the school boys and girls brought in great armloads of bloom to decorate the gym for graduation exercises. Final exams were finished. Everyone, it seemed, was going to graduate—if not with flying colors, at least graduate.

For days everybody had known about the athletic scholarships which were to be handed out officially on graduation night. To Jerry Mooney, of course—it went without saying; Joel Troy had one; and Dr. Wickham's boy, Dick. But not Carlisle McIntosh, who was back now from the Boston clinic, and seen occasionally around town on crutches.

Carlisle had been at the gym all day, not so much helping as waiting around for Debby. He had started out with the others, but the work of putting up the decorations was mostly on stepladders; fellows with two sound legs kept going ahead. past him, and doing it. By lunchtime he was sulky and sick of the whole thing.

Every time you went out or into the gym, you passed by the glass-enclosed cases where the basketball trophies were kept. There were quite a lot of small ones—area and regional awards—but only two big silver basketballs, the awards for the state championships, 1947 and this year. Carlisle paused by the case.

Quite a few photographs had been set among the trophies—group pictures of teams, shots of individual players. They were clear, dramatic pictures. There was one that was a honey, of the monumental pile-up of Boone players and himself, on the night when he'd first hurt his knee.

"Look at that!" people had said, peering in at this photo. "Isn't that awful, the way they tried to cripple him!"

Nobody thought about it now; or if people did, all they remembered when they saw you gimping around was that you'd lost their game for them, lost their money. Half the time they just looked away when they saw you coming. So all right, so nobody gave a hoot.

Ma, in Boston. When you'd think that the least she could do was worry some, what did she do? Tooted off all over town, bought new clothes. Made a fine use of the occasion to get herself married to Charles Kendall.

Oh, it was all right with him if she got married. Charles was a nice guy. But it just went to show. A guy's whole life was shot.

Since he'd got back, he couldn't even get right with Debby. She seemed to think he could do different.

Do something, she said.

Didn't say much, but you could tell she was blaming you all the time. Work, she said. Dig into the books, honey. We'll go to college together next fall if only you'll try to catch up. College! Who wanted that egghead stuff now?

He stood leaning against the glass showcase, staring in.

No mo- ball. No more ball, forever. Because if his knee ever did heal so it wouldn't be stiff, what kind of condition could he keep himself in, how could he ever get back what he'd had? To hell with it. A bum.

He heard a noise behind him, spun around. The fellow who had come into the building from the front door was nobody he'd ever seen before. He was a tall, sloppy young man, in old khaki pants and a black leather jacket, bareheaded, so that you could see how the hair had receded a little from his temples. A middle-aged guy. Thirty, anyway. He had a potbelly, and he wore a pair of old, beat-up basketball shoes.

Carlisle turned and had started to move away when the newcomer spoke.

"Well, well," he said softly. "Whaddya know!"

"What?" Carlisle said. "Did you say something?"

"Yare. I had a bet on, with myself. I lost."

"A bet?"

The fellow said no more for a moment. He stood looking into the case. Then he went on, "I bet they'd yank my pictures out of here. They didn't, they left 'em in. Whaddya know?"

Carlisle came back. He looked at the fellow curiously. "Pictures?" he asked.

"Sure. Them photos, there. That one." He laid a finger on the glass, pointing. "And drill my name off of that silver ball. You can tell it around town, so the women can lock their doors and keep the kids off the streets. Art Grindle. I just got home."

Carlisle turned red, aware that he had been caught staring. He swallowed with embarrassment. What did you say to a m just out of jail?

"Oh," he managed feebly. "Well. Hi."

Grindle looked at him. "Don't bust a gu set, kid," he said. "Hey, you're McIntos Old Shirttail."

"Yare," Carlisle said. "Yare, I am."

"What's with the crutches? How'd you g hurt?"

"Bad knee."

"In a game?"

"Uh-huh."

"Was that what ailed you that last game Boston?"

Carlisle stared. "How did you get to — He stopped.

Grindle shrugged. "They got all kinds lu uries down in the pokey," he said. "T newspapers. That Boone game, I got pretty e cited. You went on a whingding, made sor of the handsomest shots I ever saw. And the down in Boston ——"

"Don't tell me, let me guess. You'd nev know I was the same guy."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

Other views of Vogue Patterns on pages 86 and 87:

EASY TO MAKE

GEM OF A WARDROBE

Vogue Design No. 9939. "Easy to Make" coat; 10–20 (31–40). $1.00. Version shown requires 3 yards of 54" fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9941. "Easy to Make" two-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c. Version shown requires 4 yards of 45" fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9800. "Very Easy to Make" jacket; 10–16 (31–36). 60c. Version shown requires 1¾ yards of 54" fabric without nap, size 14.

Vogue Design No. 9866. "Very Easy to Make" skirt and stole; 24–30 waist measure. 75c. Version shown requires 2⅜ yards of 54" fabric with or without nap, size 26 waist.

Vogue Design No. 9940. "Easy to Make" one-piece dress and jacket; 10–18 (31–38). 75c. Version shown requires 2⅞ yards of 39" fabric without nap for dress and jacket bands and 1⅜ yards of 54" fabric without nap for jacket, size 14.

How new BAN guards against "nervous perspiration"

What causes perspiration?

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension more offensive than the odor caused by physical exercise?

Do deodorants have to irritate the skin?

BAN's lotion formula is gentle enough for the softest feminine skin.

Read the facts about a remarkable new deodorant—called BAN® —that stops odor all day—and is gentle to your skin, besides.

What causes perspiration?

Medical science recognizes two different types of perspiration.

1. Thermal perspiration: This is caused by heat or exercise—and comes from relatively small, widely distributed glands.

2. Nervous perspiration: This is caused by emotional or nervous tension. And it comes primarily from larger, more powerful glands concentrated in the underarm area.

Why is the odor caused by nervous tension so offensive?

These larger, more powerful glands that cause nervous perspiration are constantly building up secretions that "spill over" at the slightest provocation of everyday anxiety.

Getting the kids off to school—hearing the baby cry suddenly—being caught in a traffic jam. Any of these common situations can trigger nervous perspiration.

And nervous perspiration produces even more offensive odor than the hardest physical exercise!

How does new BAN guard against nervous perspiration?

Amazing Ban contains 22% more protective ingredients than the average deodorant. Ban protects against perspiration caused by heat, and by exercise, and by nervous tension.

Ban helps keep underarms dry. Stops odor all day—even the offensive odor caused by nervous tension.

Do deodorants have to irritate the skin?

Many women feel that deodorants have to be harsh and irritating in order to be effective. This is simply not true. They don't. In fact, one of the ingredients in Ban is akin to the body's own soothing oils and emollients. Ban is gentle to all types of normal skin.

Today there are no less than forty-seven deodorants that look something like Ban—that have tried to copy its unique roll-on design. But Ban is still far and away the deodorant most Americans trust. No other deodorant has duplicated the formula of Ban.

You can purchase Ban at drug stores, most food, variety and department stores.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 114

Grindle nodded. "An off night," he said. "I knew it! The same as us, the year we went down. This town! I'd like to see it burned down." He swallowed as if he had a lump in his throat. "Don't think I'm here to stay. I wouldn't die here, for fear somebody might find me dead in this place."

He swung around, flinging out a hand, thrusting his face forward. Carlisle got a whiff of his breath, foul with old whisky smell; the bared strong teeth were yellow and two of the front ones were missing.

Grindle jerked a thumb at his crutches. "So you're lame," he said. "Give your all. Like me." He turned back to the showcase again. "When that picture was taken, my whole foot was numb. I still got a couple toes ain't right. But did I care? I still never wanted to do a thing but play ball."

"People always said you were good enough for the pros," Carlisle said.

"Do they now?" Grindle said. "Why, if you want to know, I wasn't, not in a million years. I beat myself out, the whole summer after I graduated. The pros, they're college grads mostly, and all about seven feet tall. I couldn't pass exams for college on what I learned in this joint, and they weren't so free with their scholarships then. Pop said he'd send me a year to prep school. I never even knew enough for prep school. I got bounced out after half a term.

"So I come home," Grindle went on. "I hung around and played on the town team, but pop wouldn't stand for me doing nothing, said I better enlist. I was planning to leave the next day, and that night I had pop's car and a date in Fairport, the last chance I had to say good-by to my girl. Only no gas. And no dough, because pop was sore over my using the car so much. Feller in the gas station wouldn't trust me. He knew pop was good for it. He give me the ripe old bull about what bums all us young kids was. So I blew. I out of the car and let him have it, knocked him down. I never slugged the guy with a club, the way they said I did. Only my fist. He must've hit his head when he fell, because I just socked him on the nose. Just once. You know, they tried to shove me as far as they could see me go, but they couldn't make first degree stick, so I got manslaughter. I was a good boy in jail, settled down and learned to be a first-class mechanic."

"Oh," Carlisle said. "That's how it happened."

His mouth felt dry. He ran his tongue over his lips, trying to moisten them.

"Well, that's my side of it," Grindle said. "If you believe it, you're the first one ever did."

He turned and went down the corridor, his feet making a slight shuffling sound on the hard tile floor. The revolving door swung behind him; the sloping shoulders in the battered jacket passed out of sight down the steps.

Left alone, Carlisle stood by the trophy case. That Grindle, he thought. So he's what happened to the basketball star.

In the case the black-haired boy met his eye. Carlisle lifted a hand to him. "You and me both, bud," he said, under his breath.

Never trust a man's opinions on any subject until he has been in love. Love is the only thing which can make life as clear as noonday.
JOHN OLIVER HOBBES

Debby had planned a picnic. She and Carlisle had always had a lot of fun eating out—riding a long way in Katy, stopping when they were hungry by a lake or a river or halfway up a hill. If, when Carlisle climbed into or out of Katy, she could make believe that she'd noticed for the first time that his knee was better, maybe she could mention it; be surprised and delighted. Maybe that would work. Nothing else had, and she'd tried everything she could think of. His knee was better, but he hadn't said so. The only way she knew was by watching him move.

Debby had waited, feeling a little desperate. It was so easy nowadays to say or do the wrong thing. Of course you couldn't blame him for feeling awful.

Debby made all the kinds of sandwiches he liked—tuna, chicken, and a funny combination of peanut butter and catchup, which they'd discovered, fooling around, on a picnic long ago. She put in potato salad and a big frosted cake. And then they drove north along the River Road.

The riverbank was wonderful, the water high, all kinds of things—old leaves, sticks, pieces of grass—spinning down with the current in the sun. Little new alder leaves were out, bunchberries in bloom. All at once, to Debby, things seemed nice and normal again. Carlisle seemed quite cheerful and like himself; he even laughed a little, and he stretched out on a tarp spread under a tree, with the portable phonograph at his elbow, while she buzzed around getting out the lunch.

And then, he wouldn't eat.

Something made him feel bad, maybe because the place was so beautiful; though it seemed almost as if he'd planned, ahead of time, to feel bad, because he'd brought along one record for the portable, which he kept playing over and over:

"But he lived on the shady side of the mountain,
And she lived on the sunny side of the hill."

Debby listened to it three times before she said anything. "Hey, why don't we play something else? There's a whole box of records the back of Katy."

Carlisle glanced over at her without a kind of expression. He wound up the portal again

"Don't be marbly-eyed," Debby said. "I only that your friend there gets kind of fru in large batches."

She let go with an imitation of the fru baritone, which was quite a good one, wh she got the box of records out of Katy, push them across the tarp to him.

"Play that top one—that's Mary Mart singing 'I'm in Love with a Wonderful Gu That's more my speed today."

She went on unpacking sandwiches, layi out the picnic.

I won't unwrap all the sandwiches, s thought, because we'll want to eat supper o too.

She put two big packages of sandwich back into the basket, thinking, I'll wait till starts to get up, and then I'll notice, with sou effects, that he can bend his knee, let him kn that that's the greatest —— Aware of a pre nant silence, she looked up.

"Come on and eat," she said. "I'm starve Aren't you?"

"You eat," Carlisle said. "Go ahead, you're hungry."

The implication was plain enough—und the circumstances, nobo ought to be hungry.

Debby stared at hir "Don't you feel well, Carl

"Yare. I'm O.K."

She was hungry, so s went ahead. Things were little tasteless. When s had finished, he still didn seem to want to be di turbed. He lay stretche out on the tarp, with th same old record going. S Debby slipped away by he self and went for a wall

It seemed lonely along the riverbank. Th spring wind had turned cold; mud squelche underfoot. It seemed suddenly important t get back to company, back to Carlisle, feelin lonely, miserable too, under his tree.

As she came to the edge of the clearing, s saw that Carlisle had changed his mind. H was eating.

She was about to step forward, sayin "Oh, good, you feel better," when she notice that he wasn't eating the lunch she'd le spread out; he'd got one of the packages sandwiches she'd kept as a reserve for suppe

Why am I being such a fool? she asked her self. And then, Because I'm scared. I've got t know.

From behind the tree, she watched him ea heartily, healthily. Then, when he was finishe he packed everything, including what she ha left out, neatly into the baskets, put th vacuum bottle on top and closed the lids.

"Oh, you've packed up," she said, comin into the clearing. "Did you find anything a all you felt like eating?"

For a moment she thought he was going t make everything all right. But he said a littl remotely, "I guess I'm just off my feed today.

The moment passed and was irrevocabl gone. A little cold knot, like a lump of ice formed down inside Debby's breastbone.

"We'd better go home, I guess," she said.

"How about going down on the turnpike giving Katy a workout? Maybe riding'll help.

"O.K.," Debby said. "Maybe it will."

The turnpike was sixty miles away, but Kat had never found it an effort to travel far fo the sake of a four-lane freeway, with a sev enty-mile limit. She rolled into it, purring.

The swing on the turn dislodged one o Carlisle's crutches, which he had propped ove the back of the seat between him and the door Impatiently he slammed it back into plac with his elbow, and its head cracked agains Katy's shining paint, making a small dent.

"Look, watch it, will you?" Debby said.

Surprised, he glanced over at her. "You ought to hit your old man for a trailer to carry my crutches," he said. "Doesn't seem to b room for all four of us in Katy."

"There won't be, if one of us doesn't quit acting like a sorehead."

be ahead in beauty
INSTANTLY

IMAGINE, beautiful, natural-looking hair color in an instant . . . a woman's dream come true! A color rinse that requires no patch or strand tests! That's NOREEN . . . "INSTANT" because there is no waiting for color to develop . . . a TRUE HAIR RINSE because it adds just the right amount of safe, temporary color to beautify all shades of hair, or blend-in scattered gray. Color can be removed only by shampooing. Actually, all hair colorings fade and become dull in a week or so, and should be refreshed after each shampoo. NOREEN gives your hair that lustrous, fresh-looking color instantly . . . without rub-off.

39¢ and 69¢ (plus tax)
At cosmetic counters everywhere.

Noreen of Denver, distributes Noreen Color Hair Rinse and new Liqui Color, the instant liquid color hair rinse.

Noreen
INSTANT COLOR HAIR RINSE
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

are. I know. You'd rather I made a dent
u. Maybe we could lash them to the top.
verybody'd know what you're hauling id with you, these days."
verybody knows. There's never been ody with me in Katy but you."
ou try, don't you?"
es. Wouldn't you?"
Vould.n't I what?"
I were sick, or something I couldn't
I wouldn't make it so you'd have to try,"
old him.
Vell, well. The brave little heroine from ospital bed looked up and said, 'Don't hey cut off my head at the neck, but see, n't need my head.'" He shifted impa-
y. "Where are we going—a funeral?
with the foot, why don't you?" r answer, Katy slowed down. She turned e freeway into a rest stop, parked at its
id. Debby turned off the motor.
What now?" Carlisle's patience was obvi-can't drive," Debby said. "In a minute ave been up a tree."

Vell, that would be a change."
e sat, resting her forearms on Katy's
l, looking out through the windshield.
ould be more of a change if you'd come from the hospital."
Why, I'm back. The big, beautiful hunk of layer, plus crutches. You want more?"
arl, don't."
on't what?"
ook, this is me. Debby." The look she d on him was not accusing; but it was

WOMEN'S IDEA EXCHANGE*

f you're thumbtacking shelf paper
n a practically impossible-to-reach orner, use Mrs. P.D.K.'s tactics:
ut cellulose tape, sticky side out,
round your finger to hold the tacks.

Send your ideas to Women's Idea xchange Editor. $5 will be paid for ach one used in the JOURNAL.

t. "Your knee's better. You can bend it
Two weeks ago, you couldn't."
e was still sitting indifferently, with most s weight on the back of his neck; and he without realizing it, drawn up his knees.
ooked down as if he marveled at the sight.
Vell, get a load of old Shirttail," he said.
bends at the knee."
hat means it's getting better. You must known; why didn't you say? Oh, Carl. It as if—it isn't everything. It's only your
——"
rlisle stared at her. "It so happens that I e my knee. If nobody else does. Oh, you're a lame knee, sweetheart, but I lo-ove you he same ——"
You shut up!" Debby flashed. "I've cared
I've been about broken in pieces over it, you know it! And it's better, and you n't said. You mump around, trying to e people feel sorry for you!"
Keep beating on it. The big, beautiful of ballplayer, he can't win games any e; he's got a gimp. So what is he? A big,
tiful hunk of bum."
slight breeze moved among the branches e wood. It pulled a handful of petals from adbush, twirled them, sent them flowing ss the parking space like a little river.
by watched the river stop flowing before spoke.
t doesn't do any good to blame other peo-
' she said.
Who's blaming anybody?"
You are. You even blame me. At least, take it out on me. I feel horrible, too—or l, until you made me so mad ——"
Look, you don't have to go around Robin d's barn. I know what's eating you. Why
't you go ahead and say we're through,
you can't stand a guy with a gimp ——" Because that wouldn't be the reason."
by's fingers had tightened on Katy's
el. The knuckles were white. "I think you ought to know—I'm going to register at Chicago. This fall, I'm going there."

"Well, that's a nice long ways away."

"Yes. If you worked this summer, you could catch up. I could help you."

"I don't really go for that egghead stuff any more. It doesn't sound like fun. And you know what you're doing, too, putting it up to me. If you really cared anything about me, it wouldn't enter your head to go. But here you come, and spring it. You're all set."

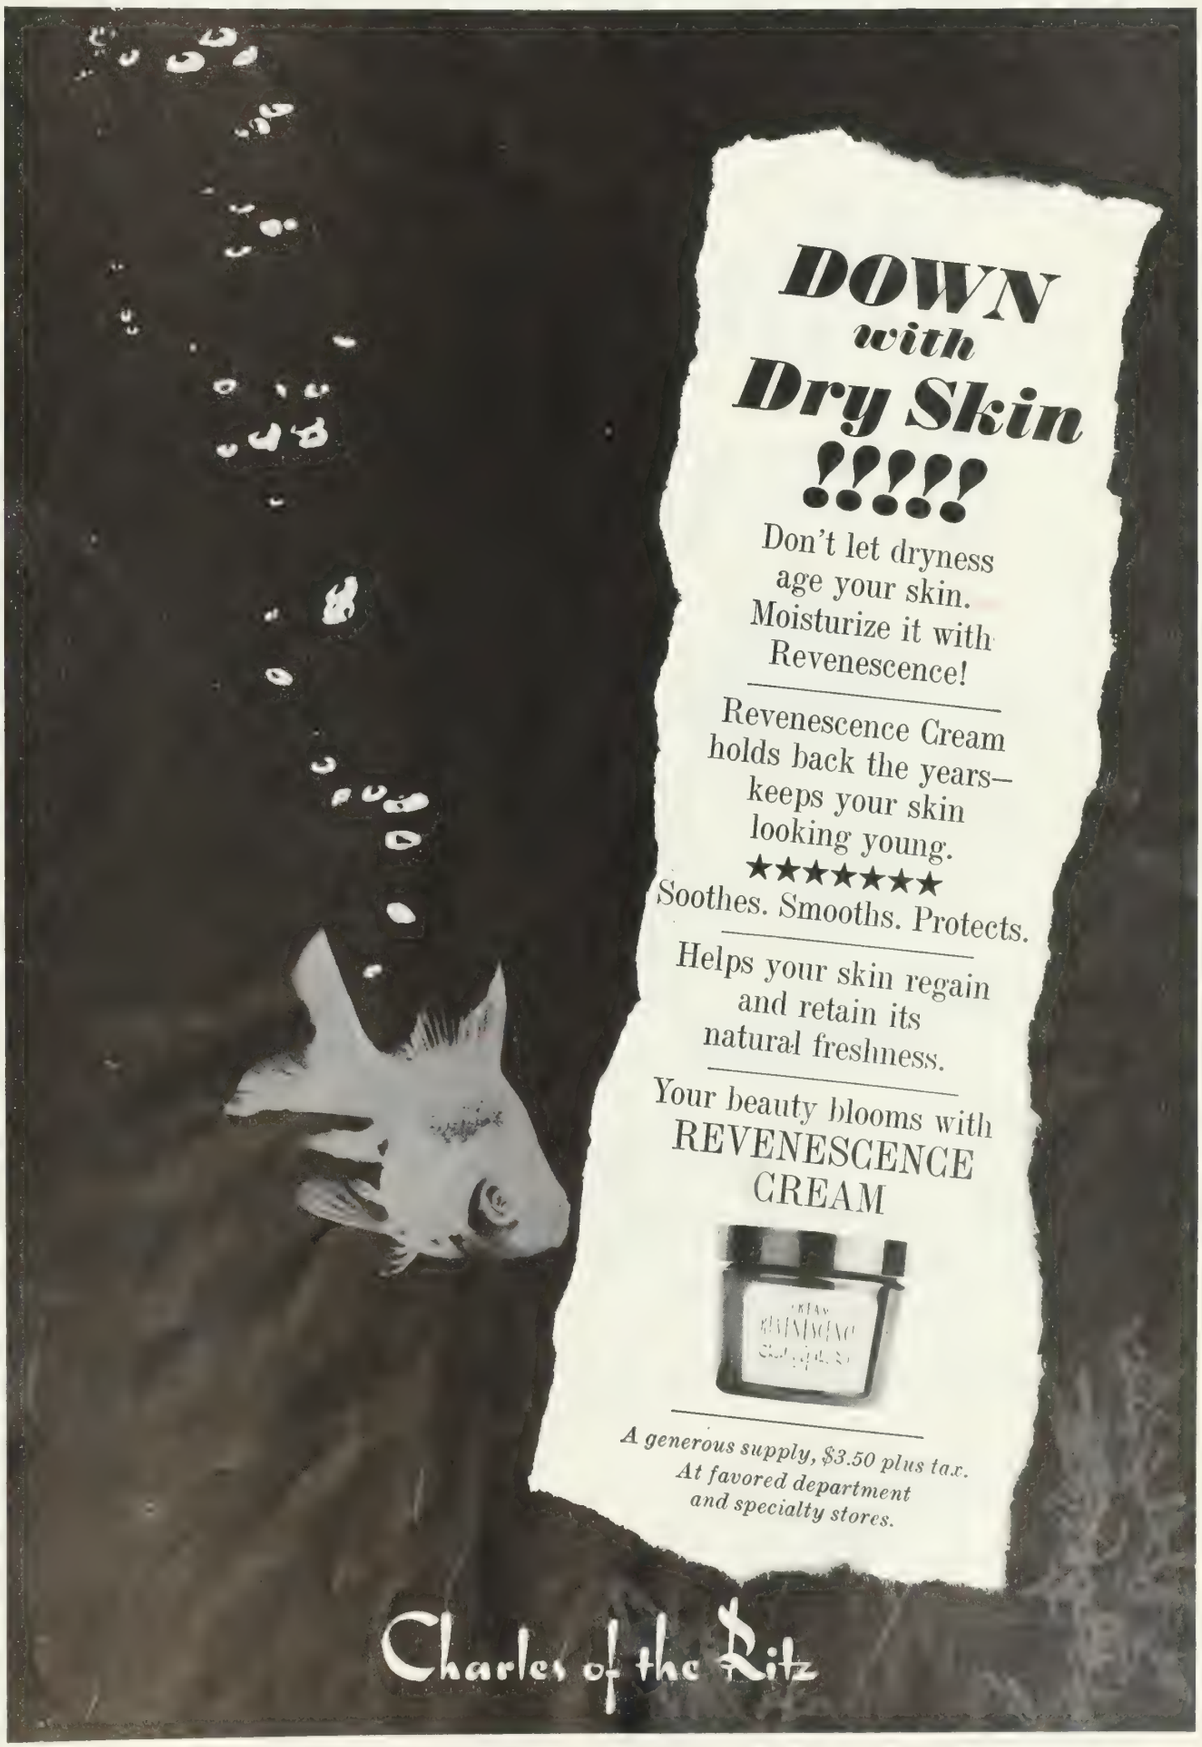
"Yes. Yes, I'm going," she told him. "You don't see why."

"Well, why? What for? All you'll do is get married."

"Even for that," Debby said, "I need to know more than I know. So do you, now there are no more cheers."

"No. There aren't, are there? I'm just a bum, and you make sure I know by throwing it in my face. Come out with it, why don't you, and say that what you want is out?"

Debby sat, not moving, looking out through Katy's windshield. "I didn't mean to throw anything in your face. I tried to say how I feel. I don't think you listened."



"Oh, I heard. I read you loud and clear. You don't like guys with gimps."

"Gimps in the knee I don't mind," Debby said. "I guess in the head they make a difference, Carl." She reached for the key, started the motor. "Come on, doll," she said. "We need that workout."

At the high-school gym, graduation ball was in full swing. Lights streamed out on the June night; the rock 'n' roll carried the length of Main Street. Light summer suits, bouffant dresses spun past the windows, kaleidoscopic. The floor shook with stomp and scuff of feet.

Alfred Berg, dancing with Ellen, stopped by a window, mopping his brow. "Wow!" he said. "Let's take a walk and get cool."

Arm in arm they strolled down the steps of the building and along the walk to the street.

What a lovely night," she said. "Why is it that it's always so beautiful the night of graduation ball? I remember mine—horse chestnuts in bloom, and a full moon, like now. And I had a lovely time—about twenty beaux, all wanting to dance with me. These kids dance with the same boy all evening."

"Monogamy," Alfred said. "It has its advantages. These kids just got it younger, that's all. Every new generation changes the rules of the tribe. By the time our kids are sixteen, the customs'll all be renovated again."

"Twice over, unless we start pretty soon."

"You keep your shirt on," Alfred said. "You know what my plans are for the summer. A cabin in Michigan. My beautiful wife. I can try and I can hope, but ——"

"Your beautiful wife will also hope and try."

"—— but I warn you, for three months I am not going to think about the young of the species. I am going to be Al Berg. Not Old Bugsy."

"I like Old Bugsy."

"Right now, I don't. Right now, he is a tired old codger of twenty-six. A square. Look at these cars," he said, jerking his head at the line of darkened, parked automobiles. "Everybody pulling in heads, like turtles, as I come by. 'Watch it, here comes Old Bugsy!' Know what I'd like to do? I'd like to run along here banging on all the car doors, yelling, 'Boo, youse! I've got a girl friend too!'"

Ellen giggled. "Do it. I dare you."

"They'd be more shocked than I would," Alfred said.

From one of the cars up ahead a girl in a pastel bouffant dress got out of the front seat, slamming the car door. She went by them swiftly, up the walk to the high-school building and vanished through the door.

"Debby," Alfred said under his breath. "That must be McIntosh in the car."

"I haven't seen him around tonight," Ellen said. "Or Debby either." She paused. "Oh, Al! Of course he can't dance, but surely he'd come to the dance with her."

"I don't know," Alfred said thoughtfully.

They walked on, past the car. Alfred could see out of the corner of his eye the shadowy boy slouched in the driver's seat, but he was careful not to turn his head.

"It's her graduation ball," Ellen said. "She ought to be having a terrific time. And she can't be because, according to their vicious little custom, she can't dance with anybody but Carlisle. Oh, Al! Could you do anything?"

"I don't know. I'd only be sticking my neck out. As a matter of fact, I have already and it is like talking in two languages, one of which never heard of the other. He can't stand the general unkind disregard dished out to a fallen idol. He just feels he isn't anything at all now. It's a shame. He's a smart youngster, all the brains in the world, only he won't use them. I've tried. I've busted all my strings, and he still couldn't pass any college-board exam in the country."

"Is that unusual? Mooney couldn't either."

"Ah, but Mooney hasn't got a lame leg. Going to Shangri-La on an athletic scholarship. He'll probably go right up to the top in the pros, have quite a distinguished career."

"You talk as if that might be a good thing."

"Certainly. Of course it's a good thing. What's wrong with a career in basketball, for a boy who's good at it, not able to do anything else? There wouldn't be anything wrong with ball if it were only kept in proportion. Can you entertain yourself awhile, if I go and stick my nose into McIntosh's business?"

"Of course. I promised James Goss a dance. I suppose I could get that over with now." She looked at him speculatively. "Al, don't ——"

"Don't what?"

"Oh, never mind, honey. You'll know what to do."

She went up the steps, into the gym. A few couples were already on the floor. She looked around for James, saw him, unattached, on the other side of the dance floor, and waved. He began to make his way toward her.

Ellen waited, watching the floor fill up. Beside the door Debby Parker leaned against the ticket table—a pretty girl, watching the others dance while she waited for her partner. If she were not having a good time, she showed no sign.

But she isn't, Ellen thought. And at graduation ball, where a girl shouldn't have a care in the world.

James Goss, at Ellen's elbow, said, "I take it this is my dance?"

"It is," Ellen said.

James was an old-fashioned dancer, belonging to the twirl-and-dip school. Whatever the beat of the music, James waltzed.

"A lovely sight, isn't it?" he said, as they slowly twirled and dipped, to the amusement, not too politely concealed, of some of the younger dancers.

"Yes, it is, rather," Ellen said.

She saw suddenly that Debby Parker had found a partner. Head high, smiling, Debby was spinning down the floor with Ralph McIntosh.

Out in the street, leaning against the open window of Debby's car, Alfred was making heavy weather of it. So far, he had succeeded only in passing the time of day.

"I like this car," he said. "Ellen and I ha been talking about getting one."

"Is that so?"

"Ellen's afraid my old boat won't hold t gether to haul us to Michigan this summer guess she's right. How is that driver's seat does it double you up any?"

"Seems to be plenty of room."

"Think I could try it on for size?"

"Why, sure, Mr. Berg." Carlisle moved ov out of the driver's seat as Alfred walked arou the car. Carlisle was neat and handsome in h graduation suit, his rippled, corn-colored ha carefully combed, his profile clean-cut, h voice quiet, polite, indifferent.

Alfred thought while he found the peda and went through the motions of testing t comfort of the car, All this kid wants is f me to get out of here, leave him alone. Aloud h said, "Sa-ay! I didn't think there'd be th much room. Easy on gas, too, they tell me."

"Uh-huh."

"Know how many miles to the gallon?"

"About thirty-eight, Debby gets."

Alfred whistled. "Something to think abou all right." Desperately he thought, I could t on talking cars all night, and no way I co think of to butt in on this boy's business. Ber shut up and go away; it's probably a good thin

He opened the car door, started to get ou "Well, thanks," he said. "I'm going to thin some more about it." Ha way out, he paused. "Ho are you set for the summe Got plans?"

"Oh, sure, Mr. Berg."

"A job? Something dow at the motel?"

"Yare. I'll probably gin around down there. Awhil anyway."

It was the first brea in the armor, and Alfre pounced. "I was hoping t get to you first." Even as I spoke, he said in his mind Oh, Ellen, darling, forgive me! "Ellen and are going to Coon Lake in the Michiga woods—a friend of ours has lent us his cab for the summer. I've got a lot of studying t do, but there'll be time for canoeing and fish ing. I thought maybe I could get you to com with us, if it was all right with your folks."

The impassive voice said, "Why, thank Mr. Berg. What would I do there?"

"Why, a number of things. Teach us t drive the new car, for one thing. Team u with me on chores—wood, water—whatev wouldn't be too rough on your knee. W couldn't make you a cash proposition, bu I'll tutor you in physics and chem, and Ellen brush you up on liberal arts. We'll guarante you to pass any college boards they can thro at you, come fall."

"Well, thanks. I don't think I'll both with college."

"Oh. Well, of course that's up to you. Wh don't you think it over, though?"

"I will, Mr. Berg."

Alfred got out of the car. "Good nigh then. Ellen and I'll wait to hear from you.

"Good night, Mr. Berg."

Back in the gym, Ralph was doing his bes He wasn't a good dancer. Debby was goo though. After a while he began to enjoy him self.

Debby's brother, Bill, dancing by, grinned and said to his girl, "Hey, dig old Sittin Bull."

Ralph felt his face getting red. He missed step, stepped on Debby's toe and couldn seem to get "Excuse me" up past his Adam' apple, which just made a clicking noise.

Debby said, "Don't pay any attention Ralphie. I'm having fun."

"Everywhere I go," Ralph said. "Funn stuff about Indians. It gets my darn goat.

"I know," Debby said. "But why show it?

Out at the end of his long arm she spun light on her toes, came back to him.

"If you don't let anyone see, nobody' know it gets your goat," Debby said. "N goat, no kidding. Give 'em as good as they send.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

Nothing is ours to keep for ourselves. Money, talent, time, whatever it may be that we possess, is only ours to use. This is the great law written everywhere.

NOW!

Mint Flavor

In Milk of Magnesia
- the remedy doctors recommend

Regular or Mint-Flavored, Milk of Magnesia brings wonderful relief from constipation and acid indigestion

Doctors agree. We asked thousands of doctors, "Do you ever recommend Milk of Magnesia?" The overwhelming majority said, "Yes!"

It's a thorough laxative. Phillips' Milk of Magnesia gently relieves constipation, and also the acid indigestion which so often accompanies constipation.

It's a speedy antacid. Phillips' settles an upset stomach in seconds! Gas pains, heartburn and other acid discomforts seem to vanish.

It's pleasant to take. Choose Regular or refreshing Mint-Flavored Phillips'. Both the same price.

PHILLIPS'
MILK OF MAGNESIA
REGULAR OR MINT-FLAVORED

THE MAYTAG COMPANY, NEWTON, IOWA · SOLD IN CANADA AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

For the woman who needs a washer or dryer that works every day...

Breathes there a woman over 16 who has not heard that you can depend on a Maytag? Some 12,000,000 Maytag customers could tell her that this is the one that works day after day, year in and year out.

Of course, Maytag gives you all the most modern features, too. Washer features like an Automatic Bleach Dispenser, a Lint Filter Agitator, a Safety Lid, two wash speeds, two spin speeds and three water temperatures (including "Cold").

And the Maytag Halo of Heat® Dryer dries clothes fast but gently. It's the only dryer that surrounds clothes with a gentle, even circle of heat—that's never too hot in one spot. This time, insist on dependability. Insist on a Maytag Automatic. At your Maytag dealer's now.

New Maytag Automatic Bleach Dispenser knows exactly when to add bleach—at just the right strength.

MAYTAG—the dependable automatics

GET IN THE SWIM AT CAPE CORAL, FLORIDA

Use the next few seconds to fill out and mail the coupon below. Receive the big FREE book that gives you all the unusual facts about CAPE CORAL. Learn why thousands of families have invested millions of dollars there. Read about the many improvements already in—an endless variety of beautiful homes; miles of landscaped streets and wide waterways; boating, fishing, bathing — all in a luxurious Country Club setting! You'll find — as have so many others — that CAPE CORAL is exactly what you've been dreaming about!

¼ acre Homesites for as little as $20 DOWN, PER MONTH!

Send for the most exciting book of its kind ever written!— "THE CAPE CORAL STORY"

It's yours for the asking ABSOLUTELY FREE Send no money, please

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE MEMBER
Lee County and Ft. Myers • Dade County • Florida State

—MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY!—

Gulf Guaranty Land & Title Co., Dept. W62
1771 N. Tamiami Trail, Fort Myers, Florida
Please rush my FREE copy of "The Cape Coral Story" in full color.
Name.....
Address.....
City.....Zone.....State.....

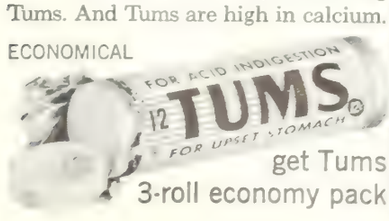
Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery

STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAIN

For the first time science has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and to relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all – results were so thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"



The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a world-famous research institute.

This substance is now available in suppository or ointment form under the name Preparation H®. Ask for it at all drug counters – money back guarantee.

BLESsed event?

While you are waiting you'll specially bless pleasant, soothing Tums! Heartburn due to acid indigestion, is quickly relieved by easy-to-take, fast-acting Tums. And Tums are high in calcium.

ECONOMICAL

get Tums 3-roll economy pack

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

"Oh, sure," Ralph said. He brightened. "Gee, I will!" Of course that was the way to handle it. Ought to have thought of it himself.

At that moment the orchestra stopped playing. Debby stuck her arm through his. "Come on," she said. "Let's get a root beer."

She waited while he got into line at the root-beer machine, dropped in his coins.

"You must be dry," she said, smiling, as he came along lugging the bottles, two in each hand. "I can't possibly drink two. Can you drink three?"

"Oh, easy," Ralph said. "C-Carl and I drank six apiece once, on a bet."

Between the dance floor and the drink machine, Ralph had conceived a plan—get enough bottles, and then suggest that he and Debby take one out to Carlisle. It might not work; but then, again, it might.

Debby said nothing; Ralph paced along by her side, "Hot," he said. "Let's take it out on the steps."

Half the crowd was out on the steps, cooling off. The other half walked, two and two, up and down the sidewalk under the trees.

At the foot of the steps Ralph would have kept going, but Debby stopped and sat down, so he handed her a bottle.

"You forgot to take the top off."

"Oh, gee," Ralph said. "I figured you'd have an opener in your car."

"I do. You go get it, Ralphie."

"Well, Carl's there. I thought ——"

"Give him a root beer," Debby said, between her teeth.

"Ah-h, Debby! He'll only bounce it off my head, if I go alone. Come on."

"Look, Ralph," Debby said. "Noses out? Please? I'll wait for you here. If he bounces it off your head, bounce one back. You've got four."

Ralph gave a small moan of despair. He set off toward the car. Good idea, at the time. Flopped like a mop. Like most of his good ideas. "Brought you a drink, Carl," he said to the silent figure in the car.

"Oh, go play with your marbles."

"Ah-h, cut it out, can't you?" Ralph stood uncertainly. "Got four bottles here," he said, and drew a little closer. "Forgot to take the tops off. D-Debby said there was an opener ——"

He ducked as the opener flew past his head, landed on the sidewalk, bounced into the bushes.

"Darn it," he said, at a safe distance from the car window, "couldn't you just ——" He had been going to say "have handed it to me," but stopped. He turned toward the bushes. They were thick and high, full of thorns. He'd have to find that opener. He couldn't just haul out the one in his pocket, have Debby guess ——

She came swiftly along the sidewalk behind him. "Carl," she said. "Carl?"

There was no response from the car.

"I told you I'd tell you after the dance," Debby said. Her voice was tense, breathless. "I guess I can tell you now. Will you please get out of my car, so I can go home?"

She moved as if to walk around to the driver's seat.

Ralph heard the sudden whine of the starter, the roar as the engine kicked in. Katy pulled away from the curb. Ralph, blinking with astonishment, saw the taillight shoot along the street, growing smaller up the highway.

Debby said, in a whisper, "Oh, no," as if what was happening was something she couldn't bear. And then her head came up; she turned to Ralph.

"Where's he going?" Ralph said. "What does he think he's ——"

"He's just used to Katy, is all," Debby said. "He'll ride around and be back. He isn't going anywhere."

In the late night, little old Katy, the livir doll, headed away, going nowhere in partic lar; just away.

The highway was mostly deserted—n much traffic at this time of night. Katy passe a truck-trailer combination barreling alor with a load of freight for Boston. For a lor time she turned aimlessly from one byway t another, sometimes speeding, sometim slowing down where the road was bad.

Sixty miles beyond Fairport, Carlis stopped long enough to push the button th controlled Katy's convertible top. Obedient Katy folded her top back, but the dark privac of her interior was gone. Around him, i stead, was the world: vast sweep of starl sky; dark countryside; to north, to sout empty highway. He jerked his hand back t the button, brought the top up again.

Better turn around while there was so gas left. Katy would run on little, but n on nothing.

The dance was long over, the gym dar Three-thirty, he saw by the clock in th steeple of the old Union church. He left th car at Parker's Garage, got out his crutche started walking. It wasn't far to the mote A while ago, he thought, striding along, couldn't have made it. Blasted knee's bette Won't be long before I can play again; heck I can always play on the town team.

Main Street was empty; from curb to cur no cars, no people. The drugstore dark, th poolroom dark; lights out in Joe's Lunc Black shadows on the fronts of sleepin houses; by a corner lamp a chestnut tre brilliant electric green, with prim whi candles. Shadows on the concrete of the sid walks; shadow of himself, foreshortene the crutches foreshortened, moving across th patches; at the intersection, the traffic ligh turning from red to green and back agai busily directing nothing.

FREE DUST

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 51

sixteen years old and could see the woods, the forest, whole. Who cared about the separate trees?

He did not listen as he went through the living room or he might have heard a disconcerting parallel to his opinions.

"The longer we live, the more we fall into the clichés of the comic strip, people like us," Mary was saying. "A rise in the anxiety graph on the first and fifteenth of every month. Old arguments about old habits that will never change; and all those halfhearted efforts to stay the effects of age ——"

"I know. Exercises done for a few mornings, then abandoned," said Zaida. "Diets started and then abandoned."

Mary sighed loudly. "I always thought there must be a cure for it somewhere."

"A cure for growing old?"

"No, for one's attitude toward it. Painless aging, like painless childbirth. . . . But I was going to tell you about Elmo. You notice the television cabinet?"

"I've been admiring it. I never thought that article of furniture could be so handsome. And what a good idea to have a sliding panel to cover the screen; that piece of dull glass, staring, can have such an effect on a room."

"That's what Elmo thought too. Well, that cabinet has a history.

"There was one day last year when every single thing went wrong. It was November, right after the Big Storm, and here we were with no power, no water, no light, and we'd bought an electric stove, like fools, so of course we couldn't really cook. We just kept roasting hot dogs in the fireplace.

"Also it was Sunday, and you know how terrible that can be. And it was cold and gray. The worst day. Timmy had a bad cold and I had my sinus, and I kept telling myself this, too, will pass.

"Well, Elmo has a cousin—thank heaven it's his cousin, not mine—who lives in Michigan. His name is Norwood Creamer, and he's perfectly nice; I always thought he was perfectly nice, but he has this wife! Her name is Eula, Eula Creamer. She has very arched nostrils and splendid teeth—white and strong and plentiful. She's never had a filling in her life, she tells you that, and opens her mouth wide to give you the experience of viewing her molars. Simon-pure. She is extremely durable in every way. She's my age and hasn't one gray hair, and her skin is like a baby's, and her eyes are clear and lustrous. They protrude, but they are lustrous. When she talks she forms her words very distinctly as if she were speaking to someone a little deaf or very old;

If we had paid no more attention to our plants than we have to our children, we should now be living in a jungle of weeds. LUTHER BURBANK and she does something to the letter r—invigorates it—in a way I have never heard equaled. P*rrr*esident Eisenhowe*rrr*. Orrrganization. Cr*rr*eame*rrr*. And she's very well informed; knows all about legislative bodies and things like that. Remembers everything; can talk business on an equal footing with the men, and child rearing on an equal or slightly higher footing with the women."

"Has she children?" Zaida asked.

"Two. Boy and girl, bursting with vitamins and very successful. Each one president of the Student Council, and so on.

"Well, as I was saying, here we were on this dreadful day with all our crippled appliances, when who should blow in at exactly the worst time, about two in the afternoon, but the Creamers! Elmo was just getting well into his Sunday nap, under a litter of newspapers, and I'd settled down with the double crostic when I heard a car door slam outside and then voices. Or rather That Voice; and I knew right away who it was, and my heart sank. I had thought them a thousand miles away, in Michigan.

"There was nothing to be done. We couldn hide, the car was right there in the drive. An the door wasn't locked; Eula just gave on knock and flung it open. She doesn't stand o ceremony ever.

"I went to meet her and she was shoutin 'Surprise! Surprise!' flashing and scintillatin in a big overpowering way like the lighthous at Narragansett Pier. She clasped me in firm sensible embrace and explained they wer on their way to see Connie—the daughter a college—and had decided to stop and see us

"'I said to Norwood, "Why, Mary an Elmo are right on our way, Norwood, let' give them a surprise!"' she said.

"When we came into the living room Elmo poor creature, was just struggling up out o his nap, newspapers all over, beer can on th floor. My heart was wrung for him, he looke so helpless and appalled. Eula gave him on of her embraces, and then, holding onto him leaned back and scrutinized him.

"'Elmo, have you been well?' she asked "'Can't complain,' Elmo said. 'Why? I loo sick or something?'

"'No-o,' Eula said. 'Not sick exactly. Bu your color does seem a little high.'

"'Beer and sleep,' Elmo said. 'That's a that is.'

"'But have you had a checkup lately?' Eul asked him. 'After fifty, all of us should hav semiannual checkups, you know.'

"'I'm only forty-eight,' Elmo said.

"Eula just laughed ringingly.

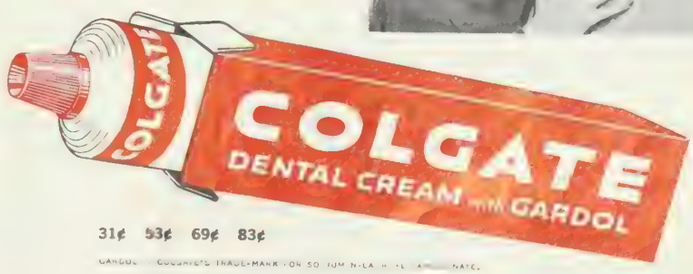
"'He really is only forty-eight, Eula,' I tol her. She is the limit. If you said you wer ninety-one, she'd just laugh that laugh, imply ing that you were really ninety-two and tryin to cover up.

"I thought I'd better change the subject an began rattling on about the storm and hov terrible it had been. (All the time I was snatch ing up newspapers and emptying ash trays trying, in a hurry, to correct the awful impres sion of dishevelment the room had presente when they came in. I saw that in Eula's light house glance.)

CONTINUED ON PAGE 123

Fight Tooth Decay with Colgate Stop Bad Breath All Day!

Every mother should give her family the benefits of Colgate with Gardol and its defense against tooth decay!



In two-year clinical tests, young adults who brushed with Colgate Dental Cream averaged 46% fewer new cavities than those who used ordinary toothpaste.

Of course, nothing completely stops decay, but you, too, may have fewer cavities if you start brushing regularly with Colgate Dental Cream. Because Colgate contains Gardol to form an invisible defense to help fight tooth decay. You can't see it—you can't feel it on your teeth—but it's there to help fight tooth decay.

Ask your dentist how often to brush your teeth. And for fewer cavities, brush with Colgate Dental Cream. Remember, you fight tooth decay with Colgate, help stop bad breath all day.

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol helps stop mouth odor instantly for most people. It cleans your breath while it cleans your teeth.

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol FIGHTS TOOTH DECAY ALL DAY!

new!

"Golden Look" Compact! Handsome metal compact holds Sheer Velvet pressed powder plus creamy foundation $1.50. Pop-in refill, 75¢.

new!

Sheer Velvet Film, flattering make-up foundation with amazing new moisturizing ingredient, $1.50.

Most natural beauty in the history of make-up ...created with new Sheer Velvet

New softly radiant formula . . . light, yet clinging and moisturized to give your skin a dewy, youthful look. Covers imperfections to perfection. Looks completely natural, even in morning sunlight . . . stays fresh all day and prevents that mid-afternoon tired look. Start with Sheer Velvet Film, the ideal make-up foundation. Touch up as needed through the day with Sheer Velvet Compact. Dorothy Gray (Canada) Limited.

Dorothy Gray

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

"And she would not permit me to have my orm. She came right back at me and described a cyclone she had experienced the year efore in Kansas when her father's front orch had been ripped clean off the house and ssed away, and the Presbyterian steeple had lown into the next county. 'Nobody was illed,' she admitted grudgingly. Then she rightened up. 'But many were injured!'

"And it was she, of course, who caught the antle of Florence Nightingale and set up a rst-aid station in the public library. I'm sure verything she said was true. I'm sure she was godsend to the community. But somehow, s she talked, she managed to make me feel hat I had been timid and ineffectual in the ace of Nature's violence, and that Nature's iolence in the East was rather a joke anyway.

"So the afternoon went on like that: bad to orse. At five o'clock it began to rain and the re started smoking. By that time Eula had riticized us for having the cat spayed, sugested a new color scheme for the dining oom, recommended a superior brand of dishasher to the one we'd just bought, and asked ne tactfully why I didn't stop dyeing my hair.

"'Mary,' she said, 'the good Lord knew hat He was doing when He let women's hair o gray in middle age; it's so much more oftening to the featurrres.'

"I could feel the wrinkles forming on my ace, I tell you. And every now and then she ould scrutinize Elmo with a worried little rown, and I began to think perhaps he didn't ook so well.

"Timmy came in about six. He was fifteen nen, so he was writing poetry all the time nd we could not get him to the barber. He ooked like Group Captain Peter Townsend. le was above talking to people, too; at least o adults. But Eula persevered. She pried an dmission from him that he liked music, and ollected records.

"'Dave Brubeck, I'll bet; right, Timmy?' ula said knowingly. 'Jonah Jones? The verly brothers? Who are your favorites?'

"'William Boyce,' Timmy told her. 'Henry urcell. Vivaldi.'

"Eula looked dashed, for once.

"'Pre-Bach,' Timmy explained. 'Music still ncorrupted by Romantic.'

"When he'd gone, Eula looked at me houghtfully and said, 'Mary, have you ever hought of psychiatry for Timmy?'

"I said no, I hadn't. At that moment I could ave killed Timmy. I thought why couldn't he ave had his hair cut and talked about Junior Gilliam, or something, just for once!

"Eula kept right on. 'Timmy's an only hild,' she was telling me—news for me—and I have a theory that the only child resents he lack of sibling rivalry. He resents being leprived of a perrrfectly naturrral outlet for his aggrrressions.'

"I didn't dare look at Elmo, but I could eel him clear across the room beginning to eave and swell like milk coming to a boil.

"Norwood was just sitting there smoking is pipe, eyes half closed, and I had the disinct impression that he'd turned Eula off; hat he's able to turn off whatever she's sayng, if he feels like it. Well, he'd have to ——

"But instead of doing anything drastic, Elmo just suggested a drink. He'd offered this before, but Eula had refused for both of them on the grounds that the sun was not yet over he yarrrdarrrm. She doesn't like to drink.

"So Elmo said, 'The sun is now under the ardarm. Way under. It is time.'

"Norwood said he thought so, too, and offered to help, but Elmo declined and went off to the pantry, where he was gone rather a long time, I thought. He came back with whisky for us and something odd-looking in the last of our old wedding-present cocktail glasses for Eula.

"'I made it especially for you, Eula,' he told her with a little bow. 'It's called a Sunset Gun.'

"'Goodness!' Eula said, but she took it and drank it right down like medicine. Then she looked surprised. 'Why, it's perfectly delicious, Elmo,' she said. 'Just as good as a soda. I believe I'd like another.'

"She grew very vivacious on the first one, and her eyes sparkled as she gave Elmo some helpful pointers on how to run his office; but after the second she suddenly fell silent and the eye sparkle turned to more of a glaze. I had the dreadful thought that perhaps Elmo had poisoned her, and I could imagine how all our photographs would look on the front page of the Daily News.

"And then Eula stood up, a little unsteady but decisive.

"'Norwood, we must go,' she said, 'or we'll never get a table at Howard Johnson's.'

"'Why, listen, we can roast you a couple of franks right here, and we've got some nice canned kraut,' Elmo offered—oh, he can be wicked—and that really lent wings to their departure.

"'Elmo, what did you put in Eula's drink?' I asked him, when they'd gone. 'Nitroglycerin, or something?'

"And Elmo said, 'Do you remember the bottle of Pernod that Roy Baskin brought us in 1939?'

"Well, I was shocked; we'd never even dared to taste the stuff ourselves. But Elmo said, 'Look here. The only way you can defeat Eula Creamer is by casting a doubt into her mind about herself, and that's next to impossible. The only time I ever saw it happen was after those sazeracs at the Hardys'; so I just thought, well, maybe a little of that Pernod . . . so I went and got it, poured in a jigger, added some Vermont maple syrup and a dash of vanilla and filled it up with cream and there you are.'

"'What a terrible thing to do to anyone!' I said. But he didn't seem at all contrite; he'd gone over to the hall mirror and put out his tongue and looked at that.

"'She's right,' he said, very depressed. 'I don't look well. My color isn't good.'

"Nothing I could say reassured him, and by and by he went down to the workshop. 'Pretty soon I'll hear him building something,' I thought, and sure enough, in a few minutes I heard a sound of sawing and some muffled shouts. After a while he stopped shouting—he always does as the work starts to soothe him—and there was nothing but the sound of carpentry.

"He worked several hours that evening, and other evenings, and on weekends, too, but he wouldn't tell me what he was making. It was a surprise, he said. I thought, 'What on earth ——'

"Finally one evening he told me I could come down to the workshop. So I did and what I saw was this long queer-looking box on the floor.

"'What is it?' I asked. 'Some sort of boat?'

"He just looked at me. 'Boat, nothing,' he said. 'That's a coffin!'

"'A coffin!' I said. 'Why? For whom?'

"'For me,' Elmo said, and Zaida, you never heard such satisfaction in a human tone. 'Look how I've mortised the corners,' he said, proud as could be. 'They might have grown together, the tenons fitted in like silk! Look at the finish, smooth as a pearl. Why, it's a work of art!'

"'Elmo, I think that's morbid!' I told him. I didn't know whether to laugh or cry.

"But he was all enthusiasm. 'Fine wood!' he kept saying, slapping the coffin. 'Fine piece of redwood. Always knew I'd find a use for it.'

"'Well, I think it's morbid,' I told him again, and he said not at all, that it was practical, economical and forward-looking. So I thought, 'Well, if it makes him happy'—and I pretended to admire the horrible thing. (It really was very well made.) As I came up the basement steps I heard him whistling Scheherazade, and that always means he's in a good mood. Oh, I tell you, Zaida, Elmo has character traits that nobody suspects!"

"I'm beginning to believe you," said her friend. "Is it still here, the coffin?"

"Wait. So the next day was Saturday. Elmo was out all afternoon, playing golf, I thought, but that night when we were going to bed he said, 'Mary, I went to see Everett Tucker today. I thought now I've got this coffin and all I might as well see about a place to put it, so I decided to pick out a plot.'

"'Oh, Elmo, that's morbid!' I said (that's all I seemed to say to him those days).

"And Elmo said, 'So I went to the cemetery and walked around with Everett, and I don't know, it's the wrong time of year to pick out a plot. The grass was dead, the trees looked dead, the sky was gray, and nothing was making a noise except some crows, and they didn't sound cheerful. And—I don't know—all those mounds; those rows and rows of mounds. The whole place put me in mind of a big tidy, gloomy dormitory—everything kept in line, you know, kept in line forever.

"'Everett showed me a plot he considered ideal; secluded, with a good view of the fairgrounds and choice company each side: the Listers, the Wendell Baileys, and so on. And suddenly,' Elmo said, 'suddenly I couldn't stand any more and I said to him, "Everett, listen; you've just lost a customer. Because I've changed my mind and I'm not going to die. I'm never going to die; but if through some slip-up I do die I'm not going to be planted in this garden. No. I'm not going to be planted, period. I want my dust to blow in a lively place. I want free dust."'

"And then Elmo instructed me as to how he wished his ashes disposed of. Or 'dust,' as he prefers to call it. He said he wanted some scattered on the fairgrounds that that plot has such a good view of; and some on the portulaca bed at noon on a red-hot August day. He said to save a pinch to scatter in Shubert Alley sometime when I'd been to town to see a good show, and another for the Stadium during the Series.

"I kept myself from saying this was morbid, because it seemed to be doing him a world of good. Even after we were in bed with the light out he kept holding up my sleep with new ideas: a little dust to toss into the woods on a September night when the katydids were racketing, for instance. And he suggested that it might be nice if I could sprinkle some over the brasses at the Philharmonic, 'but I doubt if it would be feasible,' he said, wistfully, and I said, 'I doubt it.'

"Then, as I was really drifting off, he jolted me back by saying, 'I know! A week or two before Christmas you could go to Macy's, when it's good and crowded, and from the moving stairway, just between the main and second floors ——'

"But that was too much. 'Elmo, you stop being morbid!' I told him. 'Turn over, now, and go to sleep.'

"So he did, and slept like a baby too.

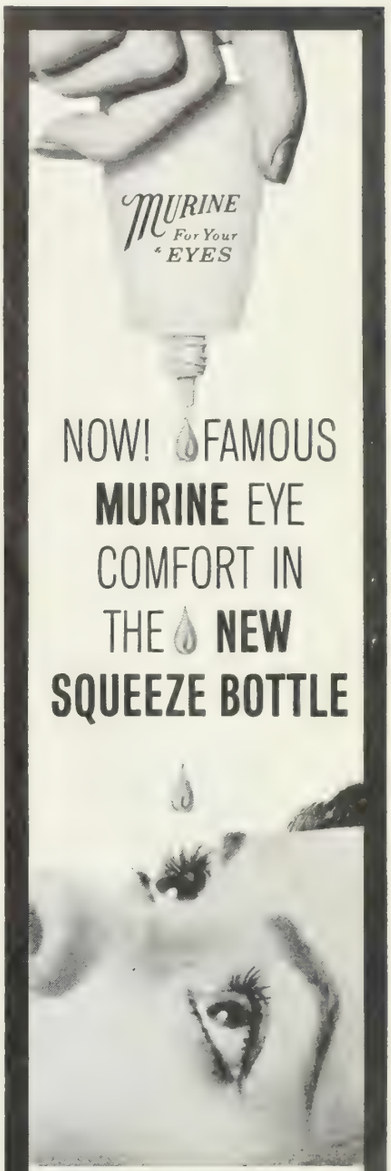
"The next day was Sunday, a lovely day, and after breakfast I had the heart to ask him what he was going to do with the coffin. 'Sell it?' I asked him. 'Can you sell a thing like that? Would the Thrift Shop take it?'

"But Elmo said, 'No, sir. That's good wood, and it's not going to be wasted. I know just where to use it.' And the next thing I knew he was measuring the television set."

Zaida stared at the handsome cabinet across the room. "For heaven's sake," she said.

"I know," said Mary.

From upstairs in Timmy's room came a throbbing of music, faint shrieks of song. Downstairs in the basement they heard the closing of a door, then footsteps running up the wooden stair; a sound of whistling.



"Listen," said Mary, holding up her hand and smiling. "It's Scheherazade. So that's all right again."

END

WOMEN'S IDEA EXCHANGE*

A zipper that doesn't zip. We've found a remedy: a crayon or a zipper lubricant (available in notion departments or dime stores) or beeswax. Actually the poor zipper does have an excuse for being balky. Hazel Owen points out that today's laundry detergents do a fine job of taking the grease out. This is O.K. for the salad dressing on your apron, but not so good for zippers.

*Send your idea to Women's Idea Exchange Editor. $5 will be paid for each one used in the JOURNAL.

NOW! FAMOUS MURINE EYE COMFORT IN THE NEW SQUEEZE BOTTLE

Just squeeze one drop at a time... discover the easy new way to soothe your eyes...and so relax tension!

The same famous, gentle Murine now in a handy plastic dispenser. Just squeeze out comforting Murine, one drop at a time. New container can't break or spill in purse or pocket. Discover this easy way to soothe your eyes . . . and so relax tension. Keep a new squeeze bottle of Murine at home, office and in your car.

Murine is also available in familiar glass bottle with separate eye dropper.

MURINE
*FOR YOUR EYES

The Murine Co., Inc., Chicago, U.S.A.
*Trademarks Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

Weatherwise, it may be winter. Fashionwise, Barbara J. knows now:

Spring is on the way

Mollie Farnham, our Barbara J., makes her first important investment for the new season ahead. Her choice (after careful contemplation) is a good beginning for almost any wardrobe: a dress and matching jacket.

For a special occasion, Mollie can wear the dress alone; for a pretty suit look, she adds the jacket. A many-occasion costume. Mollie thinks it's the perfect spring starter! By BET HART

Mollie thinks the dress alone is perfect for evening. She adds only a strand of pearls, matching earrings. The neckline is scooped at the front, ends in a V at the back.

A change in the dress: Mollie adds white bias piqué at the neckline; accents it with a pin.

A change in the suit: The white collar is quick to wash and dry (it's blended with Dacron), but this time Mollie wears the jacket without it and fills the neckline with a scarf. It might be white, blue . . . or more polka dots.

Two sure signs of spring: polka dots and navy-and-white. Mollie's investment combines both in a cotton-and-rayon dress with its own short, double-breasted jacket. Price, $24.95.

DRESS BY GRACE LACY, PHOTOGRAPH BY PRIGEN

I dreamed I was a medieval maiden in my maidenform® bra

The past was never quite this perfect! I'm a legendary figure in STAR FLOWER, Maidenform's newest work of art! Genius idea: petal-patterned circular-stitched cups, underlined with twin elastic bands (upper band expands for custom fitting cups; lower band expands for comfortable give-and-take). White cotton broadcloth. A, B and C cups. A collector's item at just 2.50!

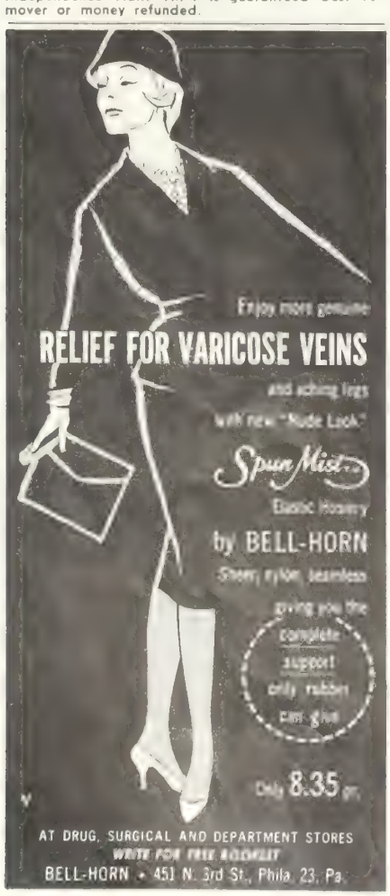
©1959 MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

CHAMBERLAIN'S
Clearly
your best moisturizer

CHAMBERLAIN'S
Clearly
your best hand lotion

When your hands are rough, red and dry, dermatologists say they lack moisture, not natural oils. Chamberlain's clear Golden Touch Hand Lotion contains not one but two of the most effective humectants known to science. Humectants are amazing clear fluids which control the delicate moisture balance of your skin by preventing the evaporation of vital skin moisture.



The secret of soft, smooth, lovely hands is moisture balance. Get clear, moisturizing Chamberlain's Hand Lotion today.

At all toiletry counters.

NOW! WASH AWAY PAINT WITH WATER

ANYBODY CAN EASILY REFINISH FURNITURE, FLOORS, WOODWORK WITH NEW DISCOVERY.

Ask for TM-4 WASH AWAY PAINT REMOVER. Just flow TM-4 on — wait — wash finish off WITH WATER. This is same paint remover used to renovate Independence Hall. TM-4 is guaranteed best remover or money refunded.

IF I HAD IT TO DO OVER AGAIN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 53

Bless him, he arrived with his family's coupé and a big box of candy. He took charge of my record player and the records. I had to have high heels, he said. While mother sewed up the hole in the seat of my faded (and I mean faded) old blue swim suit, I dashed around hunting for high heels. I'd never owned a pair, none of my three close girl friends owned a pair—Jeanette Johnson, Diane Higley, Barbara Christie—we were going to be gym teachers! Then I remembered Pat Hockingsmith—she had pretty feet and high-heeled shoes; I borrowed a pair of size four with four-inch heels. My feet almost killed me through the whole contest. When we'd finished the "beauty" parade and were on the "talent" phase, I came out to do Betty Hutton, but first I told the audience, "I'm wearing heels for the first time and they're killin' me. May I take 'em off?"

They clapped and shouted "Yes" and I went through my routine in comfort. Then I packed up and got ready to leave. It was all pretty confusing and I was still wandering around not knowing what I was supposed to do next when they started calling out the finalists. I'll always remember the Chamber of Commerce man shouting, "Mary Frances Reynolds." I knew he'd made a mistake; there was a big war whoop from the audience and someone pushed me out on the stage. You should see the pictures taken that night. My mouth is hanging open, I have a dazed stare, my mother is all teary, my brother is shocked and unbelieving, and Jerry is shouting, wild, absolutely out of his mind. My dad had stayed home like a sensible man and when we came home and told him, he couldn't believe it. He loved me, he's always believed in me, but this didn't seem to have anything to do with me.

Daddy got into it when the matter of the movie contract came up. I'd reigned as Queen of Burbank for two weeks, there'd been parades and festivities, I won a robe-and-pajama set, a string of pearls and a trip to New York (more of this later); and a couple of talent scouts who'd been in the audience that night flipped a coin to see which one would offer this crazy character a test: Al Trescony of M-G-M and Solly Baino of Warner Brothers. I don't know whether Solly won or lost the toss; anyhow, he's the one who called. He spoke to my father and was so nice that my parents let me go to the studio and make the test. It meant nothing to us, it was just part of a joke—until Solly Baino called again to say I was being offered a movie contract. Then it became a serious family problem.

My parents and grandparents, the Harmans, had belonged for at least thirty years to the Church of the Nazarene. From the time I was three weeks old I'd gone to church three times a week, to services, choir and prayer meeting. Our church meant a great deal to all of us, and far from members of this church being allowed to act, they aren't even allowed to see a movie, or to dance. My grandmother and grandfather had never seen a movie; the first one they ever saw was the first one I made. You can imagine how violently the church disapproved. Various members told me straight out—movies were evil and I'd be committing a sin.

"Have you ever been to a movie?" I'd say. "Do you really know anyone who works at a studio? Why is radio all right, and TV, and movies so wrong?"

They couldn't answer. They started praying for me. One day when I was utterly miserable, I talked to my grandfather, who'd come up to visit from Texas. Grandpa was a deeply religious man, a sort of lay preacher, and we were very close. I was born on his fortieth birthday and loved him dearly. Was it evil to go into show business? I asked him. I'd seen movies, they seemed pleasant enough, why was it sin?

"Mary Frances," he said, "if you feel in your heart that this is right for you to do and if you live by the Ten Commandments, you'll always live a good life."

Meanwhile, the church opposition, the terrific pressure had had a curious effect on my father. He'd never seen a movie either, but he said no one was going to tell him, he'd have to see for himself. He and my mother and I visited Warner Brothers' studio. Daddy watched them shoot pictures, he met the drama teacher, the dancing teacher, the schoolteacher, and Mushy Callahan at the gym; and he came away feeling that this was a business like any other business, trying to get a product made and marketed. He and mother saw nothing immoral in it. They thought I was pretty young, but the decision was up to me.

I said no, I couldn't give up school.

The studio people explained that I'd be going to school on the lot three hours a day; but I didn't want to give up Burbank High. Then they said that I could go to school on the lot and still go to Burbank High afternoons. The contract would be for a year with options, $65 a week. It was exactly like someone's saying, "You've won the Taj Mahal." Sixty-five dollars! The most I'd ever earned was 50 cents an hour working at Penney's at Christmastime. Sixty-five a week meant tuition for college, it meant wealth. I signed.

And this is one thing I would do differently if I had it to do again. I'd take the contract, but not until I was older. I never was in a picture that amounted to anything anyhow until I was eighteen, and it's better by far to finish segments of your living as you go along. That contract meant a whole new world, an adult, sophisticated world for which I was not prepared. It's much better to stay young as long as possible, enjoy high school normally. From the minute I started at Warner Brothers, even though I went to Burbank High every day, school was no longer the same. I, who'd been in on everything, was suddenly treated as an odd-ball. Kids I'd thought were my friends turned their backs and walked away. Not my close friends, of course, but plenty of others who thought I'd got stuck up and said so.

"Why do you act like that?" I'd demand, furious. "Do I look any different? Act any different? Have I changed even one bit?"

"No, but you will," they'd say. And at sixteen everything matters. It always matters, but at sixteen everything hurts.

It was a relief when summer vacation came and mother and I took off for New York—the trip I'd won. Have you ever been to New York in mid-July? We traveled tourist flight, the plane was packed, there was no air conditioning at the hotel, but we thought we'd never get there again and it was as wonderful as going to Mars. We'd borrowed $100 against my salary, and took every bus tour the city offered; the tenement kids were right when they yelled, "Rubbernecks, rubbernecks!" The Junior Chamber of Commerce people wanted us to see everything and we did; we walked so much my mother walked right through one pair of shoes.

That first year under contract was misery. I didn't have anything to do, unless you count two days' work as an extra on "June Bride" (if you blinked, you missed me). I helped the secretaries file, helped the teacher straighten up the schoolroom, helped the gardeners garden and went crazy. Solly Baino and Bill Orr decided against "Mary Frances" and named me "Debbie." I not only hated it, I didn't answer to it for at least two years.

At Christmas I was temporarily laid off. One day the studio called; they wanted me to come in for art or something, and mother explained that she was sorry I couldn't, I was working at J. C. Penney's. They were horrified. At Penney's? Their starlet? They phoned me at Penney's and told me to come at once, they'd pay me for the whole day.

"And lose my job?" I cried. I was earning 50 cents an hour at Penney's in charge of the Girl Scout Department and I wasn't about to give that up for one day at the studio.

After Christmas, of course, business went on as usual and I helped the secretaries and helped the gardeners and studied in the schoolroom, serving my time. Sometimes the crew let me walk way high up on the catwalks and watch. I was scared to death of meeting Jack Warner, for fear he'd fire me. The guard at the front gate would warn me, "Duck, here comes the boss." And I ducked. I never did come face to face with Mr. Warner and he fired me anyhow. They'd finally written in a little part for me as June Haver's sister in "The Daughter of Rosie O'Grady" and that did it.

I was thrilled. I could go back to the French horn, the band and the G.A.A. Only, within a week Solly Baino called me and carted me over to M-G-M. They were looking for someone to sing the Helen Kane number in "Three Little Words." All I had to do was sing "Boop-boop-a-doop" and they'd pay me $300 a week. Astronomical. Then producer Jack Cummings asked me to do "Two Weeks with Love" and I'd only have to sign a year's contract. I wouldn't be standing around M-G-M with nothing to do, I'd have plenty of work, there were only a few more months left of school, and college would be a certainty.

"Abba Dabba" from that picture became a record which sold 1,000,000 copies; I was sent on a personal-appearance tour at $2500 a week; and even more than the money, the audience "hooked" me. I suddenly enjoyed performing and stopped fighting show business. Up until now I'd been dying to get out; now I was dying to stay in. Staying in meant finding what in the world I was supposed to be doing. I'd been going on instinct in competition with girls who were beautiful and girls who were talented. I started studying dancing five and six hours a day, studying voice, diction and dramatics. For "Singing in the Rain" I had to really dance and there were only two months in which to learn. I couldn't dance around my own big toe; Gene Kelly and Donald O'Connor were experts. To be plunged into a professional situation over your head like this is a sensation similar to drowning. But now I didn't want to give up; I wanted to prove to myself I could do this.

What I had to do was learn and grow. Gene Kelly had me on sound stages day after day studying with Carol Haney, now a star, studying tap and ballet with Ernie Flatt, top choreographer, later, on The Hit Parade. Dance dance, dance. At night I'd go to the American Society of Dancing with my friend Camille Williams from Burbank High, who'd followed along as Miss Burbank of 1949. We took primitive jazz, modern tap and ballet. I danced until I was staggering, trying to cram into two months techniques which I might have learned in ten years. It was so frustrating; when Gene Kelly'd come on stage he'd find me slamming my dance shoes against the ceiling.

My temper was volcanic and my language abysmal. When my brother and I were tiny, Uncle Owen had taught us to swear like troopers; he'd give a prize to the one of us who cussed the best. More than once my mother'd been called to grammar school when I'd used a really delicious word on some little bully who'd just yanked up my skirt or pulled my hair. Mother felt it best not to make a point of Uncle Owen's language and she was right; by the time I was in high school it had vanished. Now, under tremendous pressure, back it came. I hate to be pushed; push me too far and . . . one day I was so exasperated I took off my tap shoes, hurled them against a huge mirror on the stage and shattered it. I cussed too. People, shocked, stared after me as I walked out.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

LADIES' CHOICE

By KAY OWENS

While some girls stay single—
And choose that lot—
Nearly all of them
Would rather knot.

Now! A better-fitting napkin you can wear and forget!

You're confident . . . eager . . . ready for the day's demands. At long last, here's a feminine napkin you can wear and forget!

Fems feminine napkins fit better and absorb better. Long enough to fit securely—yet there's not an ounce of extra bulk.

Now your napkin stays put even under stress, thanks to the extra length of the tab ends. What a feeling of security!

Forget about stains. Wear your nicest things, knowing there's a protective safety-cushion to prevent accidents, whether you're seated or moving about.

Forget about shifting and binding. Better-fitting Fems feminine napkins are made to adjust to your body without discomfort—no matter how active you may be.

Forget about chafing. Touch the chafe-free covering to the inside of your wrist, where your skin is extra sensitive. No wonder Fems bring welcome relief from chafing.

Fems absorb quickly. That's another protection against chafing. And both the covering and inner materials are designed to keep surfaces comfortably dry, even during the heaviest flow.

Would you pay a few cents more for all this extra comfort and confidence? Of course you would! So next time, wear Fems—and learn how freedom feels!

FEMS is a trademark of Kimberly-Clark Corp.

WHY MORE DENTISTS USE LAVORIS than all other mouthwashes combined!

Makes your mouth taste cleaner, feel healthier for hours

No Antiseptic . . . not even any other leading mouthwash . . . gives you the wonderfully refreshing feeling you get from LAVORIS.

In seconds, your mouth tastes so sparkling clean . . . LAVORIS clean! It feels so much healthier . . . and stays that way for hours.

There's no disagreeable medicine taste, no telltale medicine breath . . . yet LAVORIS kills millions of odor-causing germs on contact.

Your dentist will tell you a clean mouth is essential to good oral hygiene. And LAVORIS is a specialized formula with unique cleansing power that . . .

- Cleans food particles, impurities out of your mouth and throat.
- Kills millions of odor-causing germs on contact.
- Cleans away odors.
- Freshens your breath.
- Keeps your mouth tasting clean, feeling healthier for hours.

Try LAVORIS! You'll say . . . "No wonder more dentists use LAVORIS than all other mouthwashes combined." The best prescription for your mouth . . . see your dentist for professional care, use LAVORIS every day.

LAVORIS® Mouthwash and Gargle

Your mouth feels sparkling clean for hours

Only LAVORIS, of the 4 best selling mouthwashes, is accepted for advertising by the AMERICAN DENTAL ASSOCIATION.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

I was so ashamed I walked and walked around the big concrete stages. There must be some way to get things done without outraging other people, I thought, and from that day to this I've never again lost my temper.

It wasn't as hard as it sounds. The temper certainly had never accomplished anything; anger only begets anger in others, and you get a lot further by saying please and saying it quietly. If nothing else in the whole world, the movie career had taught me something as valuable as the college education I missed.

Now, I had been enticed to begin with by the money, and what has it accomplished for me? In the beginning it gave me pocket money. I could go bowling more than once a month. As time has gone on, it has enabled me to do many things for the people I love. My mother and father are both talented people. My mother sews beautifully; my father is able to build or fix anything. They have been able to become even more talented. Mother took courses in patternmaking and drafting; she's become expert. They can redecorate the house whenever they want, and it's possible to have new ranges and refrigerators and washing machines where, when I was a kid, we used things until they fell apart.

For me, personally, money has given the freedom to do many things. I don't actually believe in working mothers; perhaps because I went to school with a girl whose mother was an actress who could never be there when the other mothers were—not even for high-school graduation. By working at top speed now that my children are young, I'm hoping, in five years, to be able to work only for fun, and for perhaps three months a year while they're at school. Money gives you a sense of future security, the ability to give to charity, and a certain independence which probably in my case is dangerous. I was independent before I had two cents, and I don't think men like independence in women.

Actually, the money was less important than something else I hadn't counted on—the self-expression. I'm an extrovert, I love comedy ("The Gazebo") and I express myself in the parts I play. And drama, like my current "The Rat Race," and "The Pleasure of His Company," now in production, is exciting because it's a challenge and you constantly find new facets in your own self. It's a stimulating business, a good business, the horizons are international.

I'd do it again, but not at sixteen. And I'd prefer that my little girl, Carrie, finish high school before she ever enters show business—there is certainly a possibility of it; she has a tremendous imagination and she is the product of two show-business people. If she does grow up mad about the business, it would be silly for her to go to college. My son Todd, on the other hand, I want very much to go to college, and I'd hate his going within a mile of show business. For a man it's an insecure business with an average time span of five to ten years. Count them on your fingers: Gary Cooper, Jimmy Stewart, Cary Grant, Clark Gable, John Wayne. Yes, they've had good long careers, but they're each one in a thousand. A woman, logically, will marry and be cared for; but a man carries financial responsibility for a family and his career as an entertainer is precarious. I'd try to dissuade Todd. But Carrie ——

Someone recently—a top designer—said to me, "But would you really want your daughter in movies?" What he meant was, "Would you want her to be at the mercy of producers and directors, the Hollywood wolves who supposedly exact virtue as the price of a starring role, who chase every girl who appears on the studio horizon?" He was dumfounded when I told him that I've met all the top men in this business and all they've ever done was talk to me—from Howard Hughes down. As a matter of fact, I'm a fan of Howard Hughes; he produced "Susan Slept Here" and I found him a brilliant, friendly, warm human being I'd like to know better.

"Susan Slept Here" saved my life, by the way. I'd been very busy at M-G-M until Dore Schary became head of the studio. At first I didn't understand why everyone was working but me. Then I realized Mr. Schary didn't find me very talented and I didn't work three or four years. They were going to d me, I knew, when this chance for a loan- saved me. Dick Powell is a fine man an fine actor; he taught me a great deal. This actually my first big romantic role. There a scene where I was to reach up, put my ar around Dick's neck and kiss him. I shut eyes, missed his mouth and hit his nose. T director yelled "Cut," the crew was hysteric the make-up man rubbed the lipstick off Di and I almost died of embarrassment. D just said, "Keep your eyes open until you kissed, Debbie."

I wasn't exactly expert. I was the one w had held the light for the kissing game "Sp light" we played at parties. When any of t kids did ask me for a date in high school:

"Hey, Frannie, how about a date Saturday the movies?" (Everyone called me "Frannie

I'd say, "You really want to see the mo or you just want to neck?" I'd hid behi the couch and heard my brother and friends talk about girls, which ones wo "swing" and which ones wouldn't. No o was going to talk about me that way.

Even Hollywood hasn't changed me muc From the time I decided to find out what was doing and started the intensive lessons kept with those lessons until I got marrie And that meant classes almost every nigh Dating was pretty much a matter of necessit You have to go to cocktail parties a premières, you have to make appearances many business functions. I liked a number boys and dated a number, including Hu O'Brian and Tab Hunter, who are still f friends and who, like Jerry Odens, were co fortable with me and allowed me to be crazy and have as much fun as I liked. T same is true of the men I go with today. Th are tried, trusted friends with whom I can t at ease and have fun; good companions wh know me for exactly what I am; who kno that the last thing in the world I want rig now is anything serious.

The boy I dated most was Bob Wagne and he and I had some very happy time Actually, I had a kind of schoolgirl crush o Bob, but it was never a romance and in tim he outgrew me. He was very wise. We we getting into a dating habit; it wasn't a seriou thing, but it was too steady a thing. And Bo suggested that since neither of us was thinkin of romance or an engagement, we should sto dating for a while and date others. I like Bob, I liked any number of boys, but ther was always something lacking until I m Eddie. We met on the set of "Athena." I wa wearing a pair of old rehearsal tights, my hai was in pin curls—not even a trace of lipstick- and I was trying to play a harp twice as big a I was, thinking myself very much alone, prac ticing for a sequence in the picture. When looked up, there was Mr. Pasternak—an Eddie Fisher standing with his arms crossed smiling at me.

Our first date was at a party at Dina Shore's.

Our second was the next night at his Grov opening.

On our third date he proposed . . . marriage

It was a lovely, bewildering, happy time Neither of us had ever been in love before Neither of us had ever had time even to dat a great deal. Some people thought we couldn' make up our minds because we had a lon engagement—but we had a year's engagemen so we could get to know each other and know about each other's life.

This I would never do again.

What we did was put ourselves on the spot If you care for someone and just go steady with him, that's one thing; but the moment you become engaged, then the outside world moves in and you are bombarded. Just when you most need to be alone.

Most celebrities suffer tremendous unhappiness from the nonprivacy of their lives. It's something the person in show business finds difficult to understand and to which he never grows accustomed. At any rate, we were engaged for a year and I became more bewildered than ever.

Marriage is a complex situation; the more I knew about Eddie's life, the more bewildered I grew. I don't suppose there's anyone who, middle of the wedding, hasn't wondered haps escape might still be possible out ck door. We had wanted a big wedding t home. We postponed it when business Eddie east, and the press immediately ated that we'd broken up. We were d quietly a few days later; and the nt the barrage of conjecture subsided, I o longer frightened, all was well.

ve no regrets about my marriage. It was l, normal, all good. I have no regrets my love for Eddie, no embarrassment erness. He is the only man I ever loved. xperienced and learned a great deal. age is a way of life: two people wanting ate lasting happiness; and I don't know e who hasn't had some trouble achiev-

There's a lot of rough road to cover. e have to grow; learn and adjust to each If two people have faith, if they're both e, a happy marriage is certainly possible. ot the best informed on this subject, probably made a number of mistakes, at it's difficult I know—and not only in circles. The girls I went to school with been married and remarried, some of two or three times. One girl has six chil- another has two. They've married all of men in all kinds of businesses, and of their marriages didn't last either.

e thing I'm sure of: you must give all n give and whatever difficulty comes up, ust think "How important will this be e, ten, fifteen years? In terms of the bomb, how big is this argument?" Most doesn't last half an hour! When Mr. shchev was here, I became even more of this, of the need to put the emphasis ur personal life. In a world threatened s and H's, what is important except to r those you love, with those you love? t's what my parents did for us; that's I want to do. Children I've wanted as ck as I can remember. They are a great nd I have found I can express myself s happily as a mother, am just as fulfilled y with Carrie and Todd, as I am in . Todd is a little more reserved, but he's warming up to make-believe, and Carrie is a little extrovert and ham. Children don't ask to be born and they deserve all the love, the understanding and the time my parents gave Bill and me. We used to sit around the table every night at dinner and discuss everything. There are so many questions to ask, so many discoveries to share. My parents were Scout leaders. Mother let us have meetings at home; she took the girls on overnight hikes. Daddy helped her. But that was only part of it. They listened to us; they were firm in their discipline. At least my father was firm once and never had to be again—when my brother and I set the house on fire. Billy was five and he got spanked. I was three, so I simply watched; but it was all my mother had said one of daddy's spankings would be. There wasn't much discipline problem after that. I only mention discipline at all because it's part of a child's security, and I like to be on hand to establish my children's security as much as possible.

My parents were with Bill and me and they gave us a faith and a sense of security that is the backbone of my life and has seen me through a lot.

This last year and a half hasn't been easy. Being hot copy means pinning your life to a bulletin board, and it's a blow to a woman who loves a man to find that he loves someone else. The easiest road out is to be destroyed. You can take unhappiness and knit it into endless unhappiness, or you can take unhappiness and utilize it as an experience toward happiness. You have to rebuild your own self-confidence. You have to realize that it isn't extraordinary for people to go through many things; that life is a matter of the bitter and the sweet and there must be some reason ——

I mentioned that we had been engaged for a year so that we could know each other; but the fact is that I doubt that men and women ever do know each other. And I'm the living proof of that. I was never happier in my marriage than when I didn't know it was ending. When the newspapers phoned me from New York and I denied everything, I was only telling what I thought was the absolute truth.

Now I realize that people are capable of changing from day to day, that no one, even oneself, runs true to the mill. At one point on the road, it's possible to take another road entirely. I don't think one knows even oneself. We are all capable of doing something unexpectedly, out of passion.

At the moment of calamity, I had help. My mother and father asked no questions—each of us has our own life and they respect this—but they looked as badly as I did . . . and they believed in me. I phoned them as soon as I knew what had happened. And I phoned my friend Camille Williams, who had just come

Only those are fit to live who do not fear to die; and none are fit to die who have shrunk from the joy of life. Life and death are parts of the great adventure. THEODORE ROOSEVELT home from a tour with Dan Dailey. My other dear friend, Jeanette Johnson, would have come, I'm sure, but she is the gym teacher we dreamed of being and it wouldn't be fair to drag her away from her busy job at Glendale High. Camille was free and she came at once and stayed six months. I owe her more than I can ever repay; for if you are to save yourself in a case like this, you have first to get everything off your chest, all the horrible pent-up pressure. I talked to Camille and she did me the enormous favor of listening and forgetting.

I owe my brother Bill a lot too. He moved into the house and has been here ever since. He's studying to be a make-up man and he works hard from seven to five, but he's great around the house, a right and left arm. Last weekend he and my dad cleaned out all the debris around the eaves and trimmed the olive tree and Bill cemented back into the wall the gate that had accidentally fallen out. It's important for the children to have a man around the house, and Bill roughhouses with Todd, which is good.

And Marge Champion. I'm crazy about Marge and we've become close friends ever since our babies were born. She's a steadfast friend and you can depend on her advice. It isn't emotional advice, never one-sided but always philosophical, objective advice. With Marge and Gower, I started attending church for the first time in several years. From the first Sunday I realized there had been a void in my life; now it's a great source of strength and calm.

I owe a great deal, too, to the good job awaiting me. To be able to give enjoyment to people not only keeps one busy, but helps rebuild one's mental confidence. You have to believe in yourself again as a human being and as a woman.

I don't question what has been. The point is that you must utilize experience, learn from it and grow. Even the publicity I decry—and I still say that there are matters which could be handled with far more taste and less pain by three people than by millions—yet normally there is a warm and wonderful feeling as you go about the country and are aware of people everywhere as a sort of big-sized family. If as you grow and mature some of the naïveté rubs off, there is comfort in the fact that you learn from everything. I'll never be surprised again. I may be hurt, but never surprised. You can never be the same as you were. Who is going to stick his finger into a wall socket again? Or if he does, he'll at least know what he's doing.

Today, for the first time, I can look life in the eye, know what it's about and enjoy it more than ever before. I'm looking forward to the next five years, because they promise so much, because it's a beautiful life and I've just begun to live it. I'm looking forward with all my heart; and when I do look back—yes, I'd do it over again. END

In Just 15 Days You Will See How Wonderfully

"Ice" Helps Improve Touchy Skins That Break Out*

—without costly facials, "lights", hormone creams or any other complicated skin treatments

v York, N. Y. (Special)—Skin scientists have developed an invisible pharmaceutical ice—O-Derm—that promises miraculous new-ing complexions. Ice-O-Derm actually gives e table results of changes you can see.

ce-O-Derm replaces sent ordinary meth- Fortified by proper rition, good circula- and facial cleanli- s, it will give you itive results—time- le results or your ney back.

$1 plus tax

ue to overactive l glands in skin.

AT DRUG AND DEPARTMENT STORES

Here is Your 15-Day Complexion Timetable

1st 5 days: Ingredient number one helps free pores of blackheads, pasty fat and impurities not removed by soap and water—helps prevent pimple infection from spreading. Result: Clearer, fresher skin!

2nd 5 days: Ingredient number two holds moisture in, shields it from sun, winds, steam heat that dry out and wrinkle skin. Result: Softer, moister, skin!

3rd 5 days: Ingredient number three stimulates and improves skin circulation, tightens pores and helps build up resistance against surface infection. Result: Firmer, healthier looking skin!

©1960 Shulton, Inc., Pharmaceutical Div., Clifton, N. J.

BECAUSE WOMEN CARE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

growing pains, to form the new "R-2" district. Her second son, Jimmy, was now in a first grade of 53 children. But that fall she happened to go to a meeting.

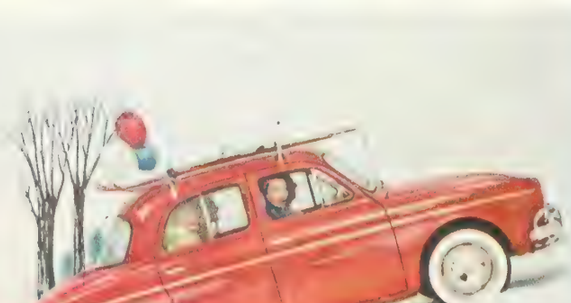
Two years before, the state of Missouri had asked a group of leading citizens to make an impartial study of Missouri's schools. This citizens' committee was now anxious to get its findings to individual school districts. One of the committee members, Mrs. Aaron Fischer, from nearby St. Louis, came to address the Teachers' Association of newly formed R-2.

Mrs. Bastian remembers, "It wasn't going to do any good to talk to the teachers, but there was no organized public for her to talk to. I was vice president of the Lee Hamilton P.T.A. at that time, and my president called me up and suggested we go. Everyone there was given a little digest of the committee's official report, and as I read it I was simply appalled. I wrote the very next day for a copy of the full report."

To Mrs. Bastian, firm believer that education should be an intellectual experience, this report was a revelation. There she found her first clear picture of the system which would be educating the three sons of whom she w so proud (Jimmy, too, was turnin out extra-bright). It was a picture of ay- below-average state support for lu- cation in spite of above-av ge wealth, below-average teachers' al- aries and patchwork teacher trai ng. Teacher certification was in a sta of utter confusion, with 81 different pos of certificates listed by the state nd certain special state requiren nts (such as credits in Missouri his y) effectively discouraging teachers m out of state. Kindergartens rece ed no state money, had no state st d- ards set for them at all.

What struck her most, howe , were the state's standards for gra a- tion from high school. A high-sc ol diploma required 17 credits, but ly 8 of these (spread over four ye s) needed to be in academic subj s. This minimum applied to all stude s, regardless of ability. In additio l credit in "fine arts" was requ d (chorus and band were the most p- ular), 1 in "practical arts" (shop d home economics) and 1 in phys l education. The remaining 6 cre s were wholly elective.

It seemed to Mrs. Bastian that e report's "conclusions" that gre r state aid was needed, that teac r training should be improved, sala s raised were manifestly just and t . Above all, it seemed to her that e report's restrained comment on e number of school hours spent i basketball was not nearly outspo n enough. She began to realize tha her own district buildings were the only problem; quality of edu tion was another. It was shared only in St. Louis County but acr Missouri, probably across Ameri



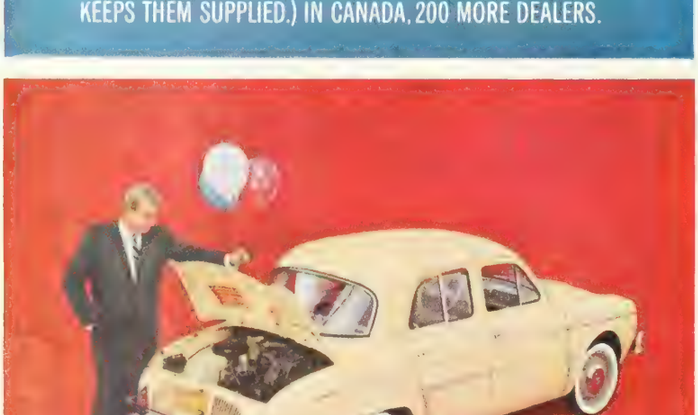
She says now, "It was this rep that got me started." The next sch year of '53–'54 curly-haired Mild Bastian, with the warmly infecti manner and capable air, was elec president of the Lee Hamilton P.T. but it was not an office that inspi her with its possibilities. As she sa "There was no organization amo all the P.T.A.'s in the district f taking up common problems." O the winter she began jotting down t names of people she knew or hea about who were interested in (or w ried about) the schools.

By spring she finally went to t telephone with her list of names in h hand. She was not quite sure what s was starting, and she had had no e perience in organizing things oth than in her job as secretary before h marriage, and volunteer work wi the Red Cross and the League Women Voters in her new communi since. But she was amazed at the r sponse she wakened. She found th under the surface of R-2's appare apathy were many citizens who b lieved strongly in good schools, an were delighted to be offered a chan to work for them.

The first result of Mrs. Bastian telephoning was a meeting of 30 pe ple in the living room of a Ferguso home. In August, the group of 3 advertised a public meeting in a Fe guson park. Close to 150 people fro every corner of the district turned ou including many business and profe sional talents. They organized them selves, drew up a constitution, name committees. "We were a citizens group, you understand. We wante people to know that these were thei schools. We've asked professiona school people to help all along, bu no school people are members." Thu was the "R-2 School District Al liance" born.

Mrs. Bastian is quick to say of th Alliance's growth, "So many peopl worked on it. I had very little to d

L'ILLUSTRÉ ALPHABÉTIQUE DE L'AUTOMOBILE OR, HOW TO MAKE YOUR DRIVING FUN AGAIN.



ASSURANCE DE TRACTION: See the snowy road. It has ice on it. Other cars stall. See the Dauphine sail on freely. Its weight distribution is the secret of the wonderful traction.

BEAUCOUP QUALITY DEALERS: IN THE U.S. OVER 800 AUTHORIZED RENAULT DEALERS. THERE ARE FACTORY-TRAINED MECHANICS AT EVERY ONE. AND A FULL SUPPLY OF PARTS. (A REGULARLY-SCHEDULED AIR-LIFT FROM FRANCE KEEPS THEM SUPPLIED.) IN CANADA, 200 MORE DEALERS.

CALCULATION SIMPLE: 1. The price is $1645.* 2. You get as much as 40 mpg. And, 3. you'll have years of trouble free driving. These 3 together can save you hundreds of dollars. Think of what you can do with these savings. Think of the elegant Paris lines. Calculate a little.

DETAILS ESSENTIELS: WHERE IS THE ENGINE? IN THE REAR. BIG MEN IN MOTOR SCIENCE PREDICT ALL AUTOS WILL BE THUS IN A FEW YEARS. (ELIMINATES HUMP IN FLOOR) RENAULT PIONEERED THIS ADVANCE; ROAD TESTED IT FOR YEARS. ANOTHER ADVANCE... 1-UNIT BODY CHASSIS CONSTRUCTION. CHECK DEALER FOR MORE.

DRESS BY ARNOLD AND FOX

Le Car Hot: RENAULT Dauphine

*...TRANS. ...

t. Besides—I had a baby while this was on."

s. Bastian had discovered she was pregn June, about the time the first meeting took place. During the Alliance's first he served on its board, but her preferred on to this day is behind the scenes—at tle dining-room desk where she can keep e on the children in the yard, and drop ork to start dinner when it's time. There been a few epochal times in recent years she has been extremely busy with major cts, and away from home a good part of y, but even then her family has cheerfully er through them. Mr. Bastian, a tall, late man, as interested in education as fe, complains that too many of his staff plumbing-contracting business don't how to figure percentages even though re high-school graduates. The boys know hese great affairs involving their mother rn their very own schools. Mrs. Bastian so had her faithful helper, Gertrude, for ys a week since her youngest boy, Petey, hree. Her general rule of thumb is to the children all my time when it's their think they'd rather have an undistracted na for half an hour than a distracted one y long."

early December of 1954 the fourth n child, a daughter, was born. Today ar-old Katherine Emily, a dark-haired ubbed "Casey" by the family, is proving ght as her brothers. She can take tele- messages, count backward from twelve, ut catchup on her own hamburger with- billing, and is still another reason why eeds good schools.

s. Bastian says, "To tell the truth, when liance formed, the school board and staff were slightly worried. How a citizens' like ours avoids suspicion is the sixty- ollar question."

the school people were to stay to bless oup of hard-working citizens. All during 0's industry found a perfect site for h in the broad river valley north of St. Factories sprang up like mushrooms f R-2's borders. What sprang up within ders were housing developments.

rkers have flooded into them, bringing ribs and their tricycles and their chil- Florissant (1950 pop., 3700) has become ling ranch-type city of 25,000. Ferguson most doubled again to 21,000.

the six years since the Alliance was d, R-2 has had to put up ten new schools, ditions to both old and new. The dis- as qualified for Federal aid, since it is a se impact" area (Mrs. Bastian says, "I ve Federal aid to education; we've made ffective use of it here"), but bond issue ond issue and increased local taxes have ecessary as well. Of the 29 districts in uis County, R-2 is now second in school ation, but it ranks only twenty-first in , and these taxes have hurt. Thus the ce's first job has been as an unofficial -relations arm of the school board—g facts before the public, organizing intensive campaigns, getting out record votes. Mrs. Bastian is running out of fingers to count the bond issues she has helped campaign for; she once made five speeches in a single day.

This has been hard and necessary work, but not the work of her heart. She was eager from the first for the Alliance to tackle that other problem—the quality of education—and she saw its opportunity in 1955, the year when President Eisenhower summoned top leaders in education from across the country to the White House to discuss urgent national problems. It was a year when educators and citizens in every state were meeting to thrash things out before sending representatives to Washington. Smaller communities held local conferences to precede state ones. Some states held several hundred such community conferences. Missouri held two, one in St. Louis, the other in R-2.

The "R-2 School District Community White House Conference" was a triumphant success. Sponsored wholly by the Alliance, it gave interested citizens their first large-scale chance to work out with school people the pattern they wanted their local schools to follow. Two discussion workshops were held, followed by a final meeting in Ferguson High School. Five hundred people in all came to argue issues that concerned them all. Mrs. Bastian says, "We worked our heads off. But we think our people were fairly well informed, and we hammered out the issues toe to toe."

Perhaps the heart of the conference's findings is best expressed in a letter written by the conference chairman (Mrs. Bastian had had the catchall title of "co-ordinator") after it was all over. He wrote, "I believe that the need for community conferences is evident from the divergence of opinion between educators and lay people shown in our conference. State conferences which are dominated by educators . . . are only partially representative."

Mrs. Bastian is putting this another way when she says, "I think it's fascinating that whenever you get parents together to discuss education, the thing they want to talk about is curriculum." Many of the conference's resolutions passed unanimously, but one of those that received a vote of 52 "for" and 37 "against" was: "That the high school require a greater emphasis on basic science and cultural subjects, toward an understanding of our modern world." It was the schoolteachers who provided most of the "nays."

Public-school teachers, deeply embedded in the present school system, have many reasons for a different outlook from parents', including their day-to-day experience with students, but to Mrs. Bastian it was becoming clearer that if the aims of public education were to rise, citizens like herself would have to provide the leadership. Therefore when Mrs. Aaron Fischer, who had become deeply impressed at the remarkable activity going on within R-2 in recent years, invited her to help prepare a similar regional "workshop" conference for the whole of St. Louis County, she could not resist the invitation.

Preparing for the first "St. Louis/St. Louis County White House Conference" during 1956 was one of those epochal periods (she was in charge of all written material) that took Mrs. Bastian away from her quiet desk at home. But she has never regretted her decision to move into a larger arena, for there is no doubt in her mind that the St. Louis WHC has proved big enough to get things done. The first public conference was such a success that the St. Louis WHC decided to become a permanent organization. Mrs. Fischer has been chairman, Mrs. Bastian served three years as secretary and as a member of several committees. Thanks to the workshop's "resolutions," the Conference had a definite program, and Conference representatives (often Mrs. Fischer and Mrs. Bastian) made very sure that state legislators, the state education department, and St. Louis school officials knew just what it was, and how widely and strongly it had citizen support. The year after the St. Louis WHC was formed, the legislature voted full funds for an extensive program to increase state aid to local districts. The education department worked out reciprocal teacher-certification agreements with five neighboring states, a measure strongly urged by the St. Louis group to ease the teacher shortage. The St. Louis school board appointed a committee which

YOU KNOW ME

By MEMORY McGONIGAL

In a crowd of a thousand you'd know me, you said. We laughed
At our fond first-plighted importance, but gently, a truth
Lies under the laughter of lovers. Even in the daft
Bright words of beginning, it was true. I knew. There is a truth
Like the seeing sun in your eyes; you know me indeed,
Even in the chittering crowd that a woman is:
The drudge, day-driven . . . the infant stringent with need . . .
The matriarch in marble . . . the minx in the frizz
Of fashion—in a moment, out of all these noisy strangers
You know me, always; you find me, tangled and tossed
Although I am, among chiders and knowing changers:
And then, as simply as a child no longer lost,
One goes running to meet you, with a quick glad cry,
Out of the moon-flung multiple that is I.

While sleep recharges your body

Prince Matchabelli's new face cream

recharges your skin

At night—when skin cell renewal is at its peak—Polyderm Compensating Cream replenishes your skin with polyunsaturates...elements of young skin that time drains away

Now you can recharge your skin with Polyderm—the cream that contains all 3 polyunsaturates—natural elements of beautiful, young skin. (In fact, 20-year-old skin is almost 50% richer in these elements than skin at age 40.)

Just cleanse your face before bed; then gently massage this vital, greaseless cream into your face and throat. Light, penetrating—Polyderm moisturizes and revitalizes dry, tired, end-of-day skin . . . recharging skin all night with all 3 beautifying polyunsaturates.

When you awaken, you'll sense a new, alive feeling in your skin. And before you know it, that vital, young look can be yours again. Daytime, enjoy Polyderm's greaseless moisturizing under make-up. $2, $3.50, $5 plus tax. Or try a sample size jar. Send 25¢, your name and address to Polyderm, c/o Prince Matchabelli, Dept. L-2, Box 32, Mt. Vernon, N.Y.

Complete your beauty treatment with New Polyderm Skin Freshener, $1.50, and New Polyderm Extra Deep Skin Cleanser, $2

Polyderm by PRINCE MATCHABELLI

NOW!

The paper napkin most like linen in big dinner size, brand new box!

Scotkins® are the only linen-like paper napkin in big, big dinner size. More than a square foot big, to give you a whole lapful of linen-luxurious protection.

Scotkins don't shred, don't fall apart, evén with fried chicken. Get Scotkins in the brand new box. One paper napkin you don't need three of! Also made and sold in Canada eventually set up a city-wide system of ability grouping in classrooms.

Once again, much of Mrs. Bastian's work for the St. Louis WHC has been backstage paper work (Mrs. Fischer says of Mrs. Bastian, "Mildred is a rock of reliability. And when ability like hers is coupled to a disposition like hers, this is a joy!"). But one of her keenest satisfactions was her association with her chairman, Mrs. Fischer, whose devotion to the cause of high-quality public education matches her own. The two women have become fast friends, and together have stanchly supported the St. Louis WHC's growing interest in their common concern: curriculum. In 1958 the St. Louis WHC staged its second public workshop, at which citizens and schoolmen once more discussed the issues. By this time the tenor of criticism had grown sharper. The 1958 conference recommended more mathematics, science and humanities, more opportunity to study foreign languages, an accelerated curriculum for the able, multiple graduation requirements for high schools. Once again publicity was wide. Mrs. Bastian alone appeared on four television panel shows. She reports with glee that unknown thousands of St. Louis citizens watching one of them saw a high-school student on the panel rise and say, "We don't work half as hard as we should in school, and what's more, we're not required to."

She says, "The White House Conference is my love. You do have to have buildings, but you also have to keep up curriculum standards, teacher qualifications. You can do so much more toward this if you have a broad group behind you that has endorsed these standards. If you can go to your superintendent and say, 'The regional conference recommended that there should be a minimum program for gifted students. Isn't that a wonderful thing to shoot at?' this is so much better for him to hear than complaints about his schools."

The influence a large body like the St. Louis WHC has on individual districts is not always measurable, but Mrs. Bastian is certain that when a district has a citizens' group like R-2's Alliance, ready to carry the ball straight to its own school officials, results are more apt to show. Certainly the academic atmosphere in R-2 has been more electric in recent years than at any other time within Superintendent McCluer's memory. As he puts it, "The Alliance is giving us the first real public support we've ever had for something other than dramatics or competitive sports." Evidence of this new spirit was the fact that last year the school board asked Mrs. Bastian to serve on a citizens' committee to study the curriculum being offered in R-2's schools. It was a courageous step, for it meant inviting impartial criticism. It was also an invitation for her to ge[t] heart of what she cared about most—t[he] stuff of education.

For a good part of last year, Ja[mes] Conant's The American High School T[oday] a worn paperback edition was Mrs. B[astian's] bible. She returned contentedly to des[k] at home, with the sounds of children's [voices] in her ear. The final report, finished la[st] mer, showed, among other things, t[hat] Ferguson High School class of 1958 hac[d] percentage of what Dr. Conant calls [an] demically talented" youngsters—thos[e] tested in the superior range or were ou[t] ing in elementary algebra; 22 per cent [of] class fell in this category. Mrs. Bastian [has] what Dr. Conant calls an "academic [his]tory" of their school records, to find o[ut] what kind of education these "superior" [pupils] had received. It is a procedure Dr. C[onant] urges upon all high schools, for no one [else] knows what the national picture is. Fe[rgu]son record may be typical: Not a single [boy] girl had taken Dr. Conant's recomm[ended] four years of mathematics; only 28 pe[r cent] had taken three years. Only 15 per c[ent] these superior boys, 8 per cent of th[em] had taken his recommended minimum [of] academic courses requiring homework [in] their four years of high school. Mrs. B[astian] picks up a card with a look of real sh[ock] her face, and says, "Look! Here's a bo[y] an I.Q. of 125. Four credits in chorus! [One] in shop! This is the way he earned his [high] school diploma!"

Her shock is not directed at the high-s[chool] teachers who let this happen. As far as a[nyone] knows, Ferguson is as good as mos[t] schools across the country. Mrs. Bastian [does] not even argue with Superintendent Mc[Cluer] who feels obliged to remind Alliance me[mbers] from time to time that "our students ar[e] variously motivated. A big high school [must] be vocational and comprehensive." Her [concern] is directed only at what she regards as a[n] waste of intellectual capacity.

She feels that pressure from groups lik[e the] Alliance and the St. Louis WHC is essen[tial] this waste is to be stopped by even a little. [But] these things move slowly. But they do m[ove]. And Superintendent McCluer adds, "I [want] this: if parents want more academic sub[jects] they're going to get them. They have or[ganized] tell us."

After six years of helping tell, Mrs. B[astian] can now say, "R-Two has had its extra [share] lem of dramatic growth, but I think [we've] done just about as well as most distric[ts] improving the quality of our education [here]. She smiles and adds, "You know, I think [what] I've been working for all along is to ge[t the] high school in shape before my boys get th[ere]

YOU CAN HAVE FUN WITH YOUR CHILDREN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 77

But after he's had her on the defensive for a few weeks she's glad to settle for merely keeping the upper hand in a majority of their encounters.

Things are easier in the three-to-six-year-old period because most children have stopped making so many issues just for the sake of making issues. They admire their parents and want to be like them. It's enjoyable for parents to be considered strong, handsome, wise, rich, even if it's only a three-year-old who thinks so. Children at this age are delightful in other ways. They show affection quite freely. Despite their lack of knowledge, they are surprisingly sophisticated in their evaluation [of] people and events. In other words, they are good companions—if we can only stop being drill sergeants long enough to give them the chance.

After the age of six or seven the pickings are thinner. The child senses that he must graduate from being a parent-adoring person, and be on his way toward becoming a citizen of the outside world. He can't give up his intense attachment to parents gracefully. He must push them away impatiently, question their statements, balk at their rules, absent-mindedly repeat habits that irritate them, scowl at them. This shift comes as a rude shock to inexperienced parents. Where is their satisfaction now? The outlook isn[t] gloomy as I've made out, of course. To [the] degree that the parents can hit the right [bal]ance between keeping reasonable con[trol] allowing sensible independence, playing [up] the child's budding sense of responsib[ility] they can still have fun with him. But now [most] of their gratification must come from s[ee]ing his successes outside the home, in schoo[l] friendships, in projects. They can shar[e] these triumphs from a distance, secretly. [They] can't horn in too closely on these activ[ities] or he will clam up and fend them off. [The] parents' cue is to be interested listeners w[hen] he feels like recounting his exploits (no o[ne] any age can resist talking when he has ar[e]preciative audience) and to avoid criti[cism] like the plague at such times, unless a [real] issue of morals is involved.

Another cue is to respond co-operative[ly] requests for assistance in building sche[mes] expeditions, formation of Cub Scout gro[ups]. It's hard for parents, who are used to b[eing] the boss and who also find the best of chil[dren] boring after a number of hours, sudden[ly] switch roles and play the willing assistant [to] child who is taking the initiative.

I won't try to go far in discussing ad[o]cence—it's too complicated. In some resp[ects] this is the hardest period in which to e[ver] ıe's children. They are apt to become even ore critical and argumentative because, as ey approach adulthood, they feel an increas- g rivalry and rebelliousness. On the other nd, their interests and tastes are maturing, they may be able to share these more nuinely with their parents, at moments when e mood is just right.

Is it harder to enjoy one's children today an in previous centuries? I can see pros and ns, but I don't know how they balance out. lo think that parenthood has been made less mfortable for many parents by the coming all the new professions into the children's ld: the psychologists, psychiatrists, pedia- cians, child educators, parent educators. ıey have made modern parents acutely vare of all the thousands of things children ed in order to be healthy and secure, from tamin A, allowances and affection to zwie- ck, zinc ointment, and zoology in school. is knowledge has given conscientious par- ts a burdensome sense of obligation, and a nviction that every fault in the child is their ult. Think of how much pleasanter it must ve been when parents and grandparents re the supreme experts in child care, and ıen maladjusted children were just bad, at's all, and downright unappreciative of all at was being done for them. On the other nd, in those days diphtheria, scarlet fever, ieumonia, infant diarrhea were ever-present reats which killed hundred of thousands of ildren every year. That must have impaired e enjoyment of parenthood. I also imagine at, back in the days when children were eant to be seen but not heard, when it was widely assumed that they came into the rld as barbarians and could be civilized ly by unremitting parental correction (as is ll largely believed in some European coun- es), it didn't occur to many mothers and thers that children could be fun to live with. Now I'd like to look more closely at present- y parenthood, and focus on the differences tween those who seem to enjoy their chil- en a lot and those who don't enjoy them arly enough. We could say, as a rough rule, that parents who are happy have a better time with their children, but this statement doesn't explain anything that isn't obvious already. We can understand this a shade better if we realize that people who are contented in adulthood were generally the same way in childhood. Their parents brought them up in such a way that they accepted themselves comfortably, enjoyed life, liked their parents most of the time. When they grow up and become parents, they trust themselves because they assume they'll do the job as well as their own parents did. And they trust their children because they learned every day in their own childhoods that children are trustworthy.

In contrast are the mothers and fathers who were made to feel too guilty in their own childhood, made to feel that they were basically naughty and unreliable, even though the neighbors might have considered them very good indeed. (I'm not talking here about the children who were really bad—only about those who felt they were bad.) When they become parents in turn they don't have enough confidence in themselves or in their children. So they worry too much, fuss too much, nag too much. Thus they cut themselves out of a lot of pleasure. And of course they irritate and provoke their children so that the latter are less pleasant to be with.

This factor—of reliving our own childhoods to some degree in rearing our children—shows up in many of us in the way we are particularly apt to identify with our first child, especially if he is of our own sex. We are overinvolved in everything he does, wanting him to triumph in all the ways we triumphed or wanted to triumph, dreading that he will fail in the respects in which we failed or nearly failed. We are much more likely to let subsequent children be themselves.

You can see that I've been up to my old habit, when trying to make a point, of putting parents into two contrasting groups. In actuality there are very few parents who enjoy their children all the time, and very few who never enjoy them. Most of us lie in the middle. In rare moments of reflection we wish it were possible to be up closer to the ideal end of the scale. I myself have had those pangs of regret, mainly when I was away from home on a professional trip. I would remember all the delightful and admirable qualities in my children, wonder why I had to act dissatisfied so much at the time when I was with them, and kick myself. But it didn't seem to have done much good when I got back.

Is there no way, then, of enjoying our children more, since we can't go back and live our own childhoods differently? In the first place, we aren't victims of our fate nearly so much as I've made out in this oversimplified discussion. We have considerable free will. We all use our judgment in bringing up our children somewhat differently from the way we were raised.

Though I don't believe that parents can do a better job by being told to act differently (which only confuses and inhibits them), I'm quite convinced that they can help themselves by understanding children's motives and development more clearly. This can be done by watching children, reading about them, discussing them with other parents and professional advisers. When you know that it's common for one-year-olds to become picky eaters, that it's normal for a child after six to become less well mannered and well groomed, less charming, more pesky, you won't be so threatened by the change, you won't take it so personally.

I think it helps parents, too, to find out that other parents have the same problems, become frustrated, get mad at their children, treat them unfairly at times. This is comforting and actually leads to better relations.

Parents who are distressed about their children most of the time, and have hardly any fun with them at all, can get more help by turning to a family social agency or child-guidance clinic. It takes long-term counseling to untangle the causes of such problems and dispel them.

When all is said and done, I don't think that parents can experience, for long periods, the pure delight in being with children that some grandparents speak of. That degree of enjoyment is possible only because long-range responsibility is lacking. (If it were necessary for the grandmother to adopt the child, she'd be back in the stew.) It's part of the basic nature of a parent to be concerned. If he weren't concerned, he couldn't be a good parent. The child wouldn't recognize him as a parent or turn to him whenever he really needed guidance and security.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

GIFTS

By JEAN TODD FREEMAN

These you may give me: the warmth of your voice,
Your quick amusement when I am clever,
Your hand in welcome—but never, never
A hint that I am your love, your choice.

These we may share: a meeting by chance,
A casual walk till our two ways part,
And careful talk about books and art—
But never, never a telling glance.

For I must give you the practiced smile
Of one committed to loving vainly,
And mask my face, lest it show too plainly
The ravages of my long denial.

The age of greatest growth . . . The Protein Age

Baby's "hungry as a little lion" when they're Swift's Meats!

. . . time to trust Swift . . . the meat specialist!

The Protein Age is your baby's first year . . . the time of fastest growth, almost unbelievable development of bone, muscle, mind and nerves. It's the time for the body-building benefits of meat, especially the complete, high-quality proteins only meat provides. It's the time to trust Swift, the meat specialist . . . for the very best in High Meat Dinners—6 delicious one-jar meals rich in Swift's high-protein meat, with choice vegetables and cereal. And for lean 100% Meats—9 nourishing varieties (available in tins on the west coast).

Swift's Premium

. . . the two most trusted words in meat.

OUR 105th YEAR

THE WELL-FED BRIDEGROOM*

DI PIETRO

The kitchen can quickly become the heart of even the newest home.

By MARGARET WILLIAMS

Thinly sliced ham simmered in a ruby cranberry sauce, golden cheese grits and a salad medley for a casual Sunday supper.

STUART

Mostly, brides approach the subject of cooking with happy, loving hearts, and a slight case of beginner's jitters. For them, here's a meal that has everything, calculated to make the most inexperienced cook feel right at home in her kitchen. Our delicious main dish, Ham Alalou, has great showmanship: it may be sizzled in a chafing dish right at the table in a matter of minutes, or brought to the table piping hot in one of the numerous attractive stove-to-table skillets. The ham may be the "bought" kind, thinly sliced at the grocery store or delicatessen, with the fat removed, or it may be leftover baked ham.

Prepare the vegetables for the salad the day before and marinate them until time to tear up the crisp greens and toss the salad. The cheese grits take only twenty-five minutes to bake, so be guided accordingly; preparation up to the final baking may be done ahead of time. Dessert is a luscious almond cake, baked, cooled and stored until time to serve. It will be moist and so delicious!

* Margaret Williams, whose first book is a cookbook, The Well-Fed Bridegroom (Doubleday and Company, Inc., Garden City, New York), was born in New York City. She now lives in New Orleans, runs a gift shop, helps cater Mardi Gras balls and, in addition, manages to keep her own large home running smoothly.

© 1957 by Margaret Williams

MENU FOR A HAPPY HUSBAND

HAM ALALOU
MARINATED VEGETABLES
CHEESE GRITS
FRENCH BREAD
ALMOND CAKE WITH COFFEE ICE CREAM
COFFEE OR TEA

Ham Alalou

1 cup dark brown sugar
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup cider vinegar
5 teaspoons dry mustard
6 tablespoons butter
8–10 thin slices cooked ham
1 cup whole-cranberry sauce

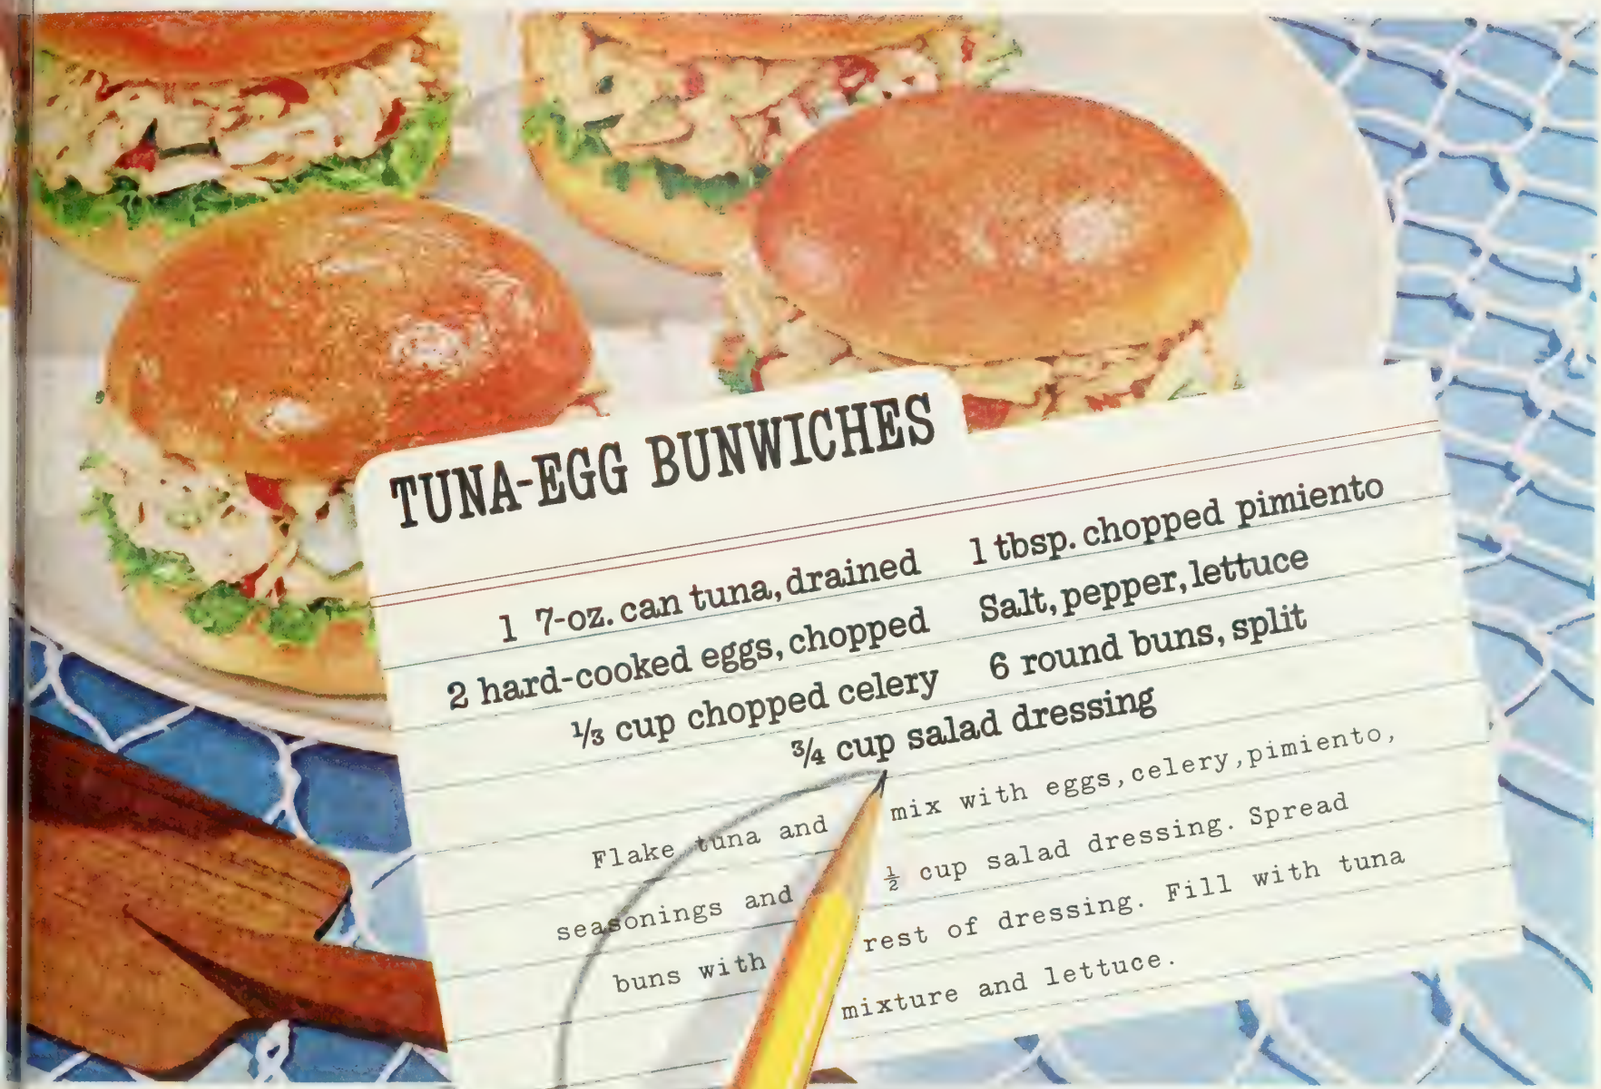
Mix together the dark brown sugar, granulated sugar, vinegar and dry mustard. Pour into a warmed chafing dish or skillet. Add butter and cook until mixture thickens, about 10 minutes. Stir occasionally. Add ham and cranberry sauce and continue cooking until hot through and edges of ham begin to curl. Makes 2 servings.

Marinated Vegetables

1 cup well-seasoned French dressing
½ cup thinly sliced raw carrot
½ cup thinly sliced celery
½ cup sliced cauliflowerettes
3 cups crisp greens

Heat the dressing and add sliced vegetables. Simmer for about 5 minutes, cool and marinate in dressing for several hours. Drain vegetables just before serving. Toss with crisp greens which have been torn into bite-sized pieces, adding about 2 tablespoons of the salad dressing and salt and pepper to taste. Makes 2 generous servings.

Cheese Grits



½ cup white grits
¾ teaspoon salt
2½ cups boiling water
¼ pound Cheddar cheese, grated
1 egg, well beaten
Pinch of cayenne pepper
Paprika

Gradually stir grits and salt into the boiling water. Cover and cook in top of double boiler for 10 minutes, stirring occasionally. Add all but ⅓ cup of the grated cheese and the egg. Season with the cayenne pepper and stir until mixture is smooth. Cover and cook 10 minutes longer. Pour into a well-greased 4-cup casserole, top with remaining cheese and dust with paprika. Bake in a moderately slow oven, 325° F., for 25 minutes. Makes 2 servings.

Almond Cake

3 eggs, separated
½ teaspoon almond extract
½ cup sugar
Pinch of salt
1⅓ cups finely chopped unskinned almonds
Whipped cream
Coffee ice cream

Beat the egg yolks with almond extract until lemon-colored. Gradually add sugar, beating until thick. Beat egg whites with a pinch of salt until stiff, but not dry, and fold into the egg yolks alternately with almonds. Pour into a round 8″ cake pan which has been greased and lined with waxed paper, and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 35 to 40 minutes. Remove from pan and cool. Cut into wedges, top with whipped cream and coffee ice cream.

One simple change will make a remarkable difference in these bunwiches...cross out "salad dressing"...specify

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than just a "salad dressing." It is a truly different and distinctive dressing, luxuriously smooth . . . and simply wonderful tasting.

To make Miracle Whip, Kraft not only uses more expensive ingredients, but more of them, too—plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.

And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A uniquely delicious flavor no one has ever been able to copy. That's where Miracle Whip makes such a difference in your sandwiches . . . that flavor plus its extra richness.

Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing is America's favorite by far.

THINK TWICE WHEN BUYING RICE

Check weights on the boxes

Check speed, ease and quality

RIVER BRAND Popular Low-Cost Medium Grain Rice

CAROLINA BRAND King-Size Extra Long Grain Rice

You'll find that the perfect natural white rice is EASY! FAST! MORE DELICIOUS!

And get 3 TIMES as much for your money!

Easy does it when you serve the perfect natural white rice, fast-cooking, fluffy RIVER BRAND or CAROLINA BRAND Rice. The best recipes taste better because of the fresh natural flavor—no flat "pre-cooked" taste. And in this case the best costs less—perfectly delicious, deliciously perfect every time. Easy, fast-cooking instructions on every money-saving box.

EASY-QUICK TIPS:

GOLDEN SAFFRON RICE. Simply soak 1 tsp. finely crumbled Saffron 5 mins. in 1 tbsp. water. Then add to RIVER BRAND or CAROLINA BRAND Rice, and cook as usual.

FAST DESSERTS: Mix fruit and whipped cream with chilled RIVER BRAND or CAROLINA BRAND Rice. Delicious and so satisfying.

RIVER BRAND RICE MILLS, INC.

New York, N. Y. • Houston, Texas, • Memphis, Tenn. • El Campo, Texas • Eunice, La.

THE COLORFUL SEASONER
GRAVY MASTER
FOR GRAVIES & STEWS and BRUSHING ON MEATS

BIGELOW'S "Constant Comment" ® TEA
Everybody Loves it!
Tea
orange bits . . .
spices . . .
delicious
For you
. . . your family
. . . your guests
For 6-cup sample, send 10¢ to
R. C. BIGELOW, INC., Dept. LF · 15 Merwin St., Norwalk, Conn.

MORE PEOPLE USE
refreshing, calorie-free
Sugarine
LIQUID SWEETENER
SWEETER THAN SUGAR
YET NO FOOD VALUE
Recommended by doctors for diabetics, overweights and lo-calorie diets. Use for beverages, desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmless.
USE-TESTED
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz. – 75c
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

AMERICA'S HANDIEST HOUSEHOLD AID
Selfix HOOKS
NO NAILS! NO SCREWS!
Just MOISTEN with WATER...
Stick 'Em Up
on wood • tile • plaster • glass
HOLDS 15 LBS.
2 for 25c
COMMENDED BY PARENTS
So easy to put up anywhere 7 smart colors! At 5 & 10 and Hardware Stores. Or write for name of nearest store Selfix Products Co., Dept. 20, 223 W. Erie St., Chicago 10, Illinois.

EXOTIC waterfall
DON'T PAY $100 - BUY DIRECT!
SPECIAL FACTORY OFFER!
These enchanting water fountains beautify any garden, home, or office. A real showpiece—portable for indoor or outdoor use! A complete unit—may be moved easily. No plumbing necessary. Simply plug in the powerful electric water pump. Circulates the same water over and over. Heavy duty construction. Will give years and years of silent service. This is the type fountain featured in all home magazines. Comes in Arctic White, Aqua Blue-green, and Iron Black. Handsome contoured bowls 16", 18", and 21". Sturdy frame is adjustable to fit any decor. A gift to be cherished for many years. Satisfaction guaranteed. Send $29.95 plus $3 freight EXTRA LARGE $39.95 Four-tier fountain with 16", 18" and 26" bowls, only $39.95 plus $3 freight. Satisfaction guaranteed
$29.95
patio, garden
offices, foyers
S & R RESEARCH, DEPT. LJ, 845 E. EL MONTE, SAN GABRIEL, CALIF.

FUEL FOR THE FLAME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 60

he knew what was essential. Ahmed had come to him, as his boss, to ask his assistance. He was entitled to it.

"You are not to worry about this," Basil told him. "In a few days you'll have your cousin back again. In the meantime, I would suggest that you move your family out here."

He proceeded to sketch out some practical suggestions; as he did so he followed his own thoughts. This had brought matters to a head. He had to get out of here.

That evening shortly after five a heavy rainstorm swept the golf course. Rex Sinclair was playing a single against Basil Hallett. They were in the middle of the fifth fairway, a long way from any shelter. "Race you to the clubhouse," Basil said. They were soaked by the time they reached it.

"How good that first whisky and soda is going to taste," said Sinclair.

Basil shook his head. "Too early for me, I'm afraid. I'm going to the play in the old man's party. I have to be on my best behavior."

"The old man's already seen it."

"I know, but Gerald Fyreman's on a visit. They're fixing up a party for him."

"Then I can't tempt you."

"I'm afraid you can't."

Basil was following the play in terms of his own situation. Catherine had learned that the king was taking an interest in her and that the existence of her earlier lovers might prove dangerous. She was incredulous. "He could hardly kill me for what I did before I knew him." Basil chuckled inwardly. How little she knew. How little any of them knew. Those young women, who did what they liked as debutantes, believing that a wedding ring would settle the account. Did Barbara, now at his side, see the parallel between Catherine's case and hers? She, too, had married a man older than herself. She, too, had committed indiscretion: she must have done, however much Julia might deny it. Was this play giving her the chance to realize how precarious her own position was?

Two places away Shelagh was also watching the play in terms of her own position. In the first act Henry was shown carrying a stick and limping, prematurely aged through self-indulgence. Yet without any doubt Catherine fell in love with him. Gerald needed self-confidence. Because he could no longer play cricket, he suspected that a woman would be unlikely to fall in love with him. He needed to be reminded that she could.

The curtain fell on the first act. There was a burst of applause. The Keable party moved onto the terrace. Basil stood next to Barbara. "Isn't this play contemporary?" he said. "It's written about the days when kings had the power of life and death in their own hands. It happened four hundred years ago. Yet the essential situation is one that is being repeated every day."

"What do you mean by the essential situation?" Barbara asked.

"A young girl absorbing the ideas of her day, behaving wildly, believing that it does not matter, because everyone else in her set behaves that way. Then suddenly she discovers that it does matter because she marries or falls in love with someone who isn't of her set or generation. It's then that she regrets. It's then she starts getting frightened."

"Is that what this play's about?"

"Don't you think it is?" He looked at her very straight. "You've seen it before, haven't you?" he asked.

"I was here on the opening night," Barbara said.

"The first time one sees a play one misses a great deal. This is the fourth time I've seen it. I used to live near Canterbury and the Old Stagers did it. Listen to the next act very carefully. You'll see what I mean. You'll see how it all recoils on Catherine. There are dozens of young women in England who find themselves in that position. Think of your own contemporaries. How many of them must have something in their pasts that they don't even now consider to have been actua wrong. It all turns on whether a girl marr a man out of her own set, who has differ standards. You'll see what I mean. Look a through Henry's eyes."

He dropped his voice. He watched closely. Did her expression change? He thou it did. If it did, then he had sown the seed.

Beside him Shelagh was talking to Ger Fyreman. "Did you see South Pacific?" asked.

"I saw the picture."

"Then you'll remember the colonel's spee about young women's being attracted by m ture men. Young men so often make that m take, not realizing what is important and wh is unimportant to a woman. They set so mu store by athletics that they can't imagine woman's being attracted to a man w isn't—how shall I put it?—dominant as athlete in a college group. But that isn't i portant to a woman."

"What is important to a woman?"

"So many things. What he is like inside hi self. His character, the way he thinks, t way he feels."

"You surely aren't telling me that, where woman's concerned, a man's looks do matter?"

"Of course I'm not. They're terribly i portant: the way a man smiles, the way looks at you. But men, young men, think masculine good looks in terms of height a profile and broad shoulders, of being able run the hundred yards in eleven secon That's why mature men are often more tractive. They know they haven't laurels that kind to rely on so they make more effo to please. Young men are different. When th aren't matinee idols, or glamorous as athlete they think, 'She'll never look at somebody li me.' So they hang back, which makes it dif cult for a girl. She wants them to come fo ward. It's up to them to make the first mov she thinks."

"I see."

He smiled, a smile that warmed her. Barbara's a lucky girl, she thought.

Watch it through Henry's eyes. On th first night Barbara had been held by the plo excited to know what would happen nex Also, as the G. M.'s wife, she had been notic details of production and of acting. Now however, freed from the necessity of compl menting actors and producers, she gave hi full attention to the play in the light of Basil comments. It was, she could see now, co temporary in its implications. Perhaps i author had deliberately chosen this theme as parallel to the problems of his day, saying "This is how it was four hundred years ag This is how the Tudors worked it out. We ca learn a lesson from it."

The second act opened a year later, thre days after Catherine has been unfaithful t Henry with the young courtier to whom i the first act she had been half engage Slowly, step by step, the king learns about he past. His fury, his indignation had a ne meaning for Barbara in the light of Basil exposition. She no longer saw it as the ridicu lous jealousy of an aging man. She was seein now the "why" of it. She followed closely th series of speeches with which Henry close the act.

"Do you see what I mean?" Basil asked, a they came out onto the veranda.

"I see what you mean."

"And do you suppose that there's a singl woman in the world who hasn't something i her life that she would hate to have known t a husband who feels that way? Is there on who hasn't?"

"Maybe there isn't."

"And is there anything within reason tha she would not do to prevent her husband' finding out? Look how safe Catherine though herself." He paused. Had he said too much had he said too little? Better to say too littl than too much.

A few yards away Gerald was continuin with Shelagh their interrupted conversation

"hat's interesting, what you were saying about a oman's not setting the same store that men d upon games. I see your point; it can make a an diffident. I suppose it has in my own c e: not being able to do any more the things I ought so important once. I can't help feeli that if a woman ever did care for me it v uld be out of a maternal pity, and that isn't v at I want."

"Oh, but you're so wrong!" Shelagh's v ce glowed, as her heart was glowing. Her p n was working. She would be making each a happy: her father, her mother, Barbara, G rald and herself. And Gerald so deserved t be made happy. "Women don't feel like t t," she said. "You're thinking of women in t ms of how men feel about other men. They r pect men for quite different reasons from t se for which women respect them. You do r lize that now, don't you?"

"I realize it. I hope Angus Macartney will as w ll."

"What's Angus got to do with it?"

"He's in the same position as myself. Games m ant everything to him. Now that he's a s mi-invalid, he won't have the same confi- n ce in himself. You haven't been to see him v very often."

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"You must. All that you've been saying to m was meant for An- s, wasn't it? That you won't be any less in love with him because——"

At that she lost her temper. "I wish you'd get it out of your minds, all of you, that I'm in love with Angus. I've never given him a thought. As far as I know, he's been as indifferent to me. We're the most casual friends. I wish——"

The bell for the resumption rang. "Let's get back to our seats," he said.

The final curtain fell. There was a burst of clapping. Basil turned to Barbara. "That was a telling phrase of Catherine's, wasn't it? 'We little thought it would end like this. We were young and wild, that was all.' How surprised we all are at the way things turn out."

He watched her closely as he said it. Was she seeing a parallel between herself and Catherine? Married to an older man, did her own past rise accusingly? He remembered the fright in Ahmed's face. What papers had the police found in that cousin's house? Was his own name there? What would happen if it were? He had to get out of here.

At the end of each performance there was a reception in the dance hall for the cast and audience. Drinks and sandwiches were served, at Pearl's expense. Once again Basil was alone with Barbara. Now was his chance. "It's always the same way," he said. "Eventually one gets caught out, however safe one thinks oneself. As a hypothetical example, let's take you yourself. Like Catherine, you've married a man older than yourself. Let's assume that there's been something in your past which you'd hate to have Charles know; you're certain that he never can know, because there's only one other person in the world who knows, one man or else one woman."

At the word "woman" Barbara seemed to flinch. Had he touched a half-healed wound, or did he fancy it? He had a thrill of victory; he was on the trail.

"You think you are safe because you know that man or woman will not speak. But there's no greater temptation than a solitary secret. The person has to talk about it. Suppose this man or woman had talked to me about it, as though it had happened to somebody else. You know how people do. 'A curious thing happened to a friend of mine.' But I'd know that she was referring to herself. It would be an intriguing incident, and I'd not forget it; but I would not be particularly curious to know who the other person was. The episode would be tucked away in the back of my mind. And then you'd come out here and suddenly I'd realize that you were the other person."

"How would you know that it was me?" Barbara asked.

His heart beat faster. "Everyone has certain phrases, certain expressions that are personal to themselves. Suppose such an expression had been used when this person was telling me the story. Then I heard you use it."

He checked, he had said enough. Now for the kill. "If that had happened, and if I knew what had happened, you would never know a moment's peace of mind. Every time you saw me in my cups—and I'm quite often in my cups—you would be terrified lest I should betray your secret. There is nothing that you wouldn't do to get me out of here. Nothing." He paused. Now, he thought. Now, now.

"There's nothing I wouldn't do to leave this place," Basil went on. "I'm desperate, and that's the truth. Wouldn't it be rather smart of you to help me?"

She did not answer. She looked him straight in the face. Hatred and contempt were in her eyes, but he did not care. His spirit gloated. He'd pulled off his bluff. She swung around and walked away.

An hour later, in the Keables' drawing room, Charles and Barbara, Shelagh and Gerald sat talking over the night's events. They had all in their different ways a great deal on their minds.

Barbara turned to Charles. "I'm tired. It's been a heavy day. Let's go upstairs, Charles. Leave these young things. Good night. Tomorrow will be another day."

Gerald had stood up to say "Good night." He paused, looking down at her. "I felt so certain that you were talking about Angus," he told Shelagh.

"I wasn't; I was talking about you."

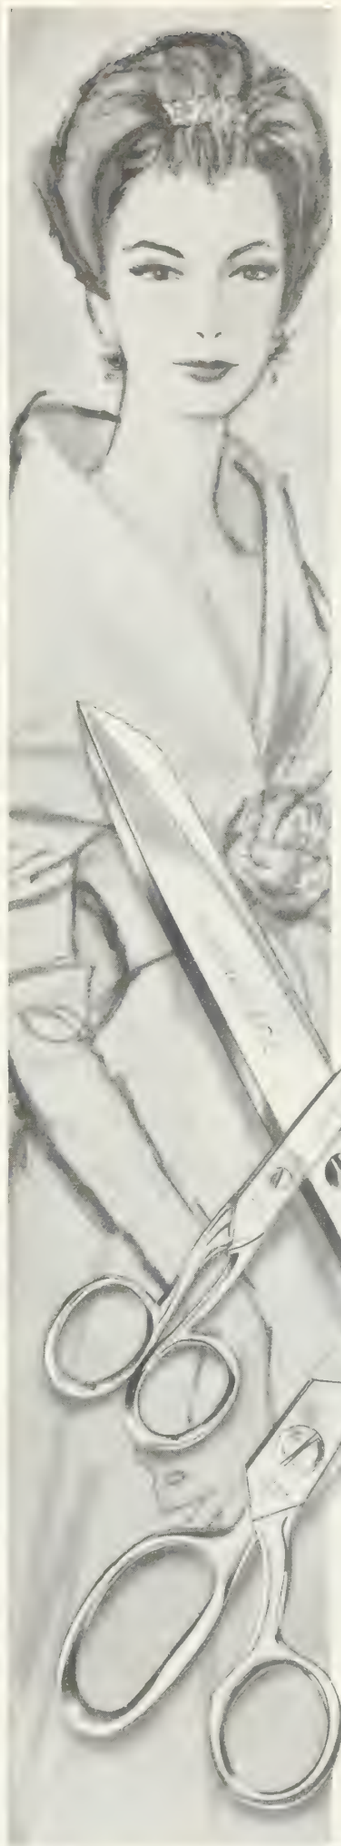
"About me?"

"I thought you were worrying about your foot, about not being a first-class cricketer any more. You had set so much store by that. You said at the dance that you'd lost your chance of being anyone of real importance. You weren't the same person any longer in a world of men. I was afraid that you might think it would make a difference where a woman was concerned. And it wouldn't. I promise you it wouldn't."

"But you spoke with such feeling. Why should you be so bothered on my account?"

"Because —— Oh well"—she stood up; she could not remain seated with him looking down at her, not while she was saying what she had to say, even though when she was standing up and in high heels she was four inches shorter; she looked at him helplessly—"because of Barbara and you," she said.

"Barbara and me?"



She nodded quickly. "It started at the dance, the way you looked at her. I realized then. It seemed so wonderful for both of you. No, please don't interrupt; it'll sound terrible at first—my stepmother, after all. But it's all wrong between her and daddy. He's so much older. And as time goes on, he'll find it harder. Then there's my mother. She's a widow. She and my father never quarreled. They were perfectly happy. It was only that she got swept off her feet, which can happen so easily, can't it? At that age." How I chatter on, she thought. In a great rush of words it all poured out; everything that she had bottled up through all these weeks. "So that was why I thought it would be such a good thing for all of us if you and Barbara were to marry. I was afraid that you might not ask her, because you were

LINES FOR A WOOD ENGRAVING

By STANLEY DONALDSON

Curvet bridge and country-cold
the winter road away.
Brambled fences, tarn and wold admire the team-sped sleigh.

Gracefully its runners swirl snow plumes for belle and beau—fur-rich driver, fur-snug girl
. . . buffalo robes ago.

every woman deserves JOY

SUPER FINE SCISSORS AND SHEARS

A cut above the average . . . you need to hold light 'n bright JOY in your hands to know why smart women insist on this brand of scissors and shears. Each JOY implement is contour finished of famous Solingen surgical steel for balance and accuracy, nickel and chrome plated for incomparable durability, serviceability, and ease of operation. Next time you need a scissors or shears ask for JOY — for a lifetime!

Embroidery Scissors • Sewing Scissors • Dressmaker Shears • Buttonhole Scissors • Pinking Shears Manicure Implements and Gift Sets

Wherever fine cutlery is sold, or write:

REX CUTLERY

385 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

diffident about your accident." She paused, breathless.

"So that's the way it was, was it?"

"That's the way it was."

"You were never in love with Angus?"

"Never, for an instant."

"You encouraged all of us to think so. Lila as good as told her mother that you were. You and Lila were so close."

"I know. It started as a joke. I wasn't fooling Angus. I'm not that kind of person. He was in the joke himself." If only she could explain completely, but that was Lila's secret. "It was very silly, but it was one of those things that, once started, are hard to stop."

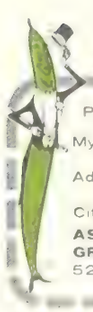
new, quick ways with Blue Lake green beans

Use bacon curls instead of usual pieces

Add garlic-butter—toasted croutons

Broil or bake with strips of cheese

For the utmost simplicity, just open the can and serve. You can do this with these aristocratic Blue Lakes.



Blue Lake Green Beans Grow best in the Pacific Northwest

They come to you from Oregon and Washington where abundant water combines with warm days and cool nights to make Blue Lakes the most succulent of all green beans—canned, fresh, or frozen.

Sold under many brand names, you'll find the variety shown as part of the product description like this . . .
"Blue Lake" GREEN BEANS

write for FREE RECIPE PACKET

"Meet Mr. BLUE LAKE" packet contains specially-prepared recipes for serving Blue Lake Variety green beans to your PTA, church guild, camp, or party. Instructions for serving 6, 12 or 24 persons.

Please send FREE recipe packet

My Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

ASSOCIATED BLUE LAKE GREEN BEAN CANNERS, INC.
526 Pittock Block, Portland 5, Ore.

"And all the time you were imagining me in love with Barbara."

"Well, weren't you?"

"I'm not now."

"You were once; you must have been."

"Perhaps. I was lonely here. She was young and friendly. There weren't so very many other attractive girls around the place. Yes, I suppose I was, a little."

"I saw the way you looked at her at the dance."

"I expect that was the last time I looked at her like that."

"Why?"

"Because I fell out of love with her that night."

"Can you fall out of love that quickly?"

"If you fall in love with someone else. We had our first real talk that night, you know."

"Me . . . you ——"

"I shall never forget the things you said, the way you looked. You were so fresh, so wholesome, so attractive; so full of life. You were everything I had ever dreamed of a girl's being; I felt that I had known you all my life, that you were what I had been looking for all my life. Then a few days later I learned from Lady Studholme that you had fallen for Angus Macartney. There was a lunch party. I was told to invite him for you."

"You believed I was in love with him?"

"Why shouldn't I? He is young, handsome, he has money, he'll have more. You seemed very right for each other."

"But when you saw us together, you surely must have realized ——"

"Why should I have? I couldn't imagine anyone's not being in love with you. Every time I saw you, I found some new thing in you; something I'd missed before. You were so honest, so straightforward; I liked you so much and you were so appealing. I wanted to protect you. It was such a delight to look at you."

"Why didn't you tell me this?"

"Because of Angus, because of that diffidence of mine. I found you more attractive every time I saw you."

He took a step toward her. He put an arm round her waist, raising his hand against her shoulder. He held her with a forceful tenderness.

"All the time I've been thinking you in love with Angus, and all the time you've been thinking me in love with Barbara."

"I never had the least idea you felt like this about me."

"Well, you know now." He took her chin in his hand and lifted her face under his, with an air of gentle mastery.

"Don't you think you should start getting used to the idea?" he said.

"Perhaps I should."

"You might not find it all that difficult."

"Perhaps I wouldn't."

"I'll do my best to help you."

He lowered his head. He kissed her very gently on the lips.

"There's nothing I should like better," said Charles. Barbara nodded in agreement. "If I were her mother I should be delighted. Shelagh is young, but a girl is as likely to guess right at her age as she is at twenty-seven. How old was Julia when she met Basil? Not much more, surely. Basil's not the husband I'd choose for my own daughter, but I'd say that that marriage was one of the most successful in the camp. They're still electric about each other."

At the mention of Basil's name, Barbara's fingers closed tightly on the armrest of her chair. In the budding romance between Gerald and her stepdaughter she had been able to forget the threat that had been leveled at her. She could not keep it in the background for much longer. I'd better get it over quickly, Barbara thought.

"You've enough on your mind," she said, "without my adding to your worries, and I know I've no right to interfere; but Julia's desperately worried, and I am worried for her sake. Basil is becoming hysterical because he can't get away. I don't know what the trouble is, nor does she. But I do feel it's serious; that if Basil isn't got away from here something terrible may happen. I know I shouldn't be asking this. You said, 'One can't make exceptions.' But Julia is my oldest friend, I can't sit by and watch her whole life collapse."

She was pleading, and she knew it, a bad case. She raised her voice, trying to give conviction to her arguments. Charles watched her closely, puzzled and concerned. "You're taking this very seriously," he said.

"Wouldn't you take it seriously, if you saw your best friend on the brink of . . . I don't know what. Surely, surely you can make a special case of this."

"Please, Barbara, please." He had never seen her like this before. "Listen," he said, "I cannot promise anything, but I will do my best. By lunchtime on Monday I will let you know."

Monday morning, Charles rang up Forrester. "You asked me to let you know if anything unexpected happened in connection with Basil Hallett. Something has. He is desperately anxious to be transferred. He applied a few weeks ago and I refused. I thought I handled him tactfully; but he's applied again, this time in a different way. His wife has worked on my wife, and I must say that she has worked her up into a highly emotional state. Barbara isn't excitable as a rule. Hallett must be in a very peculiar state of mind."

"I see." There was a pause, then Forrester spoke. "I'll tell you what I'd like you to do if it is possible."

"What's that."

"Let him have his transfer, but tell him that you want it kept a secret in the camp. You could do that, couldn't you, explaining that an exception has been made and it would cause jealousy in the camp if it was known?"

"I could do that."

"Then, having promised, I'd like you to make as much delay as possible about putting the transfer through. That shouldn't be difficult, should it?"

"It will be extremely easy."

"Then everything is fine and I am most grateful."

Forrester sat back. Things were coming to a head fast, too fast. Someone was going to get hurt. He did not know who; he did not know when or how. He got up and walked to his filing cabinet. He took out the file marked "Macartney." He glanced at the papers Angus had stuffed into his trousers pocket the night he had burgled his father's desk; he studied a list of names, then put a tick against two of them. He rang a bell. "I want Colonel Simes and Brigadier Mustapha brought in for questioning. Have warrants made out for their arrest, and search warrants for their houses. Make the arrests tonight."

He shook his head slowly. Fast, much too fast. But if this was the way the crown prince wanted it ——

Charles Keable returned to lunch in a sunny humor. "O.K.," he said, "I've fixed it."

Barbara ran into his arms. "Oh, darling, darling, you'll never know how grateful I am."

He held her tight. He was happy that he had been able to make her happy. The knowledge gave him a sense of confidence; but he was puzzled and worried. There was something here he did not understand. Why should Barbara be so worked up about the Halletts?

"I expect you would like to tell Julia about this yourself," he said.

To his surprise, she shook her head. "No. I'd rather you told Basil yourself. You know how it is when someone feels under an obligation to someone else. It's the quickest way to lose a friend. I'd rather you told Basil that you had reconsidered his application for a transfer and had decided to move him to another camp."

"That makes everything very simple. I don't want this transfer to be gossiped about. And if the camp felt that Basil had had preferential treatment because his wife had been at school with mine, it would be bad for morale. So I'd be grateful if you didn't talk about this in the camp."

"That'll be fine by me. How soon will they be going?"

"As soon as we can manage."

"Good." She said it on a note of relief that increased his puzzlement. Wasn't Julia her oldest friend? Wouldn't she miss Julia? And why should she not want to tell Julia herself that her wish was granted? I suppose I shall find out sometime, he thought.

After lunch he sent for Basil. "Come in, my boy. Sit down." He looked at Basil closely. "I've been thinking about you," he said. "Some time ago Harry Pawling told me that you would like a transfer. We had a talk about it, you remember, the night you came to dinner. I felt at the time it was a bad idea, but I've changed my mind. I believe that your particular abilities would be more use to Pearl in a bigger organization than this. So, although your contract has another ten months to run, I am going to recommend to the head office that you be transferred to a large camp; probably on the Persian Gulf."

"I'm very grateful, sir."

Charles, as he spoke, had watched the young man's expression change from furtiveness to radiant relief. Relief such as Barbara had shown. "How soon shall I be leaving?" The same first question too.

He gave Basil the same answer that he had given Barbara. "As soon as we can manage. I'm anxious that the news of this shouldn't get round the camp till the actual flying date is fixed. Questions would be asked. I want to avoid that. Can I rely on you?"

"You can certainly do that." There was jubilation in Basil's voice.

Back in his office, Basil's jubilation left him. He felt limp, exhausted, humble. He had won his battle, but it was a battle that should never have been joined. He had been weak, silly, improvident. Never again, he vowed; never, never again. When he got back that afternoon, he stood beside Julia, put his arm round her shoulder, pressed her close against him. She looked up at him quickly, surprised and touched.

"I was thinking how very lucky I am," he said.

Next morning the familiar envelope brought a chess problem. He chuckled. There wouldn't be many more of these. He was glad that Keable had insisted upon secrecy. It was as well not to have Ahmed reporting to his cousin that his boss was leaving. The Indian would almost certainly have applied the screw. As it was, a chess problem would one day receive no answer; and later, when it was too late, the news would reach the chess club that the bird had flown.

He set out the chessmen. It carried a routine inquiry about Ahmed's reaction to his cousin's arrest. He could answer that honestly. He could, for that matter, answer honestly all the questions that would be sent him before he left. Nothing mattered now. He was on his way. And as for this Communist menace, what was it but a scarecrow? It would be years before anything happened here. Cheerfully he worked out his answer.

Monday morning Gerald returned to duty. The first person whom he met was Lila.

"Your holiday has done you good. I've never seen you look so well," she said.

"If I'm looking the way I feel, I must look wonderful."

He said it meaningly. She raised her eyebrows. "What's happened?"

"I've been promised a job in Pearl and I've got engaged."

"Who to?"

"Shelagh, of course."

"I don't know where the 'of course' comes in, but I think that's wonderful."

"It's wonderful for me."

"It's not too bad for Shelagh, either, but I am surprised. You never showed the slightest interest in each other."

"I concealed it rather cleverly. I didn't think I stood a chance. I thought she was crazy about Angus."

"Oh, that."

"She told me it was just a joke, something that you and she cooked up."

"So that's what she told you, did she? It's not true at all. She was covering up for me and Angus to fool my stepfather. It was nice of her not to tell you. You've picked yourself a very loyal wife, young man."

An envelope addressed by the familiar typewriter lay on Basil Hallett's desk. He chuckled at the sight of it. Not so much longer now, he told himself. He pushed it to one side. Ten ds ago he would have torn it open eagerly, ble to settle down to work until he had dphered the message. Not any longer, th igh. The message could await his con- ve ence. It was close on eleven o'clock before h et out his men.

he message read, "Anxious personal meet- ir Your next visit Kuala Prang." Again Basil cl ckled. His next visit to Kuala Prang should b his last.

le did not make any special effort to see ry Pawling. He would wait till Harry sent fo him. It was not till the next morning that h lid—on a simple routine matter. The inter- v did not take five minutes.

Will that be all?" Basil asked.

Yes, that'll be all."

asil stood up. "Do you think there'll be a thing to take me into Kuala Prang during th next ten days?"

Would you like there to be?"

There are a few things that need settling b ore I leave."

Of course, of course. Well, let me see. T re's that wages conference on Tuesday. I meant to go, but you could go instead."

That's very generous of you."

Not at all. As a matter of fact, I'd just as s n stay here."

In that case, then ——" He hesitated. "I s pose you've no idea when my transfer will c ne through?"

Not the slightest."

It might be tomorrow, it might be next w k."

It might be two months' time."

Of course."

It is because people are like us that the world is what it is. That is the source of all the trouble.

ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE
John O' London's Weekly

But of course it couldn't. How could it be, i view of the pressure Barbara had exerted? T o months, indeed; two weeks at most.

With a light heart, back in his office Basil r de out the coded message "Tuesday."

The Indian had arranged Tuesday's meeting f half past twelve in the museum: a his- t ical collection of books, pictures, reproduc- t ns of native life and customs that had been f nded before the First World War. There w s no place in the island where you would be l ; likely to be observed by an acquaintance. T e Indian was standing beside a glass case w t explained the various stages of oil produc- t n. He smiled as Basil came toward him; a k ndly, tired smile.

'So I hear you are leaving us, Mr. Hallett."

Basil's nerves had received a number of s ocks during the last six months. This was a most violent. "How on earth do you know t t?" he asked.

'It is my business to know things like that, a d when I learned it I was not at all surprised. I ad expected something like this. It has been a real disappointment to me that circum- s nces have forced you to think of me as an e my, not as a friend. How very differently y u would have felt toward me if Potiphar h d come in first, but Potiphar did not come in f st. I have done my best to be of help to you; b t don't let us go back over that. I know how y u felt when you learned that you were to be l oked to another station. You chuckled to y urself, 'How I have fooled that silly Indian.' T at was what you thought, now wasn't it?"

He paused; his head was slightly tilted as he l oked up at Basil. A half-smile lifted the right s le of his mouth. "It was foolish to have t ought that, Mr. Hallett. Surely you should h ve realized that it would be very easy for me t find out from London where you had been p sted. And surely you should have guessed t at I was most unlikely not to have a col- l gue in any spot where you were posted and t at I should only have to send my dossier to t n for you to find yourself in exactly the same s uation as you are here. One does not escape as easily as you imagine from the kind of tangle in which you have placed yourself."

Basil made no reply; there was none that he could make. He had read in books about this kind of thing's happening to a man. Speechless, overwhelmed, he stood looking at his tormentor.

The Indian's smile grew broader. "There is no need to look so despondent, Mr. Hallett. I am not saying that will happen. I am only saying that it could happen. I have what I hope you will consider a nice surprise for you. I want to do my best for you, as far as is compatible with my own interests. And it is not particularly in my interest to hand you over to somebody else's care. Of course there is reciprocity in matters such as this: if I do a good turn for a colleague in Ceylon, he will eventually do a good turn for me. That is how an international organization functions. But that is taking a long view, and I favor the short view; provided, of course, that one does not lose sight altogether of what politicians call the ultimate objective. You will surely agree with me in that, Mr. Hallett."

"Yes, yes, of course." Would he never come to the point? thought Basil.

"In this present instance," the Indian was continuing, "I have an excellent opportunity of combining the short view, the ultimate objective and your own immediate interests. I want to release you from the hold I have on you, in return for one last service. If you perform this service I will return to you those checks that bear your signature. You have nothing to fear, once those checks are in your own possession."

"What is the service that you want?"

"Employment in your office for a friend."

"What kind of work is he looking for?"

"He has technical qualifications, but I believe he would be more useful as a secretary."

"Why do you want him in our office?"

"That is a very foolish question, Mr. Hallett. You know I cannot answer that. I need

Two wonderful new Revere Recipes

SHRIMP MEUNIÈRE

Melt ½ cup of butter in a Revere Ware 10" French Chef skillet. Add 4 cups of cooked, shelled shrimp. Then heat thoroughly. Remove the shrimp to a hot platter. Add to the butter in the skillet 2 tablespoons of lemon juice, 1 tablespoon of finely chopped parsley, 1 teaspoon of salt, ¼ teaspoon of pepper. Pour this lemon mixture over the shrimp. Makes 6 generous portions.

New Revere Ware Recipe Book tells you how to make many more exciting dishes like these. Beautifully illustrated. Send 25¢ to Dept. LH2, Revere Copper and Brass Incorporated, Box 111, Rome, New York.

that will make you want to see more

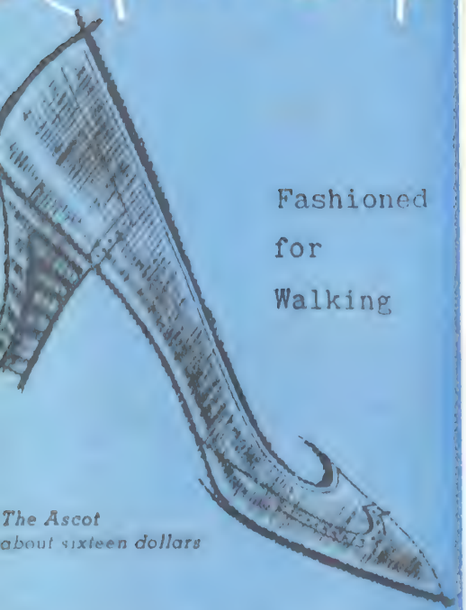
GINGER ICE CREAM

Combine ½ cup sugar and 1 tblspn. cornstarch in top of Revere Ware Double Boiler. Slowly stir in 1½ cups milk. Place over boiling water, stirring constantly 'til mixture thickens. Stir a little of hot mixture into 2 slightly beaten egg yolks. Add egg mixture to remaining hot mixture in double boiler, cook for 3 minutes. Cool. Fold in 2 tblspns. ginger syrup or 3 tblspns. preserved ginger, 2 stiffly beaten egg whites, 1 cup heavy cream, whipped. Pour into refrigerator tray, freeze until firm.

PATRIOT WARE is sturdy, handsome stainless steel inside and out. Popularly-priced. Famous Revere quality. Unique "heatlining" makes cooking easier, faster. The gleaming beauty of stainless steel cleans almost effortlessly. There's a Patriot Ware utensil for every cooking need . . . from $5.25*.

REVERE WARE is copper-clad stainless steel—the world's finest. Copper for fast, even heat; stainless steel for mirror-bright beauty. Snug covers seal in all the natural goodness of foods. Jewels to cook with. Jewels to display in your kitchen too. As low as $4.95* . . . with Revere Ware gift sets from $21.00*.

Manufacturer's suggested retail prices.*



The Rhythm Step
Fashion Column

The Courier Cord
about seventeen dollars

Rhythm Step

Fashioned for Walking

The Ascot
about sixteen dollars

THE OCCASION...tailored and walkable anytime before six, city or country.

THE COSTUME...dressmaker suits that look sleek and smart in lightweight menswear fabrics...gabardines and sheer flannels. Jackets from waist-length to bracelet-length, usually unfitted. Skirts are pleated or slimly straight and the length is your personal choice. Feminine suits that have definite mannish overtones with a go-everywhere character, especially if you walk.

THE SHOES...spectator suit pumps with tapered toes. A square-back stacked leather heel or a shapely walking heel. Both shoes in the mid-height of fashion with a classic look. Smooth soft leather, light in look and in weight. Tailored and more tailored, always walkable.

Fashion Director,
Rhythm Step Shoes

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE COMPANY

information about what goes on in Pearl, the kind of information that you have given me during the last six months. I need somebody to take your place."

"What is his name?"

"Mara Sekaran."

"Of Indian origin?"

"He has been here three years."

"We have no vacancy in my office."

"I know. You will have to create a vacancy."

"That will not be easy."

"I am well aware of that. That is why I am making you such a very generous proposal."

"If I do this for you, what guaranty have I that you will give me back those checks?"

"You will have to trust me, Mr. Hallett. I am afraid that you have no alternative to trusting me."

Two mornings later Mara Sekaran presented himself in Basil's office. He was slim, small, neatly dressed. To Basil he was indistinguishable from two hundred other relatively well-to-do Indian immigrants. Basil subjected him to the usual questionnaire: his age, his antecedents; how long he had been in Karak, why he had come here, had he friends or relatives; had he had an offer of work when he left Calcutta?

His answers were as standardized as the questions. His prospects had deteriorated since the British gave up control of India. His mother was an Anglo-Indian. His sister had married an Anglo-Indian. His links with the British had always been close. In Calcutta he was an object of suspicion and distrust. He spoke quietly, convincingly. There seemed no reason why he should not be sincere.

"You have never been out of work since you arrived?" asked Basil.

"Never, sir."

"Why do you want to leave your present post?"

"My wife's health, sir. I think she would be in better health living in the country."

Basil watched him closely. "You have references?" he asked.

"Of course, sir."

He produced three letters. Basil took them from their envelopes; he read them to gain time as much as anything. References meant practically nothing. They were obtained so easily. Yet the names and the addresses were not unimpressive.

"I shall have to check up on these," he said.

"Of course, sir."

"It'll take three or four days to get the answers."

"I suppose so, sir."

And when he got the answers what would they really tell him? All this business of checking up, references, visas, fingerprints was a nuisance for the law-abiding citizen, but the real bad hat always crossed a frontier, obtained a credit, eluded vigilance. If he refused this application, his replacement would let in somebody equally subversive. What harm, anyhow, could this man do here; what real harm? Pass on a few pieces of trivial information? This whole cloak-and-dagger business was a nursery game of pirates. If he didn't let this fellow in, his successor would. No doubt of that, no doubt whatever.

"I'll let you know within a week," he said. "But I can make no promise."

Pausing in the doorway of the secretariat, Basil saw Mara Sekaran installed in a desk in front of the one occupied by Ahmed. He had been working there for half a week. Basil walked across to him.

"Are you getting on all right?"

"Yes, thank you, sir."

"If there is anything you're in doubt about, you'll ask me, won't you?"

"Thank you, sir. Yes, I will."

"I expect that you already know some members of our staff."

"Yes, sir, I do."

"For instance, whom?"

The Indian mentioned half a dozen names. Only two of them worked in the personnel branch. I'll check up on them, thought Basil. "Have you found a house for your family?"

"I have found a flat."

"Fine. Excellent."

On the way back to his room he checked his step at Ahmed's desk, thought better of it and went on to his own room. How had the Indian known that he was being posted to another camp? He had a sense of utter impotence. Things were out of his control. He returned to his own room.

On his desk once again was lying an envelope with a Karak stamp, addressed by the familiar typewriter. He remembered when he had received the first. How lightheartedly he had slit its flap. He blinked. Never again; once out of the wood, he would be on his guard. Never, never again! He had learned his lesson.

His hands were unsteady as he set out the pieces. There was no reason why they should have been. This message could bring only good news; but he had a sense of omen. "Thursday nineteen-thirty gate Dempsey Avenue," he read.

Gate Dempsey Avenue. What a strange place to choose. Six months ago it had been the inner gate to the refinery; now, since the main gates had been left unlocked at night, it had become the outer gate. It had no sentry at night, but it was patrolled. A sentry would pass every twenty minutes. There was a collection of small huts outside which were used for storage. His presence there after dark would surprise anyone who saw him. Until now the Indian had been at such pains to arrange their meetings under conditions that would not excite comment. Why had he changed his procedure now?

His telephone bell rang. "It's Harry. Can see you for a minute?"

Harry greeted him with a grin. "Good new for you. Your transfer's through. It's t Trinidad."

Trinidad, the other side of the globe; as fa as any place could be from Karak and all tha went with Karak. If he couldn't make a clea start there, where could he?

"How soon do I start?" he asked.

"As soon as you've handed over. Your re placement left London yesterday."

"Handing over shouldn't take a week."

"I don't see why it should."

"Am I to go straight to Trinidad?"

"That was the idea."

"With Julia following on by boat?"

"That should be the simplest way."

"Then I'd better plan to throw a good-b party on Saturday week."

"I'll book it in my diary."

Back in his room, Basil looked contemptu ously at the chessboard. No need to bothe about that now. Saturday week was onl eleven days away. And within sixty hours h would have those checks returned to him He would not have a trouble in the world.

He swept the chessmen back into their box Why should he worry as to the Indian's choic of rendezvous? He had his own good reasons doubtless, as he always had. He knew hi business; leave him to run it his own way.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 142

NEXT MONTH

CAN SHE BAKE A CHERRY PIE?

Every one of Mrs. Appleyard's daughters could pass this marriage test at 16 and so shall yours, if she cleaves unto our recipe. Make the pie with a fairy-tale lattice crust and season it with tart apple, the way good Vermont farm wives do. Such pie! It should follow a family uniting meal of pot roast, Mrs. Appleyard's own sour-cream potatoes, New England johnny-cake, green salad with hot bacon dressing, mustard pickle and lacy oatmeal cookies. We have recipes for everything.

THE HUNGER THAT HURTS A LIFETIME

"I can remember how hungry I was for affection. My mother, a movie-theater cashier, was always at her job when it was my bedtime. Many evenings I sneaked out the back door and went down to the theater. I would hide behind a billboard across the street and watch my mother selling tickets in her little lighted house. . . ." Jack needed Rita as achingly as she needed him, but they were both too lonely and immature, before consultation, to help each other. "Can This Marriage Be Saved?"

AUNT MAUD'S PARENTS THOUGHT SHE WAS A BOY

Not until she was eight years old did the family decide that it would be better for him to be treated as a her. "Doctor, is a glandular condition of that kind hereditary?" Dr. Schauffler is able to give an expectant mother consoling information in "Tell Me, Doctor."

THE DARK PLACES OF THE MIND

"For a few blank seconds she could only stare, panic gripping her. She put out a hand to grope for the door, and saw the man step forward. She made a desperate effort to thrust him from her; and then she was falling, falling. She knew, as blackness closed round her, that she was falling into his arms." Redheaded, tall, broad-shouldered, he looked nice enough, but he was the man she had seen before, the day of the "accident." Jody kept telling herself she must think of it as an accident, anyway. Elizabeth Cadell skillfully combines tension and terror with lighthearted gaiety and romance in The Yellow Brick Road, condensed mystery novel in the March JOURNAL.

Also, Pat Boone talks to teen-agers about "Testing Time for Talent"; make-it-yourself fashion news; Dr. Spock's helpful page of advice for parents; "How America Lives"; more stories

IN THE MARCH JOURNAL

FIT TO BE PROUD OF
bur-mil Cameo SHAPEMAKER STOCKINGS
...there's nothing more fitting!
Sheer, seamed and seamless stretch... seen on the loveliest legs. $1.50 and $1.65. And, we make a wonderful support stocking, too!
Burlington Hosiery Co.
Bur-Mil
A Division of Burlington Industries

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

Yes, but what was that business? He hesitated, thinking of Ahmed Abrusak and Mara Sekaran hunched over their desks in the next room. What were they doing there? Why had the Indian gone to such pains and such expense to have them doing it? What kind of legacy was he leaving to the man who was replacing him?

He shrugged. He could not start worrying about that now. Whatever he had done or hadn't done, the Indian would have found some way of getting those two men into this office. If it hadn't been me, it would have been someone else!

Thursday morning was like any other morning. The air was fresh and scented, with a few negligent clouds drifting over a pale blue sky. Clouds that would disappear as the day's heat mounted and as the sky grew paler and the flowers lost their freshness under the heavy sun. A day like any other. For every person in this camp, this day would be indistinguishable from three hundred others. Only for him would it be a special red-letter day: the day of his release.

"You haven't forgotten, have you," Julia asked at lunch, "that we're having cocktails with the Foleys?"

"I'm sorry, it slipped my memory."

"How lucky I reminded you."

"I wish you had earlier. It's too late now."

"Why ever should it be?"

"Because I'm doing something else."

"Another party?"

"Work."

"At that time of day—or rather night?"

"My replacement is due tomorrow. I've a fantastic amount to settle."

"Couldn't you do this some other time?"

"I'm sorry. It's not possible."

"I particularly want to go to the Foleys'."

"I'll take you there, then go away, then come back to fetch you."

"It doesn't sound as though it were a very important piece of work."

"It is important, but it won't take long."

"I see."

There was a suspicious expression on her face. Was she going to make difficulties, was this going to start a fight? He braced himself. It was the last time; he wouldn't have to lie again. He had only to see this one issue through.

She shrugged. "If you must, you must." It was said ungraciously, but the fight had been avoided.

On his desk was a letter in an unfamiliar script, with a Karak stamp; a half sheet of paper was wrapped round a type of paper with which he was too well familiar: a chess problem. He unfolded the covering half sheet. It was signed by Forrester. "Can you solve this? It has baffled me."

Trembling, he held it in his hands. A little while ago he had copied down a problem that had been set out in the policeman's office. But it was the first time that Forrester had handed him a problem; the first time, indeed, that Forrester had referred to chess since the day he had copied down the pieces on that board. It had been a shock when he had deciphered it. Why had he not thought of it again? Why had he not reminded himself that Forrester, whether or not he could decipher them, had access to these messages in code? Had his subconscious self refused, out of cowardice, to take full cognizance? Had he suppressed it without knowing he was doing so? You'd better work this out, he warned himself.

Four minutes later he was staring at the decoded message: "Zero hour Thursday nineteen-thirty."

He began to tremble. Nineteen-thirty; the very moment at which he was to meet the Indian. How could this meeting be of concern to anybody except the Indian and himself? How had it come to be a message sent in code to someone he did not know, to be intercepted by Forrester?

It must refer to himself. The same code and the same date. Why had Forrester sent it to him? Had Forrester decoded it? Was it merely that the message had reached him on this very day? Did it matter whether Forrester had or had not broken the code? The fact remained—and it was the one thing that did matter—that for someone his meeting with the Indian that evening was a zero hour.

He swept the chessmen off the board. He put his head round the door of the secretariat. "I'll be out for twenty minutes or so."

He drove down to Dempsey Avenue. He stopped fifty yards from the gate. By day a watchman stood on guard, checking the credentials of every entrant; at six o'clock the gate was locked. A few yards inside the fence was the cracking plant. Was it credible that an act of sabotage was planned tonight? He recalled that futile attempt on the crown princess' life. Violence had been used once. It might be used again; but if it were to be used, what was his connection with it? How could there be the least connection? The cracking plant looked so secure. How could it be in danger? Don't worry, he adjured himself. Leave this to the people whose job it is to worry over it. In two weeks you'll be in Trinidad. Sit firm, do nothing and you'll be all right.

He put his car into gear and swung it round. It was two o'clock. In five and a half hours' time he would hold in his hand the three incriminating slips of paper, and all his troubles would be at an end.

During the ten minutes he had been away, a new file had been put on his desk. It contained the Old Man's comments on a scheme he had prepared for preventing duplicat[ion] of work in the repair department. "Gene[ral] idea excellent," the Old Man had pencil[led]. "Faulty in detail. Note my comments."

"Faulty in detail." Basil smiled wryly. H[e] typical of him that was. He opened the f[ile] turning the pages, looking for Charles Keab[le]'s pencilled comments, excited that his sche[me] should have been approved, curious to f[ind] where it was weak. If I get this right, thought, I'd make a saving of two per cent that department's turnover.

He felt a glow of pride. He might be ca[re]less, but he was creative. He did initiate wo[rk]. Because of me —— He paused. Because [of] him, who knew what might happen tonig[ht]. Against his minute 2 per cent saving in [the] department might be set the destruction [of] machinery whose value . . . who could estim[ate] its value, coupled with the loss of output, p[er]sibly the loss of life? How illogical that [he] should be working so hard on this report [at] the very moment when he was conniving [at] the act of sabotage.

He got up, walked to the window. His br[ain] was racing. Illogical, but aren't we all illogic[al]? The energy with which he worked for Pe[arl] was directed and inspired by the personal ne[ed] to improve his own position; his loyalty [to] Pearl was based on the necessity to himself [and] Pearl's prosperity. It was clear where his o[wn] interest lay at the moment: to do nothing, r[un] to inculpate himself; to get out of Kar[ak] safely, to begin a new life in Trinidad. Th[is] might not be in Pearl's interest, but it was [in] his, except ——

He paused, he looked toward the towers [of] the cracking plant. If that were blown up [in the] night, would he know again a moment's pe[ace] of mind? If lives were lost tonight, would he e[ver] forgive himself? He remembered that questi[on] which no man was supposed to be able to a[n]swer honestly: If by lifting up a letter weight [on] your desk, you can become a millionaire at t[he] cost of a million unknown Chinese men dyi[ng] instantly in China, how long would you he[si]tate to lift that weight? Yes, but these were [not] unknown yellow men ten thousand mi[les] away. They were his friends, and his associat[es]. He knew what he ought to do. Lift up th[e] telephone receiver on his desk, call through [to] Forrester, say, "I believe that something su[b]versive may be attempted at the camp tonig[ht] at seven-thirty. I don't know what. I do[n't] know where, but I think a watch should [be] kept on the gate at Dempsey Avenue."

That's what he ought to do. Yes, but if [he] did, what trouble might he not lay for himse[lf]. How could he explain himself away? What [a] fool he'd feel if nothing happened. He wou[ld] be expelled from Pearl; what a disgrace f[or] Julia. He could not run that risk.

He went back to his desk, picked up the fi[le]. In two weeks he'd be in Trinidad. Twenty-fi[ve] to three. If only the clock's hands would hur[ry]. If only it were five hours later.

The four-o'clock hooter went. He put aw[ay] his files and locked them up. As he walked [to] the car park he passed Barbara. It was t[he] first time that they had met since the eveni[ng] of the play. She stopped at the sight of hi[m]. She stood straight in his way. She look[ed] straight at him. On her face was an expressi[on] of contempt and hatred. She did not spea[k]. She stood there looking at him. He had nev[er] seen such an expression before. That anyo[ne] should look at him like that; that he shou[ld] deserve to be looked at like that—and he h[ad] deserved it! Blackmail. Was there a dirti[er] word? Scarcely, but by tomorrow—with[in] three and a half hours—he might have earn[ed] a dirtier word. In every face he met he mig[ht] see that expression. For the rest of his life, [it] was more than he could risk. He turned, [he] hurried back into his office; he picked up t[he] telephone.

"Get me the C.I.D." The call went throu[gh] at once. "Can I speak to Colonel Forrester?"

"I'm sorry, sir. Colonel Forrester is out."

"Do you know where I can reach him?"

"I'm afraid I don't, sir."

It was the opportunity of a reprieve, but [he] did not take it.

"Then will you take a message? It is mo[st] important. Try to find him. If you can't fi[nd] him within half an hour, give the message [to] his second in command. This is the messag[e]

Armour☆
LARD makes the difference

flaky crust "easy-as-pie"
with
Armour Star Lard

Crisp, flaky, melt-in-the-mouth tenderness! Yes, perfect crust is easy-as-pie with Armour Star Lard—the lard that stays sweet and fresh without refrigeration. Neat and easy to handle, too! Digestible as butter! So, start right—finish light, crisp and flaky with Armour Star Lard.

YOUR RECIPE FOR CRUST MADE EASY-AS-PIE:

2 cups unsifted flour
1 teaspoon salt
⅔ cup Armour Star Lard
¼ cup tap water

Combine flour and salt. Add lard and blend with pastry blender until mixture resembles coarse meal. Add water all at once and blend. Form into two balls. Roll one ball for bottom crust and other for top. Simple as that!

GOT A BAKING PROBLEM? Write for Marie Gifford's FREE Picture Pie Booklet. 32 new pie recipes! How-to-do-it illustrations. Armour and Company, P.O. Box 9222 (Dept. C.S.), Chicago 90, Ill.

...d that is that, he thought a minute later. ...the consequences.

...e cocktail party was at half past six. With ...-time feeling he escorted Julia there. This ...t well be the last party he attended in ...aya. The news that he had been posted to ...dad had got round the camp. Friend ...friend came up to congratulate him and ...sh him luck. To all of them he made the ... reply: "You'll look after Julia, won't ...' Most of the men gave the same face- ... answer: "That's what we've been want- ...o do for the last two years, only you've ... around."

...clock stood on a low bookcase. He ...ched the minute hand move round. Five to ..., seven, five past, ten past. At quarter ...e took his leave. He put his arm round ...s shoulder.

"...m terribly sorry about this. I'll be back ... an hour."

...pressed her to him. Would he ever again ... her in just this way in fond, acknowl- ...d and accepted ownership? What an ass ...been, just when his innings was about to ...

...made a detour, driving to a higher level ... which he could see the whole panorama ... refinery, with its blaze of lights and the ...cloud of smoke blowing out over the sea. ...ked so ominous but so secure. How could ...ve imagined that it was threatened? Why ...e called Forrester? He shrugged. He had ...it now. He pressed the accelerator, drove ...toward Dempsey Avenue.

...ou may travel around the world, ...ut you will find no professional cook, ...hether cordon rouge or cordon ...leu, who can make an omelet like ...e French housewife preparing din- ...er for her children.

ALEXANDER DUMAS
Le Grand Dictionnaire de Cuisine

...stopped the car fifty yards from the gate, ...t he could walk toward his rendezvous. ...tected no sign of movement at the gate. ...oked at the luminous dial on his watch: ...2...

...he neared the gate, a figure came toward ...rom the shadow. "Good evening, Mr. ...t." The Indian was holding out an en- ...e. "Here are your signatures."

...il took the envelope.

..."should look inside if I were you. Make ...hat they are correct."

...his left hand he held an electric torch. ...shed it on the envelope. Basil looked in- ...Yes, there were his three signatures. The ...ne for fifty pounds. How lightheartedly ...d signed it.

...light switched off. Basil replaced the ...ce of his stupid weakness—his treach- ... you chose to call it that—put the enve- ...nto his breast pocket.

...Indian held out his hand. "And now, ...Hallett, I think we should say good-by. ...all not meet again. Try not to think too ...of me."

...il hesitated, then took the proffered ... Its fingers closed tightly about his in a ...us manner. He tried to pull his hand ... but found it held. There was a report; ...d against his chest. Looking down as his ... sagged, he saw that the Indian's left ... in his coat pocket, had lifted a project- ...ject. There was another report, a second ...and he was on his knees. In his ears there ...sound of shouting, the rattle of machine- ...re. The grasp on his hand loosened as he ...orward. His eyes were dazzled by an ...sion inside the fence, and darkness fell ... him.

...ough a fog of nightmare Basil Hallett ...t his way back to consciousness. Then, ...g achieved consciousness, tried to fight ...toward oblivion. He was aware of pain; ... heavy throbbing, a numbing lassitude. ...ept his eyelids closed. Where was he, what had happened? To what was he awakening, to what was he returning? He had had this feeling as a schoolboy on the eve of a major row when he expected to be summoned to the headmaster's study: dreading what the morning held, wishing he could escape again into the unreality of dream; with each waking second the weight of omen heightening.

He lay in a coma of numbed sensation, ignorant of where he was, trying to fight back into his dream. Where was he, to what was he awakening? He remembered two reports, the thuds against his chest; the shouting, the volley of machine-gun fire, the explosion. After that, what? He half opened his eyes to a darkened room, to bare walls, to the smell of iodoform. He reclosed his eyes. A bedroom in a hospital. How ill was he? Was he being nursed back to health so that he might be tried for treason? Why hadn't they let him die? Was he alone? He listened carefully; no talking, no sound of feet. He tried to turn his head, but the movement sent a spasm of pain from his forehead to his toes. Wincing, he lay back with his eyes closed. The soft palm pressed against his knuckles, the fingers folded about his.

"Don't move, darling; you're all right now," Julia said. "Oh, darling, we're all so proud of you."

Proud of him, the hero. Then the miracle had happened. His prayer had been granted, he had woken to another life.

As Julia stepped out of the hospital, Charles drew up his car against the curb. "How's the patient?" he asked.

"He's fine. In three days he'll be seeing visitors."

"In that case I won't get out. Tell him I called."

"Will this affect his transfer to Trinidad?"

"All the more reason for his going. There might be trouble for him if he stayed."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 145

SAVE 8¢ and discover

NESTEA

MAKES THE BEST TEA INSTANTLY!

Nestea® is pre-brewed a special way, to make tea to your taste! It's the newest way to make bright, flavorful tea, just the way you like it, strong and hearty, or mild and relaxing. Take this coupon to your dealer's and save 8¢. Start making tea to your own taste, time after time!

CLIP THIS COUPON TODAY!

THIS COUPON 8¢ IS WORTH 8 TO YOU ON NESTEA

TO THE DEALER: This coupon will be redeemed for 8¢ on Nestea . . . plus 2¢ for handling in accordance with the terms of our offer. Any other application constitutes fraud. This coupon is void if taxed, prohibited or otherwise restricted by law. Customer must pay any sales tax. Cash value 1/20¢. For redemption present to our salesman or mail to The Nestlé Company, Inc. P.O. Box 500, Mount Vernon 10, N. Y.—Expiration date September 30, 1960.

COPYRIGHT 1960. THE NESTLÉ COMPANY, INC.

4025

GREEN GIANT

has colorful ideas about corn

The Big Green Man now adds the white to the gold

Here's a fresh new kind of fun in corn. New Green Giant Brand shoe peg white corn. Very tall, very slender kernels the shape of a shoe peg and the color of white gold. Unusually crisp and delicate with a flavor like no other corn you've ever had.

And for corn fun of another color, there's Niblets Brand corn. Sweet, tender kernels golden as the summer sun and bursting with fresh-shucked flavor.

Choose the white or the gold. Both quick-cooked to capture the natural color, flavor and vitamins for you to enjoy. Both vacuum packed to stay crisp. Just heat up and eat up.

Mexicorn Brand corn with sweet red and green peppers added.

Green Giant Brand cre style corn—the cream cream style.

GREEN GIANT BRAND

GOOD THINGS FROM THE GARDE

Green Giant Company ... Minnesota Green Giant of Canada Ltd., Tecumseh, Ontario. "Niblets", "Mexicorn", and "Green Giant" are trademarks Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. GGCo. ©GGCo.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 143

Forrester looked down thoughtfully at sil. "You'd better tell me the whole thing m the start," he said. "I don't suppose that u'll be telling me much that I don't know, t I'm curious to know how much you do ow."

He listened carefully, nodding from time to ne, interjecting little grunts that seemed to /, "Yes, that's so. Go on."

It did not take Basil very long to tell his ory.

"And now," said Forrester, "I imagine that u would like to know what actually hap- ned."

"I should say I would."

"It's a very simple story in essentials. There a strong group of military men and indus- alists who want to take over the country, intaining the throne as long as the old king es, establishing a republic when he dies. ey want to nationalize the oil. They have cking in New York and also, I believe, in ndon. They believed that the best way to ze power was by creating a Communist gey; there is no real Communist Party in rak, though there are a few disaffected ele- nts who would join one if it were properly ganized. Your Indian friend acted as the nt provocateur of this small group. You re useful to him in three ways. You were le to give him information about Pearl. You roduced his friends into Pearl. Thirdly, he d you up his sleeve, as a kind of joker; en the showdown came your affiliation h the Communistic world proves conclu- ely that the Red menace did exist. Yours s not, you see, a very pleasant fate."

"But I don't see ——"

"I am coming to that. Various events has- ed the plot. The Nationalists had to move icker than they had planned. Last Thursday re was to be an attempted sabotage at the inery. The Nationalists would intervene, ce the king to declare an emergency. You, friend, were to be found dead with those cks in your pocket issued by a Communist, dorsed by you. They also planned to shoot a mmunist. Your two dead bodies would ve been ample evidence of a plot. It was a t that would have succeeded nine times in n."

"But what happened?"

"Because of your warning I was able to estall the Nationalists. The attempt at sab- ge took place. Not much damage was ne. It was not intended that there should be ch damage. The Nationalists only wanted excuse to intervene. Because we were there t, we were able to clear up the attempt at otage, and to attribute it to the National- s. All their leaders have been arrested. Your dian friend, by the way, is dead."

"When you sent me that chess problem, did u know what its message was?"

"That is a question that I prefer not to an- er."

"Did you know there was to be this at- npt Thursday evening?"

Forrester smiled. "My dear young man, I ver quite know what I know. I make it my siness not to. I keep an open mind. I make list of as many eventualities as possible. I read my nets. I don't chase my fish; I wait them to entangle themselves in those nets. oner or later they all do. I let time do my rk for me. I make fewer mistakes that y."

"Would you have discovered the plot un- s I had warned you?"

"Everyone in the island believes I wouldn't."

"I know, and that's what puzzles me. I'm garded as a hero."

"It's pleasant to be a hero, isn't it? Partic- rly a wounded hero?"

"Yes, but how has this story got around?"

"I spread it. You are going to be extremely eful to us in the years ahead. You will have ong your colleagues in Pearl a very high putation for courage and self-sacrifice. You ll be trusted everywhere. Promotion will be celerated. Because of your actions the other ght, you will be trusted universally. You will ceive confidences that would not normally me to a person of your years, and that is mething that the Communists will appre- te."

"The Communists?"

"Your stock stands very high with them."

"With them?"

The policeman nodded. His smile could not have been more bland. "The Communists also consider you a man of courage. They believe that you unmasked an attempt to discredit them, that you risked your life foiling a Nationalist plot against their interests. You are not only a hero to the directors of Pearl in London, you are also a hero to a certain bureau that directs subversive operations from the Kremlin. I have ensured that. You can see now, can't you, how very useful you can be to me?"

Basil did not answer. He could not yet completely visualize his position.

"Wherever you go," Forrester continued, "you will be contacted by the Communists. You do not need telling that Communism is an advancing tide. You have been posted now to Trinidad. As far as we know, there is no established outpost there; but Communism undoubtedly flourishes or until recently flourished across the water in B. G. It may very easily reach Trinidad. Your presence there will be of great value to us. If you are not contacted, it will be a great reassurance to us. A nil report is valuable to us; but I think you will be contacted."

"What shall I do then?"

"You will do what we tell you to. You will be recompensed for your work. Money will be paid into a numbered account in Switzerland. There will be no record of these transactions. You will find it very useful when you retire. It will be a pleasant addition to the pension Pearl will pay you."

The word "salary" originally meant "salt money," or earning one's salt. In the days before refrigeration, salt was precious indeed, and getting it sometimes difficult. We still talk about our hard-earned savings as money "salted away." OPAL Y. PALMER

"Suppose I refuse to do this?"

"You are not in a position to refuse. Those endorsed checks are in your file."

"That's blackmail."

"It's counterespionage; which is not the cleanest game. We are not fighting people who respect the laws of cricket. We like to have a hold over our agents. Our agents are usually people who have made one grave error, as you have done, my dear young friend."

"But how long will this game go on?"

Forrester's smile was as benign as Father Christmas'. "Till the day you die, my friend."

Angus Macartney's ship docked at Southampton. During the long journey his health had been increasingly restored by the sea air and sunlight. Ah, but it was going to be good to be in London again, free and twenty-six and with a substantial bank balance.

Letters awaited Angus at his club. There were several bearing Karak stamps. Another, addressed by a typewriter, had been posted in London. He opened it.

The letter heading was from an office in the City. It was signed "Francis Reynolds."

Dear Macartney: We met, do you remember, at Karak at the Residency. I was so sorry to hear of your father's death. Please accept my deepest sympathy. I was also most distressed to hear of your accident. I trust that you are completely recovered. I wonder if you would have time to lunch with me one day. It would be pleasant to see you again and I should like to hear your version of the recent dramatic incidents in Kassaya.

Reynolds invited him to lunch at the Carlyle Club. Angus had never heard of it. It was in Dover Street and he expected it to be a vast mausoleum with columns, a wide staircase and dark portraits of men in uniform. It was not that kind of place at all. It looked more like a restaurant than a club.

Reynolds was assured and affable. A short, busy-looking man paused at their table. "I've something that might interest you, Reynolds. Could you ring me up this afternoon?"

"I'll do that."

The man's features were familiar to Angus. "Haven't I seen his photograph in the papers?"

"You certainly have. Sir Stuart Marchant. Anyone can join this club who can afford the entrance fee. But some quite good people do belong. Now tell me how the Karakis themselves took the incident."

Reynolds asked question after question, but appeared to know a good deal more about what had happened than Angus did himself.

"You keep yourself well informed," said Angus.

"It pays to, in my game. I made a lot of money out of your little piece of trouble."

"How so?"

"Pearl shares dropped several points when the news reached London. Investors have got windy about oil. They remember Abadan. But I had my sources of information. I knew there was no danger; I bought heavily. Within two days the shares were back where they belonged. By the way, I hear that Shelagh Keable is going to marry the A.D.C. I hope you're not too upset."

"So you heard that rumor?"

"It was one of the first things I heard when I arrived."

Angus laughed. "I'm afraid a good many people got dust thrown in their eyes over that. It was a silly joke that got out of hand."

"Then I've been wasting my sympathy. There was someone else I was going to ask about. Young Hallett. He showed me round the refinery. How did he strike you?"

They discussed camp personalities, then the talk switched to Angus' present plans and to London, where he would spend his holiday. Reynolds advised him on the plays to see. "If I can be of any help in any way, you won't forget to ask."

Angus thoroughly enjoyed his lunch. He was stimulated by Reynolds' company. It was the first time he had met a man of the world on equal terms.

Reynolds looked at his watch. "I must be on my way. I'm not on a holiday like you; but we must keep in touch. And there is one thing I'd like to say: International finance is a very interwoven racket and your father was in touch with a group of businessmen in Karak and the Far East who are in touch with certain interests of mine. When you go back, I'd like to put you in touch with them. It should be of advantage to us all."

Angus instantly was on his guard; a section of a pattern had grown plain: his father's taking up of chess, Forrester's concern, Reynolds' start of surprise at the Residency dinner when he mentioned it. In a flash he saw Reynolds under a new light, as part of a conspiracy.

"That's very good of you," he said. "I'm grateful."

Forrester might have cut down the branches of the conspiracy, but the roots might remain. Here was his chance to prove his loyalty to the crown and to avenge his father's death. If he allowed himself to be guided by Reynolds for a little, he might discover the secrets that had eluded Forrester. His pulses thudded with a sense of high adventure. The cycle of causation that had been started when an experienced worldling had tried to take advantage of a young woman's trustfulness was not yet complete.

Charles Keable and Shelagh sat in the drawing room waiting for the minute hand to reach the figure 4. Five minutes earlier Barbara, the Studholmes, and Prince and Princess Rhya had driven to the church. Shelagh was wearing the conventional long white dress, of silk but not of satin. She looked very young, the redness in her hair heightened by the gauzy veil. Her father, refusing to encase himself, in equatorial heat, in a black morning coat, had ordered a suit in cream-colored Siamese silk from a local tailor.

They sat in silence. This, he thought, is one of the big moments in a man's life, when he walks at his daughter's side, down an aisle toward an altar; when he hands over his daughter to the care of another man, his work of parenthood completed.

the magic of summer is specially yours in Ontario

Canada's Variety Vacation Land

Ontario's soft, starry nights are made for festivities or reflection—her days for restful or zestful holiday fun. 250,000 lakes, sandy beaches, unspoiled woodland, and varied resort facilities . . . choose the vacation area your family wants. Shop for fine clothes, woolens, exclusive dinnerware in excellent stores. Send for your free, full-colour copy of "Royal Welcome", your key to Ontario vacation adventure.

Province of Ontario, Department of Travel and Publicity, Room 1071 Parliament Buildings, Toronto 2.

Please send me your new, full-colour book of vacation ideas, "Royal Welcome".

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY..... STATE.....

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE WATER MASTER America's Largest Selling TOILET TANK BALL

Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.

75c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE

Higher in Canada

MOMMY!...MOMMY!..

MOMMY!

To mothers, that cry means that there's another cut, scratch, scrape, or burn. It also means she should get iodine—but she often doesn't, because iodine burns and stings, upsets youngsters. Here's good news. Science has discovered a new kind of iodine that stops infection best yet doesn't burn or sting. It's polyvinylpyrrolidone-iodine, found only in new ISODINE® ANTISEPTIC. Where other types of antiseptics may kill only 1, 2, or 3 types of germs, ISODINE kills all types —even virus and fungus. And up to 40 times faster. Get painless ISODINE ANTISEPTIC. Money-back guarantee.

© 1958 Isodine Pharmacal Corp., Dover, Del.

He looked at the clock. Nineteen minutes past. He rose. "Time to be on our way." He walked across to her, put his arm round her shoulder. "Good luck," he said.

As the organ began to play the wedding march, Barbara turned her head. The sight of Shelagh in white on Charles' arm sent a glow of satisfaction along her nerves. Shelagh could not have looked prettier. The dress was very simple in design, suitable to her age and looks, accentuating her freshness, her slimness, her air of innocence. It was the dress that she would have chosen for herself if she could have had this kind of wedding. She had a sense of achievement, seeing Shelagh so completely the bride of storybooks.

From the seat behind, Sir Kenneth Studholme looked with a certain envy at Charles Keable. He wished he was in Charles' shoes with Lila on his arm. Why on earth couldn't she have settled for this young A.D.C. herself? Lila was a problem, and likely to be a greater problem every year. Still, one must be philosophical about it. One must have problems and Lila was his only major one. In every other way the stars were fighting on his side. The dispersal of the Nationalist coup d'état was a great piece of luck for him. He did not know that he could take much credit for it, but Whitehall was inclined to think he could. And after all, he had been responsible for Forrester's appointment. Yes, he could take some credit; and he had given Forrester his head. No doubt it had been touch and go, but his luck had held. The status quo would last his own time. Prince Rhya was showing every sign of responsibility. The rumor that he was to be a father early in the year had been confirmed. The birth of a son would consolidate the regime. Sir Kenneth followed his own thoughts contentedly.

As others in the congregation were following theirs. Forrester had learned that morning that his name would appear among the C.M.G.'s in the New Year's honor list. The old Prima Donna would get a kick out of it, and so would he. He'd been lucky here: luckier than his nibs suspected. It had been touch and go. Another time . . . there wouldn't be another time. He'd retire first.

Barbara shifted to the right, then to the left. She wished that Charles would not stand so close to Shelagh, or would stand a little farther forward. He was blocking the view of her train from everyone on the left side of the church. Ah, that was better: he had shifted forward slightly. It was just the right train for Shelagh. Everyone could see it now.

The young couple were moving forward to the altar. Charles had stepped back to his seat beside her. She slid her hand along the seat to his. It was a symbol, this, of what their life together was about to be: Shelagh going forward with her new life, Charles coming back to her. They would be alone together now. It had been a strain, having Shelagh with them; she had tried not to let Charles know. She believed she had concealed her feelings, but all the time Shelagh's presence had reminded her of that other woman. It was all over now and in the spring . . . she had not told Charles yet, but she really had no doubt. Next summer there would be the three of them. Her heart was warm. She had not a worry in the world.

She supposed that, among the congregation, one or two of the guests were wondering what she was thinking. Whether she was envious of her stepdaughter in a white church wedding, a marriage to someone near to her in age. How different the stepmother's marriage was, they thought. She smiled. They could not believe that she had fallen in love with Charles, in just the way that a young girl dreamed of doing. They presumed that she had married for security. If that was what they wanted to think, then let them think it. She knew better.

Charles pressed the hand that had touched his. It should be Daphne's hand that he was pressing at this moment. Poor Daphne, all those miles away. He hoped that Shelagh would write her a real letter, telling everything; a letter full of love.

Lila, at her mother's side, was thinking. Good luck to you, but I don't envy you. It's right for you; it wouldn't be for me. You need solid rock under your feet, a wall round you and yours, safety within a citadel. I don't. I could have had that with Angus if I'd wanted it. I didn't. Maybe I'll never marry, but if I ever do, it'll be something.

Her veil lifted above her head, Shelagh came down the aisle on Gerald's arm. She glanced to left and right, smiling at her friends. She supposed she shouldn't; that she ought to be demure and serious, blushing with downcast eyes, or else radiantly absorbed in her own happiness, thinking only of her husband. She could not help it. Her heart was singing. She wanted to embrace the entire world. If only mummie were here too. She would ring her up first thing tomorrow morning.

The reception was being held on the veranda; the guests could wander in the garden, or if a sudden tropic storm intervened, seek shelter in the sitting room. One by one the guests filed up. A year ago I didn't know a single one of these, thought Shelagh. How many of them will I ever see again? In a couple of months she would be going back to England for Gerald to have his six months' training. Then they would be posted heaven knows where abroad. For the next quarter of a century her life would be cut up with a succession of three-year contracts. Each time they arrived at a new camp they would be asking, "I wonder if we'll find here somebody who was at our wedding?" They would have no real friends; they would never be part of a community, except on a short-term basis. They would be terribly dependent on each other, she and Gerald; the foreknowledge of that increased her happiness.

One by one the guests filed by. The Forresters, the Studholmes, the Pawlings, Annetta and Prince Rhya.

Annetta kissed her. "Sometimes it seems only yesterday that we caught that plane together," Annetta said. "Sometimes it seems a century ago."

Lila kissed her too. "Good luck," she said. "I've never had a friend like you."

The last guest had filed by. "Now we shall enjoy ourselves," said Charles. The young couple moved away. He stood by Barbara looking round him. Everything, everyone looked very happy under the blue sky, in the heavy sunlight. The brown and ocher crotons, the bougainvillaea mauve and red and scarlet, a yellow cassia in flower, the women in their bright cotton dresses; the champagne sparkling in the glasses. "You've given them a wonderful show," he said. "I can't begin to thank you."

He paused. He put his arm round her shoulder. "Isn't it good to think that tomorrow we'll be alone together?"

All the strength and force of a man comes from his faith in things unseen. He who believes is strong; he who doubts is weak. Strong convictions precede great actions. The man strongly possessed of an idea is the master of all who are uncertain or wavering. Clear, deep, living convictions rule the world.

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE

Studholme was talking to Prince Rhya. "How is the king?" he asked.

Prince Rhya shrugged. "We had the X rays yesterday," he said. " There'll have to be an operation."

"You don't know anything for certain?" Studholme asked.

"We shan't until the operation."

"You'll tell him, won't you, how concerned I am?"

"I will."

"I've never met in public life a man for whom I've had more respect and more affection."

They talked for a little, and then moved apart. Annetta and Prince Rhya were alone.

"Today makes me feel rather guilty toward you," he said.

"Guilty?"

"Seeing that other English girl go off into that very English marriage, the kind of marriage you should have made."

"I had several chances of making one," she told him.

"I know, but this —— A woman wants to give her children the best possible life that's within her range. Is there any woman in the world today who'd choose to have her son a king?"

Annetta shrugged. "One accepts one's fate. One doesn't choose it."

He laughed. "I believe you've been a Buddhist all along, without knowing it."

"Have I? Perhaps I have. Perhaps my happy-go-luckiness was a kind of Buddhism. 'The world is a bridge. Therefore build not house on it.' I'd never heard that till you told it me, but wasn't that the kind of way I lived, as though I believed just that? Perhaps that's why you asked me to marry you."

"Perhaps it is."

She looked over his shoulder at the crowded garden, all these happy faces bright with unreasoning hope; then she looked down at him. "I hope our child's a son," she said.

END

Coty

Instant Beauty
LIQUID MAKE-UP

Smooth on Instant Beauty just once—and you'll never go back to ordinary make-up again! Texture so fine it makes your skin smoother, lovelier than you ever dreamed possible . . . shades so subtle you'll wonder if it's hue or you. And Instant Beauty goes on in seconds . . . clings up to eight hours or more—without tiresome touch-ups! Only Coty, famous the world over for flesh-true shades, could create this delicious new flattery for every complexion. Six heavenly hues: Fair, Blush, Beige, Ivory, Rosy Beige and Bronze. 1.50 plus tax

COTY...THE ESSENCE OF BEAUTY THAT IS FRANCE

A HEART-TO-HEART ABOUT PARENTS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

th iving room, I had to add a belated item to m New Year's resolutions: I will never again al v the girls to play with the pillows on the so in the living room. They are different fr n the pillows on the couch in the den (e n if they do look the same).

n sure the gals will follow Shirley's logic at nce—but the guys may share my confu- si . Now how does a student parent learn th e things? By experience. It's obvious that pa nthood can't be blueprinted exactly as sc e experts would have us believe. Any more th the teen years can.

chuckled when I heard about a harassed pa getting a primary parent lesson from his sm ll son as they hustled up Fifth Avenue the ot r day.

"Pop," demanded the little kid, "how m y bricks in that building?" "Well, son, I n't rightly know," said his dad. "Pop, w does the green light mean 'go' and the re ight mean 'stop'?" "Well—uh—now, I'd ne r thought about it," replied pop. And a w steps later: "Pop, who discovered Cen- tr Park?" "Son," said the frantic parent, "I'll have to look that one up—bu"—giving him a hearty slap on the back—"y keep right on asking questions. Just ask m anything. How else can you learn?"

e what I mean? And only last Sunday I di overed that, though it took a mature man fo ly "Divide and conquer," the instinct for th cunning wisdom is already present in our ol st daughter, Cherry, at age five. Cherry w carrying on a private conversation with se ral of her dolls, furnishing all the voices he elf, and it went about like this:

Mommy, can—may I have a piece of ca y?"

firm voice: "No, Cherry."

Eva, may I have a piece of candy?"

pause and then a reluctant voice: "Not m , Cherry."

Daddy, can I have a piece of candy?"

"I guess so."

Another pause and then the feminine Dale Carnegie murmured triumphantly, "I love you, daddy."

Now this is tempting. It can turn your head. It's a siren song to male ears. And yet—you know what? When "nice daddy" was wheedled for the goodies that very afternoon he had to turn monster. He had to say, "No, Cherry. Not before supper." That's not easy, believe me.

The blueprint Shirley and I started with for the kind of parents we wanted to be sounded just great: we would encourage independence, self-reliance, good manners, high principles and ideals without being too strict, and then encourage self-expression while we dished out love, security and a sense of belonging, without spoiling them. That's a very good blueprint too. And it sounds so simple. Well, being a good parent is simple—just as balancing on a slack wire is simple. The trick is merely to put one foot after the other and not lose your balance either way. Very simple. But not easy.

THE "WHYS" IN QUESTION

Generally speaking, your questions to me about your parents seem to be variations on a single theme, and that is: "Why don't my parents have more confidence in me? Why don't they trust me and my ability to make decisions and handle situations?" The variations run from feeling that "They always think I'm trying to put something over on 'em" to "Why can't I have a car of my own if I'm willing to work to pay for it?" or "They're afraid I can't take care of myself after eleven o'clock at night," or "I always have to double-date or go with a group as if I couldn't be depended on to behave on my own," or simply, "They just don't understand me!"

Believe it or not, in trying to answer these questions in relation to what we'll call normal or "good" parents—the regular type that comes in permanent sets of two, one mother and one father (we'll deal with the irregulars separately)—there's something to be said on both sides and we might as well go ahead and say it.

Let's quit passing the buck by saying, "Our parents don't understand us." This may be true to a certain extent; but on the other hand, if you're anything like the youngsters my buddies and I were, you probably don't understand you very well either. Do you? Honestly? If not, why not? I'll tell you. Because you're in a state of transition. You're just in second gear. You're rarely the same today as you were yesterday, and you may not even be the same this minute as you were sixty seconds ago. And that takes understanding.

You don't believe me? So I'll explain.

THE TEEN-AGE YOU
(A Serious Subject!)

To understand yourself, you'll first be asking questions like this: Who and what am I—since I'm no longer a child and I am not yet a grown man or woman? Where do I fit in? By what rules do I play as an in-betweener? How do I fit with people? What am I trying to prove?

And the answer to all that is: You are an emotional and psychological and physical phenomenon (I'll bet you've never been called that before) experiencing the various stages of a metamorphosis (tighten your seat belt), trying to achieve maturity in an eight-year period. You can see where all that might add up to a large experience. I didn't copy all that out of the dictionary. I learned it in college.

Don't let it throw you though. Reduced to simple jive, a metamorphosis is nothing more nor less than a complete change in character, purpose and circumstances, a passing from one form into another without a change of nature (you will still come out you—but different; follow me?). A caterpillar manages all this very spectacularly when it goes into its cocoon a lowly but well-adjusted crawler and emerges as a magnificent but probably very surprised flying garden ornament.

We, the human animals, go into the teens as nice, well-adjusted, carefree, dependent children with clearly defined rules and limitations and from twelve to twenty accomplish the change into a high-flying, independent adult whose boundaries are infinity, and whose responsibilities are great.

Unfortunately, you can't go into a cocoon and emerge with the transformation already complete. You have to do it the hard way, on stage, front and center, because only your body makes the change automatically. For the rest, the psychological and emotional changes required of you, it's necessary that you explore your environment, make social experiments, test, accept, reject, succeed, fail, adjust, readjust—in short, to coin a phrase that probably first belonged to the butterfly, "try your wings," build your confidence and self-esteem until you can really fly alone. In these struggles you're bound to come into conflict with your surroundings. So one minute you're Joan of Arc and the next the Incredible Shrinking Man—trying to fit in.

As teen-agers we have new impulses—and these require new controls and special handling. It's like switching over from a cub plane to a jet. We develop the controls and seem very grown up and then suddenly they slip a little and we're not grown up at all, just like the guy whose voice is changing, who roars forth in a fine masculine boom that continues to surprise and delight him, except at those horrifying moments when it gets all out of control and he sounds like Lily Pons with a bad cold.

Another thing: we suddenly find we're becoming responsible for steering our own boats a little. Where once mom or dad made the decisions for us, now we feel the need to make a few for ourselves. This is moving from llow! Try on "hue-it-yourself"™ Tintair FREE!

TI MYSTERY is gone from Hair Coloring! Tintair positively answers the questions . . . "Can I Do It Myself?" ...and "How Will It Look On Me?"

THE SECRET — new "Hue-It-Yourself" Method takes guess and gamble out of hair coloring and color selection! Shows in advance how you'll look with TINTAIR!

THE ANSWER — choose the shade you want from your color column below. Order the self-timing Tintair color opposite your choice, at any cosmetic counter.

f you are BLONDE

TO BECOME	USE THIS COLOR
light gold blonde	#1 Canary Diamond
light ash blonde	#2 Bamboo Blonde medium ash blonde	#3 Starlight Blonde medium blonde	#4 Grecian Blonde strawberry blonde	#5 Golden Topaz
light red	#6 Carrot Top
warm brown	#7 American Brown
mink brown	#7½ Lustre Brown Mink
medium brown	#8 Mona Lisa Brown
auburn	#9 Gleaming Bronze
golden chestnut brown	#10 Glossy Chestnut warm dark brown	#11 Brown Onyx

If you are BROWNETTE

TO BECOME	USE THIS COLOR
medium gold blonde	#1 Canary Diamond
medium ash blonde	#2 Bamboo Blonde medium honey blonde	#3 Starlight Blonde dark blonde	#4 Grecian Blonde medium copper blonde	#5 Golden Topaz light auburn	#6 Carrot Top
medium brown	#7 American Brown
medium dark brown	#8 Mona Lisa Brown deep auburn	#9 Gleaming Bronze dark chestnut brown	#10 Glossy Chestnut dark brown	#11 Brown Onyx
very dark brown	#12 Jet Brown

If you are a REDHEAD

TO BECOME	USE THIS COLOR
light strawberry blonde	#1 Canary Diamond
golden copper	#3 Starlight Blonde medium red blonde	#4 Grecian Blonde golden titian	#5 Golden Topaz
bright red	#6 Carrot Top
medium reddish brown	#7 American Brown
auburn mink	#7½ Lustre Brown Mink
dark auburn	#8 Mona Lisa Brown
dark coppery auburn	#9 Gleaming Bronze warm chestnut brown	#10 Glossy Chestnut dark reddish brown	#11 Brown Onyx
jet black	#14 Jet Black

If you are BRUNETTE (Very dark brown to black)

TO BECOME	USE THIS COLOR
golden chestnut brown	#1 Canary Diamond
medium brown	#2 Bamboo Blonde medium chestnut	#3 Starlight Blonde medium dark brown	#4 Grecian Blonde deep reddish brown	#5 Golden Topaz
dark auburn	#6 Carrot Top
very dark auburn	#9 Gleaming Bronze darkest brown	#12 Jet Brown
jet black	#14 Jet Black

Use Tintair's Creamy Lightening Change for blonde tones — lightens 4 shades per application. At cosmetic counters.

GREYING HAIR: Choose from original color group. TINTED HAIR: Select a shade similar to your present color—lighten with Tintair's Creamy Lightening Change, or darken with any Tintair color.

Tintair®

Use Tested and Commended by McCall's

GUARANTEES long-lasting, washable coloring that you can change — anytime. Only Tintair contains exclusive "Vegetable Catalyst D"—the automatic color control that assures you an even, natural look. Be fashionable—Save time—Save money—"Hue-it-yourself" at home with Tintair.

Nature Isn't Always Right—but Tintair Is!

FREE SAMPLE!

Mail this coupon for a sample size TINTAIR package. Lets you prevue your color or create exciting streaks, tips or bands in the shade you want. Offer limited.

TINTAIR, DEPT. M3 , BOX 2331, New York 17, N. Y.

Enclosed is 25¢ for postage and handling. Please rush my free TINTAIR "Hue-it-Yourself" sample in the shade checked below.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 7½ 8 9 10 11 12 14

Name_____ PLEASE PRINT

Address_____

City_____ Zone_____ State_____

tape quarter here

(Please send 25c for each sample requested.)

Free Vacation Guide to TENNESSEE

40 PAGES 116 PICTURES

Your whole family will enjoy a Tennessee vacation. You'll ride highways into the sky in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park. Enjoy Tennessee's 22 great lakes and TVA dams, with wonderful fishing, boating, and swimming. See historic battlefields, the homes of three presidents, and Oak Ridge. Send now for free 40-page booklet.

MAIL COUPON TODAY

TENNESSEE DIVISION OF INFORMATION
2172 Cordell Hull Bldg.
Nashville, Tenn.

Please send free Vacation Guide

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY & STATE_____

Slim-hip French Secret®10.95 panty12.50 bra $5. For store name and free booklet write Olga, Dept. J20, 7915 Haskell, Van Nuys, Cal.

infantile dependence to full-fledged independence, and at first we love the taste of it. But it's possible to take the wrong turn now and then.

It takes some learnin' as well as doin'. We can use a little help. When we can't handle it alone we often try conforming to the pack, or crowd, or club, or whatever. Then it makes decisions for us. We feel safe if "all the others" do it. But this is good only if the crowd has high ideals and sound principles. Even then, the crowd can't replace the parents. It is our parents who can give us the help we need, for at this point "the folks" have the one thing we simply cannot have at fourteen or sixteen or even twenty—either as individuals or groups

Mom and dad have experience.

THE GROWN-UP PARENT AND HIS USES

A friend of mine, a brilliant Hollywood writer, who has been forced by circumstances to raise two teen-age boys alone, told me the other day that the four words he dreads to hear most on the telephone are, "Dad, you're pretty smart."

"I want to hang up right then," he admitted. "I know what's coming and it won't be anything to gloat over!" For invariably one of the boys, the sixteen- or the twenty-year-old, has just discovered dad was right about something. They have pitted their *in*experience against his experience and "usually discovered," he says, "that if you brake a car too suddenly on a curve it turns over. But it's a little late to be finding out I'm right!"

Experience dictates most of the reasonable rules made by parents. If you can believe that, the neck you save may be your own.

This will be a tough pill to swallow, but I've found, honestly, in talking with hundreds of parents (and pondering the matter myself), that the motives behind most restrictions are your safety or your reputation. Now I know that this latter is an old-fashioned word—so, too, is it an old-fashioned saying that "Who steals my purse steals trash, but he that filches from me my good name ——" Well, we'll look at an example of that shortly in connection with the too lenient parent.

I know that the rules you mention in your questions seem *un*reasonable at this moment to you—so let's take a look at them in relation to your future, using for glasses the frame of experience and the lenses of safety and your reputation. These glasses may be uncomfortable at first, but you might see some surprising things!

Take the question, 'Why can't I have a car?"—or "Why can't I date boys who have cars?" If you're in the early teens (especially if you're a boy) wheels are the symbol of your independence. I know they were for me. And my mamma and daddy were like yours—they said no to my having a car all the way through high school even if I could pay for it myself! They didn't think it was necessary, wise or safe. Chee! Wotta grouch!

Now I'll tell you a secret. Teen-age drivers in my book can be the bes.. I've ridden with some who are the best (I'd vote myself as just "pretty good"). But almost without exception they weren't the speed-demon type, either behind the wheel or at owning a car. There's not that big a rush, pal! That's what experience teaches Right now you need driving experience—but get it gradually in the family bus under control conditions, until ol' dad, the guy with the experience, thinks it wise and safe for you to own a car and until you can afford one in good condition! And darlin', you with that beautiful young neck: don't be in a hurry to trust it to some fella who's just found that four wheels and an engine go faster than a bicycle—that may be all he knows! One buddy of mine, actually a terrific driver, took one chance too many and killed himself, his girl and three other innocent people in a flaming wreck. It does happen!

For those of you who say, "My parents are afraid I can't take care of myself after eleven o'clock," I have a lot of sympathy on that score. Mine was an eleven-o'clock family and I know how Cinderella felt, scared that her pretty duds would turn into rags and her whole evening be ruined because she had to leave the party before everyone else. I know Carol and Artie can stay till twelve—and Tom and Mary Ann till one. If I had my way, we'd get all the parents in each age group together and insist that they agree on basic rules just as the Army does. It would save them and you strain if everyone had to be in at eleven—or twelve—and you never had to leave a going gang.

But I will tell those of you who have to be in . . . I almost said "early," but I'll change that to "earlier than seems reasonable to you" that these hours seem pretty reasonable to me now with my own four daughters sprouting like wild onions. And that the idea of double-dating or dating with a crowd used to be fun and now seems pretty smart.

I know. I know. I'm turning into an ol' creep. Yesterday the teen-age Boone was arguing for those same rights and calling the restrictions unreasonable and today the parental me is endorsing the same as laws of common sense which will guard your own health, homework and reputations while you're gaining experience and learning the new rules. I wouldn't blame you if you felt like the little girl whose older sister scolded her when putting her to bed.

"You've had a rotten temper all day long," big sis said.

And the little one, neatly tucked in, came back; "It's temper when it's me an' 'nerves' when it's you."

I can see the inconsistency of having fought for the same freedoms you want for myself at your age, and now sittin' back and saying blandly, "The restrictions won't do you any harm." But I guess the answer is that I have a little more experience now, and it, like your folks', is at your disposal if you care to use it. Anyway, don't go 'way mad.

The best thing I can pass along to you is, "Don't rush." I can stay up all night now if I want to—and, y' know, it isn't nearly what it's cracked up to be! Actually, I don't worry too much about your ability to meet these annoyances cheerfully as they come up.

I do worry, though, when you say, "They don't trust me"; "They think I'm trying to put something over on 'em." Because this indicates a lack of communication—and if you aren't communicating, you're in trouble. You may lose a pair of great guides who want to help you through the teen-age maze.

GETTING IN TOUCH WITH PARENTS

Unfortunately, somewhere 'twixt twelve and twenty it becomes unfashionable to discuss things with parents—while to agree with them is practically to acknowledge that you need 'em, and some ill-advised teen-agers feel that this puts them back to child status again. If you fall for this you get out of touch.

Now, let's be honest. You do need them. As long as your parents give their support you'll find it safe to make your own decisions. Look what happened to a young friend of mine recently. Ella felt her mother didn't h any confidence in her ability to make her c decisions. A holiday party was coming up Ella was going to the beauty shop to have hair styled and set. All the way down in car she lectured her mom.

"Please let me tell them how I want it d this time," she begged. "Every other time give the orders and treat me like a baby. old enough to know what I want."

So her mother dumped her at the hairdr er's and scooted off to do her marketing then picked Ella up. On the drive home was in tears. She didn't like her new hairdo wasn't becoming and she knew it.

"Oh, mother, this looks terrible," wailed. "I'll have to go back and have it d over the way it used to be. You can't let me to the party looking like a witch!"

Now, from there on Ella's mother mi well have stopped trusting Ella to mak own decisions, because somehow they w speaking two different languages. At the s face level Ella was saying, "I don't n you—I need you. I don't want you—I w you. Let me alone—help me." It didn't m much sense.

But Ella's mother could translate. W Ella was really saying was, "Advise me. Do boss me." However, can you imagine confusion if her mother hadn't been able figure that out? This kind of confusion g on all the time.

It would be better if we tried a little har to make ourselves understood by our eld in the teens instead of inventing a secret l guage and only talking to ourselves—that if we want to get our problems settled.

To begin with—try to lay off the jar when outside your own set. If a boy s "Slip me some bread, pop," to his dad, apt to get whole-wheat instead of money you tell your mother you've heard a pictur "wicked" she'll probably make you miss best show in town. If your young date s "Let's make the scene" instead of, "We'd b ter go now," you may find you won't be lowed out with him again.

Now, here's a Boone formula for getting be trusted—for letting the folks know you not trying to put anything over. They're g eral rules for talking things over with pare in a way that gets results. Try it! It worked me when I used it.

First: Be sure you are coming in loud a clear, speaking the same language on the sa subject.

Second: Choose the right time and place do not interrupt a business conversation dad's, or catch mom when she's hurrying get little sister ready for a party. Try turni off the TV once in a while (yes, even my sho and getting to know each other.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

In this day of paper napkins, some persons seem as afraid to use a linen napkin as others are to use a guest towel.

Stalemate: one who, after twenty-five years of marriage, is still telling the same jokes.

Our local child psychologist says one trouble with children is they all have mothers and fathers, but some of them do not have parents.

Memory expert: any woman who has successfully forgotten how old she is

In a normal household, something abnormal can be expected to happen on most ordinary days.

Perhaps people, like automobiles, should undergo a semiannual inspection, then be kept off the road until running smoothly.

Overheard: "Once I've decided something, I never seem able to make up my mind."

No matter how old she grows, a woman married to a man who is older will always be young.

Devoutly to be wished. "If we could have but one generation of properly born, trained, educated and healthy children, a thousand other problems of government would vanish."

Herbert Hoover

Raisintoast

wakes up sleepy eyes with a Taste Surprise

• Breakfast is off to a bright start when you sniff a whiff of Raisinbread a-toasting! And when that toast comes to table—crispy, golden brown 'n buttery with all those raisins winking up at you—who can wait to start nibbling? Don't wait. Be Taste Surprised! Be energized! (Raisins do both for you.)

And be sure to see your raisinbaker often for well-raisined breakfast rolls and coffee cakes, too.

California Raisin Advisory Board, Fresno.

What French's does to a bean...

...should happen in your bean pot!

Once in a blue moon you run across a recipe like this! Boston baked beans better than you ever tasted and ready in minutes. Delicious—because the 7 lively spices in French's Mustard cook right along with the recipe. Discover today how French's Mustard adds exciting golden flavor to this recipe and most everything you eat.

Golden Bean Bake

2 cans baked beans
3 tbsp. marmalade
3 tbsp. French's Mustard
1 tbsp. French's Minced Onion

Combine ingredients in 1-qt. casserole. Bake 10 mins. in hot oven (400°). Topping: Cut 1 small French bread into thick slices slantwise. Blend ½ stick soft butter and 1 tbsp. French's Mustard. Spread thickly on both sides of bread slices. Remove casserole from oven. Place bread on its side, over the beans. Bake again 5 mins. until bread is golden and crusty. Serves 4 to 6.

Enjoy it! on Food and in Food

7 lively spices in every jar—

that's the secret of French's Golden Touch!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 148

Third: Don't try to pit one parent against the other. Either pick the one you think has more wisdom and authority in this particular matter and stand by that one's decision, or call a meeting. You'd be surprised how pleased your parents would be if you'd matured enough to know that two heads are better than one—and that "divide and conquer" doesn't work in the home.

Fourth: Try to be reasonable, intelligent and to the point in your requests or complaints. Remember the fisherman in the fairy tale who hooked the magic fish and by increasing requests raised his wife and himself from a hovel to a castle. But when his wife wanted the sun and moon to obey her they found themselves back in their shack again.

Or, here's an excellent illustration of the value of brief, clear, reasonable speech (the opposite of whining and nagging) reckoned in reverse by Mark Twain. His story was that when he had listened for five minutes to the preacher telling of the heathen, he wept, and was going to contribute $50. After ten minutes more of the sermon, he reduced the amount of his prospective contribution to $25. After half an hour more of eloquence, he cut the sum to $5. At the end of an hour of oratory, when the plate was passed, he stole $2!

But you get the point. Enter into communication with your folks on a sound basis and see if their trust doesn't grow and your problems shrink away.

One last bit of advice. Spoil your parents from time to time. You like a little spoiling, don't you?

I remember that my mamma was always very demonstrative. She liked to kiss and hug us and say, "I love you." As little children we liked it. But as we got older that sort of embarrassed us. It always stuck in my throat. Most teeners tend to shy away from any outward emotion or affection. Yet the few times when, as a teen-ager, I would give her a kiss and say, "I love you, mamma," tears came to her eyes. And I know now it was more than manly.

My advice is to thaw a bit—melt the chill. Don't be too "mature for that stuff." Kiss your mom. Pat your sisters and brothers. Ask your dad on a date—ball game, show or something else he likes. Just you two.

It works wonders, those displays of affection, for basically real love (not sentiment) is the answer to almost all the human-relation problems of this old world.

EXTREME-TYPE PARENTS—AND WHAT TO DO ABOUT THEM

The too strict parent and the overprotective parent don't allow their teen-ager to make his blunders at a normal rate of speed. They tend to slow you down and, though not dangerous (the only danger is if you bolt and butt your head into a wall or permit yourself to be filled with resentment), certainly this is a tough row to hoe.

Their motives would seem to be fear, a genuine lack of trust not only in the teen age but the older world; and the best—in fact, the only advice I can give you is to work hard on communicating with them and to do everything you can to build their trust. Defiance or rule breaking with such as these only confirms their worst suspicions and tightens the bit in your mouth. There's no doubt that, if your parents are really unreasonable, you're going to have to be more reasonable and ma than the average young person.

Too lenient or "indifferent" parents, or other hand, can be the most dangerous. withdraw with all their experience and l you alone on the field.

There were a couple of kids, friends of of my sisters, whom I watched struggle a with a set of parents who just dropped reins and let them run. The girl had su bad reputation by the time she graduated high school that she had to go husband h ing in another state, and even that wasn' enough. The boy, after being kicked ou several schools, both public and private, wo up in a wild automobile wreck in which on the passengers was killed. Finally the par had to face the realization that they had g love without guidance, freedoms without - pervision. The saddest part was that t children suffered most.

Now I want to say right here that my f were really alert. They seemed to know e second where I what I was up to whom I was with. mom had a sev sense and seemed know if I was just p ning to do someth that was out of or and that always gave pause to think—an we pause to think usually come up with right decision.

I'm not saying didn't irk me to h my family so intere in everything I did. today I'm grateful. absolutely true that do not have to "g the dogs" because parents are indiffer But you'll have to w twice as hard. Grow faster. That is, if want a happy life.

The decision her all yours. You can problem parents for excuse to be misera all your life or you open your eyes r now, adopt some of rules imposed on ot guys and gals admire—stick close your heavenly Fathe and bring yourself up be the strongest of all.

My friend, you w an extra parent (beca of divorce and marriage)—work hard on getting in touch. wicked stepmother is a fairy tale. If you "get in touch" you can have something pre special. If you aren't in touch, are you the who did the shutting out? I feel for you, and know you have extra problems, may but you can and should be happy too.

When we come to the deep problems-wi parents—the kids who have to contend w a mother or father ill on alcohol, morally spiritually ill—we, all of us, have a job to We have to open our normal world to the To show them what a joy it is to live in sunshine of goodness and right. To help th overcome humiliation, shame, defiance, old chip on the shoulder. We've got to courage their loyalty and not invade the p vacy they keep around their dark secret wo Try to draw them out of it. But for you, aga if this is your situation, I know there is ev hope, for you have a heavenly Father—a you, too, can bring yourself up. And to h your parents—remember—love works wo ders with problem parents too.

I'd like to offer you, whatever your story a prayer, a prayer that can be used for pro lem parents, or daily problems, or any tee age situation. It isn't an old one. It isn't a n one. It isn't long either. But it's powerful:

"God, grant me the serenity to accept t things I cannot change, the courage to chan the things I can, and the wisdom to know t difference."

SONG FOR A SLEEPING CHILD

By ALEXANDER TAYLOR

Sleep gently, my dove, my child,
The features of your face
Will never be so calm, so mild,
Any time, anyplace.

Soft upon your side you lie
As all my thoughts, unstrung,
Gather in the light and die
For one so young.

The turmoil of the world will farm
Upon your ivory brow
And bring ten small fingers harm
Anyhow

Sleep gently, love, lie at rest.
May life over sorrows give
You similar children so with zest
You richly live.

TIGER, TIGER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 54

s and out at the other, she was so used to t n.
Borrow some of mine." Rosetta stretched a groaned. "I feel rotten tonight," she said.
Have a drop. It'll settle your stomach."
Think I will." Fishing under the bunk for a tle, Rosetta poured a generous amount of contents into her tea.
omeone knocked at the door and shouted.
h, all right," said Carmencita.
Rosana got up and climbed on a shelf and ooked her mother's costume from a peg.
vas shaped like a rose-pink corset striped h silver and there were sequined frills of k gauze round the hips and bosom. It was very clean, but Rosana thought it was the st beautiful garment imaginable. She got the pink tights and pink sequined cap l the enormous grubby shawl and laid them
the bunk.
You get to bed earlier tonight, do you r?" said her mother. "You look half ked."
But after yours."
Straight after, then, or I'll skin you."
setta was painting her eyes black, her uth crimson. "Think yourself lucky you can o bed," she said.
Rosana watched her mother's act every nt at the first performance, waiting pressed inst the canvas in the drafty tunnel that to the ring, so as to be out of the way, till moment came when she was allowed to and peer through a gap in the musty red en curtains and see the flares and the saw-t and the tiers of faces, and the trapezes nging thin and fragile high against the k roof of the big top. It was not a long t, for the Three Calvinis came on third;
l she liked the blare of the music and the zied coming and going, and the glitter
l jingle of the horses as they passed her;
it always seemed long, sometimes endless,
ore the ringmaster shouted, "And now, ies and gentlemen ——" The trumpets nded, the cymbals crashed, and there was mother, with her black hair tightly pinned ler the sparkling cap. She would throw her wl to Rosana, and because she was keyed and liked to see the shining admiration in child's eyes she would smile at her before ran through the parted curtains into the ht light with her partners Mike and Nicolo either side. That, to Rosana, was almost best part of the act; it was the only time mother ever did smile at her.
he Three Calvinis were not in the top k of trapeze artists because the circus was in the top rank of circuses, but they were ood deal more than adequate. They had rked together for six years and their confi-ce in one another and in themselves was in from the effortless grace of their per-mance—though limited in scope, it was vlessly done. It looked so easy that in two sons of watching once a night the idea of ger had never crossed Rosana's mind.
w, when she saw her mother dive like a llow through the smoky air high above and saw her mother's hands pass a foot ow Nicolo's that were stretched down to grasp them, she did not at first believe it. The swallow shape broke, crumpled into angles, falling toward the edge of the net. The music stopped, people began to scream. Then Rosana understood; she started screaming herself and, still clasping her mother's shawl, she ran along the passage from the ring and out into the mist among the caravans and tents and cages, and through them and out into a road, trying to get as far away as she could. Soon she had no breath to scream; she could only whimper. She scuttled round a corner and ran into someone almost invisible in the dark. A watch chain bumped against her nose and a hand was laid on her shoulder.

"What is it?" the man said, but Rosana could not answer. "You are lucky," he said. "There are some rough characters about, with this circus. What's the matter? Have you lost your mother?"

Rosana had found a little breath, and at this she used it in such a way that Edward Howells glanced behind him and, taking her quickly by the hand, led her up the street and along another turning. Except for a muffled uproar in the distance and the sound of a horse and carriage not far ahead the town was quiet, dark but for the dim halo of mist around gas lamps. Neither Rosana nor Howells could see each other; unasking and sobbing, she stumbled with indifferent obedience (for he walked quickly) by his side. He opened an iron gate and led her up a short path and through a door with a scallop shell of faint greenish light above it.

Alice Howells had been married to Edward and living in this house for twenty-four years, and as well as that she had an acute ear; before the footsteps reached the gate it was clear to her that Edward was bringing in one of his problem cases, and almost automatically, with a passing hope that this one was sober, she laid down her book and poked the fire. The other footsteps were light and short, and as soon as the door was opened she heard the sobs; an erring female, she thought with a sigh (not on Edward's account but because erring females were exhausting), and expecting something in high heels and a feather boa, she was quite unprepared for the bundle that Edward ushered into the parlor. Rosana looked minute; at either end of the grayish woolen shawl she was clutching, all that appeared of her were a pair of worn and muddy button boots below and a three-cornered face unrecognizably screwed up, with swollen eyelids and a mat of mist-dampened hair falling over them. Both Alice's training as Edward's wife and her own instincts made her draw the bundle into the circle of her arm, while above its head she raised her eyebrows.

"She ran into me," said Edward succinctly, now free (for he had been carrying three books) to remove temporarily his bowler hat. "I have to go out again." He vanished.

Alice perfectly understood this; the police station was only three minutes' walk. While she collected herself she lifted Rosana onto her lap, and was devastated by the child's lightness and abandoned grief. Rosana leaned with chattering teeth against her shoulder,

"There's where the classes are held, this is the gym."

The newest desserts are chiffon and fruit cocktail make them in minutes with Jell-O Chiffon Pie Filling

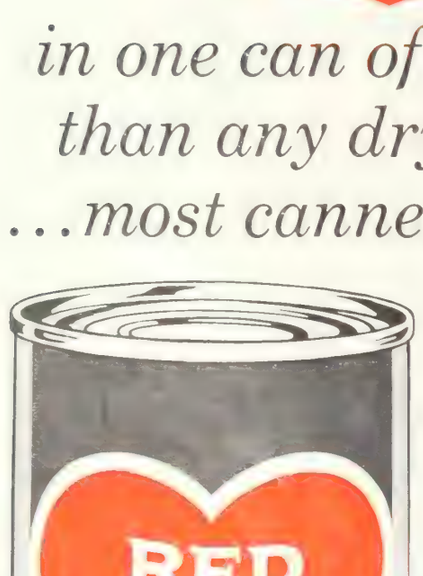
Fruited Strawberry Chiffon Pie Drain 1 can (1 lb.) fruit cocktail. Whip up Jell-O Strawberry Chiffon, using ½ cup fruit cocktail syrup instead of cold water; reduce sugar to two tablespoons. Fold in fruit cocktail. Pile in a baked 9-inch pie shell. Chill until set.



Fruited Lemon Chiffon Delight So easy! So luscious! Simply follow package directions for making Jell-O Lemon Chiffon. Heap high in dessert dishes. Chill until set. Before serving, spoon on colorful, delicious fruit cocktail.

Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation

3 times more fresh beef protein

in one can of Red Heart than any dry dog food ...most canned dog foods

Red Heart comes in three tasty varieties: Beef, Beef-plus-Fish, Beef-plus-Liver!

© 1960, Red Heart Div., John Morrell & Co.

refusing with one violent movement to be parted from the shawl; she had a strange smell, one that Alice recognized as not exactly dirty, but which she associated at once with musty material, and later, after a little thought, with a long-ago visit to the zoo. Like Edward, used to Edward, she knew when not to talk. She held Rosana in her arms beside the fire till Rosana stopped shaking and sobbing and was nearly asleep, and then put her to bed in the spare room. She had no garments that would remotely fit; she wrapped Rosana, naked, in a shawl, not the one Rosana had brought with her but an immaculately clean one of her own, made of thin soft wool, and tucked her in with a stone hot-water bottle wrapped in flannel. The child, she had noticed, was small and fine-boned but well enough nourished; she thought food, as well as talk, could wait.

Meanwhile Edward had made one of his purposeful entries into the police station. The sergeant, hunched over his desk, repressed an inward flinch and turned to a clean sheet of paper.

"I have found a little girl," said Edward.

"Girl," said the sergeant, writing. "Name? Age?"

"I have no idea of her name. She is about that high," Edward said, remembering how Rosana's nose had driven into his watch chain, "and she was hysterical. If you have any notification of a child lost, or an accident, you can let me know. My wife has no doubt put her to bed. I think she would be better left undisturbed till the morning." Edward left briskly, passing a hurrying constable but without turning his head.

Rosana awoke to pallid daylight and an expanse of sheets and honeycomb quilt that seemed to her as big as a field. She had never slept in a room before, and though the Howells' spare room was not large it was big enough and strange enough to frighten her; she could not remember where she was. With the shawl wrapped round her she sat up and stared, and looked wildly at the door when Alice came in. Alice carried a tray with cocoa and biscuits; she was austerely dressed in a long dark serge skirt and a plain white blouse, high-necked and long-sleeved, with an enamelled watch pinned to it; she wore gold-rimmed pince-nez, which made her seem severe, although she was smiling. She looked back at Rosana, into a pair of eyes no longer so swollen as to be invisible but now seen to be enormous and of a clear light blue-green color, with sooty lashes. Rosana's hair was even more like part of a hearthrug. Poor little wretch, thought Alice.

She said, "I expect you're hungry. This will do for now, and when you get up I'll cook something."

"I want my mother," said Rosana in a whisper.

"Mr. Howells has gone out to see about it. You mustn't worry; I am sure he will find her."

"He can't find her. She fell down."

"Where?" said Alice gently.

"In the circus."

This explained a number of things to Alice, but left others unanswered—she knew nothing about circuses. She thought it best not to say more till Edward got back. She said, "Don't worry; I expect it will be all right. Tell me your name."

"Rosana."

"How pretty," said Alice, who did not really like it. "I'll bring up your clothes and then you can get dressed. Can you dress yourself?"

"Oh, yes. Except the buttons."

"Bring the buttons down to me." Alice had heard Edward's key in the door; she hurried off. Edward was standing with his back to the black marble fireplace in the parlor, looking exceedingly gloomy. "Well?" she said.

"It's as bad as it can be."

"She's dead?"

"Yes. And there is no father."

"But there must be someone ——"

"That is to say, she did have a father, who was with the circus, but he disappeared soon after she was born. He used the name of Fred Smith, but is said to have been a Pole. The police seem to think he would be quite untraceable. I have seen the circus proprieto he's not prepared to keep her. One can't, suppose, blame him, and in any case it's a extremely squalid, like a traveling slun It's ——" Edward paused; he could nd banish from his mind's eye the lions an tigers in their cages.

"Then what will happen to her?"

"She will have to go to an institution."

"Oh, no."

"What alternative is there?" Meetin Alice's compulsive gaze, he shifted his ow to the plaster wreaths on the ceiling. "It woul be difficult," he said.

"I know."

"And more difficult for you than for me."

"All the same ——" said Alice.

In 1906 there were no adoption laws. Th unwanted child had little or no protection an formalities were few.

Edward went off again to the police statio and then once more to the circus, which w packing up, and where he collected Rosana possessions; they were a small and pathet bundle, tied in a filthy piece of red velve Holding them reluctantly in a clean glove, h returned home to find Alice and Rosana si ting side by side on the green plush sofa in th parlor, looking at a book. Rosana's hair ha been washed and brushed, and now fe damply but smoothly to her shoulders, curlin at the ends. Every so often she drew a dee irregular breath, but did not appear to hav been crying. Edward put the bundle on th floor and signed to Alice. They went into h study.

"Have you told her?"

"Yes."

"What did she say?"

"She didn't say anything about her mothe I don't know whether she took it in. When told her this was going to be her home, sh said, 'I want to go back to the circus.' Sh seems stunned—it's bound to be very strang to her at first. She has never lived in a hous I don't believe she has ever seen a book, h alone been taught her letters. We shall hav to be patient."

"We have a long way to go."

In the parlor Rosana was sitting on th floor. She had untied the red velvet, h wooden doll was clasped in one arm, she ha thrown aside a few clothes, and with the oth hand she was arranging on the Turkey carp the rest of her treasures: a string of chea glass beads, some orange feathers, scraps gaudy material, an emerald sash trimme with sequins. They were all extremely dirt Edward glanced sideways at Alice.

"What beautiful things," said Alice. "A they yours?"

She was disappointed, but not surprise when Rosana snatched up her finery and he it fiercely to her chest.

"A very long way," said Edward, going c at last to his shop.

Edward owned a small but profitab drapery store adjoining the house. He em ployed a young man assistant and a g cashier, and had a steady trade with loc customers who respected his honesty, goo sense and integrity. He had married Ali when he was twenty-four and she was twent one; she was the daughter of a schoolmast in the town, and he had just inherited the bus ness from his father. They had set up hou beside the shop and hoped for a family; b no children arrived. As a couple they we serious and intelligent, and had progressi ideas such as freethinking and sympathy wi women's suffrage, but these they kept to thei selves for fear of losing customers; Edwa served on charity committees and every often picked up lame dogs of varying speci and with varying results. They lived quiet and economically, read a great deal, play the piano to each other and talked abo books and music. They knew practicall nothing about children. As adoptive parer for a child dragged up in a circus they we ludicrously unsuitable, except for three esse tial qualities: they had brains, sense and en less patience.

In the weeks that followed they needed three. It seemed impossible to make conta

Rosana. She was well enough behaved; is to say, she did what she was told, ned to like helping in the house with such as dusting, watering plants, making —all these she performed silently but unexpected efficiency. Alice once or e heard her crying at night, and went in er, but she got no further than holding still-speechless child, closely and tenderly, she slept; her breathed endearments met response. Rosana never mentioned her her, or the circus; but she played furtively her possessions, her beads and feathers bits of stuff, which Alice had had the e not to wash but had stolen and fumid one night while Rosana slept. All efforts each her she stubbornly resented; Alice A's and B's and C's in colored chalk till brain reeled, but Rosana sat obstinately, lip stuck out.

he house was L-shaped and had been , with the enchanting assurance of its od, in the second half of the eighteenth ury. One arm of the L opened on to the t, and was the shop; it had once been a fectioner's, and its window dated from —the pointed Regency-Gothic panes e it difficult to see what was displayed in, and Edward had often thought of ng it altered, but few of his customers lged in window gazing, and though the was out of fashion he could not bring elf to pull it down replace it with something contemporary. ough the iron gate th across a handhief of garden, in angle of the L, led e front door. The ide of the house, of -rose brick with a fanlight, was unupted Georgian; inside had the orian age left its k. Edward's father ripped out white laces carved with t and Cupids, and tituted black marinset with lozenges arble colored like n; and above these had erected tiers shelves in fretted ogany inset with bits of mirror. His furnithough hideous, was solid; Edward and had accepted it along with the black le and the overmantels, and asserted own taste only in enlarging the bookves and hanging Whistler and Botticelli ad of Highland Cattle at Dawn. To na the potted palms and aspidistras, the s of carpet, were incomprehensible space; ing went on around them.

the hope of attracting her interest, Ed- took her with him to the shop. Most of rade was in materials, to be bought by yard and made up by some small tailor or smaker; his shelves were piled with es, heavy silks and taffetas, and though ana wandered around exploring, they not to her liking. Edward's customers sober and respectable, and chose their es for the same qualities; the beautiful somber stuffs had no appeal for her. The thing she seemed attracted by was a roll se-pink velvet. She had a little stool which would pull about, and sometimes she ld sit, when she thought he was not look- and rest her cheek against the roll. Ed- always found this unbearably moving, longed to take her in his arms, but her k greenish stare defeated him.

he must meet other children," said Alice, carried her off shopping and visiting never she could.

he townspeople knew Rosana's history were kind to her, but meetings with r children were not a success. Rosana un-co-operative, and once when badg- produced several epithets that made e blush to the ears. Having pacified, ehow, the outraged mother, Alice said on way back, "There are some words you use people don't like."

Rosana was bowling a wooden hoop with a small iron hook. In her reefer coat and dark blue sailor's hat, her black stockings and button boots pacing out the squares in the pavement, she looked (Alice thought painfully) like any other child. She stopped the hoop expertly and said, "What ones?"

Alice felt herself unable to repeat them, in spite of her progressive ideas. "I think you know," she said.

"Like ——" said Rosana in a pure clear voice, as the curate from St. Andrew's emerged from a front gate into their path. The curate, to his credit if it was a word he knew, greeted Alice politely, and only momentarily closed his eyes, as if thinking, when he was ten yards along the street.

Nevertheless, Alice continued to take Rosana visiting, hoping to find a child Rosana could get on with; she needed company of her own age, and sending her to school was useless till she was willing to learn. Once Alice thought she had succeeded, when the eight-year-old daughter of a friend of hers on the other side of the town seemed to take to Rosana and Rosana to her. They went out amicably into the garden, wrapped in coats and scarves; not holding hands, but chattering like sparrows. It was unfortunate that Trudy had a swing, slung high from a walnut tree. "You have a go," she said, pushing it; and Rosana, breaking for the first time since the night of her arrival, ran screaming in to Alice.

Only one other thing produced the same reaction. Walking in the town one afternoon a week or so later, they came suddenly on a brass band at the head of a procession; trumpets, drums and cymbals started up with a deafening blare as they turned the corner. Rosana stopped short; her hand, in a small woolen glove, trembled in Alice's. Alice looked down and saw her face. "It's all right," she said. "It's only an old band—look, there's Mr. Norman with his trombone." But there was nothing she could do; quickly she took Rosana home.

Alice's theories were in advance of her time, and when she got back she sat down and wrestled with her brains and her instincts. That night she said to Edward, "I think we are wrong. We should make her talk about the circus."

"Perhaps you're right. I'd hoped she might forget it."

"I hoped so, too, but it's clear she hasn't. It's all bottled up inside her, and that's why we can't make any headway. It's like a boil; we have to open it to let the poison out."

Edward clasped his hands round one knee; his square serious face, illuminated by the fire, took on angles and planes of shadow so that for a moment he reminded Alice of his Welsh father, dead a quarter of a century ago. He said, "How?"

"I'm not sure. I have a kind of idea—what had you thought we should give her for Christmas?"

"I'd supposed some kind of toy; why?"

"There is that pink velvet in the shop—you tell me she sits beside it, strokes it. I wondered if it means something to her, something her mother wore, perhaps. Could we give her two or three yards of that?"

"It's a strange present," Edward said after a pause, "for a child of seven."

"I know."

"But if it seems right to you, we'll try it. Neither of us knows Rosana, but you know her better than I do, because you see more of her. I will have it cut off."

Alice and Edward decorated a Christmas tree, anxiously and inexpertly because they had never had a child in the house before. They hung up Rosana's stocking and filled it while she slept with nuts and oranges and

UNMARRED

By MAY RICHSTONE

No longer are we
So fresh and fair;
Home also shows signs
Of wear and tear.
Some fabrics are fraying,
Some springs are sprung—
But bless their hearts,
The children are young!

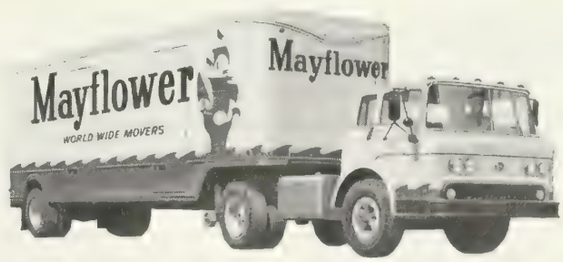
another Mayflower customer reports:



"On-time loading and delivery!"

"We couldn't ask for better service than we received on our move from Philadelphia to Chicago. The timing of both departure and arrival was perfect, and so was the condition of our furniture!"

Promptness is a planned habit of Mayflower movers. Pick-up and delivery schedules are carefully arranged to save you delay and confusion. Their courteous efficiency smooths every phase of your move, from careful, safe packing and loading to the unpacking, setting-up, and placement of your possessions in your new home.

Modern Mayflower vans and equipment, with skilled, experienced Mayflower men, make your long-distance move safe and easy. Next move, let Mayflower do all the work. Just call your local Mayflower warehouse agent.

AERO MAYFLOWER TRANSIT COMPANY, INC., INDIANAPOLIS

America's Most Recommended Mover

Your Mayflower agent is a leading warehouseman in your city. He explains service, estimates costs, makes all arrangements. Find him under "Moving."

world-wide service

In all 50 states and Canada . . . overseas by ship or plane . . . our responsibility all the way!

new, higher standard of service

Only Mayflower men are "accredited"—qualified and kept up-to-date by special study, training, and tests.

exclusive, "packed with pride" service

Safeguards all your items, even the most fragile, with special Mayflower methods and materials.

small toys, but the parcel of pink velvet was too big and they laid it across the end of her bed. Alice woke in the darkness of early Christmas morning. Without rousing Edward she struck a match and looked at her watch; it was twenty past six, and she heard movements from Rosana's room. Lying still for a time, arms crossed to clasp her elbows, she listened and wondered, and in the end could bear it no longer, and got up and put on a dressing gown and softly opened Rosana's door. Rosana had a night light under a glass shade, which shed a dim radiance on the trellis-papered walls and marble washstand and struck gleams of brass from the bed. She was standing slipperless in the middle of the room, swathed from head to foot in rose-colored velvet, with the orange feathers stuck in her hair. When she saw Alice she gave a strange proud little smile.

"Happy Christmas," said Alice. "Do you like it?"

"Oh, yes. Is it really for me?"

"Of course it is. We thought you'd like to dress up. You look like someone very important in a circus."

"I know. It's the same color."

With the caution of someone stalking a rare and unapproachable animal, Alice said, "It must have been pretty."

"It had silver stripes down here, like that," Rosana told her.

"How lovely."

"And frills there and there, with sequins." In the middle of a gesture, Rosana stopped; her feet, on the cold linoleum, looked blue, and with chattering teeth she pulled the velvet more closely round her.

Alice was filled with a sort of miraculous confidence, which made her go and take Rosana in her arms. She said, "Let's get in your bed and keep warm. I love hearing about it, because we belong to each other, and people who belong to each other can talk, can't they?"

"Yes," said Rosana. She put her a round Alice's neck; the pink velvet slid to floor.

After that Rosana began to respond. W the air of someone dropping a remark int already established conversation, she wo talk about the circus. She never mentio her mother, but the rest of the performers g dazzling and over-life-sized when she sp of them. An elephant became a mamm the sad lions were killers and the ho Pegasus multiplied. Alice and Edward liste and encouraged, for Rosana's blue-green s had achieved focus. They were like amat scientists who start an experiment and with both elation and apprehension against the known odds it works.

One evening when Edward was back fr the shop and it was almost Rosana's bedt she came and leaned against his shoulde he read. She said, "What's that?"

"It's a poem," Edward said. From Welsh father he had inherited a passion words, and especially for poetry. As he Rosana's elbow sticking into his neck, her warm breath on his cheek, he wonde why it had happened when he was on t page.

"What does it say?" she said, and know she could not read Edward could have peated anything, but he accepted the c cidence, if that was what it was. With Rosa face an inch from his, he did not look at book except for a moment to lay his finger the place; he raised his eyes to Alice's said:

"Tiger! Tiger! burning bright,
In the forests of the night."

Gently and evenly Rosana breathed into ear, while Edward looked at Alice and Ali lips slightly parted.

"Say it again," said Rosana.

"Tiger! Tiger! burning bright,
In the forests of the night."

"We had a tiger," said Rosana, "in circus. Called Sultana. It was very fierce was always killing people."

Edward remembered, as he too often membered, the small cage without privacy the tired and tamed animal. He saw it clearly that tears came into his eyes and put his hand over them. Through a blur he Rosana's small finger pointed on the page

She said, "That's a T."

"Yes."

"Does that say Tiger? Tiger, tiger, burn bright, does it say there?"

"Yes."

Alice said, "Wouldn't you like to learn read it for yourself?"

Rosana turned her enormous dark-rim eyes away from the book. She said, "I read it."

"The first bit, I know, but there's a more than that."

For a moment Rosana glanced at Edwa and then back. "All right," she said, "if show me again."

Once having given in, she did indeed le very quickly. By the following autumn, s after her eighth birthday, Alice thought was up to the standard for her age, and rolled her for a private school in the town was run by an ex-pupil of Alice's father. Bef term started, the circus came to Leintfo Alice took Rosana to stay for ten days her sister, who was married to a farmer lived deep in the country about thirty m to the north. This was a measure of despe tion (things were going so well by now the advent of the circus in the flesh, so speak, was something that Edward and A were not yet prepared to take a risk on), Alice had not given much thought to w Rosana would be like on a farm. What h pened was that Rosana became immediat and totally absorbed in the animals. Excep mealtimes she was rarely seen anywhere bu the cowsheds or stable or trying to tame half-wild cats that lived in the barns. Arth farm was large and flourishing, he was

Roberta Peters says: "I wouldn't dream of giving Paul any aspirin but St. Joseph Aspirin For Children"

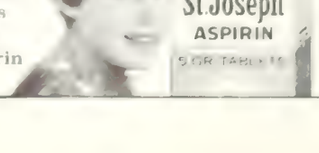
(MRS. BERTRAM FIELDS) Singing star of opera, TV and radio

Trusted by more mothers...

because it's approved by more doctors

These three important "firsts" explain why mothers have special confidence in St. Joseph Aspirin For Children . . . why it's approved by more doctors than any other children's aspirin . . . in fact, any other medication for children's fever and pain:

FIRST IN ACCURACY—with the tiny 1¼ grain tablets (exactly ¼ of an adult dose) that doctors recommend for children.



FIRST IN TASTE—with the smooth, creamy-textured, pure orange flavored tablet that children like best.

FIRST IN SAFETY—with the special safety cap (at right) that top health authorities everywhere now insist on.

You want the best for your child. So be sure you buy St. Joseph Aspirin For Children—not a substitute. Remember, it's first in accuracy, taste, safety. Get a bottle today—your child may need it tonight. (In Canada, ask for St. Joseph Bebetine For Children.)

SAFETY CAP PIONEERED
by St. Joseph Aspirin For Children—helps prevent unwanted opening by children! Opens easily for you!

For her family's further protection, Roberta Peters buys regular St. Joseph Aspirin

. . . because St. Joseph starts to work faster!

For adults, buy regular (5-grain) St. Joseph Aspirin. It disintegrates faster, is ready to go to work faster than all 3 other leading pain relief tablets. Why pay for expensive buffering, "prescription-type" compounds, or costlier aspirin? Get the best for less—St. Joseph Aspirin.

rt manager, and it amused him to see na's passion for his sleek cattle and ning horses. He took her round with let her try milking a cow, which she did very successfully but quite without fear, saddled the smallest pony he had and nt her to ride. The pony was several sizes ig for Rosana, but her courage and quick-in learning delighted Arthur, and when ft her sedately trotting round a field and back five minutes later just in time to er describe a parabola from a standing ion on the saddle to a sitting one in the he burst out laughing, picked her up took her back to be cleaned off; but to he only said, "She had a bit of a fall."

ice was nevertheless not easy in her mind.
children like cats and dogs and ponies,
Rosana seemed to prefer size and drama—anache with which she approached the and the Shire horses was alarming. Her est, rather than being agricultural, ed an alien desire to compel. Perhaps, thought (blaming herself for not seeing ore), we should have given her a puppy or ten right at the start; but she knew it d not have been the same. If she had l about how Rosana fell off the pony, about what happened in the barn, she d have been even more disturbed.

the barn early one evening Rosana was ing a tortoise-shell cat up a pile of
: the cat was believed to have a litter of s somewhere which Rosana wanted to
The building was high and darkish, the -hundred-year-old rafters above were al-hidden in dusty obscurity. At the top of ile she turned her head and saw quite to her a loop of rope
ing from a beam; in draft from between imbers it swayed very y to and fro. For a Rosana watched it as pnotized, crouching in raw; then she stood up ulled the rope toward braced her hands in oop, and with a great ay of frilled white cotton drawers hed herself into space.

le and sweating, she landed shivering in raw again. The cat was forgotten; she sat for a little while staring at the arc of the and then reached for it once more. After evening she returned to the barn when-no one was looking. Her terror dimin-and disappeared; half-remembered ges-came back to her, and skills she had wit-d but not till now understood. In three she could do a somersault between let-go of the rope and landing. When she undressed at night her clothes deposited ch of straw on the rag rug.

ice said, "It must be very uncomfortadon't notice it. I keep looking for those ns."

hen they returned home, Rosana started
ol. Alice was apprehensive, but Rosana d down happily enough. Alice had had a with Miss Holland, who had an Oxford ee and knew Rosana's history, and they thought it better that nothing should be ealed, so Rosana came openly to the school child brought up in a circus, and conse-tly acquired such glamour in the eyes of other children that it quite went to her
. Some episodes, such as a performance he iron bar that spanned the cloakroom et above the floor, Miss Holland was ignt of, but she would often come across na in the middle of a cluster of little girls hear phrases like: "Then he threw a chair, t wasn't any good; the tiger sprang." Miss and smiled indulgently, and reported to e what Alice could see for herself, that na was doing excellently.

September of the next year the circus back again, and Alice planned to take na to the farm; but three days before they due to leave, Alice became ill. It was some infection, but it kept her in bed with a perature and she was clearly unfit to travel;
ard could not leave the shop. Lying tidily
r the white quilt, with Edward walking up and down the bedroom floor, she said, "I ought to take her."

"Well, it's quite obvious that you can't, and I can't," Edward told her, "so 'ought' doesn't come into it."

"Perhaps Arthur could come and fetch her."

"Perhaps he could, but he's busy, and I don't think it's necessary. Sooner or later we must stop this. I think she has grown out of it enough."

"I hope so," said Alice. "Last year I was worried, I told you; I don't know why. But nine is more grown up than eight. We must take a chance. We have no choice."

Not many of the children at Rosana's school were allowed to go to the circus, for varying social, humanitarian or hygienic reasons, but all of them knew about it, and Rosana, whose circus it had once been, was the center of attraction. She described to them, over and over again, the clowns and horses and lions and tigers and elephants, and the costumes and the trappings; many things she thought she had forgotten crowded fresh into her memory.

"When are you going?" they said.

"When are we going?" Rosana said to Edward that evening, while Alice, cooler but uneasy, lay dozing upstairs.

Edward had had a hard day at the shop, and for relaxation was reading King Lear. He was the sort of person to whom Lear is like a powerful drug, and he raised unfocused eyes from the page to Rosana standing in front of him, small but intense and strictly buttoned into blue serge. He said, "Where?"

"To the circus."

At this word, which rang a sort of alarm bell in Edward's consciousness, he dragged himself back from Edgar and Gloster to the immediate situation, one in which he would have liked to have Alice beside him. He said, "Do you really want to go?"

"Of course. It's my home."

Looking at her sadly, Edward said, "I will have to see if I can find someone to take you."

"I thought you'd be coming. Don't you like circuses?"

Edward was about to say "Yes, but I'm busy," and then changed his mind. He said, "I don't like to see wild animals shut up in cages."

"Oh," said Rosana, pondering. "But if they were let out they'd kill people."

Edward explained.

"Yes, but our animals like it," she said obstinately.

"Perhaps."

The following afternoon Alice came downstairs for the first time, and at half past four Edward left the shop. He found Alice crouching by the fire, not doing anything. He said, "She's not back yet?"

"No."

"We mustn't worry. She will probably have walked home that way, just to look at the outside. All the children do."

"Can you imagine Rosana just looking at the outside?"

"If she is not home by five I'll go and find her." Edward saw Alice's face. "Do you think I should go now?"

"It's only that I'm frightened. We've taken such trouble, and if she should want to go back ——"

"Alice, we can't keep her shielded from the circus forever."

"No."

At five minutes to five Edward got up and went to fetch his hat and coat. He was in the hall when he heard someone running up the path, and he opened the door as Rosana reached it. She flung herself against him, and he remembered the night two years ago; now it was her chin and not her nose that bumped into his watch chain. He laid down his coat and hat and took off Rosana's, lent her his clean handkerchief, and led her by the hand into the parlor.

Snuffling, Rosana put her arms round Alice and then sat on the floor by Edward's knee. At nine years old the destruction of a dream in one blow seems to shake the earth: first in shock and defense, and then to impress, she had built up a picture of the world she had come from, imagination supplanting memory till memory had almost vanished. "It's my home," she had said to Edward, but now she laid her head against his knee to show him it was untrue. She could not tell him about the peeling caravans and ragged children, the litter of paper and sawdust, about Carmencita, who had become (or perhaps had always been) fat and lank-haired and blowzy, or about the tiger, apathetic, bleached and dusty, staring unseeingly with hopeless resentment out of the too-small cage.

She said, "Tell me that piece, the tiger one."

"Tiger! Tiger! burning bright,
In the forests of the night,
What immortal hand or eye
Could frame thy fearful symmetry?"

"There are tigers like that," she said, "aren't there?"

"Where tigers live," said Edward, "there are lots of them and they are very splendid and burn very bright." He touched Rosana's damp cheek with one finger.

"I live here," said Rosana, and put her hand in his. END

The dog with the bone is always in danger.
AFRICAN PROVERB

Your skin can be smooth as this paper

Glowingly Soft and Bright
Gloriously Free from Blemishes

You have tried many different soaps and creams . . . why not Cuticura? Results are dramatically noticeable in just a few days. Get the full treatment and see . . . it's simply this:

Superemollient Cuticura Soap for twice daily, one-minute lather-massage. Softening, soothing, purifying lather tones, freshens, revitalizes and protects as it cleanses. (For general family use get the large economical bath size.)

Cuticura Ointment to soften and gently stimulate as it works overnight to counteract dryness, speed out blackheads, quickly soothe and relieve blemishes.

Cuticura Medicated Liquid to cool and refresh as it cleanses antiseptically, curbs oiliness, checks blemish bacteria, dries up and heals pimples fast, fast, fast. Buy all 3 at toiletry counters.

Exciting Results begin to appear just a few days after you start using Cuticura . . . new baby softness, new clarity and freshness, new radiant glow. And, Cuticura helps keep your skin that way. From now on, always use Cuticura for all your family!

Cuticura

World's best known name in skin care

The Vice President and his wife live in two spheres, one global and constantly limelighted; the other a quiet residential section where they own their own home and, with their daughters, try to be "just another family."

By HAZEL MARKEL

PHOTOGRAPHS By JOSEPH DI PIETRO

THE NIXONS AT HOME

It was the night of the big Brownie picnic. Fathers were invited and, to Brownies at least, it was the most important event of the year. At 4308 Forest Lane, Washington, D.C., an enthusiastic Brownie was already dressed in her uniform and waiting, with controlled impatience, for her father to come home and get ready for the picnic.

Then the telephone rang. Her father was very sorry, but he wouldn't be able to go: he had to stay at the office to work on official business.

Julie Nixon, then nine, was disappointed. "I think daddy ought to get a new job," she told her mother, "so he would be home more. Why can't he work like the man in the grocery store and come home every night at six?"

Neither Julie nor her sister Tricia, thirteen, is particularly impressed by the importance of their father's position; to them it is all too frequently a nuisance that interferes with their own plans. Tricia, an ardent sports fan, has been heard to wish he were an athlete—preferably a baseball player.

Having spent most of their lives in Washington, the Nixon daughters probably have a clearer understanding than the average youngster of some of the functions of Government and of their father's part in it. They know, of course, that he is Vice President of the United States, and that he is a Republican. The Nixons still laugh about the time, a few years ago, when Julie was poring over a history book and came across the statement that Abraham Lincoln was the first Republican President. "Mamma," she asked in shocked incredulity, "was George Washington a Democrat?"

The elder Nixons are sometimes called "the busiest team in Washington." When official activities are at a peak, the Vice President may have to be out six nights a week; Mrs.

Tricia's favorite spot for listening to her phonograph records is the stairway in the hall. Her father also likes music—he plays the piano "pleasantly," sometimes tries a tune on one of the girls' accordions.

Julie likes to entertain schoolmates and other friends in her father's study. She arranged a tea party all herself—selected flowers from the garden, chose the best Nixon china and bright dainty napkins.

Julie's cat, Nicky, makes havoc of the box in which Pat Nixon stores ribbons for reuse. Other pets: Tricia's cat, Puff; parakeets; the ubiquitous Checkers; goldfish. The dress is one Pat has had for years.

NIXON:
Republicans' Leading Candidate

Richard Nixon would be content for the 1960 presidential election to turn on one overriding issue: which aspirant could best deal with the Soviets. He believes expertness on that score is now the most vital qualification for the Presidency. And his devotees are certain Nixon proved his superiority in Moscow last summer by clearly matching Prime Minister Khrushchev's toughness, cunning and inflexible grit.

Everything considered, there is no question but that Nixon would be a forceful and positive President—at times, perhaps, to a fault. While foreign affairs would be his primary interest, his Administration as a whole would operate much like those of previous "Strong Presidents," whose tenure was usually lively or contentious—and never bland.

In his six vigorous campaigns to date—four of them as battle leader for the Republican Party nationally—Nixon received and inflicted a full measure of political wounds. He gained a loyal following among Republicans, and a huge array of enemies among Democratic leaders.

As President Eisenhower's understudy for seven years the Vice President has had an insider's access to everything in the Government. Considering his total background, one could reasonably expect that if he were elected President, Nixon's Administration would be a spirited extension of General Eisenhower's. Fundamentally, their political philosophy is much alike. Both are progressive in international affairs and essentially conservative on domestic matters.

They are quite different, however, when it comes to operations and politics. Nixon would be leader of the Republican Party in fact, for instance. Youth, generally, would stand out in his Administration's make-up. The base of key personnel would spread to the universities, professions and even labor unions.

"President" Nixon would not hesitate to invoke White House prestige on a moral issue—like civil rights. Nor would he hesitate to use the tremendous powers to knock heads together—or off—if necessary. Nixon is a crisis man. He is devoid of panic buttons, and tends to become increasingly cool and deliberate as an emergency worsens.

His capacity to gain the respect and confidence of those with whom he works is like an automatic reflex. Eisenhower has said that "No man in history has had such careful preparation" for tenure in the White House. Dulles considered him "uniquely experienced in the responsibilities of the Presidency." And when Governor Nelson A. Rockefeller served under Eisenhower, he wrote Nixon: "You have no idea what your understanding, integrity, courage, and leadership mean to so many of us."

By EARL MAZO

Author of "Richard Nixon," published by Harper & Bros.

Sunday morning at 4308 Forest Lane. Dick Nixon enjoys a cup of coffee in the kitchen before breakfast. Julie, who is "absolutely starved," keeps a very careful eye on the muffins browning in the electric oven.

Nixon, four or more. One of the challenges confronting this couple in their mid-forties is the question of how best to reconcile their public and home lives. They want their children to regard them as parents, not personalities; and they want to keep their private lives, so far as possible, private. This was a practical impossibility in the small house where they used to live—on busy Tilden Street, with sight-seeing buses making regular tours past. Three years ago they bought their present home on Forest Lane (a quiet dead-end street), with its huge back yard bordered by woodland. Here the Nixons feel at home.

The comfortable eleven-room house is more spacious than any the Nixons have ever lived in before. Each of the girls has her own bedroom and bath on the second floor. They share a capacious doll room, but each has her own dollhouse and extensive collection of dolls accumulated from American friends or brought by their parents from foreign lands, the latest additions being

CONTINUED ON PAGE 160

New! Country Pie...Beef makes the crust

...And you'll make the savory filling double-quick —but only with Hunt's Tomato Sauce and Minute Rice.

Here's a new one! A rice pie with an unexpected beef crust!

And the filling—tender, fluffy Minute Rice, rosy and spicy with Hunt's Tomato Sauce—hearty with melted cheese.

Rich in vitamins too! You don't wash or boil Minute Rice —so the added nourishment is right there when you eat it. And Hunt's is the most tomatoful sauce of all—thick and smooth—fresh, ripe tomato through and through.

NEW! COUNTRY PIE

The crust

½ 8-oz. can (½ cup) Hunt's Tomato Sauce
½ cup bread crumbs 1 lb. ground beef
¼ cup chopped onion ¼ cup chopped green pepper
1½ teaspoons salt ⅛ teaspoon oregano
⅛ teaspoon pepper

Combine these ingredients and mix well. Pat meat mixture into bottom and pinch 1-inch flutings around the edges of a greased 9-inch pie plate. Set aside.

The filling

1⅓ cups Minute Rice 1 cup water
1½ 8-oz. cans (1½ cups) Hunt's Tomato Sauce
1 cup grated Cheddar Cheese ½ teaspoon salt

Combine Minute Rice, Hunt's Tomato Sauce, salt, water and ¼ cup of the cheese. Spoon rice mixture into meat shell. Cover with aluminum foil. Bake in a moderate oven (350°F) 25 minutes. Uncover and sprinkle top with remaining cheese. Return to oven and bake uncovered 10 to 15 minutes longer. Cut into pie-shaped pieces. Makes 5 or 6 servings.

Hunt's Tomato Sauce is a product of Hunt Foods, Inc.

Minute is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corp.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 158

gaily garbed dolls from Russia and Poland. They also share a large costume collection, but Julie, who has dramatic instincts, uses it more often to "dress up" herself and friends.

The girls likewise share a small upstairs sitting room in which they do their homework after school, read, write to Grandmother Nixon in Whittier, California, or, subject to certain house rules, watch their own TV. On rainy days there is a broad, glassed-in second-floor veranda on which to play, and to which Julie has currently moved her dollhouse. It must be a wet or wintry day to lure the girls inside, for there are two wonderful outdoor attractions.

One is a tree house which the Vice President had built between twin tall, leafy elms, and which Tricia herself painted white. Most youngsters simply climb the tree to reach it, but there's a rickety ladder for the less nimble. There is no furniture in this retreat, but Tricia took a rope, a pulley and a box, and rigged up an elevator for lifting dolls, books and snacks. Here the girls "keep house" and one night last autumn Tricia and a friend asked if they might sleep there.

Pat Nixon had loved her childhood nights sleeping under the stars, as her Nevada gold-prospecting father and mother had often done before her; she had no objections, and helped the girls hoist up some bedding.

When the Vice President arrived home shortly after midnight he protested: "Why, they'll be cold up there. It's turned quite chilly." He started to climb the tree-house ladder with an extra blanket, but halfway up it broke, and he crashed to the ground. Unhurt, he went back to the house, obtained a stronger ladder, and tucked the additional covering over the still-sleeping girls. It was after 1 A.M. by the time he got to bed.

At 5 o'clock next morning he was awakened by Tricia and her friend, bright as daisies, and eager to tell him about their night's adventure.

The other back-yard attraction, a Trampoline, is useful in clement weather for gymnastics, picnic lunches, costume plays and improvised circus performances. Julie is playwright and actress; Tricia the producer in the Junior Nixon theatrical presentations. When rain threatens, as on the night last fall their "Cinderella" was scheduled, performances are not canceled, but moved to the big recreation room indoors. This production, incidentally, was planned, costumed and rehearsed by Julie and Tricia during their parents' tour of Russia, and premiered for them on their return. Julie eschewed the title role to play the Prince and neighborhood children filled out the cast. Admittance was by invitation, but these were extended by the girls to parents of all participants so that the recreation room was filled. The performance was followed by lemonade and cookies, Mrs. Nixon's hasty contribution.

Julie's dramatic flair brings back memories to Patricia Nixon of her own girlhood, particularly of the romance of her life.

It was during tryouts for roles in The Dark Tower, an ambitious Whittier, California, Little Theater production, that Richard Nixon, just back from Duke University, first met Patricia Ryan, Whittier's new high-school commercial teacher.

The young lawyer had been a champion debater and had acted in plays while attending Whittier College. Pat had appeared in high-school plays at her girlhood home in Artesia, California, and, while attending the University of California at Los Angeles, had minor roles in two Hollywood film productions.

Both had worked since adolescence, Dick in his father's grocery where he managed the fruit-and-vegetable department; Pat, left motherless in her childhood and fatherless in her teens, as a store clerk, stenographer, bookkeeper and X-ray technician. Both had had to earn their own college education, and both were twenty-five. They won the two romantic roles in The Dark Tower, and quickly their play-acting developed into a real-life romance.

On the first off-stage evening together Dick Nixon informed his brown-eyed, blond companion that she was to be the future Mrs. Nixon, a statement that she thought a bit dramatic. Pat Ryan was not yet ready for marriage. At U.C.L.A. she had clerked in a department store to pay her way while she studied merchandising, home and business economics and commercial law. In these years she had been literally too busy for romance, now she found that she enjoyed teaching.

For two years Dick Nixon wooed her, always accompanied on any strolls by Pat's devoted Irish setter. ("Dick used to say I liked the dog better than I did him.") The Quaker lawyer and his Methodist schoolteacher were married at Riverside, California, in June, 1940, in a Quaker ceremony, Pat adopting her husband's faith.

The Nixons splurged on a two-week honeymoon to Mexico City. On their return they took financial inventory: between them they had $200. Most of this was invested in second-hand furniture which the bride slip-covered.

Pat continued teaching, but the Nixons' combined finances barely stretched from one payday to the next. Then her Irish setter died, and soon after Dick Nixon brought home to her a handsome plaque of a setter in burnished metal on a base of polished redwood.

"It cost twenty-five dollars," Pat fondly recalls, "and was our first major extravagance." She still cherishes it today.

When war was declared, Dick Nixon entered the Navy as a lieutenant, junior grade, and their life became a sequence of moves. Wherever her husband was assigned, Pat accompanied him and made a temporary home with used furniture and slip covers. It is a practice she has never abandoned: "You can save so much, and often you can have more nearly what you want." To supplement the family income, Pat usually took a job at each place they were stationed, as a stenographer, clerk or bookkeeper. In Ottumwa, Iowa, she was a bank teller.

After Ottumwa, Lieutenant Nixon was sent to the South Pacific Air Transport Command, and Mrs. Nixon went along as far as she could—to San Francisco. There, for fourteen months, she worked for the Government as a business economist, saving every cent she could manage for a nest egg. Island-hopping in the Pacific, her husband likewise was hoarding his pay.

Contemplating their postwar future via long-distance and frequently delayed FPO mail, the Richard Nixons planned that they would return to Whittier, where he would resume his law practice and they would raise a family. Neither had any thought of a career in politics. Nor did politics enter their minds when, after his return as a lieutenant commander, he was assigned by the Navy successively to Philadelphia, New York City and Baltimore to handle the legal technicalities of renegotiating war contracts. He and Pat were still in Baltimore when friends in Whittier, in the closing weeks of 1945, drafted him to seek the Republican nomination for Congress in that district.

The Nixons weighed this call from the West for several evenings, decided to accept it. Commander Nixon had managed to save about $5000 of his service pay and his wife had almost the same amount from her Government salary. They agreed that they would pool their funds for campaign expenses, and in January, 1946, when Nixon was released from the Navy, they returned to California for the congressional race.

Richard Nixon's first campaign speech was made under peculiarly nerve-racking circumstances—his elder daughter was born that same night. The speech had been scheduled long in advance of the arrival of Patricia II, and neither event could be postponed. Three weeks later Pat was out campaigning while the baby was watched over during her temporary absences by a devoted grandmother.

No red carpets or welcome mats marked the arrival of the Nixons in Washington. They found an unfurnished, two-bedroom apartment in Virginia, more than six miles from the House Office Building. The rental of $80 per month was even then low for the Washington area. Pat was cook, laundress, maid, seamstress and baby sitter for the household, with no outside help. Her husband, with many more free evenings than he has today, frequently spelled her in tasks requiring no mechanical ability. Pat, handy with tools, is the "Mr. Fixit" of the family.

On June 5, 1948, Julie was born at Garfield Hospital in Washington.

There was no change in living arrangements until Richard Nixon was elected to the United States Senate in November, 1950. Demands on his time increased and his wife was required to share more and more in his official activities. To conserve time, the Nixons decided to move into the city. They bought a home in Spring Valley, a two-story white brick house with seven rooms; it cost the Nixons $41,000, of which they paid down approximately $20,000. The down payment came largely out of savings from the congressional salary, but about this time Pat acquired $3000 from her father's estate and her husband $1500 from an inheritance.

A senator is elected for six years. With a senator's salary at that time $12,500 a year (it has since been raised to $22,500), the Nixons had decided they could safely risk this investment. Old furniture was moved from the apartment. Mrs. Nixon made the draperies, curtains and coverings.

Pat Nixon had no regular domestic help until they moved to their present home. Now a young couple, Susie and James Johnson, take much of the household burden from her shoulders, but she still presses her husband's suits, alters her daughters' dresses, and so on. "Dick scolds me," she confesses; "he says it's too much in my busy life. But I've always done it and I like to."

The family lived here while Mr. Nixon was in the Senate and throughout his first term as Vice President. But they realized they soon had to find a larger home. There was scarcely space for their growing daughters' increasing accumulations; there was no room where the Vice President could have a den or study; and when they wished to entertain friends or were obliged to host official dinners it was necessary to use a hotel or private club.

When Richard Nixon entered his second term as Vice President they sold the Spring Valley property for what they had paid for it and applied the proceeds to the purchase of the house on shady Forest Lane, former home of the late Homer S. Cummings, President Franklin D. Roosevelt's first Attorney General. Real-estate agents say that it was a reasonably good buy at $75,000. The substantial monthly payments on the balance owed constitute their biggest single expense, but they consider this as saving.

Except for an occasional cleaning woman, Patricia Nixon had never had household help, but after moving to Forest Lane she and the Vice President employed a young couple, Susie and James Johnson, who "live in."

The Nixons pay their own household expenses, their own clothing and service costs. When they go to market or take the children to school, they drive their own automobi 1955 Oldsmobile. A car with chauffeur, nished the Vice President by the Governm is for official use only.

The principal expense of moving wa redecorating the larger quarters. A few pieces of furniture were added to t brought over from Spring Valley. Pat Nixon, as usual, made new slip covers several pieces, notably the easy chairs sofa for her husband's study. One luxury indulged in was a long-playing hi-fi set; other, an intercom telephone system for four-level home.

With the first hint of spring the Nixons in both flower and vegetable gardens. girls are in charge of the vegetable garden which they grow tomatoes, onions, carr lettuce and radishes; Mrs. Nixon assumes sponsibility for the flowers.

Every room in the house is adapted to c venient living, and the Nixons crowd a g amount of home life in it despite their frequ absences. The family is up a little bef seven, regardless of how late the adult Nix have retired. Breakfast is an event no wants to miss: "The one time of day when can be sure of all being together."

Breakfast invariably includes a hot ce and fruit. Julie prefers canned peaches, Tricia and her father are less particular. Vice President considers fruits and fresh ve tables essential to a healthy diet, and, as former specialist in produce in his fath market, is a connoisseur of quality. M Nixon often prepares the eggs, says prou "Dick claims that no one but me fixes s scrambled eggs the way he likes them."

The morning meal is served on weekday the big, cheery, all-electric kitchen, wh walls, furniture, utensils, mixers, contain are all in varying shades of yellow. A dine also in pale yellow, is used for Sunday bre fasts and frequently for other meals when Vice President is not at home. Mrs. Nixon lected the color scheme and helped make curtains. Yellow is her favorite "morn color," just as the yellow daisies in her g den—and frequently on her table—are most prized flowers.

Breakfast over, Dick Nixon kisses his w and daughters and is off to work; he tries be in his office by 8:30.

The girls have several morning tasks to before they leave for school. They feed a water their pets and tidy up their rooms. Ea selected her own bedroom color schen Tricia chose pale pink for her walls, Julie li blue. The windows have light, fluffy e broidered curtains and those in Julie's ro Mrs. Nixon made herself. "I had promis them to her for her birthday, and since couldn't get them done outside by then, I j took time out and made them."

The walls of Tricia's room are almost h den by pictures of horses. She has a collecti of horses in miniature, a library of illustrat books on horses, and a colorful display riding whips, jockey caps, boots and spu Topping these is an authentic black-trimm pink silk jockey jacket. ("This used to be su a dainty little room," Mrs. Nixon comment

Pictures of baseball players replace hor in one corner of the room, along with ba baseball caps, autographed balls, and boo written by famous diamond stars, a perso touch that no horse can duplicate.

Strategically located on walls and furnitu are crayoned signs: "Do Not Touch"; and her door is a yellow pad with a pencil attach and another note: "Please sign before goi in here."

In Tricia's room there is also the skull o giant sea turtle, brought home from a bri Florida beach vacation. It rests on a silk sca with a king-sized "Do Not Touch" sign. T skull attracted more attention in her scien class than the mole she brought on anoth occasion, or the veal heart she took to scho to dissect. She also wanted to take a snak that a neighbor boy had killed and given h but here Mrs. Nixon drew the line.

Tricia's parents do not take seriously h announcement that she plans to be a jocke nor have they accepted her suggestion th they return to California and buy a ran

CONTINUED ON PAGE 162

Tastes as fresh and moist tomorrow as the day you bake.

NEW BETTY CROCKER Country Kitchen CAKE MIXES

Actual photograph of our eight new Betty Crocker Country Kitchen Cakes.

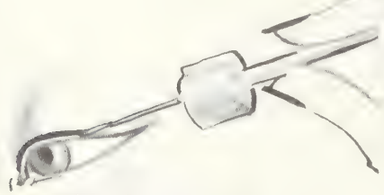
"A moisture secret makes our new Country Kitchen Cakes melt in your mouth like homemade butter cake!"

We've made the flour softer and the sugar finer. We've found a new rich, creamy shortening. We've come up with a wonderful new way to pre-cream all these good ingredients for you. It all adds up to a rich, moist, tender, honest-to-goodness-homemade kind of cake.

And it's one-step-easy! You put everything into the bowl at once—your cake mix, eggs and water. The batter fluffs up thick and rich in just four minutes . . . ready to bake a cake as fresh and moist and just plain good as grandmother's best butter cake. Bake one for your family tonight, why don't you?

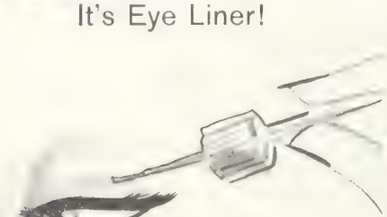
"Melts in your mouth like homemade butter cake!" "Stays fresh as any homemade cake!" "Tastes so rich and moist and good my husband ate three pieces!"

That's what home testers have been writing us about our new Country Kitchen Cakes. Yes, your favorite cake mixes are better than ever now!



As rich and moist as homemade butter cake . . . tastes as fresh and moist tomorrow as the day you bake! That's our Country Kitchen Cake —we guarantee it on every package!

Betty Crocker — General Mills



Look for these new packages at your grocery store!

NOW!
Eye make-up as easy to apply as lipstick
(and just as important)
Coty Eye Lights

It's Eye Liner!

It's Eye Shadow!

It's Mascara, too!

Goes on in minutes, dries in seconds, stays on all day! Genuine sable brush attached to cap of spill-resistant bottle. No bothersome brush cleaning, no danger of mixing colors. In 15 couturier shades to complement the color of your eyes, hair or costume.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 160

where she can own horses. Tricia follows the races on television. On her last birthday, and to celebrate her becoming a teen-ager, Tricia's father took her to the races at a nearby track.

During the racing and baseball seasons on evenings when the Vice President is home, Tricia first posts him on top turf events, then on the major-league competition. Once in a while they can watch a televised night game together, and the Vice President sometimes drops important work in his study to join her during exciting final innings.

Julie also likes baseball, and a favorite family recreation is attending a game on the rare occasions the Nixon calendar permits. The girls find the games very exciting, but also a bit embarrassing. So many persons, particularly photographers, watch them instead of the ball field.

Julie's decorating tastes run to dolls, wee bouquets of flowers picked from her mother's garden, miniature furniture, tea sets and dishes, and small living creatures. Currently both parakeets are quartered in her room, and the two goldfish.

The object in Julie's room which draws the most attention is a picture she painted in water colors, a copy of Renoir's bright and appealing A Little Girl With a Watering Can. The original attracted her on a tour of the National Gallery of Art with her class and she bought a small souvenir print for 50 cents. Her reproduction of the picture, two and a half feet long, is amazingly faithful.

Until a year ago the Nixon children attended public school, but when Tricia was promoted to junior high school, both were transferred to Friends School, a private (Quaker) institution in Washington, so they could continue to be together.

After her family gets off to work and school, Pat Nixon makes up the menus for the following day and lists groceries to be purchased on her next trip to the supermarket where she has shopped since the Nixons moved to the city. In the interest of economy and time, she likes to buy in quantity and to cook sizable dishes; keeps a surplus of prepared food in their large freezer.

Next, with Susie, she gives the house the once-over. One recent morning a friend found her going through the large linen cabinet showing Susie how she wanted it labeled and rearranged. Mrs. Nixon had taken most of the linen from the shelves, sorted and tagged it, and was replacing it in the proper order and location.

At his request, Mrs. Nixon helps her husband select his suits. "Dick has very good taste," she says proudly, but he respects her judgment of fabrics and workmanship. She also buys his shirts, socks and ties.

Does the Vice President notice what his wife wears? "Why, yes indeed," she says. "If I have a new dress or hat, he usually says, 'Oh, that's pretty.' Or he may say when we are going out, 'Why don't you wear that blue dress?' He and the girls sometimes surprise me with something they have bought for me. The girls have very good taste too."

Size is no problem with either of the adult Nixons. Both weigh exactly the same as when they were married, she a size 10, 110 pounds and 5'5" tall, he a trim 165 pounds and with still no bulge. "I really don't do anything about my weight," says Pat. "I just run it off. Going to market, working in the garden and at home I'm always busy, and our tastes in food are rather simple."

The numerous banquets she and her husband must attend are no problem for her. "I just don't want the amount of food usually served. Naturally there is always conversation and that's an easy way to get through a course without eating too much."

Clothing for their trips abroad presents a problem because invariably they pass through several temperature zones. Pat's answer to this is simply, "Travel light." She usually does the packing, prefers for herself noncrushable, easily washable materials that pack well.

On their Russian tour last summer the Nixons took four suitcases (two each), one plastic bag and a hatbox. Mrs. Nixon packed two jacket dresses and two suits for day wear, three afternoon dresses and one short evening gown. She took two pairs of daytime shoes and one pair for evening, all high-heeled although the State Department had advised low-heeled shoes for daytime walking over cobblestones. ("I've been around the world in high heels, and I find them more comfortable.") Pat says the hatbox held a "lot of hats. They serve as costume changes when you haven't much time and can't carry much luggage."

Although she dislikes leaving her daughters, Patricia Nixon says she loves traveling with her husband. "Something new is always happening." For campaigns, she has her travel wardrobe down to a recipe: for a ten-day jaunt, she takes one suitcase, with three suits and three dressy afternoon dresses which can double for receptions and dinners. "With three suits, when you are usually in a place only one day," she says, "you can arrive in one, spend the day in one, and leave in one."

Making shopping lists, planning menus and doing the family bookkeeping take up many of Patricia Nixon's morning hours. Her husband's salary of $35,000 represents the family income, and demands on the Nixon pocketbook are heavy. A $10,000 expense allowance provided by the Senate is for use solely in connection with travel and other official business. The Vice President does not receive an allowance for quarters as do military officers and the President. Nor is there an allowance for household help or upkeep. When the Nixons return favors for courtesies extended them in foreign countries, they do so in a personal capacity and draw on their private funds, no small outlay in a typical Nixon travel year.

The Nixons do not operate on a household budget, although the Second Lady believes in them. In their own case, she explains regretfully, "We just can't. One month we may have to spend a lot, and that means that the next month I just have to go sparingly on expenditures and even up.

"We really don't save a cent," she confides to intimates, "except, of course, the money we're investing in our home. But I do see that we live within our means. I do all the shopping and I do shop very carefully, and I count the pennies."

Although Mrs. Nixon sees that lights at the Forest Lane residence are turned off whenever an occupant leaves a room, checks water taps for leakage and economizes on heat or air conditioning in unused parts of the house, she confesses that "the girls are the only ones who manage to save. They have a weekly allowance of fifty cents for Scouts, Sunday school and so forth, but they manage somehow to put a little in the bank," she says proudly. "Tricia, naturally, is saving for a horse."

Mrs. Nixon's work is not ended with normal household duties. She has no secretary and there is always a voluminous correspondence, much of it from persons quite outside the family circle. After the Nixons' South American tour hundreds of friendly letters came to her, answers to all of which she drafted herself.

Midday usually means hurrying off to a luncheon. Mrs. Nixon is one of those women who can dress quickly and yet appear at their almost daily rounds of luncheons and meetings dressed in quiet, good taste. She wears slim, understated, well-made suits or dress usually dark-toned and combined with flattering hat.

Hats are no problem. If she doesn't find precise one she wants, she can make it herse Time was when Mrs. Nixon made all her o hats, the bonnets for the little girls, and h for her daughters' dolls. She still makes headgear for the more important dolls, recently she has been called on to prov some creations for the children's favor stuffed animals.

Pat Nixon has her own theories abo dress, and they work well for her. She lieves that "good fabrics keep costs dow and she never goes in for fleeting high sty At the end of a season she may pack awa garment for a year or two. Then she alter to the current mode and thus gets anot year or so of wear from it. (The silk dress is wearing in photographs accompanying article is more than two years old.)

Whatever her midday or afternoon enga ments, Mrs. Nixon tries to be home by time school is out. Then, for a few hours least, she can devote all her time and attenti to her daughters. Tricia and Julie slip into p clothes as soon as they get back from scho jeans and sweaters if the weather has turn cold, shorts and blouses in the summer. T sweets ban, imposed during the earlier ho of the day, has been lifted and Tricia and J are allowed to raid the cooky box and the frigerator. If the cooky box is empty, th mother may mix up a new batch of cooki with the girls doing their own frosting. all three of them may join in making fud

This afternoon treat is almost a ritual. dinner is not served before seven o'clock the nights the Vice President can join the When he telephones that he is coming, glistening cherrywood table is set in the d ing room, Julie usually placing the silverw and napkins. The girls hurriedly change fr play clothes into dresses.

Family dinners in the Nixon household c sist of simple dishes, energy foods, w cooked. The entree is often a roast of beef baked chicken, a tasty stew—the Nixons h Irish antecedents on both sides—or some n dish based on a new recipe using the chea cuts of meat. "I always watch the reci in the magazines," Mrs. Nixon commen A green salad is traditional. Cheese wed and crackers are customarily served, and d serts are apt to be fruits.

Susie prepares most of the meals, but M Nixon likes to cook. At the age of twelve was cooking for the five members of motherless Ryan household, and through college and her working career she made breakfasts and dinners. She continued as f time family cook until the move to their pr ent home, and today there are still some dis she leaves to no hands but her own. One these is the Vice President's favorite spagh with meat balls, on the menu at least onc week. Another: the waffles she serves on S day mornings. Sometimes she surprises family with one of the fiery Mexican dishes learned to make in Artesia.

Inspired by their mother, Tricia and J also have become interested in the culin arts, but their efforts are directed largely sweets and pastries. Their crowning achie ment to date has been the pink-frosted an food cake with which they welcomed th parents home from Russia and Poland. N only were they the sole creators of this fl masterpiece, but they decorated it with "W come home, mommy and daddy," the let spelled out in mint-green frosting.

Susie serves the weekday dinners when Vice President is home; dinnertime i leisurely, relaxing period, in which the Nix all catch up on one another's activities. It i time for family conversation, and the girls encouraged to talk about their own inter and plans. Politics seldom enters the disc sion, because the girls find the subject d Mrs. Nixon feels that their dinner hour precious, is proud of the absence of age tinctions and the ease of their table conver tion. "I think it gives the girls good train and experience," she says, "and they re have developed very nice table manners."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 164

NEXT MONTH

● As a young man, Bill Graham had many ambitions—one of them was to make a million dollars. He has realized that ambition. Now he—and his wife and six children too—is dedicated to something he says is "bigger than making money."

RICH BEYOND MEASURE

By GLENN MATTHEW WHITE

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the March JOURNAL to be sure of wear and beauty—

buy the name you trust

Cannon stockings 79c—99c

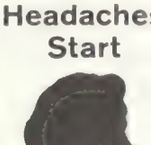
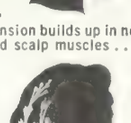
Happy Valentine idea. Proportioned for flawless fit. Full-fashioned: 51 gauge, 79c; 60 gauge, 89c. Seamless: 99c

by the makers of Cannon towels, sheets and bedspreads CANNON



Better than aspirin—even aspirin with buffering for

TENSE, NERVOUS HEADACHES



Acts Instantly to Give More Complete Pain Relief

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles . . .

2. . . . puts painful pressure on nerves.

3. Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

Tense, nervous headaches need the special medication in Anacin. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever and no special medication to relieve nervous tension. But Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients—each with a specific purpose. Anacin not only relieves pain incredibly fast but also contains special medication to relax tension, release painful pressure on nerves—assuring a better 'total' effect—more complete relief from pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients in···

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 162

One result of this training was evidenced at a luncheon to which the Vice President and Mrs. Nixon had been invited as ranking guests. That morning Tricia became ill, and Mrs. Nixon wanted to remain home with her.

"I'll take Julie," said the Vice President, delighting his younger daughter with this unprecedented proposal. Next day Mrs. Nixon received a note from a prominent Washingtonian, who reported: "I never had a nicer luncheon partner. Julie was a charming conversationalist, completely poised and comfortable. She talked spiritedly and freely as if she were an adult. I was astounded."

There are few restrictions on the way the Nixon daughters spend their afternoon and early-evening hours, except for the flat rule that homework must be completed before television is turned on. The set is located in the little upstairs sitting room between the girls' bedrooms and it is there they do their homework. Tricia is loath to miss any sports telecasts and Julie has several favorite Westerns. Studies usually are given prompt attention.

Mrs. Nixon's policy is to let her daughters do their homework without volunteered assistance. "I don't try to teach them," says the former schoolteacher. "That's not fair to their teachers. Of course I'm always around to help with spelling and little things like that, but that's all."

Disciplinary action is seldom required in the Nixon household. "I try to keep them busy," explains Mrs. Nixon, "and I give them different things to do on different days to hold their interest."

When one of the girls does misbehave, or when both become embroiled in a sisterly spat, the punishment is mild—denial of a favorite television program, visiting a friend or dipping into the cooky jar.

"I'm not strict, but I'm firm," says the mother. "I really rule by love. They're good little girls, so eager to please and so affectionate, that really just a simple look from me usually is sufficient."

That "look" can be a powerful deterrent. Recently Julie, who had been reprimanded for a minor mischief, repeated the offense. Her mother reminded that she had cautioned her only a moment before. Julie was startled. "But mommie, I didn't see you look."

The Vice President achieves discipline with even less effort, according to Mrs. Nixon. His severest reprimand is, "I wouldn't do that," and usually it is effective. Their grandmother, Mrs. Hannah Nixon, also shares in the girls' training. "Nana," as Tricia and Julie call her, makes her permanent home in Whittier, but frequently comes to Washington when her son and daughter-in-law are leaving on a prolonged tour, although she did not do so last summer when they went to Russia. The girls write to her regularly when she is in Whittier, and both Tricia and Julie frequently talk to her over the long-distance telephone.

No matter what the pressure of work, Richard Nixon tries to spend some time after dinner with his daughters. They may watch television or, in summer, play croquet in the back yard, or perhaps have a songfest in the recreation room with the girls singing Scout songs while he accompanies them on the spinet. But eventually he has to get down to work in his study.

This room, entered from a stairway landing midway between the first and second floors, has a high, trussed ceiling from which hangs a chandelier of antique metal painted ivory to match the walls. On the floor is a Persian rug, a gift of the Shah of Iran. A colorful troop of Vietnamese warrior figurines stands on the dark wood mantel. Brass andirons brought from the Orient are flanked by an anc brass coffee maker from Africa on one h and a pair of enormous brass spurs on other. Curtains of economical strawlike substitute for draperies in this office-den.

Shelves bear countless other reminder lands the Nixons have visited: a pric Buddha, gift of the King of Afghanis delicate papier-mâché dancing dolls f Thailand; a fabulous collection of eleph in jade, ivory, bronze, porcelain and prec woods, the only visible reminders in the en home of the Vice President's political lif

There is a large sofa brought over from house on Tilden Street, which Mrs. Ni slip-covered in gold brocade; and sev deep, comfortable overstuffed chairs. Th leather cases hold the Vice President's t writer, dictating machine and desk supp

Least used for everyday living is the la light living room, where the Vice Presid and his wife occasionally entertain good groups. Draperies and walls are in aqua. Mrs. Nixon likes to match walls and hangings, plains, "When both are the same shade, eries need not be made of elaborate, ex sive fabric."

On either side of a large fireplace is an usual floor lamp, e a giant butterfly etched, burnished br which once adorne Korean temple. Th were a gift to the V President and his w from the Korean g ernment. On the ma is an arresting l brass plate decor with multicolored amel in Oriental des To one side of it st four choice figurine Siamese dancers. Ja nese scrolls of delic landscape scenes h on each side of a l beige sofa. A price gold-filigree jewel c on an ivory base r on a low Oriental ta Two large brass u hold green rhodod dron plants. A cha ing nest of end tab in black Oriental w with gilt ornamenta holds a shining cop betel-nut bowl from Burma. Green-sha brass-based lamps are placed on a set of f low mahogany chests, along with an intrigu little gold globe with four faces—a clock barometer, a thermometer and a hygrome

The room has a "Roman corner" wit completely Occidental grouping. Square, tiqued-mirror end tables sit against an iv toned settee. The top of a Roman column se as the base for a coffee table. On the wall c the settee, an ivory bracket bears a small fi sculptured pair of dancers, and hanging side it are two white-framed water color Roman ruins.

Mrs. Nixon likes to change this room w the seasons, choosing plants and pictures t blend and alternating objets d'art from Nixon collection. The room is unclutte and restful.

On a recent Saturday night the Vice Pr dent dashed through the front door of home at 6:55. He had put in 10 hours 25 minutes at his office, having a noon sa wich of tuna on rye at his desk. Before leav the office he had caught a moment to go o his fast-growing dark stubble with an elec shaver. He and Mrs. Nixon were due to be at 7:30 for a formal dinner at the Austral embassy, but he settled down with the g in their sitting room as if he had the wh evening before him.

To avoid traffic jams, Mrs. Nixon had ready dressed in a sweeping yellow-satin d embroidered in crystal, and had done nightly reading to the girls. At 7:15 she rel tantly called time on the laughing threeso and Dick Nixon went to switch from his b ness suit to evening garb. At exactly 7:30 t left for the embassy.

LITTLE YOU KNOW

By ELIZABETH McFARLAND

Little you know. And I, I fear,
Little I care. You are small and near,
Warm in your crib, though unread, my dear—
Unlettered, unciphered, sweet son.
You are ignorant, wise little one.
But not of first Word: would the sun
Ever rise should you fall? Would the sky
Bloom ever again should you die?
Little, you know. And I!

Bedtime for the Nixon daughters in winter is 9 P.M., although, once in bed, they may read for a while. In summer when school is over they are allowed up until 9:30. Exceptions sometimes are made on holidays, for a night football game or a special TV show.

On evenings out, the Nixons return home as early as official etiquette permits, but seldom much before midnight.

One chore remains for Pat. Checkers must be taken for his evening walk. Formerly the famous cocker spaniel and his mistress strolled alone, but now they are joined by the cats, Puff and Nicky. "They're walking cats," she says. Evenings when the entire family is home, Checkers may join in this sedate trek. "It's a good thing not many see us," Patricia Nixon comments. "We must look pretty funny."

The Vice President and Mrs. Nixon sleep in an upstairs bedroom close to the girls. The striking characteristic of this room is its simplicity: pale green walls and draperies, light cherry furniture and a few family pictures on the walls. The only reminder of the Nixons' outer world is on the otherwise-empty mantel, a delicate ivory chest containing a gold bracelet and watch charm, a gift of Liberia's president on the Nixons' visit to Africa.

The Vice President drops off to sleep quickly. Mrs. Nixon may leave her bed light on to read awhile. Perhaps by 1 A.M. the household is silent.

This is the private world of the Richard Nixons. Pat and Dick, dedicated parents, are determined to keep this home unchanged by the demands and tensions of their public life.

Mrs. Nixon, when confronted by a look into the future, answers simply, "We like to think of now. I can't project into the future. We are trying to let the girls grow up happily in a good home. I want that more than anything else."

HOW MOVIE AND TV VIOLENCE AFFECTS CHILDREN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

impact on most children than the images they conceive in their own mind's eye from reading a story or having one read aloud to them. My conviction is based on interviews with children, on studying their day-dreams, their dreams, their drawings, their play and games, and their attempts at imitation. An eight-year-old boy, for example, gave me a most sensitive account of the movie The Grapes of Wrath, which much older youths could not give me from the book.

"Live action" on the screen, particularly when it is cruel or horrifying, works directly on the child without the—for some children—cumbersome detour of reading. The identification with a character in a motion picture may be almost overpowering. The very effort which even fair readers must make to read the abstract letters on the printed page is a barrier to merging completely with the story. The same exciting story on the screen can absorb a child immediately and entirely.

When you gain a child's confidence and show him that you are really interested, he will tell you how stories play a role in his thinking. I asked a four-year-old girl how she remembered so many details long after she had seen a Western on TV. "Why, I remember it!" she told me. "Of course I remember. I have seen it!" One eight-year-old boy, watching a TV film, asked his father, "Which one is the bad guy?" When his father told him, the boy replied, "I'm him. O.K.?"

When reading a violent story in book form, a child is protected by the limits of his own imagination, to which, in even the grisliest fairy story, something is left. On the screen, violence and horror are spelled out. They are made much "realer," as a seven-year-old told me. There is also the matter of age. Children watch television at a much earlier age than they read books. And if they read books that are beyond their comprehension with regard to sex or violence or dishonesty, they just skip those parts and keep on reading. Seeing the same or a similar plot on the screen is a more complete and more potent experience. Whether they completely understand it or not, they have a vivid visual image of it.

Q "Will watching violent TV shows and movies cause a child to become a criminal?"

Obviously no one can say exactly how any individual child will be affected without knowing a great deal about that child. But there does seem to be a connection between screen violence and the committing of crimes by young people. The connection has been pointed out by some distinguished jurists and criminologists.

Justice Curtis Bok, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, has listed, on the basis of extensive experience, the primary causes of juvenile delinquency and crime; as one among only five groups of causes, he mentions crime and violence shows on TV and movie screens.

The director of the U. S. Bureau of Prisons, James V. Bennett (who has access to an immense amount of case material), has noted that the modus operandi in an increasingly large number of crimes committed by young offenders closely parallels TV shows they have seen.

The British Report of the Departmental Committee on Children and the Cinema says that sadistic and brutal scenes have a bad effect on children and should not be seen by them.

Judge Frank J. Kronenberg, president of the New York State County Judges' Association, states that "television is an instrument of intense pressure that convinces the immature mind that violence is an accepted way of life. It is a subtle form of American brainwashing."

Parents reading of juvenile crimes, especially the mad, senseless stabbings that have become so prevalent in cities, ask, "Don't these young hoodlums have any feelings?" They certainly don't have much empathy—the capacity for feeling the pain of others and "hurting with them." There are many reasons for this callousness, but Dr. Walter C. Alvarez, renowned physician formerly of the Mayo Clinic, has pointed out that violent movie and TV films may have something to do with it.

"Do we adults have any sense at all," he asks, "when daily we let people show our children pictures of murder, violence, shooting, hanging, kidnaping? . . . Today most children have become so hardened that they can look at these pictures of murder and sudden death without being upset."

Commissioner Frieda B. Hennock, of the Federal Communications Commission, told a Senate subcommittee that television sets "are pouring an unending stream of crime, violence, outright murder, brutality, unnatural suspense and horror into the living rooms of America. The suggestions which have been made that there is no discernible relationship between these programs and the recent appalling increase in juvenile delinquency flout common sense and rudimentary sound judgment."

Well-authenticated observations indicate that delinquent children have been influenced—directly or indirectly—by the screen. Even the courts have taken official cognizance, in cases of robberies, of this "indirect incitement." Children have injured other children and adults with BB and other guns, re-enacting the shootings they had seen in screen Westerns. They have worn gloves when committing burglaries, imitating crime pictures, and used masks like that worn by Zorro.

In recent years I have had to examine a number of adolescents and postadolescents charged with homicide. Among them were cases which aroused national interest on account of either the age of the accused or the type of alleged crime: the boy who killed a baby sitter and a baby in Massachusetts; the boy who shot the "model boy" on the streets of New York City [described in Doctor Wertham's book The Circle of Guilt—Ed.]; the high-school boy on Long Island who killed a fellow student with a shotgun in the school washroom; the Bible-carrying "model boy" who strangled to death a fifteen-year-old girl in New Jersey; the youth who shot a hotel employee during a robbery; the youth who

Enjoy WASHINGTON STATE

It's the WESTERN-most!

Enjoy clam-digging on our safe, sandy beaches...enjoy blue Pacific Ocean surf and sun bathing too.

. . . Most pleasure per mile!

Where's Mother in all this exciting fun on Washington State's broad ocean beaches? She's taking the photo . . . for picture memories the family will cherish for years. And there will be other pictures too – Grand Coulee Dam night-floodlighted, magnificent Mt. Rainier, the prehistoric Grand Coulee Dry Falls, ferrying on blue Puget Sound, the fine guest ranch, resort motel or friendly hotel the family loved so much. May we help you plan your best vacation ever in . . .

WASHINGTON STATE

. . . Where everything's only hours apart!

Washington State Dept. of Commerce
Gen'l Administration Bldg.,
Olympia, Washington LHJ-1

Please send your FREE vacation folders to:

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

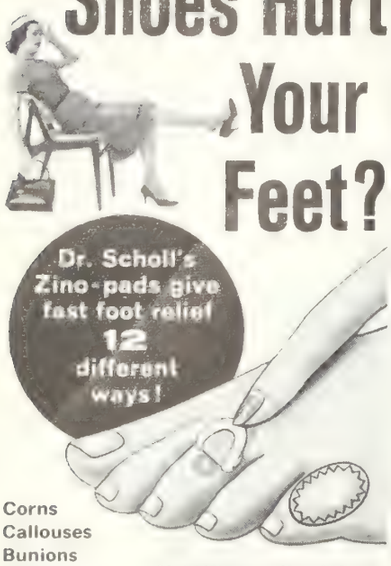
(PLEASE PRINT CLEARLY)

HAVE YOU HEARD ABOUT

THE AMAZING NEW
"DUB-L-LOX"
DIAPER PIN?
IT CAN NEVER OPEN ACCIDENTALLY!
At infants or notions counters. For FREE Sample write: DeRONDE & CO., INC., Montpelier, Vermont

LIPS SORE?

POCKET SIZE 39c
HIGHER IN CANADA



YOUNG MOTHER PROUD OF SMOOTH, FIRM BODY SKIN

Smooth away that dry, tight-skin feeling before baby comes . . . enjoy smooth, firm, lovely body skin afterwards! Just massage MOTHERS FRIEND onto your abdomen every day as your figure starts to change. MOTHERS FRIEND keeps your skin firm yet elastic . . . after pregnancy, too. Also soothes those nagging aches in back and legs. Try this refreshing body skin conditioner today. It's made only for expectant mothers. At drug stores everywhere.

Special Offer! For Trial Size bottle plus informative booklet about you and pregnancy, send 25¢ in coins to Dept. K, Mothers Friend, P. O. Box 4447, Atlanta 2, Georgia.

MOTHERS FRIEND®

Shoes Hurt Your Feet?

Corns
Callouses
Bunions
Sore Toes
Tender Spots
Sore Heels
Instep Ridges
Rough Seams
Binding Straps
Heel Bumps
Enlarged Joints
Danger of Blisters

No other method does all these things for you

Now, wherever and whenever a shoe painfully rubs, presses or pinches your feet or toes—protect them with Dr. Scholl's thin, soothing, cushioning Zino-pads. Relief will be yours almost instantly and corns, callouses stopped before they can develop. If you have corns or callouses, Zino-pads remove them one of the quickest ways known to medical science. Get this wonderful relief of Dr. Scholl's today!

For FREE Sample Packet of all sizes and valuable 64-page booklet on Foot Care, write Dr. Scholl's, Dept. 2Z13, Chicago 10, Illinois.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

Prove to yourself

You can stop taking laxatives

Why fight constipation with laxatives or "bulks" that work unnaturally, uncomfortably? Take new REGUTOL instead. It's not a laxative, yet it restores regularity as no laxative can. REGUTOL simply makes the moisture in your colon keep waste soft for easy, normal elimination. Hospital-proved safe and not habit-forming. Try it! 30 tablets, only $1.00.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

20 Second Way To A

SWEETER BREATH CLEANER MOUTH

It's really true . . . now you can have a clean, refreshed mouth and throat—a sweeter breath—in just 20 seconds with Astring-o-sol Mouth Wash. Yes, even after heavy smoking or indulging in foods or beverages with lingering odors.

Developed by a practicing dentist, Astring-o-sol is far superior to any toothpaste in sweetening breath. For Astring-o-sol also helps remove odor-carrying mucous from mouth and throat. So get Astring-o-sol, the concentrated mouth wash, at any drug or toiletry counter.

FREE! For free sample, write your name and address on a postcard and mail to: Astring-o-sol, 941 Prospect Street, Trenton 8, N. J.

Astring-o-sol
MOUTH WASH

was the leader of one group of young torturers and "thrill killers" in Brooklyn.

The circumstances, background, motivation and most other factors were very different in each case. But in each of them I found—and in several said so under oath—that the visual mass media (TV, movies and crime comic books), though not decisive or fundamental, played a contributing part in the final tragedy. They did not start the fire, but they did add fuel to it.

One boy who had beaten a girl told me he had had daydreams of doing this for a long time. When he saw a girl being beaten on the screen, the idea of actually carrying out his daydreams came to him for the first time.

I agree with Clifton Fadiman's statement that violent TV shows create in young people "a lust for violence."

I have often asked a special kind of expert in this field—the juvenile criminals themselves—what they think about the effect of violent screen fare on children. Nearly all have said the effect is bad. "They make you think you do something big," or "They show you how a man is killed," or "They make you want to try it out." Typical of many such opinions is this conversation I had in jail with a boy of sixteen charged with a serious assault:

Q. If you had a son, would you want him to see a lot of the violence on TV and in movies?
A. No.
Q. Why?
A. It affects the mind. One fellow's enemy does something to him—the first thing that comes to his mind is to bump him off. The children scheme to do what they see on TV. It is like a recipe that tells you how to make a cake. In my opinion it's something that just grows with the child when he sees it. The same thing is true with violence in movies. Like City Across the River, Edge of the City, Viva Zapata. The children are more apt to get into violent troubles because all these violent things that they see are in the subconscious. Like a child does something, and he may not realize that he wanted to do it at one time.

The screen may not only provide unhealthy suggestions, it may also lead to a subtle general conditioning. This is best understood through analogy with medical pathology. Excessive use of the drug phenacetin, and phenacetin-containing drugs, can cause serious disease by lowering the power of resistance of such organs as the kidneys. A usually harmless infection or injury may then cause a serious disease in the phenacetin user. This has recently been proved experimentally. In the same way the child whose memory is filled with screen violence may have less psychological resistance to various evil influences

The connection between violence and sex, as presented on the screen, is particularly apt to arouse fantasies and/or facilitate the transition from fantasy to action. Where the Western films stultify with violence, the horror shows titillate with sadism (sex combined with violence). I know of cases in which boys as young as eleven have been sexually excited by them. Sadistic daydreams, whether or not accompanied by masturbation, are certainly not good for children and may instill a liking for sadism that will cause serious trouble in later life.

Assuming that your child will not become a criminal, it is worth noting that he will grow up among children less fortunate than he is and that if they are influenced toward violence and crime your child—and, for that matter, you yourself—will be to some degree endangered.

Here in the U. S. great progress has been made in diagnosing, analyzing and treating troubled and delinquent children. Where we have fallen down is in the field of prevention. A positive mental-hygiene program for children would mean actively combating anything that might be harmful to them. One reason we are making so little progress in the prevention of juvenile delinquency is that we tend to blame it all on "the family" and ignore those outside forces which bypass the family and work directly on the child. Even where they are not "basic" causes they may be important contributing causes. The study of the growing individual is incomplete if it does not take into account the total environment, which today must include the influence of TV and movies.

Q "Do violent TV shows and movies interfere with children's sleep?"

Many children stay up long past a sensible bedtime in order to watch TV. It may be argued that they would do this whether or not the programs contained violence, but the fact is that if the only shows they would view in the hours after 7:30 P.M. or so were of a nonviolent type, few children would be eager to stay up, or able to stay awake, for them. Shows featuring violence overstimulate children and keep them awake. Watching such a show may cause a child to want to commit violent acts, and even though no violent act is actually committed, the need to suppress the urge may place a burden on his mind and set up a conflict which will interfere with sound sleep.

In group therapy sessions, when one child relates the detailed plot of a story he has seen, he is frequently interrupted: "Now they're going to drown him"; "Now she'll shoot him"; "Now he'll run over her with his car"; "Now he'll be tortured." This anticipation of violence is an unwholesome response. If it becomes ingrained, it leads to an attitude which Henry James has called "the imagination of disaster." Disturbing dreams and nightmares may result.

By allowing a child's mind to be filled with violent images we may prevent him from escaping even in sleep and fantasy into a peaceful harmonious world.

Faith means believing what is incredible, or it is no virtue at all. Hope means hoping when things are hopeless, or it is no virtue at all. And charity means pardoning what is unpardonable, or it is no virtue at all.
G. K. CHESTERTON
Heretics

Q "There is violence in real life; shouldn't children learn about it from watching violent TV shows and movies?"

The fact is, many so-called children's TV programs, or movies available to children, portray in a half hour more violent excitement than the average person experiences in a lifetime. How many of us have seen a man shot down or knifed, pistol-whipped, deliberately run down by a car—in real life?

Credulous people in other countries, who get their idea of Americans only from our exported motion pictures, often believe that we are a nation of gangsters and gun slingers. We would not recommend to a visitor from another nation that he base his estimate of our national character on our violent TV shows and movies. How can we expect our children to learn about "real life" from these programs?

Commissioner Hennock, of the F.C.C., whom I quoted earlier, has said that "the programing to which children are subjected cannot help but convey to the minds of the immature viewers the impression that crime, violence, brutality and horror are the most conspicuous features of life. There is no other impression which can be gained by children who are subjected to a relentless and increasing barrage of crime and violence on the TV screens in their homes."

What children see on the screen is violence as an almost casual commonplace of daily living. Violence becomes the fundamental principle of society, the natural law of humanity. Killing is as common as taking a walk, a gun is more natural than an umbrella.

I have asked many children what they have learned from Westerns: When did the action take place, within the past fifty years? In what state did the action take place? Did the people really live, or is it just a story or legend? What was the duty of the sheriff? And so on. Even very intelligent children could not answer correctly. Many thought that the actions they were taking place right now.

Sometimes very general questions will reveal how a child views the history offered in Westerns. Witness this interview with eight-year-old boy:

Q. Do you think it is good for children to watch television?
A. Yes. Yes, I do.
Q. Why?
A. They help you to understand real
Q. What do you mean, real life?
A. What it was like in the old days.
Q. From what you have seen on TV, was it like in the old days?
A. Well, it was exciting.
Q. Fun?
A. Yeah.
Q. What was the most fun they had?
A. Gun slinging, rounding them up shooting them.

It would seem that these violent shows l children to expect, and in some cases to crav kind of violence that they will not encounte real life unless they stir it up themselves.

Parents who have lived and fought throu a major war, and are not at all sure their s and even daughters may not have to do same thing, often ask whether violent scr shows won't "toughen up" their childr make them stronger, braver, more patrio prouder of their country's past, better fight for democracy. Undoubtedly there are scre plays that do inculcate in young people a f ing of pride in their country, an admiration and wish to emulate brave conduct. But not shows that specialize in violence. Superm doesn't have courage—doesn't need it. Neit do most of the invincible heroes of Weste and crime pictures. Can anyone reasonably gue that the kind of intelligence and imagi tion one needs to survive in today's highly co plex and competitive world is wholesom nourished or trained in a child by his sitting front of a screen and being "entertained" violence hour after hour?

With the progress of civilization we h learned—slowly and painfully—that violenc not the best way to settle human differences. we seem to be using the marvelous techni media of movies and television to teach child that it is the only way.

Learning about "real life"—learning to ferentiate between the realm of reality a that of imagination and fiction—is more di cult for children than most adults reali Experimental studies have shown that the c tinction is not actually mastered before the a of eleven or twelve. Before that there are w fluctuations and children feel many things real although they may half know they are n

Many children think Superman and otl such television figures are real. They are le of admitting this to adults because adu laugh. Disturbed children have confided me how their feelings have been hurt by th Many children have been injured and at le one has been killed trying to fly like Sup man. Separation of the real from the fictio is part of the child's mental growth. Good programs can be helpful in this; violence-r den ones are harmful.

Small children get frightened because th cannot possibly understand what is real a what is not. They think that what they see actually happening right in their room. T immediate effects of this are emotional upse development of fear of the dark, nightmar and so on. The long-term effects are mo difficult to assess.

To shock and confuse children as to t very nature of reality can hardly help to p pare them to cope with it.

Q "Don't children learn ev from violent TV shows and movies that go always triumphs over bad?"

The question we have to consider is n what "moral" does the movie or TV produc claim to be drawing, or what point may a p ture establish in adult minds, but what does child pick up from it?

Here is an eleven-year-old girl's descripti of a story she saw on TV: "They threaten

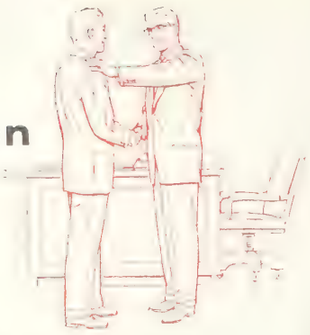
CONTINUED ON PAGE 168

HOW LONG SINCE YOU'VE SAT ON TOP OF THE WORLD?

The sun's shining high in a blue sky today. And there's a song in your heart as you back slowly down the drive and ease out into traffic. The gal next door waves gaily from her porch. Curtains flutter in the house across the way. At the corner stoplight a woman in the car alongside nudges her husband to look.

The new car's yours for the day! So much to do, and what a glorious way to do it! The itinerary: First the hairdresser . . . then a visit with Grandma . . . the marketing . . . pick up the kids after school and take them to their den meeting . . . meet Jim at the office at five.

On your merry way down Main Street you see the dealer who sold you your car hard at work — helping put up a display for a local charity drive. And you realize your dealer is a businessman, sure, but first and foremost he's a member of your community. He helps keep it rolling. Doc makes his calls in a car your dealer sold him. Your milk is delivered in one of his trucks. In his spare time he serves on the Chamber of Commerce. Sponsors safe-driving programs. He's a good citizen . . . a good neighbor . . . and a good man to do business with. For instance, he helps folks finance their cars — and their insurance, too.



Five o'clock, and all's well. You park in front of Jim's office and lean back in the seat, smiling to yourself. What if (as Jim kiddingly maintains) you don't know what's under the hood? The car goes, doesn't it? It goes beautifully, and to a woman, that's all that matters. You know that — from gas to gaskets, batteries to brakes — your town is staffed with skilled, reliable people who'll keep your new car new. And you know something else, too: it would be heavenly to be sitting on top of the world like this every day of the year . . . in a car of your own!

See the new 1960 models that are featured in The Saturday Evening Post, the nation's greatest year-round new-car show place. Then see your dealer pronto!

The Saturday Evening Post

when the occasion

calls for MOVING...

call United

Who wouldn't pop a button or two on the happy occasion when a promotion comes through?

And moving your family to the new assignment can be pleasant, too, when the United Agent "Pre-Plans" the details. You get personalized service from the moment your goods are "UNI-PACKED" 'til you're comfortably settled at your new address.

A United move is safer, easier. Cleaner, too! Because only United vans are SANITIZED* to keep your furnishings fresh and clean.

Whatever the occasion . . . if it calls for moving, call your United Agent. Look under "MOVERS" in the Yellow Pages.

* REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

United Van Lines

MOVING WITH CARE EVERYWHERE®

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 166

kill, they betray. A good man knocks an old man down, they kidnap a girl, the men have guns. Two men are tied, there's a lady captive. They bring money as ransom but they threaten to kill them anyhow. Two men kick one man with their heels. The criminals shoot each other. A bad Indian captures the lady and uses her as a shield—holds a knife on her. One man is shot. The sergeant kills the Indian by breaking his neck, and choking him with an underarm grip."

Such descriptions indicate that children do not learn from these shows that "good guys win over bad guys"; rather, they learn that violence is exciting—and, since we allow so much of it to be shown to them, that it is probably a pretty good thing. (A child accustomed to a rich diet of murders and other violence on the screen may have trouble understanding why his minor transgressions, such as slugging his little sister, call for any punishment.)

What some children learn from screen violence is that all life is a fight, that gentle persuasion is never successful—and is sissy, anyhow.

The greatest influences in the life of one troubled boy I examined were TV and movies. "I learned my lesson," he told me. "I know how I'm going to live. I heard it on TV. If you are knocked down once, you'd better figure it was a lucky punch of the other fellow. If you're knocked down twice, you'd better figure it was a slip of your own. If you're knocked down three times, you'd better stay down before you get your head knocked off."

Ethics deals with that part of a man's development that has to do with other people. One of its essential teachings is not to hurt anybody if it can be avoided. Here is where many television stories and movies do subtle but definite injury. Children learn to take pride in force and violence and to feel ashamed of ordinary sympathy. They are encouraged to forget that people have feelings. A cowboy is shot and falls off his horse. Nobody in the film shows any concern or emotion; in fact, frequently the others do not pay any attention to him whatsoever, but ride on after someone else without even looking back.

The best introduction to astronomy is to think of the nightly heavens as a little lot of stars belonging to one's own homestead.

GEORGE ELIOT

In some of these plays, it is easier to tell the good guys from the bad by their horses or their hats than by their actions. One child told me how much he had liked one violent Western TV film. I asked, "What was the lesson of it?" He thought for a while and then said, "Well, it's like the man said at the end, 'Smoke Viceroys!'"

I have been told of one case in which a boy of eight went to a priest in the Bronx in a distraught state of mind. The priest asked what had upset him so. The boy explained that he felt guilty because he had bought a brand of bread that was not the one recommended by his favorite TV star!

Many parents have trouble because their children fight too much over trivialities. This tendency would be easier to understand if parents were as familiar with Popeye as the children are. Popeye "proves," day in and day out, that the way to settle differences is through the roughest kind of fighting. One such show might be funny, but the endless repetition, week after week, is not—especially to parents who have to deal with combative young Popeye addicts.

To teach a child ethical values is a delicate business, requiring patience and an understanding of the child's capacity to comprehend. What evidence there is of the effect of screen violence on a child's ability to distinguish between right and wrong seems to show that such violence blurs his moral sense.

Q "Don't children get rid of hostility feelings harmlessly by watching violent TV shows and movies?"

In all my work with children and in all my study of the work of others with children, I have never found any evidence to support the theory that violent stories "provide children with a harmless outlet for their hates"—or "relieve pent-up aggressions"—or "provide vicarious outlet for latent hostility."

If a child is hostile or destructive or hate it is necessary to find out and understand causes and circumstances responsible for t Seeing pictures of fights, man hunts cruelty is no help to him. On the contrary may stimulate the child to express his hosti in violent acts of his own.

The idea that looking at murder helps c dren get rid of "pent-up aggressions" has b tested and just the opposite has been fo true. In one test, a group of six- to ten-year- children was shown a typical crime West film; over a third of the children were m aggressive after seeing it than they had been previous testing.

The whole idea that hostility may be wor off by witnessing violent acts is based o misunderstanding of the psychology of Fr and the philosophy of Aristotle.

Freud wrote about relieving repressed er tions by giving them a free outlet thro analysis and understanding. I believe he wo have been horrified if he had seen five-year- children looking at Superman, Zorro and Mummy.

Aristotle wrote about purification thro pity and fear in plays presented in the Gr theater, but Greek children did not go to theater for several hours every day, and a ally violence was not shown on stage in Greek theater. The most important poin ignored by all the defenders of violence on screen who invoke Aristotle—is that Arist actually advocated that children should excluded by law from m plays. So one can say certainty that he would have approved either of ideas now laid at his d or of the violent screen provided the modern A ican child.

Some parents believe t if sex is portrayed to c dren it will incite them, have been persuaded tha violence is portrayed to th it will purify them. Ther no reason to believe this. The most that can said for violent screen fare is that it may reli a child's boredom and thus improve his dis sition—momentarily. Much the same defe might be made of narcotics and sin for adu

Q "Children who are loved well brought up and emotionally well balan are not affected by screen violence, are they

From the evidence gathered thus far psychological tests, we may answer that children are impressionable and theref susceptible.

It is easy, after a child has committe crime or got into serious trouble, to say t he must have been "maladjusted" or "pre posed." But we flatter ourselves if we th that our social conditions, our family life, education and our entertainment are so above reproach that only emotionally s children can get into trouble.

We like to assume that most children "immune" to influences such as screen v lence—that they are naturally so resilient t they cannot be affected. But my work w youthful criminals and troubled children, a my study of the subject, convinces me that such immunity exists. Harm is harm. A n ious agent is a noxious agent. There may defenses against a snowball, but there none against an avalanche. As Dr. Fra Braceland, Chief Psychiatrist at the Insti of Living and former president of the A ican Psychiatric Association, expresses "No matter what the make-up of the dividual, there are always limits to tolerance."

Actually the theory that harm can co only to the predisposed child leads to a cont dictory and irresponsible attitude on the p of adults. The argument goes like this: C structive programs on television are praised giving children constructive ideas. At the sa time it is denied that destructive scenes g children destructive ideas. Healthy, norm chi en are not supposed to be affected by scr fare. And for unhealthy, abnormal chi en it is not supposed to matter, because if t y were not influenced by the screen they wo l be influenced by something else. Judge Kr enberg, whom I quoted earlier, has said: "T argument that crime programs damage onl children who are already emotionally unsta is contrary to common sense. Even if it wer true that only the emotionally unstable are ffected, there are still some two million suc children."

is question about whether normal children can be adversely affected by mass media is crucial one. Recently a high court, the Ap llate Court of the State of California, car d out an independent appraisal, reviewing stimony given at an earlier trial concerning Los Angeles County ordinance forbidding the sale of crime comics to children. A chi psychiatrist of the Bureau of Child Guidance in New York, Dr. Hilde L. Mosse, testified hat visual mass media, and "especially television," can have a detrimental effect upon "b cally healthy" children. The director of a Los Angeles child-guidance clinic tried to argue n his testimony, that normal children are not harmed. The court's decision was unanimo. In the first such verdict by a high court on le effect of mass media on children in this country, it confirmed the validity and constitutionality of the ordinance forbidding the sal of crime comics to children which had bee drawn up after long study by Harold W. Kennedy, county counsel of Los Angeles County. Even if this opinion were to be reversed in the course of further appeals, it is a milestone in judicial appraisal of the effect on children of violence in the mass media.

Justice Allen W. Ashburn, who wrote the opinion, quoted with approval a statement I had made in one of my studies pertinent to this issue: "The claim [is made] that only unstable children who are insecure, or otherwise predestined or preconditioned, are adversely affected by mass media. . . . One cannot make an hard and fast rule according to which children can be divided into stable or unstable. Every normal child is immature, growing, and to what extent unstable and vulnerable. And even if he does nothing wrong, temptation excites him to emotional conflict, and that, coupled with other factors, may do him subtle harm, immediately or later on. The first modern psychologist, St. Augustine, was well aware of this. He pointed out the effect of this seduction by public spectacles on an immature mind, especially in the direction of one's fascination by sadism and violence."

Dr. Horace King, the eminent British educator and member of the House of Commons, has made a study of mass media in the United States. He says: "The unhurtable and incorruptible child" is a "mythical figure"; and asks: "Are not children who are very sensitive and normal children? Are not children who are richly endowed with emotions normal? Are not children with vivid imaginations normal? Or do we mean by the 'normal' child just the tough child? If we have in our midst neurotic children, is it our business to feed the neurosis or to check it? If we have in our community potential sadists, is it our job to stimulate and encourage their cruel fantasies?"

Here is, I believe, a simple axiom that concerns every parent: Normal children are susceptible to abnormal influences.

Of course the child who already has difficulties is especially susceptible to bad influences of all kinds, including screen violence. It sometimes goes in a sad, vicious circle: the child whom nobody loves or looks out for is able to watch TV or movies by the hour; his loneliness makes him long for this kind of "entertainment," his ego hunger makes him identify with the "strong guys" and emulate their behavior—and then he's in serious trouble. And a victim may be dead.

Q "But can you prove TV and movie violence is bad for children?"

Not with mathematical exactness, no. A lot is to be left to the experience and judgment of the child expert and the sensible parent. The best we can do is to sift the evidence and carefully draw conclusions.

SCHOOLS, COLLEGES AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 380 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' & Girls' Camp

Dr. Johnsons Camps Crescent Lake, Me. Established 1921. Moosehead for boys 6–16, Three Pines for girls 6–16. Adjacent camps. Activities including riding, swimming, sailing, water skiing, golf, tennis, trips, music. Nature, campcraft. Tutoring. Site of A.R.C. Small Craft School. Catalog.
A. B. Johnson, Box 307J, Weston, Massachusetts

Girls' Camp

brown ledge Mallett's Bay, Vt. "One of America's finest camps." Girls 10–18. Free daily riding for all. Waterskiing, swimming, sailing, drama, golf, riflery, archery, crafts, trips. No "extras"! (Also Buff Ledge, girls 7 & up.) Give age. For booklet, write winter office:
Mrs. H. E. Brown, 18 Carver Ave., Box A, Scituate, Mass.

Coeducational Camp

Shaker Village Work Group
For teen agers wanting to discover the responsibilities and satisfactions of work, make better use of leisure, explore the art of getting along with people. A new kind of education in work, leisure, community relations.
P. O. Box 1149-L, Pittsfield, Mass.

Coeducational School

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep Grades 9–12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog.
R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

College

Nichols College of Business Administration For Men. B.B.A. degree. Conservation & Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education (unexcelled location: 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment.
James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols College, Dudley 6, Mass.

Junior College

Vermont College A two-year college for 345 women. Terminal, transfer courses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, nursery teaching, secretarial, medical sec'l, medical tech., general. Electives in art, home ec., music. Spacious hilltop campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 17 bldgs. 125th Yr. Catalog.
R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier, Vt.

Music School

Sherwood Music School Train for a successful music career. Two- and three-year certificate courses and four-year degree courses. Faculty of distinguished musicians. Member Nat. Assn. Schls. Mus. State accredited. Coed. Well-equipped building on lakefront. Dormitory for women. Founded 1895. Write for catalog.
1014 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5, Ill.

Boys' Schools

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY

"At the Nation's Shrine" Valley Forge, shrine of our freedom, has loaned its name to this fully accredited, distinguished Mil. Acad. and Jr. Coll. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep. School, grades 9 thru 12 & Jr. Coll. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band, Senior Div. ROTC.
Catalogue. Box Radnor, Wayne, Pa.

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY

★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings. 2 completely equipped gyms. 2 indoor pool. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8 has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 62nd year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 862, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Perkiomen
Boys taught how to study. Graduates attend leading colleges, universities. Homelike atmosphere. Grades 9–12. Sports, activities for all. Modern dormitories. Near New York City, Philadelphia. 86th yr. Summer school. Catalog.
Stephen A. Roberts, Headmaster, Pennsburg, Pennsylvania

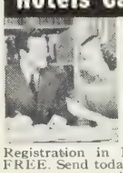
Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 6–12. How-to-study training, remedial and developmental reading; individual guidance. Christian influence. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Est. 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY

In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J 2, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS.
Founded 1860

Missouri Military Academy And Separate Junior School 71st yr. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Essentially college prep. Sr. ROTC. Friendly, inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. 50-acre lake. 5 athletic fields. 226-acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 120 Main St., Mexico, Missouri

Thomas Jefferson School
Why not the best for your son? All graduates have entered college, 90% Ivy League since 1953. Faculty all Ivy League graduates. Hard work. No frills. Cheerful rooms. Delicious food. Not military. Grades 9–12.
Robin L. McCoy, Headmaster, St. Louis 27, Missouri



Miami Military Academy Develops leadership and character. Fully accredited. College preparatory high school, Junior School. Small classes. Boys learn to study. National Defense Cadet Corps. Honor School. Sports, sailing; pool. 35 acres on Biscayne Bay. Moderate fee. 35th year. Catalog.
Col. F. R. Williams, 10603 Biscayne Blvd., Miami 38B, Fla.

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Fully accredited. Semi-military. Outstanding preparation for all colleges and the service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music, activities. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Massanutten Military Academy
62nd yr. Accredited. New Dorm & classrooms. Small classes. College Preparatory. Supervised study. ROTC. Band, Rifle team, Riding, Tennis, Football, Basketball, Baseball. Athletics for all. Gym, Pool. Grades 7–12. Also Camp. Catalog. Col.
R. J. Benchoff, Hdmr., Woodstock 4, Va. (Shenandoah Val.)

Hotel Training

Hotels Call for Trained Women

You can qualify at home or through resident classes in Washington for a well-paid position in hotel, motel and hospitality field. Thousands of Lewis graduates, both young and mature, "making good" everywhere. Get into this fast-growing field offering sound, substantial opportunities, fine living, luxurious surroundings. Previous experience proved unnecessary. Registration in Lewis Nationwide Placement Service FREE. Send today for FREE Book.
Accredited by N.H.S.C.
Course Approved for ALL Veteran Training
LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL Room FB-549, Washington 7, D. C. 44th SUCCESSFUL YEAR

Home-Study

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. text supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H23, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

Dolls!
Learn to make, repair and sell dolls and accessories at home. Excellent money making opportunities. May we send free informative booklet? No obligation!
Norm & Sue's Doll Hospital School, Studio L-20, 11826 San Vicente Blvd., Los Angeles 49, Calif.

ART LEARN AT HOME!
Enjoy glamorous high-pay career or profitable hobby. Learn Commercial Art, Painting, Cartooning, Fashion Art, Lettering, TV, etc. We train you at home, in spare time. TWO 22-pc. art outfits included free of extra charge. LOW COST — only 20c a day. Write for FREE Book describing easy method. No salesman will call. Washington School of Art, Studio 1552, Port Washington, N. Y. (Estab. 1914)

ACCOUNTANT BECOME AN EXPERT
TO THE WOMAN WHO WANTS TO ENJOY AN ACCOUNTING CAREER
FREE SAMPLE LESSON
Thousands of firms need women accountants. We train you thoroly at home in spare time for well paying accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of CPAs and expert accountants. Placement counsel. Write for sample lesson and illustrated free book, "Opportunities in Accounting" which describes the opportunities for women in this profitable field.
LASALLE Extension University, 417 So. Dearborn St. Chicago 5, Ill.
A Correspondence Institution. Dept. 246H

Home-Study

Design Smart Fashions LEARN AT HOME—SPARE TIME

Fascinating field. Design own wardrobe at considerable saving. Gain experience designing for others. It may lead to thrilling career. Basic "learn-by-doing" course under guidance of qualified teachers provides excellent starting point for a career. Send for free booklet, "Adventures in Dress Design."
NATIONAL SCHOOL OF DRESS DESIGN
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1372, Chicago 14, Illinois

Floral Training
Learn flower arranging at home—countless money-making opportunities. Accredited training. May we send free, and without obligation, our booklet? Act now!
Norm & Sue's National Floral Institute, Studio L-20, 11826 San Vicente Blvd., Los Angeles 49, Calif.

Learn INTERIOR DECORATION at Home
Fascinating field for men and women. Excellent starting point for career. Practical basic training. Approved supervised method. Low tuition. Easy payments. Send for FREE 24-page illustrated booklet, "Adventures in Interior Design & Decoration." No obligation.
CHICAGO SCHOOL OF INTERIOR DECORATION
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1372, Chicago 14, Illinois

Sewing Learn modern dressmaking methods, factory shortcuts, professional techniques at home. We show how to make money. Countless opportunities. May we send free, and without obligation, our informative booklet? Accredited.
Norm & Sue's Good Dressmaking Institute, Dept. L-20, 11826 San Vicente Boulevard, Los Angeles 49, California

Play Right Away!
ANY INSTRUMENT
Now it's EASY to learn ANY INSTRUMENT—even if you don't know a single note now. No boring exercises. You play delightful pieces RIGHT AWAY from very first lesson! Properly—by note. Simple as A-B-C. You make amazing progress at home, in spare time, without teacher. Only few cents per lesson. 1,000,000 STUDENTS, including Lawrence Welk.
FREE BOOK Shows how easy it is to learn music this modern way. Write for it. No obligation. No salesman will call upon you. U. S. School of Music, Studio 632, Port Washington, N. Y. (62nd year). Tear this out.

Technical

ENGINEERING EDUCATION for the Space Age

NORTHROP INSTITUTE of Technology is a privately endowed, nonprofit college of engineering offering TWO-YEAR accredited technical training curricula and complete Bachelor of Science degree programs. Students from 50 states, many foreign countries. Outstandingly successful graduates employed in aeronautics, electronics, and space technology. Write today for catalog—no obligation.
NORTHROP INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY
1145 West Arbor Vitae Street, Inglewood 1, California

Business & Secretarial

Latin American Institute World wide Careers in Diplomacy, Government & Foreign Service. Exec. Secretary. Bi-lingual sec'y. Foreign trade & commerce. Translator-Interpreter. Languages. Coed. Day & Evening summer courses. Chartered by N.Y. Bd. of Regents. Residences recommended.
Room 218, 2 West 45th Street, New York 36

KatharineGibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts Secretarial (two years), Special Course for College Women. Residences. Personal placement service. For catalog write: Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave.; Montclair, N. J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

Wood Secretarial School College-level courses for High School and Private School graduates. Accredited by N.Y. State Education Department. Placement service. Air-conditioned. Dormitory. 81st year. Enroll now for Feb., July or Sept. Catalog. Enrollment Sec'y, 125 Park Ave., (100 E. 42 St. opposite Grand Central), N.Y. 17. OX 7-1290

Bryant College Bachelor's degree in 2 or 3 yrs. Professional training for business leadership. Business Administration, Acctg., Management, Marketing, Exec. Sec'l; Admin., Legal, Acctg., Med. Business Teacher-Ed.; 4 yrs. 1-yr. Sec'l Diploma. Coed. 27 bldgs., dorms. Vet appr. 97th yr. Sept., Feb. entrance. Catalog: Ruth West, Bryant College, Providence 6, R. I.

SHORTHAND IN 6 WEEKS

Write 120 words per minute—
Age no obstacle—LOWEST COST

Wins Fine Position As a Result of SPEEDWRITING Shorthand

Famous SPEEDWRITING shorthand. No symbols; no machines. Uses ABC's. Easiest to learn and use. Fast preparation for a better position and a sound, substantial future.

Nationally used in leading offices and Civil Service; also by executives, students, etc. 120 words per minute—50% FASTER than Civil Service requirements. Over 500,000 taught at home or through classroom instruction. The very low cost will surprise you. Typing available. 37th Year. Schools in over 400 cities in U.S., Canada, Cuba and Hawaii.

Write for FREE Booklet to:
School of Speedwriting
Dept. S902, 55 W. 42nd St., N. Y. 36 ®

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

"Why didn't I think of Long Distance before?"

"After my friend told me about calling her folks every week, I tried it too.

"It's wonderful! I get such a lift out of hearing their voices and sharing all the news. You can bet I'll call them often from now on!"

* * *

Right now would be a good time to enjoy a visit by phone with your folks.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

Here are some examples:

Chicago to Grand Rapids	50¢
Pittsburgh to Cincinnati	70¢
Phoenix to Los Angeles	85¢
Birmingham to Washington, D.C.	$1.10
Houston to Newark, N.J.	$1.40

These are the Station-to-Station rates for the first three minutes, after 6 p.m. and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Call by number. It's twice as fast.

Science has not yet supplied all the answers about polio. In an epidemic we still do not know which child will be affected and which will remain well. Nor do we know which of the affected children will get over the acute stage without any effects and which will be left with serious damage. But we do know enough to try to protect all children.

When the harmful influence of screen violence is discussed verbally or in print, there is often an "authority" who will say that in all his years of experience he has never seen a single child who was harmed by it. This does not mean the harm was not done—merely that he has not seen the connection. It has now been established that feeble-mindedness may be caused by chemical disorders of metabolism in the mother. Until this was discovered the experts in that field could say with honesty that they had "never seen a case in which feeble-mindedness was so caused." But it was.

We do not know all about anything with regard to human behavior. But the idea that watching screen violence hour after hour will have no effect on a child contradicts everyday observation and common sense. If young people watch dancing, it makes them want to dance. If they see peanut butter or soft drinks or breakfast foods, they want to buy them. It cannot be sensibly argued that children who see violence on the screen do not acquire a liking for it, on some level of consciousness.

Q "What can we do to reduce the amount of screen violence our children are exposed to?"

It is unrealistic to suppose that most parents are able or willing to solve the problem by denying TV and movies to their children, or by watching constantly themselves to see that the children are not overexposed to violence. In this day, when fewer and fewer families have even part-time help to look after the children, it is a blessing to be able to set them down in front of the TV for an hour or so while mother and father have a quiet dinner or a little adult conversation. And TV does provide many happy and wholesome hours of entertainment and instruction and relief from boredom. Here and there an irate parent at the end of his patience will throw the TV set out, or disconnect it for a time, but in most American homes TV is here to stay.

Limiting the hours of TV viewing by children is, of course, every parent's duty, as is limiting the viewing to certain programs approved by the parents. But this is far easier said than done.

Mother leaves the children happily watching an educational or suitable children's program and returns an hour later to find the dial has been turned to another channel and now they sit in a white-faced, wide-eyed, nail-biting trance, watching the detective being kicked in the groin, the marshal being pistol-whipped, the villain being thrown to alligators.

Of course the child who moved the dial can be punished. This is difficult when he explains that the picture on the other channel got all full of stripes. It also sets up a very strong natural desire on the part of children to see, when nobody is looking, what horrible forbidden thing is on those other channels.

And what about the mother who, meaning to leave the children alone for only an hour, finds it impossible or inconvenient to return right on the dot, and the children's program ends and the next program features a fiendish killer? Parents who keep track of such things are aware of the violent "teasers" for coming attractions that are often sandwiched between parts of innocent children's programs.

Of course it has become increasingly difficult for programs that are really suitable for young children to compete with programs that are violent and unsuitable. We know of one little girl, accustomed to a rich TV fare, who was taken to the movies for the first time, to see a gentle picture, and who turned to the baby sitter at the end of ten minutes of this and whispered, "Can we see what's on other channel?"

As for violence in the movie theaters, [illegible] theory possible for a parent to take the [illegible] tion that he will not allow his children [illegible] any picture until he has seen it himself [illegible] approved it. But in practice everyone [illegible] that half the point of letting children go [illegible] movies is to gain the parents a little ti[illegible] themselves.

The fact is, TV and movies have bec[illegible] part of the atmosphere in which childr[illegible] brought up. Few parents argue that the [illegible] phere should be done away with, but the[illegible] der if it could not be made a little less d[illegible] ous, less malignant, less hostile to sensitiv[illegible] impressionable children.

On whom should pressure be broug[illegible] achieve this? Many parents, convinced [illegible] harm in screen violence, will write to thei[illegible] gressmen and demand Federal cens[illegible] And in the case of movies some form of [illegible] ernmental censorship, however regret[illegible] may prove to be the only solution.

But since nearly all TV entertainme[illegible] sponsored—and in fact virtually produc[illegible] by advertisers, American parents may b[illegible] position to bring about a reduction in TV [illegible] lence more easily and more quickly.

In the New York Times of Sunday, Ju[illegible] 1959, TV critic Jack Gould reported a he[illegible] held in New York the previous week b[illegible] Federal Communications Commission t[illegible] termine how advertising agencies opera[illegible] television. Men high up in some of th[illegible] tion's largest advertising agencies testifi[illegible] the hearing and, in Mr. Gould's words, "sp[illegible] out the advertising side of TV with uncom[illegible] vividness and forthrightness."

Give me the benefit of your convictions if you have any, but keep your doubts to yourself, for I have enough of my own.
GOETHE

"What was made a[illegible] dantly evident," wrote [illegible] Gould, "was that adv[illegible] ing agencies, which [illegible] solicit billing on the sc[illegible] in practice may be virtu[illegible] the actual producers. [illegible] Theatre Guild, David S[illegible] kind and Desi Arnaz [illegible] take the public bows .. [illegible] they don't make an im[illegible] tant move without an [illegible] proving nod from [illegible] agency men.

"In the case of most shows in which [illegible] are active, for instance, the agencies said [illegible] they review all scripts in advance, scruti[illegible] dialogue and story lines and have their [illegible] gram representatives' on hand to check [illegible] day's production work."

One advertising-agency executive testi[illegible] that advertisers are most interested in leav[illegible] the viewer with "a pleasant and favorable [illegible] pression"; another, says Mr. Gould, "ad[illegible] that even a relatively small volume of crit[illegible] mail can make a sponsor 'apprehensive.' [illegible] recalled an experience of seeing the head [illegible] very large corporation personally reading e[illegible] letter received. Because of the nature of t[illegible] business in dealing with the public, adverti[illegible] are 'extremely sensitive,' he said."

This suggests that although it may be te[illegible] bly complicated to regulate TV by law, to p[illegible] vent excessive violence, it might be relati[illegible] simple for parents to achieve much of w[illegible] they want simply by letting the sponsors of [illegible] shows know that violent shows do not cre[illegible] the favorable "image" advertisers are after[illegible] word from the sponsor to the advertis[illegible] agency might achieve quickly what it wo[illegible] take years to accomplish otherwise.

At different stages of history children h[illegible] needed protection for different reasons. At [illegible] dawn of history they needed protection aga[illegible] institutionalized infanticide. Before the m[illegible] dle of the nineteenth century they needed p[illegible] tection against child-labor practices. Now th[illegible] need protection from seduction by the scre[illegible] The late Arthur T. Vanderbilt, chief justice [illegible] the Supreme Court of New Jersey, wrote in t[illegible] Washington University Law Quarterly: "O[illegible] greatest concern with the oncoming generatio[illegible] I submit, relates to the perversion of you[illegible] minds through the mass media of the movies a[illegible] television. . . . The problem is only beginning[illegible] receive the consideration its seriousness d[illegible] for."

Printed in U.S.

ASTON DR. BR
BURLI
PUBL

JOURNAL

The Magazine Women Believe In

35c
March 1960

is Dr. Spock?

ETE NOVEL CONDENSED IN THIS ISSUE
LIZABETH CADELL

demic of Teenage et Marriages

For You—10 pages
Dream Kitchens

RFUL SPRING FASHIONS
FUL COMPACT 5-STAR WARDROBE

now a CANNON FASHION SHOW

new designs • Spring colors • fresh idea

New floral "Fanfare," 24 x 46 bath size, about 1.98. See the matching Cannon Combspun® Percale all-cotton sh

CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 WORTH ST., NEW YORK 13, N. Y. • TOWELS • SHEETS • BEDSPREADS • DRAPERIES • STOCKINGS • TERRY CLOTH

New "Fantasy," 22 x 44 bath size, about 1.00

Gay "Forget-me-not," 24 x 46 bath size, about

Every CANNON TOWEL stays soft and thirsty, wears for years. Cannon's Beauti-Fluff process makes all the difference.

see the difference • feel the difference • enjoy the difference for years

TRADE MARK CANNON

March, 1960

Ladies' Home JOURNAL

VOL. LXXVII NO. 3

Margaret Russell

The author of The Cup (page 60) says of herself: "MARGARET RUSSELL is a very ordinary, rather untidy sort of person who recently regained the thirty pounds she lost last summer. She has seven amazing children (a safe adjective—all children are amazing), and all likes to hunt rocks, cook and fight with her husband. The Cup is about the good kind of family fighting."

Elizabeth Cadell

ELIZABETH CADELL takes her readers and some other nice people on strange, dark paths along The Yellow Brick Road (page 56). "I was born and brought up in India—I think the American term is 'raised,' but my parents couldn't have known it, as they raised me to a mere five feet. I am now a widow, but I have a son and daughter and live most happily on the Island of Jersey in the English Channel."

Dorothy Black

DOROTHY BLACK (The Duke and the Girl, page 54) reports: "My home is in Scotland; my second home is aboard ship—any ship—going anywhere. I have crossed the Indian Ocean more than twenty times and my Atlantic crossings are increasing. I lived in Burma for many years. My grandparents were German, Irish and Swedish. I married a Scotchman and my daughter, June, married a rancher and lives in the United States' far West."

CONDENSED NOVEL COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

56	The Yellow Brick Road	Elizabeth Cadell

STORIES

52	A Country Tale	Isak Dinesen
54	The Duke and the Girl	Dorothy Black
60	The Cup	Margaret Russell

SPECIAL FEATURES

11	Our Remarkable Presidency	Dorothy Thompson
22	When Someone Close to a Child Dies	Benjamin Spock, M.D.
28	Tell Me, Doctor	Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D.
37	Children Need Someplace to Go and Something to Do
37	Youngsters Outdoors	Margaret Hickey
58	Jack Kennedy: Democratic Dynamo	Joan Younger
62	Who Is Dr. Spock?	Hildegarde Dolson
74	Teenage Secret Marriage Epidemic	Betty Coe Spicer
84	Can This Marriage Be Saved?	Dorothy Cameron Disney
85	Testing Time for Talent	Pat Boone
90	When Is a Dream Car!	Abner Dean
176	How America Lives: Rich Beyond Measure	Glenn Matthew White

GENERAL FEATURES

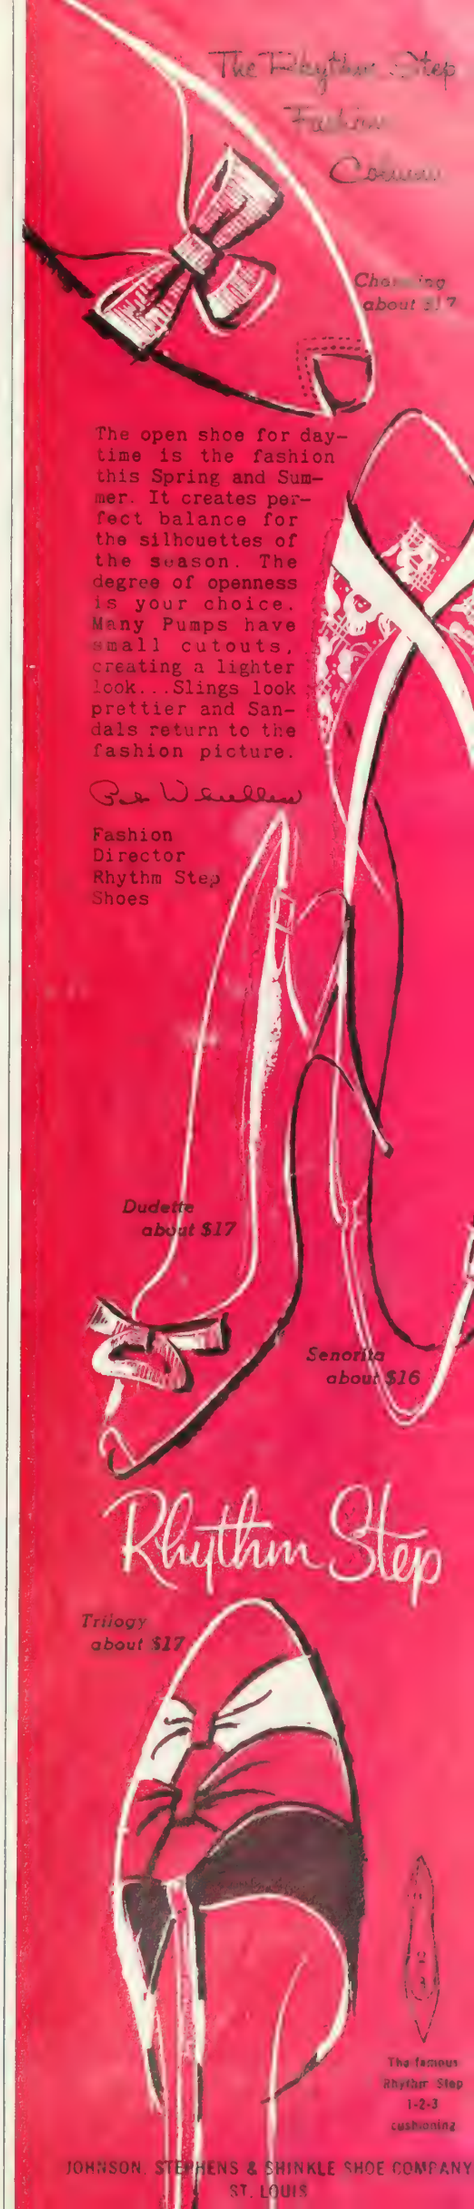
4	Letters Our Readers Write Us
21	Under Cover	Bernardine Kielty
42	There's a Man in the House	Harlan Miller
46	Making Marriage Work	Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D.
51	Fifty Years Ago Journal About Town
108	This Is a Medicine Meddler	Munro Leaf
151	Ask Any Woman	Marcelene Cox

FASHION AND BEAUTY

76	Fashions to Love in the Spring	Wilhela Cushman
80	The Journal's Five-Star Wardrobe	Ruth Mary Packard
82	"When I See it in the Journal I Make it for Myself"	Nora O'Leary
86	From a Problem Skin to "How Pretty You Look!"	Dawn Crowell Norman
147	How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!	Bet Hart

FOOD AND HOMEMAKING

49	Corinne Griffith's Cookbook	Corinne Griffith
64	Unforgettable Kitchens	Margaret Davidson
92	"When I Entertain,"	Mrs. Laurance Rockefeller as told to Nancy Crawford Wood
94	Appleyard Family Favorites	Elizabeth Kent Gay



INTERIOR DECORATION

88	A Completely New Look . . . And it Cost Only $354.20	Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland

POEMS

Heritage in Spice, Jessie Farnham 27 • A Small March Song, Virginia Linton 33 • Listening Sleep, Shirley Willard Chamberlin 40 • On Waiting for the Birth of a Child, Norman Levine 104 • Wild White Beach Plum, Dionis Coffin Riggs 106 • And Be Not There, Richard F. Armknecht 111 • One's Own Child in a Recital, Virginia Scott Miner 124 • At Long Last, Kay Owens 137 • To Ella: When We Were Twelve Years Old, William Stafford 157 • Animal Stamina, Janet Henry 169 • Song at Fifteen, Jean Carpenter Mergard 195

COVER PHOTOGRAPH BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

CHANGE OF ADDRESS. At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent. • Ladies' Home Journal, © 1960 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Second-class postage paid at Philadelphia, Pa., and at additional mailing offices. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada. The names of characters in stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence. Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; Pan American Countries—1 Yr., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice. Additional Guaranty. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications previously mailed. The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Donald M. Hobart, Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; E. Huber Ulrich, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Ford F. Johnson, Sr. Vice Pres. and Manager, Business Department; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Maurice S. Gould, Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, Holiday and The American Home.

Printed in U. S. A.

SPAM® DANDY OVEN DINNERS!

SPAM 'N EGG SUPPER CASSEROLE

Easy to fix in the morning . . . pop in the oven after a "day out"!

Cook, drain 5-6 oz. wide egg noodles. Spread in broad, shallow casserole. Cover with cut-up hard cooked eggs (4-6). Pour on 1 can cream of celery soup blended with 1 c. milk and ½ c. grated cheese. Top with 1 can SPAM, sliced then cut in triangles. Garnish with sliced, stuffed olives. Bake 30 min. at 350°.

PLANTATION SPAM-BAKE

Flavory SPAM . . . atop delicious cornbread!

Mix and bake cornbread according to directions on package of Betty Crocker Corn Muffin Mix. After baking only 10 min. quickly top with SPAM slices. They should settle slightly into top of bread. Brush the cornbread with butter or sprinkle with cinnamon and sugar. Return to oven and bake about 10 min. more, or until done.

Because it's made from sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham (choice meat . . . rich in protein) only SPAM tastes like SPAM

NOW MARKETED IN CANADA

HORMEL

SPAM is the registered trademark for a pure pork product packed only by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., General Offices, Austin, Minn., U.S.A.

LETTERS our readers write us

CALIFORNIA

THOSE "PROBLEM" ARTICLES

Dear Editors: Your fiction is fine, the food is wonderful, and I shouldn't like to miss a single article of Dorothy's. But, can't we dispense with some of the tiresome stuff on marriage problems, sex and obesity? I have had marital difficulties for over twenty years (same husband). My sex life is far from perfect. I am constantly at war with about five pounds around my middle. But I have learned to lead a busy, happy life in spite of these things. I can even forget about them for days, and then another JOURNAL arrives and I am reminded that life is not Utopia and that human beings are subject to foibles.

A subscriber for a quarter of a century

Napa

● Many people tell us that our discussions help them to look at their lives more realistically and honestly—and, often, to find lasting solutions. ED.

NORTH CAROLINA

WRITE THE NETWORKS!

Dear Editors: The JOURNAL gives housewives credit for being intelligent. Why can't radio do the same? Nine-to-five programs, which I'm quite sure are heard primarily by housewives, are a series of repeated ads, repeated records, repeated news and repeated anecdotes. (I'm ignoring the alternative of turning to soap operas.)

I wish programmers would take: (1) a look at your format; (2) a few hints from it. Sincerely,

Greensboro MAUDE POTTER

NEW JERSEY

THAT WONDERFUL CORNELL BREAD

Dear Sir: I tried hard, but I thought I would never learn to make good bread. Then I wrote to the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

Well, tell the lady that sent me that bread recipe I am so thankful. This morning I studied the recipe, made the bread and it turned out wonderful. Oh, how happy I am! Respectfully,

Jersey City MRS. MERRILL JOHNSON

● In her enthusiasm, Mrs. Johnson sent us a sample. She's learned well. ED.

KENTUCKY

DO OUR SCHOOLS TEACH DISHONESTY?

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: When I entered high school I believed every thing that would help me to become an educated man must come from books. Through many and varied experiences I have learned that, while books are helpful, they do not necessarily make a man wise. Something from each of us must rub off on the other. Getting educated is a lifetime process.

This year I have visited several schools and observed many youth. Teaching facts and skills which help one to earn a living is still as good to day as it was when I was in school. But something more than teaching youth to make a living must be stressed now.

In this second half of the twentieth century we need to teach that which goes far beyond personal security, a full stomach and a fine automobile. We have boasted too loud and too long about our high standards of living. Shouldn't we aim also, and primarily, for high moral standards, for honesty—in a word, for character? We who are older should set a better example for youth to follow.

To me, good character includes many basic human qualities, such as honesty, fair play, tolerance and, maybe, mercy and love. If a boy is the most brilliant student in his class, but lacks character—that is, if he is dishonest, if he will lie, cheat and steal—his education is of little value. If it serves only to sharpen the wits of a scoundrel, it is harmful.

Recently a young man came to me wanting a recommendation to a college where he could play basketball. I knew the boy personally and promised that I would recommend him. He was the type of player who could pull his team up when it was behind. He was dependable. He never smoked, drank or broke a training rule. When he liked a subject, he could make A's. If it was a required subject and he didn't like it he would fail it, despite his love for basketball.

I visited his high school to find out about his grades. They were good. They were just what he had told me they were when he asked me to recommend him. But while talking to teachers in his high school I learned that this young man and other athletes had been taken from regular classes when

CONTINUED ON PAGE

Try any Lipton Soup and get ovenproof set of 6 LIPTON SOUP MUGS just $2

Green Pea. Smoky ham 'n bacon taste with proteins in every gulp! Makes a whole meal when you add chopped-up franks or meat bits!

Chicken Noodle. Livelier chicken flavor, golden, plump noodles. 3¢ a mug makes a mere sandwich lunch a warm-up feast!

Beef Noodle. Country vegetables in rich beef broth. Use a spoon to get every last fresh-cooked, "never soggy" Lipton noodle!

Onion. Browned onions in saucy beef stock. Serve Gourmet style, topped with toast and parmesan cheese. And what a virtuoso at dips!

Tomato Vegetable. Succulent bits of Red Bell Peppers and soup greens in a tangy tomato broth with right-from-the-garden flavor!

New! Lipton Soup Mugs. Set of six 12-ounce mugs in gay bonbon colors. Ovenproof. Jolly way to cook and serve popovers, muffins!

Only from LIPTON

home cooked taste the new mix way

Set of 6 Lipton Soup Mugs—heavy ovenproof ware. $4.50 retail value! Now just $2.00 and top of any Lipton Soup Mix box. (Get your $2.00 back if not delighted.)

Good only in U.S.A. and its possessions

LIPTON SOUP, Box 5830, St. Paul 4, Minn.

I enclose $2.00 (check or money order) and top of any Lipton Soup Mix box. Please send set of 6 Soup Mugs in "mixed" bonbon colors.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

more time for living with a KitchenAid dishwasher

This new KitchenAid portable dishwasher goes to work the very day you buy it—hooks up in seconds...washes complete service for ten (NEMA standards)...gives you more time for living. You have no installation costs, no cabinet changes.

Best of all, the KitchenAid features the exclusive Hobart revolving power wash—proved the most effective in any dishwasher because of its soil-stripping, high-velocity water pattern. It's the double-wall portable, porcelain inside and out, designed for quietness, cleanliness and lasting beauty.

For the finest made, ask your dealer to show you the dishwasher with the big, blue, lifetime wash arm—KitchenAid. Whether you choose a portable or built-in, there's a KitchenAid for every kitchen—ready to do your dishes automatically. Write Department KL-P, The Hobart Manufacturing Co., Troy, Ohio. (In Canada, write Hobart, 175 George Street, Toronto 2.)

KitchenAid® by Hobart

World's Largest Manufacturer of Food, Kitchen and Dishwashing Machines

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

they were taught by reliable, fair and qualified teachers, and put in special classes to receive special instructions from the superintendent and coach. This information actually sickened me.

Now, I cannot blame the boy—but a school superintendent who gives his regular teachers the runaround in order to qualify athletes is dishonest. Look how many pupils he is giving an unfair deal! In this particular school, when the matter was reported to higher authorities and an investigation started the teachers' grade books were stolen. What can be a more deadly sin than dishonesty with youth, especially when a superintendent, coach or teacher is dishonest?

Not long ago I helped judge a poetry contest in which poems were submitted by Southern high-school youth from several states. The third poem I picked up startled me. Someone had copied Robert Frost's "Passing By the Woods on a Snowy Evening," to be found in many high-school literature books, and sent it in as his own. I found several other less well-known poems had been copied and submitted. How badly youth in our elementary and secondary schools—yes, and in our colleges and universities—need character. Teachers should take time—more time—to stress honesty above trying to make all A's or win all the games.

How could a seventeen-year-old boy think he would "get by" in a contest by submitting a poem written by Robert Frost as one of his own? Didn't he, at seventeen, know that Robert Frost is a great American poet and this was one of his most often reprinted poems? Did he actually think he could steal it and win a prize?

In one of my high schools' graduating classes, the boy who was valedictorian in a class of eighty-five was offered a $300 scholarship. The boy who was at the bottom of the class was offered a $7600 scholarship to play football. How many ballplayers have received as presents an automobile? Do you know of anybody being given one for academic excellence? How many coaches have received valuable gifts for coaching a winning team? Tell me of one hard-working, honest teacher who has received similar gifts. It is not difficult for anyone to observe what we emphasize!

We have men in high places in our school system with no more backbone or character than a jellyfish. We have basketball coaches who tell their players to step on the other man's toes. We have teachers who close their eyes to a swiped poem, hoping the pupil will get by with it and accept a false honor in which she or he will share. If this isn't tragic, then there isn't any tragedy in our land.

I know we were a rough-and-ready lot when I was in high school, but we were not accorded special treatment for being athletes. Not one of us would have dared to copy anything and hand it in as our own. Character was needed then, and it had to be built as it must

CONTINUED ON PAGE 8

Clearly your best moisturizer

When your hands are rough, red and dry, dermatologists say they lack moisture, not natural oils. Chamberlain's clear Golden Touch Hand Lotion contains not one but two of the most effective humectants known to science. Humectants are amazing clear fluids which control the delicate moisture balance of your skin by preventing the evaporation of vital skin moisture.

The secret of soft, smooth, lovely hands is moisture balance. Get clear, moisturizing Chamberlain's Hand Lotion today. At all toiletry counters.

CHAMBERLAIN'S
Clearly your best hand lotion

HANG FIXTURES SECURELY...USE MOLLY SCREW ANCHORS and JACK NUTS

PERFECT FASTENERS to hold anything on walls, floors, ceilings

With Molly you can install fixtures exactly where you want . . . not just where studs are. Won't pull through. Spider backing reinforces area in which used. Fixtures can be removed and replaced in same anchor. Easy to install without disfiguring wall. Inexpensive, guaranteed. Ask your hardware dealer for genuine Molly . . . the name is stamped on the cap.

New JACK NUTS HOLD IN HOLLOW-CORE FLUSH DOORS

Now you can fasten fixtures securely to flush doors! Jack Nuts need only ⅜" expansion space, grip any material up to ¾" thick.

SEND $1.00 FOR SAMPLE BOX OF 12

EXPANDS BEHIND WALL
MOLLY CORPORATION
206 N. 5TH ST., READING, PA.

Enclosed is $1.00 for sample box of (check one) ☐ Mollys ☐ Jack Nuts

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ ZONE ____ STATE ____

BE REALLY REFRESHED... AROUND THE CLOCK!

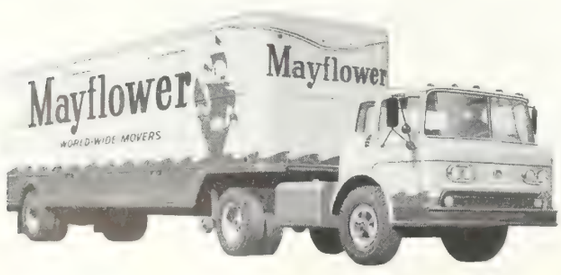
RECIPE: Broil frozen rock lobster tails on hibachi or table grill until they are nicely browned. Make a tangy oriental butter sauce by adding a few drops of hot pepper sauce to melted butter. Serve lobster tails with butter sauce, slice of lime, crinkle-cut frozen French fries and lettuce and tomato. Serve with ice-cold Coke.

KING-REGULAR

At dinner time...serve this Seafood Barbecue along with King Size Coke and be really refreshed! Only Coca-Cola gives you that cheerful lift...that cold crisp taste that makes good food more savory. Sign of Good Taste

COPYRIGHT © 1960 THE COCA-COLA COMPANY TRADE MARK

another Mayflower customer reports:



"even the piano was in tune!"

"We were really amazed to find everything so clean and in such perfect condition, after its long trip from Philadelphia to Spokane, Washington!"

Of course we can't promise that your piano will be in tune, but it will get tender care and protection when it's moved the Mayflower Way. Mayflower packers and loaders are "Accredited" experts—specially trained to move your valuable possessions.

Fragile pieces are carefully wrapped and packed in shock-resistant materials and containers. Furniture and major appliances are individually cushioned and protected with clean, soft padded covers. Experienced movers personally supervise the loading in modern Mayflower vans, so that everything rides safely. To make your next move easy and worry-free, call your local exclusive Mayflower warehouse agent!

AERO MAYFLOWER TRANSIT COMPANY, INC., INDIANAPOLIS

America's Most Recommended Mover

Your Mayflower agent is a leading warehouseman in your city. He explains service, estimates costs, makes all arrangements. Find him under "Moving."

world-wide service

In all 50 states and Canada . . . overseas by ship or plane . . . our responsibility all the way!

new, higher standard of service

Only Mayflower men are "accredited"—qualified and kept up-to-date by special study, training and tests.

exclusive, "packed with pride" service

Safeguards all your items, even the most fragile, with special Mayflower methods and materials.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6

be built in every generation, but I haven't read of a time or place when character building needed revitalization as it does in our schools today.

Sincerely,
Greenup — JESSE STUART

MASSACHUSETTS

CHIVALRY DEAD?

Dear Editors: This morning I stood next to a well-dressed man on the bus; when the seat next to us was vacated, he sat down! The age of chivalry is dead, but need we dispense with all courtesy? Sincerely,
Boston — CAROLYN GARDINER

PENNSYLVANIA

IT TASTES SO GOOD!

To the Editor: I am surprised at the recipe for Honey Crème in a recent JOURNAL. Part of the directions read "cook over low heat, stirring constantly . . . this will take about 1¼ hours." Now do you believe any homemaker has time like that to spare? Especially after you run articles on the harried young homemaker!

Very truly yours,
Easton — MRS. ELIN SCHULTZ

● Well, Honey Crème is a special treat. For grandmothers to make—or while the baby is taking a nap? ED.

WASHINGTON

IT BURNS ME UP!

Dear Editors: No wonder intelligent women by the thousands are leaving the role of "just a housewife" for offices, factories and many other outside jobs. The world in general gives the housewife so little consideration!

For the hundredth time in the past few months I as a housewife have not been treated with the courtesy considered essential in business relations. Tradesmen, servicemen all seem to feel that a housewife has nothing to do which would prevent her waiting for hours, so they do not inform her of delays. (If I knew that the washer serviceman could not possibly call until next Tuesday because three of his crew were ill, I would gladly send out my laundry. But no; he says he will be here tomorrow—so I stay home waiting for him, and am scorned if I complain.)

No business would long continue relations with such service, and yet a homemaker has a schedule which would baffle many businessmen. It is not easy to be chambermaid, laundress, cook, baker, chauffeur, purchasing agent and public-relations director. However, if the persons with whom we deal would respect our "office hours" and afford us the courtesy of informing us of necessary delays (as they do businessmen), they would find us much happier and more tolerant. Sincerely,
Seattle — MRS. ROLLIE R. JONES

PY-O-MY BROWNIE Mix?

Py-O-My is the original Brownie mix. Its old time flavor is unique. So is the handy aluminum pan it comes in. Makes chewy or cake-type brownies. Kids love eating and making them! Serve this week. Most grocers have Py-O-My.

15th Anniversary Saving!

Polly Flex
HOUSEWARES
Dishpan, Drainboard

Long Lasting—In Lovely Colors

Won't become soggy or fade. Insist on Republic's Dishpan and Drainboard for top value. At Hardware, Housewares, Department Stores. © 1960

REPUBLIC
MOLDING CORPORATION
6465 N. Avondale • Chicago 31, Ill.

During March
EACH $1.79
Reg. Price Ea. $1.98

As vintage is to champag

VIRGIN is to olive oil

The natural flavor of the fruit—that's POMPEIAN Virgin Olive Oil. First press only of the choicest olives. Far tastier salads, meat, fish, fowl. Specify Pompeian!

MORE PEOPLE USE
refreshing, calorie-free

Sugarine
LIQUID SWEETENER

SWEETER THAN SUGA
YET NO FOOD VALU

Recommended by doctors fo diabetics, overweights and lo-ca orie diets. Use for beverage desserts, cooking. Pure. Harmles

USE-TESTED McCall's

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 oz.–

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHER

Going to Build

25¢ brings you Aladdin Readi-Cut Home Pla Book with 115 Modern Plans to choose fro You can save up to $5,000. Write Dept. 60-5

THE ALADDIN CO. Bay City, Mic

For m-m-marvelous meatless meals—Borden's Fine Cheeses

BORDEN'S CHATEAU—all family cheese food of 100 uses

There's no end to the delicious ways you can use Borden's CHATEAU—the first and finest cheese food ever made. Melts to a creamy richness. Slices clean and easy for sandwiches or snacks.

Here's one suggestion for a hearty, meatless main dish: make your favorite tuna salad. Heap on bun. Top with zesty CHATEAU and pop under the broiler.

And CHATEAU is nourishing for children. 1½-oz. serving of Borden's CHATEAU provides more essential protein, plus other vitamin and mineral benefits than an 8-oz. glass of whole milk!

Get Borden's CHATEAU in the money-saving 2-lb. loaf! Featured at your food store now!

BORDEN'S PARMESAN and ROMANO—greatest flavor upper since salt and pepper

Keep a canister of this zippy grated cheese right on your table.

Borden's Parmesan and Romano peps up everyday dishes, as well as adding true Italian flavor to your favorite Italian recipes.

It's doubly delicious because Borden's combines two superb Italian cheeses to make the finest grated cheese ever: Parmesan (dry, sharp, aged fourteen months) and costly, full-bodied Romano. You'll like it better because two are better than one!

BORDEN'S FINE CHEESES
very big on flavor

© The Borden Co.

There are two kinds of catsup: Snider's...and all the others!

Snider's is different because we simmer-in a whisper of Capsicum, the high-spirited chili pepper. It puts the zing in Snider's, gives food a bright new lift. You already know what the others taste like. Now, try Snider's.

Snider's

the chili pepper catsup

Desert spring is bright and brief as a rainbow. Cactus wears a rakish flower crown, and pools of golden poppies reflect the sun.

Our Remarkable Presidency

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

When I was a college student on the eve of World War I—yes, that long ago—a lecturer came to the campus who spoke favorably about the Germans. All I can remember of the address is the speaker's statement that the President of the United States had considerably greater powers than did the German kaiser.

The statement shocked me, though later I was to realize that, dependent upon the personality of the President and how much power he chooses to use, the speaker was right—right when he made the statement and even more right today. No head of state in the world has as much power as the President of the United States. The President's powers were great initially, and as our institutions have developed they have expanded. As we are engaged this year in nominating and electing another candidate to this supreme office, it may be appropriate to think a little about these powers.

As chief of the Cabinet the President has the function of a Prime Minister; but unlike a Prime Minister, he cannot be removed from office by an adverse vote of Parliament or by a shift during his term of office in parliamentary representation. A Republican President may have a preponderantly Democratic Congress, but short of impeachment he remains in power at least until another national election.

He is the head of his party, hence of a faction—a position not envisioned originally—but he is, at the same time the symbol of national unity, the head of the state and the leader of the whole people. In that respect he stands above party and faction and has many of the attributes of a king. Indeed, his office has been compared to an elective kingship. But kings in the modern world "reign but do not govern." The President both reigns and, within constitutional limits, he governs.

He is the administrative chief of the nation and as such directly presides over the most vast administrative apparatus in the world. As of June, 1958, the Administration had 2,382,237 civilian employees in 65 departments. The President is commander in chief of the nation's armed forces. This puts another 2,500,000 men under his control. He also commands the militia of the states when they are called into national service. With nearly 5,000,000 persons in the Administration and the armed forces, the President commands, however indirectly, 7 per cent of the total labor force of the country.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor:
Mary Bass

Associate Editors:
Wilhela Cushman
William E. Fink
Louella G. Shouer
Mary Lea Page
Dawn Crowell Norman
Margaret Davidson
Nora O'Leary
Glenn Matthew White
Donald Stuart
Helen Everitt
Peter Briggs
Anne Einselen
Margaret Parton
Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland
Geraldine Rhoads
Nancy Crawford Wood
William McCleery
John H. Brenneman
Jean Todd Freeman
Nelle Keys Bell
Betty Coe Spicer
Neal Gilkyson Stuart

Contributing Editors:
Richard Pratt
Laura Lou Brookman
Hugh MacNair Kahler
Bernardine Kielty
Margaret Hickey
Gladys Denny Shultz
Barbara Benson
Elizabeth McFarland

Editorial Associates:
John Werner
Ruth Mary Packard
Ruth Shapley Matthews
Joseph Di Pietro
Elizabeth Goetsch
Eileen Sharpe
Virginia Price
Joyce Posson
Elizabeth Hart
Dorothy Anne Robinson
Albert Serwazi
Liane Waite
Abbot Mills

Assistant Editors:
Victoria Harris
Alice Kastberg
Dorothy Markinko
Jean Anderson
Joan Huse Cornog
Grant Harris
Jean McClory

Editorial Assistants:
Lee Stowell Cullen
Hazel Owen
Helen Olchvary
Sally Platt
Mary Jane Engel
Frances Johansson
Mary Lee Jones
Janet M. Boe
Kathleen McDonald
Judith Harkison
Ann Blackmar
Carole O'Brien
Elaine Ward-Hanna

NOW! A 'DOUBLE PLAY'...

Most famous 'Double Play,' with Sta-Up-Top®. #147. White, Black, Pink Pearl, Blue Pearl, Beige. Matching pantie, #148. Either, $3.95. Famous A'Lure® bra. #1045. Same colors. $3.95.

Feather-light freedom in Warner's® briefest 'Double Play' pantie. #133. White, Black, Pink Pearl, Blue Pearl, Beige. $5.95. 'Double Play' bra with criss-cross bands to lift and round you. #2369. White. $2.50.

Average leg pantie with slimming back panel. Perfect for active figures. #233. Matching girdle, #232. Each, in White, $6.95. 'Double Play' bra. $2.50.

All-over slimming made magically comfortable, thanks to Warner's exclusive Free-Lift® feature. Bra is detached beneath cups to eliminate shoulder strap strain. #3706. White. $15.00.

to make every body beautiful! Choose yours here...from $5.95

'DOUBLE PLAY': Criss-cross bands put the ~~HEX~~ on tummy bulge!

Happy you! Your hunt-and-fret days of girdle choosing are over! Now 'Double Play'—Warner's sure way to a slimmer you—comes in 28 fashion-inspired styles. Why settle for a fit, a comfort less than perfect—when there's a 'Double Play' exactly right for your figure? Some with midriff-shaping Sta-Up-Top! Some with hip-slimming side panels; all with flattening back panels! All lengths of panties, too. And those criss-cross bands trim tummy bulge away so gently, you'll never feel t inches disappear! Prices start at a low $5.95—even for colors!

New and Young from Warner's

New! Warner Wash! [illegible] their looks. It's Warner's gentle-formula cold water soap. Get Warner Wash where you buy your Warner's. $1.50 for 10 ful

More than meets the eye! How openly flattering can a pretty sling be? What seems no more than a pair of pretty straps poised on a slim, fashionable heel is really a shoe that supports you gently with its all-but-unseen vinyl panel, its cushioned hidden platform. And adding to the delight of the eye-catching La Scala is its famous Red Cross Shoe fit that makes it feel as if made for your foot alone. Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from, 10.95 to 14.95

THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO • THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

Congress votes all appropriations, but the President's office prepares the budget. At present it amounts to $81,736,000,000—well over a fifth of the national income.

Constitutionally, Congress alone has the power to "declare" war. Actually, war comes or is avoided by the day-to-day operations of foreign policy, and this, except for the Senate's right to accept or reject diplomatic appointments, is in the hands of the President.

The President, as commander in chief and as effective prosecutor of the war in the diplomatic and military fields, also has the power to form policies which may prolong or shorten a war once it has started. The doctrine of "unconditional surrender" enunciated by F.D.R. at Casablanca made a fight to a military finish inevitable—provided the Allied forces had the masses of their people with them. Because the pronunciamento came when the tide of the war was running in the Allied favor, there was little opposition to it, although it had, from the viewpoint of this writer, who opposed it at the time, serious political consequences.

In the field of foreign relations the President negotiates treaties. These must be ratified by the Senate, but actually our relations with other nations are regulated less and less by formal treaties and more and more by agreements between heads of states or their foreign ministers which require no ratification by the Senate. Few of those postwar arrangements which have been the genesis of the subsequent Cold War with Russia took the form of treaties. They were made in a series of summit conferences in Casablanca, Quebec, Tehran, Yalta, Potsdam, and so on. In addition there are United Nations agreements, also entirely in the hands of the executive, which, without being treaties as provided in the Constitution, have the effect of treaties.

The powers of the President have always been supreme in foreign relations. But the United States has not always had so many foreign relations as now. Certainly we have not had the present form of personal "summit" diplomacy, which is altogether new. The President's trip this past winter to many of the capitals of the earth raises the question of how much further extension of powers and, at the same time, possible dissipation of them the office can stand. Certainly these personal appearances and interventions should be used sparingly when at all, lest the great symbol of the American community as a whole become altogether too commonplace.

Both externally and internally the powers of the President have always flourished and expanded in crises. Ours has been a generation of crisis: the depression with which F.D.R.'s Administration began and which plagued it intermittently until the country began arming in earnest; the World War; the Korean War; the uninterrupted rivalry with the Soviets and with Red China; the unsuccessful attempt to win over the uncommitted nations; internally the unresolved agricultural crisis; persistent inflation; and the eruption of the South as the result of the Supreme Court decision to desegregate the schools—to mention but a few.

All these facets of crisis have increased the responsibilities and the powers of the presidency. The Department of Agriculture must deal with the agricultural crisis of ever-expanding surpluses, although Congress and pressures from the agricultural states and various farm organizations and industries catering to farmers make it almost impossible to formulate and carry out a rational policy. Inflation can be combated by fiscal policies, but not successfully without the co-operation of labor and management, neither of whom can be coerced. The Supreme Court, according to Judge Learned Hand, assumed the prerogatives of a third legislative chamber in making it the law that any colored pupil must be granted the right to study in hitherto white public schools, and the President, who is charged to enforce the laws, must also seek means to enforce this one, a formidable enforcement problem.

The New Deal, under Franklin Roosevelt's leadership, made one single drastic constitutional revolution: it established that responsibility for the functioning of the national economy rested with the Federal Government, and, in the nature of the powers, upon t executive and the presidency. The functioni of the economy must, in a democracy, be r sponsible to the popular will, and the popul will demands full employment. Obvious Congress cannot assure full employment l passing a law; it requires policies framed in t Executive Department.

The President, overburdened by cares a demands of office, must meet the press eve week during a large part of the year and n only have to answer ad lib the questions rain upon him, but do it under the glare of tel vision lights. Every hesitation, stumbling temporary admission of ignorance is record for millions to hear and see.

This condition of being perpetually in t public eye also expands, for better or wors the influence of the presidency. If the majori of the people, or a large minority, should f to have confidence in the President, the cou try could be in a condition of serious disunit

Although some Presidents have receiv their chief popularity and support by a c alescence of minority groups, even they mu steer a wary course in order not to alienate a larger group. Every presidential lion must l to some extent a fox. Theories have therefo grown up among professional politicians—ar it is these who pick the candidates—about t "ideal" candidate. Mr. Eric Sevareid, in t introduction to Candidates 1960, which he al edited,* names nine traditional ideal conc tions: 1—previous public service; 2—prefe ably experience as a governor; 3—from a lar state with an electoral vote that might be d cisive; 4—a Northerner; 5—not too close identified with any one economic group su as labor or management; 6—a happy fam life; 7—from a small town in preference to big metropolis; 8—of Anglo-Saxon stock; an 9—Protestant.

To a quick question, give a slow answer.

ITALIAN PROVERB

Actually the only candidate who fulfills a these conditions, except that he has not been governor—more than offset by having bee a senator and Vice President—is Richar Nixon. But all these conditions are by n means as telling now as they once were. Pre ident Eisenhower never held a public offic but was a war hero. One may well argue (a Mr. Sevareid does) that, in today's world, e perience in the Senate, especially in its mo important committees, is better preparatio for the presidency than any governorship. candidate need not come from a state with large electoral vote in order to carry it. Tru man, from Missouri, defeated Dewey, fro New York, against all the bets!

Although the South, and especially Virgini has given us some of our most revered state men, no President has come from there sinc the Civil War. But among the possible Dem cratic candidates this year, and one popula both north and south and even with som Republicans and numerous independents, Senator Lyndon Johnson of Texas—hardly Northerner.

To be too closely identified with either labo or management is still a handicap on a na tional scale. The American people are nc class-conscious, and especially not in times c prosperity. They want full employment and a much of the welfare state as we now have, bu labor leaders have never been able to gover the voting of American workers. They hav no objection to benevolent millionaires; th Squire of Hyde Park was the idol of the masses and Nelson Rockefeller, had he not withdraw from the race and had he received the nomina tion, would have attracted many workingmen On the other hand, to have a consistent anti labor record would make one ineligible.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 1

Candidates 1960*, edited by Eric Sevareid (studies c Rockefeller, Nixon, Humphrey, Kennedy, Stevenso Symington, Lyndon Johnson and a few dark horses Basic Books, $4.95. Recommended to all who want t know a little more about the candidates than they wi learn from their supporters or opponents.

the art of stepping on crow's feet or TUSSY EYE CREAM
the specially rich way to care for that specially dry area
Footprints in the sands of time are strictly for the birds. Let Tussy Eye Cream help shoo away your "crow's feet"!
Almost everybody has very delicate, dry skin around the eyes. But Tussy Eye Cream is rather highbrow . . . it's specially blended for loving action . . . to pamper this area that needs extra-special, gentle care.
Wear Eye Cream to bed every night . . . under, around and on the lids of your eyes. Smooth it in gently—it leaves a glow, not grease. A jar that will put stars in your eyes for many moons is just $1.00. Larger size, $1.75, plus tax.
Morrow
TUSSY cares for you
© 1959 TUSSY, 445 PARK AVENUE, NEW YORK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

It is doubtful whether the happy family life has the force it once did, and whether the continual publicizing of the same cuts as much ice as the public-relations men think. Our people, also, have become increasingly urban and sophisticated; even the small towns are more urban and sophisticated; one thinks of Nixon as coming from California rather than Whittier and of Stevenson from Chicago rather than Libertyville.

And President Eisenhower, who could have become President on either ticket, is not of Anglo-Saxon but of German stock.

The question of whether a Catholic could become President is an issue this year because of the candidacy of Senator John F. Kennedy.

The United States is still predominantly a Protestant country, though there is much more interreligious tolerance than there was a generation ago. We have also had in the White House a number of official Protestants whose churchgoing days started or were resumed only with the presidency. But the anti-Catholic prejudice has by no means died out. A Catholic candidate, no matter what his qualities, would, I should guess, lose an indeterminate number of votes on that ground alone. Senator Kennedy has been a darling of the public-opinion polls; he is popular with women, and he is a thorough extrovert. These might overcome the religious handicap (if it is one) as well as the impression he gives of youth.

Attractive as his youthfulness is—and deceptive, for he is a mature man—I am personally inclined to think it a handicap even in an otherwise youth-worshiping society. People, I think, are more likely to vote for a father-image for President than for a son-image, if only because the office is so august and awesome. Our first President was called "The Father of His Country"; the founders are called "Founding Fathers"; the symbol of a country is "fatherland" (or motherland). One thinks of the father as older, wiser and above oneself, and so do most men and women like to think of the President.

> I will study and get ready and perhaps my chance may come.
>
> ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Among the six presidential candidates in the running as I write, only two are predominantly introverted. They are the two most hostile to each other: Nixon and Stevenson.

Introverts are more likely to be controversial than extroverts because they are harder to understand. Their real personalities are not on the surface. They often appear contradictory. Richard Nixon is a brooder, one who is often "bottled up" inside. He believes more in destiny than in the power of his own will. He is extremely ambitious, but he does not always welcome the fruits of his ambition, nor think that by ambition he has achieved them.

If I am right that it is essential that the President enjoy a high degree of confidence from nearly everybody, this militates against Nixon. He is greatly admired; by some he is distrusted, and even detested by others; and he is apparently loved by very few. He has few if any intimate friends outside his own family circle. He has considerable wit, but he lacks the more winsome attribute of humor.

Stevenson is also predominantly an introvert, and highly complex. He has never really succeeded in convincing the electorate that he wants to be President—though if he is nominated and runs for the third time it would seem to be proof that he does. The probability is that he does and he doesn't. Probably no candidate is more aware that the burdens, responsibilities, glamors and cares of the presidency are beyond the powers of any man completely or adequately to discharge. And probably no candidate takes them more seriously.

In most introverts there is a melancholic strain. There was in Lincoln and there is in Nixon and Stevenson. It is hard to say which

CONTINUED ON PAGE 18

brighter "happier" haircolor—

Your beautician will tell you: the "secret" of beautiful haircolor is a natural look that glows with highlights—the look that Roux can bring to your hair. For Roux will give you brighter, happier haircolor, whether you want to color gray or brighten dull natural color or try dramatic blonde lightening—whether you want lasting new beauty or color effects you can wash right out!

Roux, you see, is a complete family of haircolorings: temporary rinses, hair lighteners, lasting tints and color shampoos. And one of these fine cosmetics is designed specifically for your haircolor need—designed to give you the loveliest hair of your life!

ROUX®

"AMERICA'S FIRST FAMILY OF HAIRCOLORINGS"

LASTING HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR SHAMPOO
CREME HAIR TINT
TEMPORARY HAIRCOLORINGS
CREME COLOR RINSE
COLOR RINSE (POWDER)
COLOR CURL HAIR SPRAY
HAIR CRAYON
HAIR LIGHTENERS
CREME HAIR LIGHTENER
RAPID HAIR LIGHTENER
CREME COLORTONER
AND FOR YOUR HAIR CARE
CREME SHAMPOO
CREME RINSE
CREME HAIRDRESSING

AT BETTER BEAUTY SALONS AND COSMETIC COUNTERS EVERYWHERE.

Secret Hug: wire lift without wire or under band via non-press, non-slip latex ribbon in cup $5. For store, free booklet write Olga, Dept J30, 7915 Haskell, Van Nuys, Cal. pat. pend.

OPPORTUNITY

If you want extra money and have spare time to put to use, this is for you! You can spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earn generous commissions.

Just send us your name and address on a postal card. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss. Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Write that postal today. Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
200 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa

FREE Vacation Guide to TENNESSEE

Colorful booklet tells all about the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, Tennessee's 22 Great Lakes and water sports, historic shrines including the homes of 3 presidents, fine family accommodations — everything you need to plan a wonderful vacation!

40 PAGES — 116 PICTURES

MAIL COUPON TODAY

TENNESSEE DIVISION OF INFORMATION
2173 Cordell Hull Building, Nashville, Tenn.
Please send Free Vacation Guide
NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY & STATE_____

©1960 BY SIMMONS CO. MDSE. MART, CHICAGO, ILL.

E SAFARI INFLUENCE, exciting new look for today's colorful homes and apartments, enting the simple beauty of a modern Hide-A-Bed . . . available everywhere, in the er shown, for immediate delivery . . . or covered to order in your choice of more than fashion fabrics. Only Hide-A-Bed gives you a sofa designed to look like a sofa s a bed that sleeps like a bed . . . because Hide-A-Bed is made by Simmons, creator of the world-famous Beautyrest mattress. You get more sitting comfort on Beautyrest cushions, more sleeping comfort on a Simmons super-size mattress, and authentic Simmons styling for fashionable living. Choose from modern, traditional and contemporary styles in Hide-A-Bed—the sofa with a guest room inside. Your local store will have your choice custom-covered and delivered to your home on easiest credit terms.

New Fashions in living with Hide-A-Bed

the only convertible sofa with real sleeping comfort by Simmons

Converts instantly to a comfortable double bed.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

man is more intelligent. Nixon has a remarkable capacity to get rapidly to the heart of the matter, but he is not so learned or cultivated as Stevenson. Stevenson inspires enormous enthusiastic affection, which he must reciprocate or he would not inspire it. He finds it extremely difficult to convince himself that he should follow "expert" advice (even when the experts on how to get votes are provably right). And when he does follow it against his own spontaneous feelings, he convinces nobody of his sincerity. Yet sincerity (which is by no means synonymous with wisdom or rightness) is the one thing instantly detectable by the radio listener or television viewer.

Stevenson is the darling of the "intellectuals," but one has to be the darling of far more than they to hold the confidence of the American people.

I think it is too bad that as I write Lyndon Johnson is not better known to the American people, for Senator Lyndon Johnson may as truthfully be called "Mr. Democrat" as Senator Robert A. Taft was called "Mr. Republican." Robert L. Riggs, chief of the Washington Bureau of the Louisville Courier-Journal, says that not even dictatorial old Uncle Joe Cannon ever got his own way as often as Lyndon Johnson did as leader of the Democratic opposition in Congress.

President Eisenhower has been anything but a dictatorial President. His instinct has been to exercise as little of the power of his great office as is compatible with filling it. Mr. Riggs remarks that it is "a law of politics that when the White House refuses to exercise power someone in the legislative branch will." And that someone has been Lyndon Johnson. Yet when he started to take the leadership of the Democratic opposition under a President who was all but worshiped, Johnson had no competitors and won more brickbats than laurels. But he has won the firm loyalty of the Democratic senators whom he has made into an extraordinarily effective force.

He has one obsession: that the race question shall not split the Democratic Party or the nation. His favorite adjectives are "prudent," "reasonable" and "responsible," and he believes that reasonable and responsible men can achieve results without tearing one another to pieces. He knows how to work on and through men. He is a liberal—his idol was F.D.R.—but he has an excellent sense of timing. He is no champion of lost causes, and has little patience with "bleeding hearts."

He had a serious heart attack in 1955 from which, however, he has made what appears to be a total recovery. His wife, incidentally, has looks, wealth and brains; she possesses three university degrees and is studying Russian.

Stuart Symington has always been regarded as a compromise; Humphrey does not look like a likely nominee at a time when public opinion is, on the whole, conservative. Anything can happen between now and the conventions, but my own hunch is that the American people will vote for the man they feel reasonably sure will not rock the boat.

The truth is that the presidency needs the aid and support of able men and sensitive minds in both parties. The lines in the two-party system are by no means as closely drawn as they once were. One cannot put a "party" on television—only a man, or men and women. The people decide, more than they ever did, not only who will be elected but who will be nominated. The smoke-filled room in which the professionals once cooked matters up between them is emptied. The professionals watch the press, the polls and public reactions, not only to candidates but to potential candidates. No "dark horse" is likely to be nominated in the coming or in future conventions. Any horse that could win would have been performing in the light long before the conventions assemble. END

The human heart is vast enough to contain all the world.

NOW! WASH AWAY PAINT WITH WATER

ANYBODY CAN EASILY REFINISH FURNITURE, FLOORS, WOODWORK WITH NEW DISCOVERY

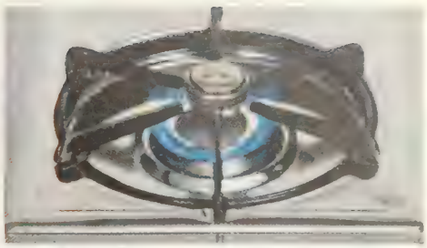
Ask for TM-4 WASH AWAY PAINT REMOVER. Flow TM-4 on — wait — wash finish off with WATER. This is same paint remover used to renovate Independence Hall. TM-4 is guaranteed best paint remover or money refunded.

Profits for You!

YOU can profit, as do thousands of others, by using our money-making plan. Our subscription commission offer is enthusiastically used by folks in many communities. You can offer and profit from Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, Holiday, Jack and Jill, American Home and many other popular publications. Write today for our easy-to-follow plan and supplies. No obligation. Address your request to:

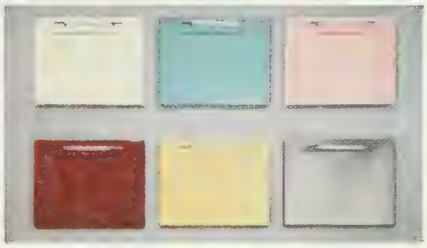
CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
989 Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Penn

MOMMY!... MOMMY!



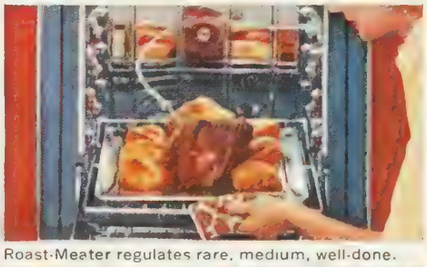
MOMMY!

To mothers, that cry means that there another cut, scratch, scrape, or burn! also means she should get iodine—b she often doesn't, because iodine bu and stings, upsets youngsters. Her good news. Science has discovered a n kind of iodine that stops infection b yet doesn't burn or sting. It's polyvin pyrrolidone-iodine*, found only in n ISODINE® ANTISEPTIC. Where ot types of antiseptics may kill only 1, 2, 3 types of germs, ISODINE kills all ty —even virus and fungus. And up to times faster. Get painless ISOD ANTISEPTIC. Money-back guaran



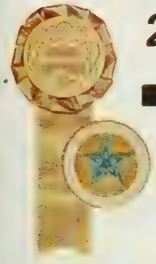
*Pat. No. 2,739,922 General Aniline & Film Corp.
© 1959 Isodine Pharmacal Corp., Dover, Del.

Sparkling chrome-lined oven reflects heat evenly for better baking, roasting, browning. Beautiful lifetime finish.



Set 'N Forget Burner—makes all pots automatic.

Copperloy, Lusterloy, 4 other beautiful colors.



Clock Control Oven cooks meals automatically.

Roast-Meater regulates rare, medium, well-done.

Lift-Off Doors for carefree oven cleaning.

28 exciting advancements win Gold Star Award for

Tappan Built-Ins

'Fabulous 400'—daring new electric range that puts all cooking at your fingertips.

'Holiday'—Gold Star Award winner—finest gas range built. Automatic all the way.

Tappan automatic features end pot-watching and oven-watching. 28 exciting advances make Tappan ranges award winners. Tappan is today's biggest-selling built-in, gas and electric —both look alike.

Gas, electric or electronic, nothing cooks or looks like a

TAPPAN

Mansfield, Ohio; Montreal, Quebec

The Tappan Company
Department LHJ 3-0, Mansfield, Ohio

I want more information on Tappan:
Built-In Gas Ranges ☐, Electric ☐, Conventional Gas ☐, Electric ☐, '400' ☐. I am moving ☐, remodeling ☐, building ☐. Please send me Betty Brown's Favorite Recipes ☐. Kitchen Plans Book ☐.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

New gold-accented Pyrex casseroles are bright in the home-decorating picture. This smart-looking cook serve-and-store ware has a wonderful way with food—never transfers flavors! 1¼ to 2½ qt., $1.95 to $3.9

PYREX-WARE a symbol of modern living, is a product of CORNING research

Corning Glass Works, Corning, N. Y.

"This just seems to be one of those centuries when everything goes wrong."

Under Cover

By BERNARDINE KIELTY

Not so long ago—though it takes a bit of readjusting to take it in—George Sanders, smooth Hollywood villain, was working in the advertising branch of Lever Brothers, London. In the office next to him, in charge of the Market Research and Information Department, was a gorgeous redhead, whom we know as Greer Garson. Miss Garson now lives in Bel Air, California. Her bathroom is done in pink marble. It has a sunken bath, with great sea shells holding the multicolored soaps. One side of the room is made entirely of glass, and opens onto a small exotic garden completely walled in and private. A low garden chair rests there, amidst a profusion of gardenias and heavy-scented magnolia. "The biggest production for the smallest audience yet to emerge from Hollywood," says Mr. Sanders.

Call it gossip or success stories or cynical comment, at any rate you know what you're getting into when you pick up George Sanders' autobiography. The title is MEMOIRS OF A PROFESSIONAL CAD (Putnam). You can always drop it for something worthier.

But to go on. Yul Brynner is another who made good. When he went to Madrid for the filming of 'Solomon and Sheba,' he took with him an entourage of seven. One minion's duty was to place already lighted cigarettes in Brynner's outstretched fingers. Another's was to shave his skull when the suspicion of a shadow darkened it. During both operations, according to Sanders, Mr. Brynner sat in sphinxlike silence and splendor, wearing a black leather suit or a white leather suit, of which he had a half dozen each, made for him by Dior.

Speaking of titles, WHAT IS AN ANGEL? by Pie-Raymond Regamey, is volume 47, Section III, of the Twentieth Century Encyclopedia of Catholicism (Hawthorn). It answers the title's question in a concise 128 pages.

In public life you apparently have to look the part. When Justice Holmes was appointed to the Supreme Court, Fanny, his wife, said, "Look at me! How can I go to Washington—I who look like an abandoned farm in Maine!" (Catherine Drinker Bowen, in Adventures of a Biographer). On the other hand, Liu Shao-chi, Head of State in Communist China, takes pride in owning only one shirt, which must last him for several years. When a comrade suggests that he buy a new one, he says, "No, no; change the collar and patch the sleeves." He wears an old straw hat which has turned yellow, with brown spots all over it. Liu, his public-relations officials say firmly, is a leader of the people.

Thomas Costain, who probably holds the record for popularity in historical novels, has never written a better historical novel than THE DARKNESS AND THE DAWN (Doubleday)—about Attila the Hun and all the melodrama and horror and heroism of his incredible century. I got to this book late, but must register my admiration.

And don't forget A TIME IN ROME, by Elizabeth Bowen (Knopf)—a penetrating revelation of that wondrous city.

The big paper napkin most like linen...now in a brand-new box!

Doesn't fall apart . . . even with saucy spaghetti! Just one Scotkin stays crisp and fresh . . . gives linen-like strength throughout the meal. And dinner-size Scotkins® give you extra inches of linen-lavish protection. Get Scotkins in the new box today. It's one paper napkin you don't need three of!

Also made and sold in Canada

LAST YEAR,
1,000,000
POISON IVY SUFFERERS...

DIDN'T!

because
AQUA IVY TABLETS made them
IMMUNE!

Aqua Ivy's immunity protected hundreds of thousands of chronic sufferers against poison ivy and poison oak—protected them from within (where it can't rub off!)—protected them all season long. AQUA IVY TABLETS are proven effective in over 95% of cases—are proven safe. And are easy-to-take.

And if you and your family took AQUA IVY AP® TABLETS last year, be sure to take them again—now—to maintain your immunity this year!

REMEMBER: Don't wait till summer. It takes time to build full immunity. So start your family on AQUA IVY TABLETS right away. They're available at your local pharmacy in the U. S. and Canada.

Send coupon for new informative booklet that tells all about poison ivy and poison oak, and how Aqua Ivy Tablets were developed to provide immunity—including research findings and clinical documentation.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

COMMENDED BY PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Dept. J
SYNTEX CHEMICAL COMPANY, INC.
P. O. Box 117, New York 11, N. Y.
Please send me your free booklet

My name (PLEASE PRINT CLEARLY)

Street Address

City Zone State

"When a brother, sister or parent dies, there's stirred up in the child all the guilt left over from all the times he hurt him."

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

When someone close to a child dies

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

MARTHA HOS

When a member of the family dies, a child may r reassurance that he did not "wish" the person d

A death of a member of the family—a parent, a brother or sister, a grandparent who has lived in the home—stirs up feelings in a young child which are quite different from those aroused by the death of a person who is not well known to the child, or by an impersonal discussion of death. In the latter case, as I explained two months ago, the young child's main concern is in the possibility of his own death and whether this will separate him from his parents.

But when a member of the household or someone close to it dies, the child's previous relationship with him leaves a mixture of upset feelings which may last for many months.

First of all is the sense of loss. If a close brother or sister has gone, there is the repeated sharp sorrow which comes from wanting to share another experience with him and realizing again that he isn't there. If a parent has recently died the child will continue to want to turn to him or her a hundred times a day, when he needs knowledge, assistance, guidance, approval, comfort or reassurance. The anguish is fresh each time. This sense of bereavement we call mourning. In a healthy child (or adult) it heals gradually over the months as other attachments and interests fill the emptiness.

But there is a surprising difference between children in how much the mourning shows. One child—and it's more apt to be a girl—loses her joy in her usual pursuits, looks sad, and easily breaks into tears. Another child, even in the same family, may appear almost unaffected on the surface. We know that this appearance does not represent a true lack of feelings. Rather, the child has a personality which is expert in controlling, suppressing and denying them.

Most parents have noticed similar variations in how their different children react to everyday sorrows and worries. Feelings come to the surface so easily in some and are concealed so promptly by others. A majority of girls who have had a pleasant life feel free to shed a few tears of disappointment when a treat has to be canceled, or of sorrow during the sad part of a story. Most boys—in America at least—are learning to keep a stiff upper lip by the time they are six or eight.

There is the same contrast in regard to other f ings too. Girls when really overjoyed may squeal w delight. But boys are more apt to maintain a par dignity and use some conventional expression, "Gee, that's swell." When fighting, most boys try battle silently and to use only their fists.

This usual difference between the sexes is not marily a glandular matter. In some other parts of world—even the Western world—men may scream each other when mad. When a death occurs they only permit themselves to cry; it appears to an barrassed American as if they were encouraging th selves to becoming hysterical. So it seems that male pattern in our country is mainly taught. partly done with words: "Don't cry"; "Fight lik man"; "Don't be a sissy." More important still is example set by the father and other men and boys.

But I'm bringing out the usual contrast between and girl primarily to explain how even in the same there can be marked differences. A girl in Amer may appear to be as untouched by distressing sit tions as the average boy. Perhaps she grew up i family where mother was just as self-controlled father. Or she may have taken as her model in respect not her mother but her father. We see child-guidance work the girl who has had some diffi emotional problem

CONTINUED ON PAGE

TWO-PIECE TOPPER SET. Nevabind puffed sleeves, plastic-lined pant. White with azure, pink, yellow. Sizes 6 mos.-1½ yrs. $3.50.

T...is for Tuddle

that's cuddly me in my Carter's topper set! Daddy says I'm sweet as cotton candy, but Mother says it's Carter's cotton knit that does it . . . soft cotton knit that machine-washes and machine-dries and never, ever needs ironing. She also says the panties' plastic keep me lap-lovely . . . whatever that means. I guess that's why she thinks T is for Too-good-to-be-true-and-practical-too-for-gifts-to-give-and-get!

TWO-PIECE JACQUARD KNIT CREEPER
Nevabind sleeves, plasticized pant, snap-fastened crotch. Blue, red, yellow. Sizes 6 mos.-2 yrs. $3.50.

THREE-PIECE PINWHEEL PRINT PLAY PAJAMA
Azure, blue, pink. Layette size $2.50.

PATTERN KNIT TOPPER SET
Plastic-lined pant, snap-fastened front. White with blue, red, yellow. Sizes 6 mos.-1½ yrs. $3.50.

Carter's
THE WILLIAM CARTER CO., NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS

To be sure it's the best . . . look for Rubbermaid on the product.

Smart way to keep tracks outside!

Dress up your doorsteps with Rubbermaid Door Mats to keep floors and carpeting clean and dry. Only Rubbermaid brings you so many beautiful Door Mat styles, sizes and colors to choose from! Everything from striking diamond-bedecked designs—to sturdy grid, ribbed, or combination grid-rib types. Select yours now in time for a spring fresh-up. You'll like the new look at every entrance! Mats priced from 98¢ to $6.98.

All-grid door mat for beauty and duty. Gives doorway drama, traps mud, dirt.

Rubbermaid means better made
RUBBERMAID INC., WOOSTER, OHIO • COOKSVILLE, ONTARIO

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 22

ever since early childhood (such as prolonged toilet-training conflict, severe jealousy of sibling or resentment of parent) who learned to protect herself from the painfulness of her feelings by drastically suppressing or denying them. It's a form of self-defense. In such a child (or adult) the feelings still exist, buried deep, but they show only in some disguised form—in bodily symptoms, for instance, or in inappropriate behavior. Conversely, a boy may show more emotion than is conventional for his sex—because, for instance, his father sets a similar example, or the boy is taking after his mother in this respect.

So far we have been talking about the bereavement a child will suffer and may or may not show. But there is another feeling which is just as important. It may be more upsetting and last a lot longer. You might be skeptical at first that it even exists. I am thinking of guilt.

That a child might feel guilty about the death of a close relative was recognized only rarely before psychiatrists began to try to understand the hidden feelings of people of all ages who were miserable or nervous or mentally ill. It was first realized that an occasional adult would react to the death of a member of the family not just with mourning but with a more complex depression that lasted for many months. He would cover himself with reproaches: that he had not sought medical care early enough; or that he had not been as dutiful as he should have been during the last illness; or even that he had brought on the sickness, through his inconsiderate behavior for many years back. His relatives would call these self-accusations entirely unjustified, the very opposite of the truth. It was discovered that such a person was feeling terribly guilty not so much about the things he had actually done or left undone, which were largely imaginary, but about unkind feelings and wishes that he had harbored at times toward the deceased. Deep inside he assumed that these feelings, in some magical way, had done harm.

> Everybody is afraid for himself, and everybody thinks his neighbor's fears ridiculous, as they generally are.
>
> J. A. SPENDER
> THE COMMENTS OF BAGSHOT

In some parts of the world, where science is unknown, a person believes that he has fallen ill because someone is using black magic against him, or he seeks revenge by sticking pins into a clay statue of the one he thinks is his enemy.

It isn't just mentally ill people or savages or ignoramuses who believe in the harmful effects of bad thoughts. Most of us pride ourselves on our rationality, which comes from a sensible upbringing and long education. But almost all of us are a bit superstitious about the power of our thoughts and words, even if we decline to admit it publicly. We step over cracks in the sidewalk or throw salt over our shoulder or knock on wood. We believe in magic, not because we aren't educated enough but because each of us still has inside him traces of the child he once was.

When psychoanalysts began to treat unhappy children they learned how guilty children feel, not only about their hostile acts but about their hostile wishes even when there are no acts. This is not surprising, when you think about it. Children get plenty of chances to feel angry every day, what with the crudeness of other children, and the frequency of parental correction and irritation.

Young children carry most of their anger toward others directly into action and they see the effects of it in the tears of brothers and sisters and friends, in the disapproval of their parents. You might say that it takes them a number of years of growing up before they realize that the hostile wish which doesn't get carried out doesn't hurt anybody.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 27

America's Most Popular Nurse

HOME ECONOMIS
CHOOSES evenflo

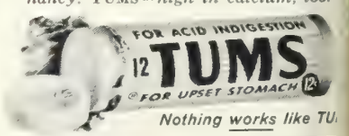
Mrs. William Schofield, of Pittsburgh, Pa., taught home economics before marriage. She writes: "Good eating habits begin in infancy, so I made sure my own babies got the right start. All three finished their Evenflo bottles easily, without fussing—and without any urging from me."

Mothers find Evenflo best for baby because it is easier to nurse and handier to use. Exclusive Twin Air Valve Nipple lets formula flow smoothly so baby never tires out or strains. And new Sure Seal* design eliminates excess air swallowing . . . helps prevent leakage and nipple pullout.

*Patent Pending

All-New Evenflo Nurser 25c Complete (With Nipple Cover 35c) Also available in Super Plastic 39¢ (44c with cover)

Send for Free Formula Preparation Booklet



evenflo® RAVENNA, OHI

MORE MOTHERS USE EVENFLO THA
ALL OTHER NURSERS COMBINED.
according to independent surveys

HEART BURN?

Acid indigestion or heartburn robbing you of sleep? For fast effective relief keep Tums by your bed

P.S. To Expectant Mothers—TUMS are wonderful for fast relief of heartburn, and gas so common in pregnancy. TUMS—high in calcium, too.

Nothing works like TU

Shrinks Hemorrhoids
New Way Without Surge
STOPS ITCH—RELIEVES PAIN

For the first time science has found new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids and relieve pain – without surgery.

In case after case, while gently relieving pain, actual reduction (shrinkage) took place.

Most amazing of all – results were thorough that sufferers made astonishing statements like "Piles have ceased to be a problem!"

The secret is a new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) – discovery of a world famous research institute.

This substance is now available in suppository or ointment form under the name Preparation H®. Ask for it at drug counters – money back guarantee

All dressed up for a family visit by Long Distance

A Long Distance call is warm and wonderful—the next best thing to a personal visit.

Just relax and enjoy the warm glow that comes from being close to those you care about . . . chatting together and sharing the family news.

It's a fine way to visit. Try it!

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Call by number. It's twice as fast.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

Here are some examples:

Buffalo to Cleveland	55¢
St. Paul to Chicago	80¢
Boston to Norfolk, Va.	90¢
Milwaukee to Philadelphia	$1.15
San Francisco to Detroit	$1.65

These are Station-to-Station rates for the first three minutes, after 6 p.m. and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

You give your love in many ways...with cradling warmth ...unhurried care...and the gentleness of your touch.

You give it by surrounding every bath and change time with fragrance and softness...by smoothing your baby with the silkiest, purest powder ...by soothing your baby with cream as soft as white velvet.

You give it, always, in the happy moments of "Johnson's time."

Johnson & Johnson

© 1960 Johnson & Johnson

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 24

Parents in their efforts to curb open hostilities frequently warn of the possibility of serious consequences from anger: "You might break his leg" (or put his eye out or even kill him). Parents, without realizing it, often teach children, too, that even illness comes from meanness and disobedience. "Your fighting has given mother a headache." . . . "You got the earache because you didn't wear your rubbers as I told you to." . . . "When you splash water on him like that you might make him catch cold." So children all get the idea, in one way or another, that their anger could do serious harm. This doesn't really surprise them so much, knowing as they do the unrestrained vigor of their feelings. Even in their cooler quarrels young children can threaten to kill each other, over an issue that would provoke older child or adult only to the point of shouting, "I'm going to report you."

When a brother, sister or parent dies from any cause, there is stirred up in the child the guilt left over from all the times he actually hit him or wished to hurt him himself or wished that some other misfortune would befall him. The primitive part of his conscience, which was forming at two and three and four years, tells him that it was his evil wishes that brought about the death.

The amount of guilt will be quite different, of course, in different children. A child who has had a very predominantly loving relationship with the relative who died will have much less guilt than the one who felt a lot of hostility. The child whose parent used heavy moral disapproval of antagonism will have a heavier conscience than the one whose parent used a more direct and casual sort of control. And, other things being equal, the older the child, the more his knowledge of the true causes of death will counteract the primitive sense that his own evil wishes did the harm.

What are the applications of this knowledge—that children feel guilty about a death in the family? The Romans used to say "De mortuis nihil nisi bonum," meaning "Don't say anything but good about the dead." This may be an ideal for grownups to strive for (in the sense of avoiding unfair or senseless defamation), but it would be too hard on children. If, in family discussions, a departed child is pictured as an angel without fault, it makes the living children feel inexcusably evil to have ever been angry at him or to have wished him any harm. So when the family is talking about how much they miss him and how humorous or helpful or smart or loving he was, it might be good for the parent to add—understandingly, not accusingly—that he was sometimes irritating too. "I certainly used to get mad at him at times." Such remarks, in a tolerant spirit, not only keep the memory of the departed from becoming oppressively pure; they show the children that if a parent can admit irritation without guilt, they too can be a bit less uncomfortable about their own antagonistic feelings, more able to talk about them.

Even in the case where a parent has died I think it is possible for the other parent, without disloyalty, to admit casually that he had his failings like everyone else. "Do you remember, Jackie, how cross daddy used to get when you left your bike out?" (or used his tools or whined or wouldn't eat). "He was more crotchety about that than most fathers. It must have made you mad sometimes."

Perhaps we should bring up the broader subject of whether the dead should be talked about at all. I think that most parents would be surprised at the question, assuming that such conversation would be inevitable, natural and proper. Yet there are some for whom this is so painful that they almost never mention the dead relative themselves, and either act disapproving or at least change the subject if the children speak of him. You can imagine that if a child is consciously or unconsciously holding himself responsible to some degree for the death, a parent's stern refusal to let the death be mentioned might intensify the child's feeling that unspeakable evil (including his own) had played a part.

It not only helps children in their adjustment to the death of a child or parent to be able to talk naturally about their former relationship to him, it should help the parent in the long run, however painful it is to him at the moment.

Needless to say, the child who shows more than the expected amount of grief, and little tendency to recover from it, and particularly the child who reacts with fear, guiltiness or other personality change, should have the help of a child-guidance clinic or family social agency.

Sometimes a parent not only overidealizes a dead child, but uses this image quite purposefully to bring brothers and sisters into line. "Surely you want to be a helpful" (or honest or pure or studious) "person like Harriet was. What would she be thinking if she knew what you did today?" This is unfair, of course, to Harriet as well as to the erring child, because the latter, in addition to guilt, can't help feeling an increasing antipathy to this apparently smug and preferred sibling.

Once in a great while, parents who have been unable to become reconciled to the death of one child may expect a subsequent child (or adopted child) to fulfill not only all the actual achievement of the first, but also the future hopes they had had for him. (They may even name the new child after the dead one.) Such expectations, being impossible for anyone to achieve, will compel the living child to feel a failure sooner or later—in his parents' eyes and in his own.

Before ending, we should broaden the subject beyond the matter of death, and think again about how readily children feel responsible for the accidents, illness and unhappiness of brothers, sisters, mother and father. Partly this comes from parents' specific warnings and reproaches: "If you hadn't left your roller skates on the stairs he never would have fallen." But we believe that this happens even when the parents don't foster such ideas.

Actually you can see this kind of guiltiness about mean wishes in its simplest form in the two- or three-year-old who is jealous and hostile at times toward a new baby. Perhaps when the baby first arrived the child was mean to it on a few occasions and made it cry, but parental disapproval was successful in stopping any further overt attacks. Or perhaps the child succeeded in controlling his aggressive impulses right from the start, and revealed them only indirectly in slightly uncomplimentary remarks or suggestions that the baby be taken back to the hospital where he came from. In either case the child who is suppressing his

CONTINUED ON PAGE 197

HERITAGE IN SPICE

By JESSIE FARNHAM

Some things the years do not erase:
The evening star above
Comes back steadily at dusk
To remind me of
The quiet way she let us know
The largess of her love.

The wooden spoon and mixing bowl
Were all that had to show,
We knew her hands would soon be kneading
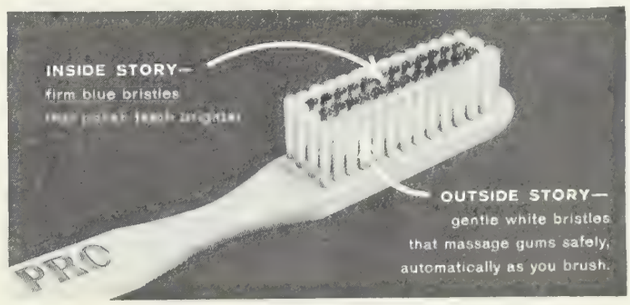
Balls of velvet dough,
How eagerly we waited for
The yeast to make it grow.



Strange that I remember most,
Though memories come in droves,
Her hovering hands like benisons
Above the honeyed loaves,
Dusting a scented heritage
Of cinnamon and cloves.

Because we believe it will pay us to give you a

2 YEAR SUPPLY OF PRO DOUBLE DUTY

TOOTH BRUSHES—

we're making the amazing offer below!

We at Pro-Phy-Lac-Tic Brush Company believe the Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush is a major contribution to sound teeth and gums, the most important new aid to home dental care in years.

We are convinced that, once you've used this superior brush, you and your whole family will continue to use it for years to come.

That is why—in the interests of your better dental health and our own future sales—we are making this unprecedented offer: Go to your dealer's and buy two Pro Double Duty Tooth Brushes in the special pack with the coupon on the back. Pay only the regular price for two—$1.78. Fill in the coupon and mail with both labels to Pro Brush Company, Florence, Mass.

Pro will send you four tickets—each good for one more Pro Double Duty Brush every six months for two years—four free brushes. Offer limited. Act now—before coupons are gone!

PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH COMPANY, FLORENCE, MASS.

—also makers of regular Pro Tooth Brushes, Jewelite Hair Brushes and Pro Combs

1. Buy two Pro Double Duty Tooth Brushes at the regular price of $1.78.

2. Get a new Double Duty free every six months for two years!

beautiful discovery!

New! Moisture Base by Ponds

new kind of greaseless foundation cream!
brings you "night cream" moisturizing
under your make-up all day!

Creates an all-day "moisture reserve." At last a cream that goes beyond superficial smoothing . . . that actually controls the moisture level of your skin under your make-up. At the same time, it normalizes your skin's protective chemistry all day long.

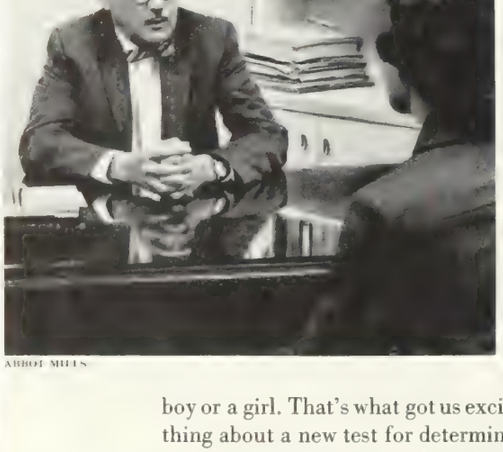
Prevents under-make-up dryout! New Pond's Moisture Base protects your skin against sun and wind—the drying effects of make-up itself! Your skin stays soft and dewy all day.

For a smooth, no-shine finish. Pond's Moisture Base is greaseless. Your skin never feels sticky—your make-up never streaks or cakes. Completely transparent, it can't conflict with any make-up shade.

For a lovelier face, smooth on New Pond's Moisture Base every morning. And, of course, use it for nighttime moisturizing, too.

Pond's Moisture Base
NEW GREASELESS UNDER-MAKE-UP MOISTURIZER

By GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER, M.D.



Tell me, doctor...

There are many questions which women would like to ask a trusted physician, but there is not always the opportunity. In this series, Tell Me, Doctor, Doctor Schauffler will discuss some of the problems which have been sent to him by readers. The situations are all real, but all the names used are fictitious.

"I have just learned that the was a tragic case of mistaken sex identity in my family a go many years ago. Is this condition hereditary? Can it happen my baby? If it should happen, can anything be done?"

"Doctor, is it true there is a way of finding out what a bab sex is before it is born?" the woman in the doctor's office ask

The doctor, engaged in taking his patient's blood pressu replied, "Edna, don't tell me you can't wait until your baby born to find out whether it is a boy or a girl! It won't be ve long now until that qu tion will be settled in t natural course of event

ABBOT MILLS

Edna Mills' blood pr sure had shot up, t doctor noted, since s had been in for her l prenatal check.

Edna flushed. "My terest isn't exactly p sonal. Malcolm, my h band, is a lawyer, y know. The firm he is w has a complicated inh itance case. Disposition a good deal of money pends on whether baby their client is pecting turns out to b boy or a girl. That's what got us excited when Malcolm read so thing about a new test for determining the baby's sex quite ea in pregnancy. We wondered just how far it could be counted o

"I see." Having removed the blood-pressure cuff and corded the reading, the doctor gave Edna's question his full tention. "Yes, there is a test now for determining what we the genetic sex. That is, the sex Nature confers on us at the ti we are conceived. I presume it is the test you are referring Our powerful microscopes permit us to study the chromosome the chromatin mass, it's called by scientists—inside the b cells. It has been established that the chromatin mass in fem forms in a sort of drumstick shape, not found in male c That's the basis of the test, and it has proved quite reliable.

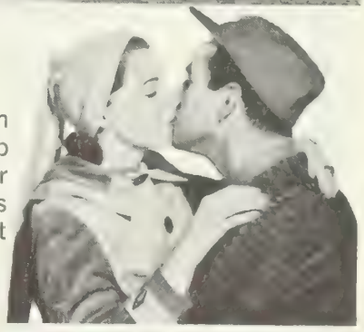
"It is also true that this test can be used to determine the of a baby months before it is born. But that is a pretty r business. A long needle has to be inserted into the sac of liq in which the baby floats in the womb. This is done either f below, through the vagina, or straight through the female's dominal wall. The liquid drawn off contains cells sloughed f the baby's skin or mucous-membrane surfaces, which re whether it is basically male or female.

"The drawback to applying the test prenatally is that l might be precipitated, infection

CONTINUED ON PAG

Fight Tooth Decay with Colgate Stop Bad Breath All Day!

Every mother should give her family the benefits of Colgate with Gardol and its defense against tooth decay!



In two-year clinical tests, young adults who brushed with Colgate Dental Cream averaged 46% fewer new cavities than those who used a plain toothpaste.

Of course, nothing completely stops decay, but you, too, may have fewer cavities if you start brushing regularly with Colgate Dental Cream. Because Colgate contains Gardol to form an invisible defense to help fight tooth decay. You can't see it—you can't feel it on your teeth—but it's there to help fight tooth decay.

Ask your dentist how often to brush your teeth. And for fewer cavities, brush with Colgate Dental Cream. Remember, you fight tooth decay with Colgate, help stop bad breath all day.

Colgate Dental Cream with Gardol helps stop mouth odor instantly for most people. It cleans your breath while it cleans your teeth.

31¢ 53¢ 69¢ 83¢

GARDOL IS COLGATE'S TRADE MARK FOR [illegible]

Brush with Colgate Dental Cream to FIGHT TOOTH DECAY!

14-DAY FREE TRIAL PROVES IT #1

You'll buy smarter, he'll look smarter in a Wings Rocket. Saves money, too, because the amazing new Airplane Cloth collar is guaranteed to outlast the body of the shirt, or new shirt free or money back! Same fine cotton fabric as airplane rudder control surfaces, yet feels soft and smooth forever. In addition, test Wings Rocket's (1) superior fit and (2) handsome collar styles; if he is not entirely satisfied after 14 days, new shirt free or money refunded. Remarkable buy at . . .

$3.35 3 for $10

DESIGNÉE: LE GRAND PRIX AMERICAIN

GUARANTEED To Outlast The Shirt Or A New Shirt FREE

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED WASHABLE

FINE DRESS SHIRTS, SPORT SHIRTS, DYNAFLEX® JACKETS AND PAJAMAS. KNITWEAR AND SWIMWEAR FOR MEN WINGS SHIRT CO., 4 WEST 33rd STREET, NEW YORK.

ZUD it's Wonderful!

REMOVES RUST & STAINS from bathtubs • sinks • tile floors bottoms of copper pots metals • auto bumpers aluminum storm windows

FREE SAMPLE
Give names of dealers
RUSTAIN PRODUCTS
FAIRLAWN, NEW JERSEY

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ZUD is sold at Grocers, Hardware, Dept., 10¢ Stores

MONEY...
In Your Spare Time

Spare-time income can help you meet expenses. Write for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
201 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

Here's a delightful difference

Real cowboys, Indians, pageants, rodeos. Mountains, lakes, streams. Resorts, lodges, ranches. VACATIONLAND VARIETY. COME ON UP!

Write Publicity Director SOUTH DAKOTA DEPT. OF HIGHWAYS Pierre 3, South Dakota

Name _____

Address _____

City State

20 Second Way To A
SWEETER BREATH CLEANER MOUTH

It's really true . . . now you can have a clean, refreshed mouth and throat—a sweeter breath—in just 20 seconds with Astring-o-sol Mouth Wash. Yes, even after heavy smoking or indulging in foods or beverages with lingering odors.

Developed by a practicing dentist, Astring-o-sol is far superior to any toothpaste in sweetening breath. For Astring-o-sol also helps remove odor-carrying mucous from mouth and throat. So get Astring-o-sol, the concentrated mouth wash, at any drug or toiletry counter.

FREE! For free sample, write your name and address on a postcard and mail to: Astring-o-sol, 942 Prospect Street, Trenton 8, N. J.

Astring-o-sol MOUTH WASH

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 28

might be introduced. So we doctors feel it isn't desirable to do this just to satisfy the parents' curiosity. In the case you are speaking of, it might possibly be of enough value to warrant the danger involved. But I couldn't say without knowing more about the mother and the entire situation. Actually it has been done only a few times in humans." Edna looked pale, the doctor was thinking. Her eyes were overly bright and there were dark circles under them.

"Doctor"—Edna twisted her long, slender fingers—"you said something about the baby being 'basically' male or female. From a purely theoretical standpoint, suppose it wasn't either male or female, but a hermaphrodite? Would the test show that too?"

The doctor looked at Edna with concern. She had struck him as being oversensitive, though with a fine intelligence. Now her strained attitude and pinched, anxious face showed that this unusual question held great importance for her.

He answered mildly, "The term 'hermaphrodite' is very much abused and misunderstood, Edna. Individuals are often labeled hermaphrodites when they have any kind of sex confusion, whatever its nature. A true hermaphrodite starts out with both ovarian and testicular tissue, from the very first differentiation of sex in the embryo. But such persons are very rare, practically museum specimens. If I remember rightly, only about a hundred or so have been recorded in all medical literature. Whatever started you thinking about hermaphroditism, Edna?"

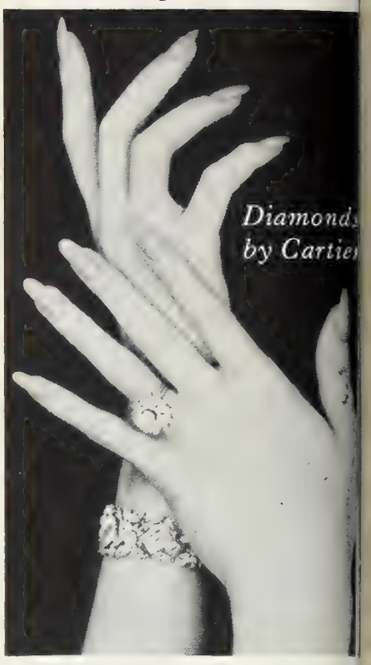
When men belittle us they belittle half of life, and they belittle their own happiness. To demean women is to demean love and relationship, and these are the two qualities in which civilization is very weak, and which it greatly needs.

FLORIDA SCOTT-MAXWELL
WOMEN AND SOMETIMES MEN
ALFRED A. KNOPF, INC.

Edna did not reply. Tears came to her eyes, her distress was evident.

"I think we would both feel better if you would tell me," the doctor urged. "Your mental and emotional well-being during pregnancy is of as much concern to me as your physical condition, you know. And they react on each other. I can't have you worrying yourself sick over something that hasn't the slightest likelihood of happening!"

Edna retorted, "That's where you're wrong, Doctor. And that's what worries me. It has happened. In my own family, to my mother's younger sister. Or brother! I still don't know the whole story. I have been going through some old family letters and learned about it for the first time. All I have been able to think of since is, 'Suppose that should happen to my baby!'"



"I would like to know just what you found out from those letters, Edna."

"I only know that, as a child, there was something queer about Aunt Maud. According to the letters, she was taken for a boy until she was about eight years old. Then things began to happen which made everybody frightfully confused, even the doctors. There weren't any details in the letters. People didn't discuss such things then, I guess. A few years later they apparently decided that it was better for 'him' to be treated as a 'her.' That was where the term 'hermaphrodite' came in—apparently no one was completely sure, even then. All of a sudden Aunt Maud disappeared from our lives. I remember that the atmosphere around home was pretty morbid for a while. Now I've discovered the reason. Aunt Maud committed suicide. She couldn't stand it.

"Is a condition of that kind hereditary, Doctor? It's true that my interest in the new test for sex began with the case Malcolm's firm is handling. But those letters have

CONTINUED ON PAGE 33

Hands by Sofskin . .

New—3-way Hand Cream
SOFTENS—WHITENS—MOISTURIZ

Unlike ordinary hand lotions, Sofskin concentrates its special moisturizing ingredients in a nonwatery cream—providing 3-way act This rich, velvety cream moisturizes chapped hands . . . softens and whitens rou red detergent hands . . . helps heal and prot "hurt" hands. Penetrating Sofskin gives day protection . . . goes to work instantly. younger, softer, more beautiful hands luxurious, yet inexpensive Sofskin.

Sofskin with Lanolin . . . for normal dry skin.

Sofskin Moisture Magic . . . for extra-hands.

Sofskin
PROTECTS ALL DAY • MOISTURIZES ALL NIG

CORNS also Calluses. Qu easy, and econom Just rub on. Jars, and 60¢. Buy M at your druggist.

REMOVED BY MOSC

Your money refunded if not satisfied. The Moss Company, Rochester, N.Y.

ON A LAXATIVE MERRY-GO-ROUND

TAKE NR TO-NIGHT... TOMORROW ALRIG SPARKLING BRIGHT!

Searching for effective overnight lief? Try NR tonight! You'll know millions use it with utmost confide NR works overnight . . . and gen aids the function of elimination, with restlessness or sudden necessity. NR i all-vegetable laxat that gives easy relie

NR REGULAR CANDY COATED or NR JUNIORS

helps you feel better ...and look better!

Nature's Remedy NR TABLETS - NR

ALL VEGETABLE LAXATIVE

Advertisement

How to throw off a cold... before it throws you

Face these cold facts: there just isn't any cure for a cold—and no preventive short of isolating yourself completely from humanity.

But this doesn't mean you have to surrender completely to the miseries of the common cold.

Many of us, however, ignore a cold. We go right on working—and right on weakening our defenses. And that's a sure way to invite a complication that forces us to bed—sometimes a hospital bed. In fact, pneumonia can actually start with a cold.

The best way to throw off a cold is to pamper yourself a bit. Go to bed, curl up warmly with a novel you've been planning to read, eat sensibly and lightly, drink plenty of liquids—and give your body's natural defenses a fair chance to lick the cold virus.

Of course, you'll feel achy and irritable, especially if you have a fever. So for headache, fever and body aches, take Bufferin®. Bufferin gives you blessedly fast relief.

In fact, Bufferin's great benefit for millions of people is that its exclusive speed ingredient, Di-Alminate®, gets its pain-reliever into the bloodstream twice as fast as aspirin. Helps relieve tension and achiness too.

And you can take Bufferin as long as your cold lasts. Bufferin combines its aspirin with a special anti-acid that gives you protection against the stomach distress you can get from aspirin alone.

So, when you catch a cold, get plenty of rest, relax and stay in bed, if possible—and take Bufferin, at least every four hours or as often as your doctor recommends.

There's no other dog in the world like yours:

Available in 1 pound and economy size 26 oz. cans.

For 8" x 10" print of picture alone, send 25¢ in coin to Dog Picture 20, Box 7366, Chicago 77, I

There's no other dog food like Ken-L-Ration

with Lean Red Meat*

Most dogs now-a-days can't run off a diet too rich in fats and carbohydrates. Which is why protein-rich Ken-L-Ration suits your dog to a healthy T. Contains delicious *steaks, chops and roasts of U.S. Gov't Inspected Horsemeat. Plus other essential ingredients. Ken-L-Ration's U.S. Dept. of Agriculture seal of approval tells you officially that it's good. But your dog's wagging tail and good health tell you even more. PUT YOUR TRUST IN KEN-L-RATION...MORE PEOPLE DO!

INSPECTED AND CERTIFIED U. S. DEPT. OF AGR. AS A NORMAL MAINTENANCE DOG FOOD

TINUED FROM PAGE 30

inly brought it home to me! If there is a ce that our baby might turn out to be like t Maud, wouldn't it be some help to know advance? Be a little prepared for it?"

hat was indeed a strange affair, Edna. really bad thing, though, is that your first vledge of it should come at this time when are expecting your first baby. I don't wonthat it has upset you. Well, let's talk it ugh—see just what we are facing here.

irst of all, I would have to say that if your was a true hermaphrodite, it's remotely ble that some vague hereditary element t have been involved. But I doubt very that she was. This sounds like a case of we doctors call 'pseudohermaphroditSuch people are much more common true hermaphrodites, and they only *simu*ertain characteristics of both sexes. Also, ex mix-up occurs after the embryo has d out as perfectly male or female, as the may be. Actually, we might almost say as fectly normal female; for nearly always seudohermaphrodite is essentially fe-There are male pseudohermaphrodites, hey are rare; almost as rare as true aphrodites."

ut Aunt Maud's parents thought she was until she was eight years old!"

A SMALL MARCH SONG

By VIRGINIA LINTON

These are the days
Of the light's long leaning,
The hedges greening,
And willows showing yellow
By the streams—
Ancient impetus
For this year's dreams.

at is often the case with female pseudoaphrodites. What usually happens is that he embryo has started developing into a al female, a peculiarity occurs in the oning of the adrenal gland. It starts ing too much of a substance that acts much like the male sex hormone. This ance can bring about masculinizing es in the sex organs, such as overdevelnt of the clitoris—which is a rudimentary sex organ, by the way. There may also be tions in the lower genital tract—confuin the vagina or urethra, for instance. probably know that the urethra is the from the opening in the bladder, and part of what we call the genitourinary n. Quite often, by the time such a baby n it may be difficult or impossible to de- the sex without making special tests. the masculinizing influence may come outside. Recently we doctors have beconcerned about the possible masculineffects of giving male hormones—and certain kinds of female hormones—to n in early stages of pregnancy. These ones may have been given to prevent rriage. Or perhaps to keep pregnancy occurring. The new contraceptive pill we been hearing so much about has the same tial for masculinizing the fetus, if it d fail as a contraceptive. And it does fail, ertain percentage of cases, because not one takes it faithfully. Too much X ray ly pregnancy has also been blamed. That ay, when more X ray has been used than ded for ordinary diagnosis."

octor, I think it is just dreadful if treatgiven a mother can doom her child to a e Aunt Maud's!"

gree with you heartily. But treatment by rs is certainly the least of the causes of ix-ups. There were pseudohermaphrodites before anyone thought of either hormones or X ray. Certain types of tumor can have this effect, as well, and they may appear very early; even in fetal life. They, too, can make a girl baby appear to be a boy; or, in rare cases, vice versa. And sometimes the adrenal doesn't start acting up until years have gone by.

"More important, though, the female pseudohermaphrodite no longer is 'doomed,' as you put it. If discovered at birth, or very shortly thereafter, the condition now can often be treated very effectively. We simply give other hormones, such as cortisone, to counteract the masculinizing substances. The treatment must be very carefully supervised by an experienced specialist. But, properly used, it not only can prevent further alteration; it can do much toward reversing the masculinizing changes, and turning the baby back into a practically normal female. Tumors that produce masculinizing hormones can be removed, with resultant cures. Where it is necessary, plastic surgery can complete the process, by altering the outer sex organs to conform to the proper sex of the individual."

"Do you mean that unless something is done, the masculinizing changes can keep right on?"

"Yes, they can. If the diagnosis is missed in early stages, the changes become more marked, and some of them become irreversible."

"How does this work, Doctor?"

"At puberty, a female pseudohermaphrodite is likely to develop masculine hair patterns—hair on the face and chest, for instance. Perhaps a male rather than a female type of bony structure as well. The breasts may be late in developing, and may not develop normally. The voice change may be toward baritone or bass. But the mental and social orientation the girl has made toward maleness may be the most difficult thing of all to change. An attempt to shift her back into being a female, when it is discovered that a mistake has been made, may be truly tragic."

"The letters mentioned that Aunt Maud was very resentful. She kept saying that she wished the doctors and everyone else had let her alone."

The doctor nodded. "Nowadays we believe it is best to leave the older pseudohermaphrodite alone if he or she is firmly settled in the adoptive sex role, and not unhappy in it. Operations are performed in such cases to make the sex organs conform more fully to the adoptive sex. Those are the operations that have received so much publicity in late years. Sometimes it is considered best not even to tell an individual that a mistake has been made in identifying the basic sex. That is when a very good adjustment has been made, and there is no point in getting the individual upset about his or her sex role. Though that can be dangerous too. The age when the mistake is discovered is of great importance. Early cases are more easily managed."

"How could a mistake be discovered only after such a long time? If there is a mix-up, why wouldn't it show up sooner?"

"It could possibly have been discovered earlier in your aunt's case if a thorough investigation had been made. Obviously, the external manifestations were inconclusive and the attending doctor should have been alerted. Even at that time, I believe, they were finding out about sex chromatin. Or if necessary, operation could disclose whether the genetic sex tissue was ovarian or testicular. That is often the way long-standing cases are discovered. And they turn up even nowadays; more often than the general public has any idea.

"But I agree with you that today there is little or no excuse for letting a sex mix-up reach such a state. I think doctors have fallen down a bit, especially with regard to girl infants and small children. In a newborn baby, nearly all the more common sex anomalies can be detected by a conscientious physical examiner. Theoretically, the pediatrician should examine the baby and record anything out of the ordinary. But the obstetrician sees the baby first and has the initial responsibility. I have been urging for twenty years that every child, and especially every female child, should have a gentle but thorough examination of the sex organs at birth. It doesn't bother the baby in

For dry skins
MAX FACTOR creates a fountain of beauty—
Pan-Stik* make-up

Only PAN-STIK can create a flawless complexion and—simultaneously—bathe your skin in a 'fountain' of soft, dewy beauty. For PAN-STIK is enriched with precious oils that hold moisture in, keep dryness out.

And only PAN-STIK strokes on make-up from a swivel stick, as easily as a lipstick! $1.75

MAX FACTOR...master of make-up artistry for over fifty years.

*PAN-STIK (TRADE MARK) MEANS MAX FACTOR CREAM-TYPE MAKE-UP ©1960, MAX FACTOR & CO.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

I dreamed
I was enchanted in my

maidenform girdle*

Presto — what a change-o! I'm a new woman and the magic word is FRIS-KEE*! Light fantastic elastic for uncanny control. Smooth sleek front panel makes tummies all but disappear (yet FRIS-KEE* is airy light as the touch of a wand!) Pantie or girdle styles in white, black, and 4 colors. Machine washable! S, M, L. From 6.50. New! FRIS-KEE with lace front panel. Pantie or girdle, 5.95.*

The bra: Enchanting STAR FLOWER*, 2.50.

*REG. U. S. PAT. OFF. ©1960 MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC. NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

the least. Not as much, in fact, as a thorough examination of throat or eyes or ears.

"Unfortunately, there has been a kind of taboo against any but the most superficial examination of a baby's sex organs; especially those of a girl baby. Yet many a story like that of your aunt could have been prevented if such an examination had been carried out conscientiously at birth. It would either establish the sex of the child beyond the shadow of a doubt, or else reveal the need for more searching tests.

"Here is a place where the new chromosome test can be very valuable indeed. It can be made easily after the baby is born, and involves no danger or discomfort at all. There are other tests, too, that can be applied after the baby is actually here. The true genetic sex can be established. If there is a sex mix-up, management can often be started in time to keep it from becoming a tragedy."

"You have relieved my mind tremendously, Doctor," Edna told him. "Though it still seems a weird business!"

"Yes, it is one of Nature's mysteries, certainly. It is exciting to scientists, though, because as these mysteries are solved something is added to our store of helpful knowledge. There is a lot more to sex determination, in fact, than you and I could cover in many conversations.

"What I would like you to fix in your mind is that, when doctors are on the lookout, mix-ups in sex identity can be suspected at birth; and that we now have means to find out rather easily what the basic sex is. And finally, when the condition is discovered early, there is a great deal to be done for the pseudo-hermaphrodite.

"Of course I'm speaking now about the more serious cases. Lots of people are born with minor sex peculiarities about which there is no need to be concerned at all. For instance, we doctors rather often see women with a clitoris larger than ordinary; perhaps with a heavier-than-usual growth of facial hair. But there can be no doubt that they are women, and fitted to play the feminine role successfully in every way. It isn't necessary to employ medical measures with them.

"Well now, Edna, I want to assure you that as a result of our little talk, I shall examine your baby with particular care. As a matter of fact, all doctors and all parents should have in mind the possibility of a mix-up in sex identity, even though serious cases are rather rare. Then there would be less chance for a life to be set in the wrong sex pattern.

"And I think I can pretty well guarantee that there won't be another Aunt Maud in your family! In the first place, the chances are at least a hundred to one that your baby will be born a perfectly normal boy or girl. But we will leave nothing to chance."

Next month Dr. Schauffler discusses ectopic pregnancy.

MARK TWAIN SAYS:

Let us endeavor so to live that when we die even the undertaker will be sorry.

Don't mourn over fancied grievances. Bide your time and real sorrow will come.

By trying we can easily learn to endure adversity. Another man's, I mean.

Good breeding consists in concealing how much we think of ourselves and how little we think of the other person.

If you pick up a starving dog and make him prosperous, he will not bite you; that is the principal difference between a dog and a man.

Get your facts first, and then you can distort them as much as you please.

Now...a special laxative for women!

Gives gentle relief more natural than any ordinary laxative

Mrs. Birdie Mohaupt
Woodbury, Conn.

"At 70, I must avoid harsh laxatives," writes Mrs. Mohaupt, "so I'm delighted with the wonderfully natural action of Correctol. It's the answer to this grandma's prayer for sure, gentle relief from irregularity."

Correctol® has been specially developed for a woman's delicate system. It is completely different from harsh, all-purpose laxatives.

Its secret is a non-laxative mineral regulator that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give regularity a start.

Working together, these two gentle ingredients make Correctol bring relief more naturally than any ordinary laxative can. Not only after middle age, but all the years before—even in pregnancy, after childbirth, during menstruation.

Do try Correctol soon. 30 tiny pink tablets, $1.00—at any drug counter.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Ingrown NAIL

Just a few drops of soothing Dr. Scholl's ONIXOL in nail groove relieve soreness and pain, soften embedded part of nail for easy removal. Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's ONIXO

HOW TO MEET EXPENS

YOU can earn extra cash to meet expenses by selling subscriptions to Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post, The American Home, Holiday, Jack and Jill and other popular magazines. Earn generous commissions in your spare time. We'll send details without obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPA
988 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

Stops Bad Breath INTERNALLY!

You Simply Can't Offend

No other method dares make this claim!

For quick, safe, sure, 'round-the-clock freedom from odors of strong foods, alcoholic beverages, smoking, etc., take wonder-working, pleasant-tasting "ENNDS" Tablets containing the miracle extract, Daratol®

"ENNDS" act internally where sprays, mouthwashes, toothpastes simply cannot reach. Can't upset the stomach. Trial size at Drug counters only 54¢.

"ENNDS"®

Lady Mary Hardwicke, renowned beauty and leader in London's social circles.

Lady Mary Hardwicke says: "So many of my friends, in fact most fashionable women in London, rely on Odo-ro-no for extra assurance of personal daintiness."

She's right. Odo-ro-no Cream is the largest selling deodorant in London, in fact, in most of the world's fashion capitals. Loved for its cosmetic touch—its sure, lasting protection against perspiration dampness and odor. Gentle to your skin; safe for finest fabrics. Discover the excellence of Odo-ro-no yourself —in cream, stick or spray.

Did you know ODO-RO-NO is the leading deodorant in London?

It's Casserole-and-Salad Time

Quick, easy and delicious with Minute Rice and Jell-O

Creole Casserole

1⅓ cups Minute Rice
2 cups grated Cheddar cheese
2¼ cups (20-ounce can) tomatoes and juice
1 teaspoon salt • ¼ cup finely chopped onion

Grease a 1½-quart baking dish. Spread about one-half of the Minute Rice right-from-the-box in an even layer on bottom. Cover with 1 cup of grated cheese; add remaining rice. Combine tomatoes and juice, salt and onion in saucepan, crushing tomatoes and mixing well. Bring to boil. Pour over layers of rice and cheese. Bake covered, in moderate oven (350°F.) 10 minutes. Remove from oven, uncover; spoon remaining cheese onto rice mixture around edge, leaving center uncovered. Bake 5 minutes longer. Serves 4.

Sunny Fruit Mold

1 package Lemon Jell-O
1 cup hot water • 1 cup cold water
1 orange, freed from membrane and diced
1 banana, sliced • 1 red skin apple, diced
1 cup celery, thinly sliced

Dissolve Jell-O in hot water. Add cold water. Chill until slightly thickened. Fold in fruit and celery. Pour into mold; chill until firm. At serving time, unmold on crisp lettuce; garnish with mayonnaise. This Jell-O dish also makes a light, lively dessert when garnished with whipped cream. Makes 6 servings.

Created for your enjoyment by General Foods Kitchens

GENERAL FOODS KITCHENS

Minute and Jell-O are registered trade-marks of General Foods Corp.

PUBLIC AFFAIRS
EDITED BY
MARGARET HICKEY

YOUNGSTERS OUTDOORS

by MARGARET HICKEY

"My child is growing up isolated from ature. Oh, we do the best we can with books d vacations, but to him the world is held to- ther with concrete, not with the roots of getation and the flow of rivers. He does not ve to read wind and cloud for weather, for his elter is ready-made. He has no chance to ove himself against Nature in the old struggle at once, it seems to me, helped every child d himself."

An answer to this complaint of a suburban other is more and more frequently being found parents, teachers and recreation leaders who ree that exposure to the natural world should an important part of a child's growing-up ex- riences.

This month we are featuring a project sup- rted by an entire community, which includes estry classes, hikes, camping trips and train- in the lore of the woods.

In New Jersey, students of Ramapo Regional gh School who join the school's Conservation ub maintain a wildlife sanctuary with the lp of the New Jersey Audubon Society. They rk trails through the woodland, build bird- ding stations, label trees and shrubs, have nted more than a thousand evergreens on e grounds of the society and the school.

In Washington, Utah, Nevada and Idaho the te federations of women's clubs have spon- ed more than half a dozen "youth forests" nted by Boy and Girl Scouts, 4-H clubs, mp Fire Girls, Future Farmers, Y.M.C.A. mbers and church youth groups. In Cali- nia some 5000 youngsters have taken part in e reforestation program of the Los Angeles ea Council Boy Scouts. On camping weekends ey have planted burned-over acres with thou- nds of seedlings, come back later to water and n. Within their lifetime these boys will see nd restored to water conservation, wildlife d recreation.

An exciting summer of field work in Grand ton and Olympic national parks is being ered selected high-school, college and gradu- students in an experimental program spon- ed by a private agency, the National Parks sociation, which receives funds from many urces, including twenty-three garden clubs. ese young people, who are volunteers, lp our Government's National Park Service. st summer, among other things, they cleared ils, built shelters and helped take an elk nsus. Since the program's start in 1957, 150 dents have spent their summers in the heart Nature in these spectacular parks. Not as rists, but as young men and women learning live with Nature. END

JOHN LEWIS STAGE

New Hampshire's Bristol civic recreation program provides all kinds of outlets for energetic boys and girls—from junior forestry classes (which usually meet in the woods, occasionally in the lodge as here) to tobogganing, craftwork, badminton, rope-jumping and square dances.

Children need someplace to go and something to do

. . . Civic recreation program the answer

There was a light snow falling on the town of Bristol, New Hampshire. Most townspeople, including the children, stayed close to the hearth.

But a mile up the road, past Follansbee's General Store and the Federated Church, where town turns into full country and the pines stand in solid rows, the woods were alive with laughter and shouts of youngsters, the scratching of saws, the quick clip-clip of pruning shears snapping at branches.

Eighteen boys and girls, aged nine to fourteen, were hard at work on that icy January day of 1959 thinning pine in the wooded 135-acre "outdoor classroom" which, with its rustic lodge, is administered by the Bristol Community Center.

As much a part of the civic recreation program as the big brown center building itself down in the town, this land was bought and the lodge built by townspeople in memory of state conservation officer "Slim" Baker and his firm belief that "there is no limit to what can be learned and seen" in the woods. "All you have to do is give a kid a chance," he used to say; "if you take him into the wood with a pack on his back, it will bring out the best in him."

The youngsters pruning and trimming up on Little Roundtop hill were learning woodcraft and rudiments of forestry at a three-day "winter camporee." It was free, as are all activities sponsored by the Community Center, of any charge except for food, and it was fun. Boys and girls searched out tracks of deer and snowshoe rabbit; prepared samples of different woods; learned what a tree looks like when "a pine weevil's got it" and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 40

SUN-MA

Winter

OF SUNN

RAISIN TOPPERS

• Combine 1 cup light or dark SUN-MAID Raisins with ½ cup brown sugar (packed), 2 Tbs. flour, ⅓ cup water, ¼ tsp. salt. Cook, stirring, until thick. Stir in 2 Tbs. lemon juice. Cool. Sift 2 cups sifted all-purpose flour with 1 tsp. salt, 1 tsp. soda. Stir in 1½ cups brown sugar (packed). Cut in 1 cup shortening. Stir in 3 cups uncooked rolled oats, ⅓ cup water, grated rind 1 lemon, blending. Form balls, 1 Tbs. dough each. Place on greased baking sheet 2 in. apart. Flatten. Dent center with thumb. Fill with raisins. Bake at 375°F. 10 min. Let stand 5 min. Cool on wire rack. (Makes 3½ doz. cookies.)

RAISIN SUNSHINE SALAD

• Rinse ⅔ cup light or dark SUN-M
Raisins. Cover with water and bo minutes. Cool and drain. Dissolve package lemon-flavored gelatin in cups hot water. Blend in 2 Tbs. f lemon juice, 1 cup undrained cru pineapple, ¼ tsp. salt. Cook until slig thickened. Fold in the raisins and cups grated carrots. Turn into indivi molds. Chill until firm. Turn out serve on crisp salad greens. (Mak servings.) Good—and good looking!

SUNSWEET

Carnival

CALIFORNIA FRUITS

LOOK FOR THIS COLORFUL DISPLAY IN YOUR FOOD STORE

All the glorious bounty of California's sun-blessed vineyards and orchards awaits you now at the SUN-MAID-SUNSWEET Winter Carnival! Plump, golden peaches and apricots, tender raisin-variety grapes and luscious prunes are picked at the peak of the harvest—carefully processed to preserve flavor, precious iron, vitamins and minerals. And then these choice fruits are packed by the growers in protective flavor-sealed cartons—ready for you to enjoy during the winter and all year 'round!

• What better, brighter way to add summer goodness and extra energy to your family's cold-weather meals? Use SUN-MAID and SUNSWEET fruits in your baking and cooking—or enjoy 'em right from the box! Come to the SUN-MAID-SUNSWEET Winter Carnival at your food store and stock up on the best fruit buys of the season!

FREE

RECIPE BOOKS

• Serve dried fruits in easy, new ways! Send name, address to SUN-MAID RAISIN GROWERS OF CALIFORNIA, Box LHJ-30, Fresno, California. You'll receive free copies of "More Downright Delicious Sun-Maid Raisin Recipes" and SUNSWEET's new recipe book, "Visions of Sugarplums."

POT ROAST WITH PRUNES AND WINE

• Brown 4 lbs. beef chuck on all sides in 2 Tbs. hot shortening. Peel and chop 1 large onion. Add to pot and cook until soft and yellow. Add a No. 2½ can tomatoes and ¼ cup water. Cover and simmer 2½ to 3 hours. Add 1½ cups uncooked SUNSWEET Prunes, 1 cup red table wine, 2 tsp. salt, dash of pepper. Cook 30 to 45 min. longer. Cook an 8-oz. package noodles in boiling salted water. Drain. Place on serving platter. Sprinkle with ¼ cup grated Parmesan cheese. Top with slices of pot roast. Spoon sauce in the pan over the meat and serve. (Makes 6 to 8 generous servings.)

APRICOT-PEACH-PRUNE SNACK TRAY

• Steam ½ lb. SUNSWEET Prunes, and ½ lb. SUNSWEET Apricots and Peaches, or Mixed Dried Fruits over boiling water 10 min. Remove pits from prunes. Cut fresh marshmallows in quarters. Melt ½ lb. semi-sweet or milk chocolate over warm (not boiling) water, stirring frequently. Dip half the pitted prunes, one at a time, using two forks. Drain off excess chocolate. Set chocolate-covered prunes on waxed paper to harden. While they are cooling, fit marshmallow segments, almonds, walnuts and pecan halves into remaining pitted prunes. Arrange on bon-bon tray with peach and apricot halves.

THE TOUGH WAR AGAINST STAPH CONTINUES...

PNEUMONIA IS ON THE RISE

By Gene Wilburn, Medical News Writer, Houston Chronicle

A resistant breed of killer germ is holding the medical spotlight. Called Staphylococcus aureus (better known as "Staph")—it has become a tough winter adversary—as the known cause of a fatal form of pneumonia. Its principal victims are young babies, young mothers, students—in fact, anyone who is weak or under heavy stress.

There are many reports of mortalities due to "Staph" invading lungs which have been weakened by cold and flu. That is why, during the peak months of February and March, we must guard against cold infection and keep up resistance to it.

Infection by contact

Once in the family circle, "Staph" can cause great havoc—passing swiftly from one member of the family to the next. For, "Staph" can be spread by contact, causing other serious diseases.

"Staph" can be carried by almost anyone, sick or well—deposited by a carrier on the cleanest of household surfaces.

Anyone can pick up "Staph" just by touching a contaminated faucet, basin or bowl. That is why the bathroom can become a danger zone of "Staph" . . . and why strict bathroom disinfection is so essential.

Laboratory tests show that neither soap suds nor pine oil solutions kill "Staph"—that so-called "sanitizers" are not true germicides (they may not kill all disease germs they touch). But Lysol Brand Disinfectant kills disease germs on contact—including "Staph" and many deadly viruses. And, in laboratory tests, its anti-germ action was found to last 7 full days.

Basic steps for weekly bathroom cleaning

1. Use Lysol in cleaning solution as directed. 2. Wipe floors, walls, bowls, fixtures with this solution. 3. When laundering bath mats and lid covers, soak them in Lysol solution before adding detergent. Note: If anyone in your family has a boil (a direct source of "Staph" contamination)—disinfect bathtub, basin, bowl, seat with Lysol after every use.

Lysol disinfects from one cleaning to the next as nothing else can. Now in pine scent as well as regular, a bottle costs as little as 29¢.

SPECIAL NOTE:

Whenever there's sickness in your house, use Lysol. Use it to clean sickroom, bathroom, kitchen. To disinfect dishes and eating utensils, Lysol can help protect your family from infection by contact. Be sure you have it on hand. Check your medicine chest for other Sickroom Needs. Your druggist is featuring them now.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

how it would be bent and bowed as it continued to grow. There was time for skiing and tobogganing and square dancing too.

This camporee and the classes for junior foresters on most Saturday mornings are not the only times when the lodge and woods are put to good use. Here each summer, three days a week for eight weeks, is held the only community-conducted day camp in the state.

Day campers, children of townspeople and of the summer visitors who swell Bristol's population to 6000 from a wintertime 1600, are divided into small groups, and each picks its own campsite on the needle-blanketed floor of the woods. They study winds and seeds and plant and animal life. One summer they marked off pine plots to be trimmed in winter. Another year the project was reforestation—with the youngsters planting seedling pines.

Much used as this area is, activities there are not the whole of the comprehensive recreation program which Bristol citizens support. Hub of indoor activities and administrative headquarters for all programs, whether held in woods, lodge or town, is the Community Center building on North Main Street.

Kindergarten meets here five mornings a week, and junior-high and grade-school gym classes come during the day. As soon as school lets out, streams of children arrive—for archery, badminton, craft work, dancing or just getting together with friends over soft drinks or candy bars. There are tennis and pool tables, a basketball court, a stage and a riflery range. Across the street is the skating rink, and the supervised sledding area is not far. Ski classes are also available.

"It's the sort of thing we ought to want to give tax money for," says Maybeth across the counter of her bakery where crisp doughnuts fill cooky jars and the pungency of cinnamon and pie apples is in the air. "Perhaps some people fuss because we pay $10 per person in recreation taxes—it's the highest in the country, I understand—but I think that ought to be a feather in our caps. We're a pretty small town to have such a fine program and fine meeting place for our young."

The young appreciate it too. "You know," says teenage Jennie, "without the center and all the things it plans this town would be a real flop for us kids."

Church-sponsored in the beginning, it is still located in the building left empty when the Methodist and Congregational churches federated. "The first time we made use of the place, it was one Halloween," recalls white-haired Rev. A. Brownlow Thompson, a Methodist pastor, who for more than thirty years had tried to convince the town it needed a civic recreation program. "Some of the mothers came to me. They said if I could think

CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

LISTENING SLEEP

By SHIRLEY WILLARD CHAMBERLIN

The children sleep too deep for dreams
And man and pets know heavy slumber,
But the mother's sleep lies in the land
Close to waking where cares encumber.

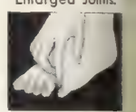
The small child's cry pulls puppet strings,
Propels her stiffly to his care.
Released, she staggers rag-doll limp
To sleep that listens and is aware.

Corn, Callous Bunion Pain Stops Fast!

SUPER-FAST RELIEF!

No other method like Dr. Scholl's!

Shape for Corns and Sore Toes.

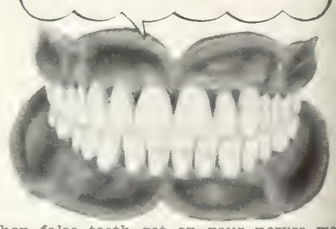


No waiting for action when you use soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. Just the pads alone on corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes stop pain almost instantly . . . ease new or tight shoes . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop.

Heart shape for Callouses, Pain, Burning here.

Special shape for Bunions, Enlarged Joints.

Special shape for Corns Between Toes.



Remove Corns, Callouses

Used with the separate Medications included in every box, Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads remove corns, callouses one of the fastest ways known to medical science! Get a box today. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. and 5-10¢ Stores everywhere.

For FREE Sample Packet of all sizes and Foot Care booklet, write Dr. Scholl's, Dept. 3Z13, Chicago 10, Ill.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

NOW! DENTISTS HELP OVERCOME THE SHOCK OF NEW FALSE TEETH- WITH FASTEETH

When false teeth get on your nerves many dentists give special FASTEETH powder. It helps hold teeth in place—helps keep them from slipping or dropping down when you talk—makes you feel more secure. FASTEETH cushions tender gums so you can bite harder and eat easier, faster with greater comfort. FASTEETH helps you laugh and speak more clearly without embarrassment. FASTEETH is alkaline (non-acid). Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). At drug counters everywhere.

PUT A STOP TO

"CONSTIPATION MISERY"!

Millions of people have found it is quite unnecessary to suffer cramps, headachy digestive upset and other miserable results of taking a laxative. At the same time they get prompter, more dependable results than from other laxatives.

They use Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets, the pure vegetable "prescription" containing the ingredient "of greatest value" for relieving intestinal overtenseness present in most constipation. Another ingredient promotes flow of intestinal lubricant to soften dry, hardened wastes. No griping. No stomach distress because it works in bowel lower down.

Proved 58% more effective than 6 other laxatives in hospital test. Ask for Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets at any drug store.

Acts Instantly....to give more complete pain relief from

Tense, Nervous Headaches

ETTER THAN ASPIRIN OR SPIRIN WITH BUFFERING

How Tension Headaches Start

1. Tension
Nervous tension builds up in neck and scalp muscles.

2. Pressure
Tension puts painful pressure on nerves and tiny blood vessels in the head.

3. Pain
Tension and pressure cause headache pain. Anacin contains special medication (not found in aspirin or any buffered aspirin) to relax tension, release pressure and relieve pain fast.

ANACIN® relaxes tension, releases pressure, relieves pain fast!

Tense, nervous headaches need the special medication in Anacin. Mere aspirin or even aspirin with buffering contains only one pain reliever and no special medication to relieve nervous tension. But Anacin contains a number of medically proven ingredients — each with a specific purpose. Anacin not only relieves pain incredibly fast but also contains special medication to relax tension and release painful pressure on the nerves — assuring a better 'total' effect — more complete relief from pain. Anacin Tablets are safer, too. They have a smoother action and do not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients in····

Totally new compact make-up

Powder+foundation—with no grease

Covers flaws and tired lines

Won't streak, won't change color

Cloth
French
Flair
Complete compact make-up

$1.50 plus tax

12 flattering shades

By HARLAN MILLER

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

"We grew up together, I carried your books in school, we got married, had a lovely family, married off three beautiful daughters, and all of a sudden you can't stand the sight of me."

I can't help asking, as our brave-new-world mechanisms go haywire in dumfounding rotation: Do a few picaresque manufacturers ever tell their dealers, "You'll clean up big profits on the repair bills alone"?

One of our town's clubmen wants to bet $100 that a chorus of local waitresses might turn out prettier and more graceful than a chorus of matrons and debs. Round 'em up and let's see!

At nearby colleges the fraternity boys and sorority girls vie in pursuit of good deeds; that is, they assign their "pledges" to do 'em. Why not find dates for lonely and bashful unaffiliated barbarians?

After a transcontinental motor trip, our lunch club's most intrepid explorer reports he could swim down the Mississippi with a coffee bean in his teeth and the river water would taste more like coffee than the roadside stuff he drank at a dime a cup.

An odd rule prevails in the "singleton" club for the fancy-free, recently organized downtown: male members must earn at least $5000 a year, female not under $3600! Also, there must be an equal number of each sex. . . . And why not more of the opposite sex?

Next to a teenager report card with good grades, what thrills pa most is good news from the dentist: Young Imogene and Horace have no new cavities! Never fear; they will, if they shirk that accusing stiff-bristled toothbrush.

With a certified list of New York's ten best restaurants, one of our wanderlusty gourmets ate ham and eggs in all ten. "Better test of a restaurant's character," he argues, "than their steaks."

I wonder why clubs, social circles or P.T.A.'s don't rent one of the vacant store rooms downtown as a rendezvous to rest, loaf or primp on shopping trips. Merchants might bait 'em with coffee or newspapers!

Much as I love Latin and calculus, I wonder if they couldn't squeeze into high school a course in household repairs for the young husband. So he might tangle with a dishwasher or an ailing garbage grinder, with a chance to win.

We've uncluttered our living room, shooing out three coffee tables, four chairs and several plants and quaint mementos. I doubt that an interior decorator could have improved the room much more.

One way I might induce my Dream Girl to wear unmatched earrings would be to hide one from each pair. (These concealment tactics work very well when I don't like one of her hats.)

Homeward bound from Japan, our lieutenant reports his three-year-old yelled as usual when he got his last twenty-five-cent Air Force haircut. "He won't yell any louder," he surmises, "when the next one costs $1.25."

As I pressured to scoot to the airport, I discovered that four of my five well-worn topcoats had apparently gone off to college with our youngest. All I had left to wear was my seventeen-year-old Army gabardine, minus the belt.

At our last P.T.A. party a fetching young matron of thirty-two was worrying about her fifteen-year-old daughter's heavy dating. "That's no age," she confessed with emotion, "for a girl to get married at." (Never finished high school herself.)

Our town's stingiest millionaire accuses his wife of stubbornness for declining to eat enough hors d'oeuvres at cocktail parties. "If you nibbled enough," he argues, "I wouldn't have to buy you dinner."

My Dream Girl gave me an ultimatum right after the overstuffed holidays: No more stuffing in our turkeys until I take off fifteen pounds; nor any ice cream in the freezer.

After a highly successful rummage and white-elephant sale, our Junior Leaguers discovered they themselves had done the bulk of the buying; they largely swapped their own castoff clothes and bric-a-brac.

One way the wily parents in the neighborhood trick their young into shoveling snow off the driveways is to hang basketball goals on their garages. So they can practice at the height of the season.

Since somebody told me Marlene Dietrich's legs were the most beautiful in the world, and that a French actress once had her gams insured for $1,000,000, I've kept careful track, and to date I've seen 17,849 women with prettier legs than either.

We attended a bon-voyage dinner for a lucky pair off to circle the globe in leisurely fashion. Our hosts, who must have paid the club at least $7 a plate for the meal, for 36 guests, claim they can't even afford a trip to Atlantic City.

. . . When my Princess of Sheer Delight responds instantly to my silliest question
. . . And our youngest snaps in color my favorite pictures at an art exhibition
. . . Or our daughter rattles off the names of five or six new antibiotics I haven't even heard of
. . . And our son obligingly gets assigned to an air base amid oodles of Colonial, Civil War and Southern landscapes we'd love to visit
. . . And our in-laws all turn out to be people we'd admire on airplanes
. . . Then my cup runneth over without marring my necktie.

What do steaks sizzle for?

Hunt's of course!

... because Hunt's is rich and thick and spiced with imagination!

America's new way to bake from Pillsbury
Bursting with hot buttery home-baked flavor

NEW! Refrigerated! Pillsbury Quick Butterflake Dinner Rolls

Fresh dough...
butter-layered...
all shaped
for you...
just bake!

(Makes 6 double rolls or 12 individual ones!)

Exciting new way to have fresh, home-baked dinner rolls in 12 minutes! Taste the golden touch of butter in every bite! These rolls are actually many layers of fresh dough—ready for your oven. The layers fan out as they bake—the tops turn delicately crisp, golden brown! Each roll flakes apart into bite-size morsels—bursting with buttery home-baked flavor. Get some! Pillsbury promises you the best in refrigerated fresh-dough foods.

...at your grocer's dairy case!

HOW CAN YOU TELL REAL LOVE?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

WHICH IS THE MAN FOR ME?

Anne's letter explained that she was nineteen and would complete a two-year college course in June. Her dilemma was set forth succinctly: "I can't make up my mind between a job, more school or getting married. I'm now dating three boys, all nice, attractive and good company. Each one wants me to go steady, and I could probably fall in love with any of them. I want to marry most of all, but I also want to be sure things will work out happily."

The unusual aspect of Anne's situation is her realistic approach to marriage. She realizes, as many girls do not, that there is more than one man in the world whom she could learn to love. What she was really asking for was guidance in deciding among three men. Now, before her emotions were deeply involved, she wanted to choose the one with whom she would have the best chance of building a secure marriage and enduring love.

Far from deprecating the importance of love in marriage, she wants to make the decision that will give love the best chance to grow and deepen. If more women considered security and stability before becoming too deeply involved in courtship, there would be fewer unsuccessful marriages.

When she came in, it was apparent that Anne was stable, outgoing and self-possessed. She had already decided against continuing in college for financial reasons, and had the promise of a full-time job on the campus after graduation. "The three fellows I'm interested in are all still in college, so that makes it perfect."

The counselor has neither the wish nor the right to make a decision for another person. Instead of helping Anne make a specific decision, we discussed with her some of the factors other than love that affect a couple's chances of married happiness. Here are some of the points we considered:

Age. Research indicates that, other things being equal, the "ideal" age for a man to marry (in terms of the chances of ultimate happiness) is between 22 and 30; for a girl, between 20 and 28. Within these limits, age in itself does not seem to be a crucial factor. Neither does age difference between husband and wife. The average young bridegroom today is two or three years older than his wife, but the difference can be greater, or less, or the wife can be the older, without negative effect on chances of married happiness, within the limits of the "ideal" ages set forth above.

Length of courtship. Every couple should have the opportunity to share a variety of experiences, to be together in many different situations and under adverse as well as favorable circumstances, before contemplating marriage. For people who attend college, the length of courtship and engagement should be at least two years. In my opinion, a long courtship and a relatively short engagement is preferable to a short courtship followed by a long engagement. Since at least a third of all first engagements are broken, it's likely that many of them would never have been undertaken had courtship been longer.

Economic security. Obviously, the least economic risk is involved if the man a girl marries is already established in a job he likes. If she marries a man who has still to complete his education or training, she must recognize the possibility that he may not be able to fulfill her expectations in this regard. Further, she may have to assume part of the responsibility for earning the living. This does not necessarily mean that the marriage must be postponed, but it does mean that both the girl and the man must realistically evaluate the situation and make plans to deal with it.

Timing of marriage. In general, it is better to postpone the wedding until immediate or foreseeable practical problems have been resolved. Are living quarters available? Is the husband's military service complete? Are job arrangements satisfactory? Are debts paid, family obligations fulfilled? Many young couples who answer such questions in the negative get married anyway—and many of them make a success of it. But at the very best, they get their marriage off to a difficult start. Often a delay of only a few months will give them time to eliminate the difficulty, or at least to make concrete plans to do so.

Personal differences. Differences of interest and taste can be submerged on a casual date, but they can create a solid barrier to companionship in day-to-day association. Fundamental differences of religious faith, if ignored during courtship, can be a source of prolonged and bitter dispute after marriage. An introverted male and an extroverted female who enjoyed dancing together but did not explore each other's personalities much beyond that may find it difficult to establish any real basis of understanding after marriage. All such differences should be considered and evaluated as early as possible in the courtship. If they cannot be resolved, it is far better for both the man and the girl if the relationship is terminated before the emotional involvement grows deeper.

Before the interview ended, it was clear that Anne had made her preliminary decision. Now she will apply the test of time, and if her choice was sound will undoubtedly become engaged soon. By taking every possible precaution to safeguard her relationship with the man of her choice—including the choice itself—Anne is doing her utmost to insure a serene, secure and affectionate marriage. Any girl considering becoming engaged, or going steady on a serious basis, can profit by her example.

THIS QUESTION OF PETTING

"The wives in our suburban neighborhood social group are in their late thirties or early forties, and nearly all of us have sons and daughters in high school or college. We all wonder and worry about certain things—petting, for example. Is my seventeen-year-old Marilyn as indiscreet as some of the girls in her senior class are said to be? Right now she is going steady, but she never has to worry about having a date, whether she is going steady or not. She expects to go to college, and we want her to, but I hear that pretty heavy drinking and petting go on in many colleges, and this worries me.

"Most of us mothers, I'm sure, would like to have some dependable information on this whole question of petting. How different is it from necking? Are more young girls petting? Is it as widespread as we hear, and why is it on the increase? When should we bring it up with our daughters, and what attitude should we take?"

Every mother is concerned about her children's standards of behavior, particularly those affecting relationships with the opposite sex. Unfortunately, the mother's concern is often greatest when her influence is least.

From early adolescence onward, the desire to be like the rest of the age group and to do what they do becomes increasingly powerful, and the influence of the parents correspondingly declines. Marilyn may agree or disagree with her contemporaries' opinions, but her own beliefs will inevitably be influenced by theirs to some degree.

The question of what her mother's attitude toward petting should be is subtle, delicate, and depends on the individual situation. In fact, she—and every other mother similarly concerned—must answer it for herself. But perhaps factual information will suggest a few principles which apply generally.

Necking usually refers to simple kissing and embracing. Petting, in contrast, is more intimate, involves closer bodily contact, and is intended to arouse sexually colored feeling or response.

Petting has increased, and is beginning at younger ages. The same is true of dating. In fact, compared with the increase in dating, the increase in petting is slight.

As to the extent of petting, estimates indicate that some four fifths of all girls have had one or more petting experiences by the time they are eighteen. However, it should be remembered that there are degrees of petting; probably not more than one fourth of girls have engaged in heavy petting by twenty. Further, this does not mean that most dating involves petting. Actually, most petting is confined to couples who are going steady or are considering engagement and marriage.

In evolving a code of behavior with her daughter, the mother must take account of these facts if she wants her counsel to be heeded. She cannot expect her daughter automatically to accept the code she herself observed, because the situation is not the same. If the daughter knows that her mother's recommendations, whatever their nature, are based on some understanding of present circumstances, rather than on "ancient" memories, she will be far more likely to heed them.

But if mother and daughter are to evolve a code together (the only effective way), the mother must have established an easy, comfortable, confidential relationship with her daughter. All too often this is not the case. Our studies of college girls show that only half of the parents have discussed with their daughters how they should behave on dates, and just over a third have specifically discussed petting. Nearly half of the girls say they are unable to discuss matters of sex with any member of their families.

Surely any daughter should feel free to discuss sex, or anything else, with her mother. The attitude Marilyn's mother takes toward sex, though important, is less so than her attitude toward Marilyn. She should be willing to state her own beliefs, clearly and without embarrassment (some mothers won't, through an excessive fear of dominating), but she should be more interested in hearing her daughter's. The mother who is open-minded enough to give in to her daughter on some things is far more likely to have her way on big issues than is the mother who is sure she is right just because she is mother, and tries to govern by edict.

ASK YOURSELF:

Might he make a good husband?

Even though you may not now be seriously interested in any of the men you are dating, your attitude could change without much warning—especially if you are emotionally ready for marriage and receptive to love. By answering these questions in respect to each man you date who seems generally qualified for marriage, you may be able to evaluate their individual desirability as husbands.

Does he:

1. Work in a field that you respect?
2. Value what people think of him?
3. Accept women as equals?
4. Take his responsibilities seriously?
5. Know what he wants from life?
6. Manage money wisely?
7. Seem to be interested in marriage?
8. Act kindly toward strangers?
9. Have friends of whom you approve?
10. Behave in ways that please you?
11. Have religious views like yours?
12. Like your friends and relatives?
13. Share several basic interests with you?
14. Always treat you considerately?

Unless you can answer these questions accurately, you certainly don't know a man well enough to appraise his eligibility for marriage. And whether you fall in love with him or not, the more "Yeses" he earns, the better husband he is going to make for some girl. (Happy wives agree this is true, since nearly all of them answer eleven or more questions "Yes," while unhappy wives usually score eight or less.)

Only Royal is made with special
Swiss Chocolate Flavor

Royal

Rich Flavor, Deep Flavor, Smooth Flavor's Why Royal Makes Better Pudding And Pie

When you open a Royal Pudding package you open a new world of flavor. Try Regular Chocolate made with Royal's special Swiss Chocolate flavor; Dark 'n' Sweet made with fine Dutch Process Chocolate flavor; Butterscotch made with 100% pure butterscotch flavor; and Vanilla made from the finest Madagascar vanilla beans enhanced with vanillin. Royal also makes 6 delicious Instant Puddings, and 3 tempting Tapioca Puddings.

And remember, every serving of Royal Pudding gives your family rich milk nourishment.

For Exciting Flavors Switch to Royal.

Only Royal has two chocolate flavors—Regular Chocolate (Swiss Chocolate flavor) . . . and Dark 'n' Sweet (Dutch Chocolate flavor). Try them both.

Another Fine Product of Standard Brands Inc.

Add excitement to eggs ...add Tabasco®!

(The seasoning that sings)

The unique Tabasco flavor begins when we take this pepper . . . The proud strain that the McIlhenny family has watched over for more than a century . . . Press it tenderly, keeping all the essential flavorful oils . . . Mellow it for years like fine wine in oaken casks . . . And finally put it in this famous bottle. Then this liquid pepper seasoning is ready to spread singing flavor through all your favorite foods. See . . .

*Registered Trademark for McIlhenny Co. Pepper Sauce

EGGS BENEDICT
The Tabasco magic is in the Hollandaise Sauce that covers poached eggs on sliced ham, served on English muffins. For breakfast, brunch or lunch. Another famous recipe from the Tabasco recipe booklet.

TABASCO EGGS
For this famous dish from the Tabasco recipe booklet you drop the eggs, one at a time, into simmering cream, flavor-sparked with Tabasco. Sprinkle with bread crumbs, parsley and Parmesan cheese, serve on toast—mmmm!

FRIED EGGS DELUXE
Browned butter, lemon juice, chives and Tabasco—start your day just right by adding real eye-opening flavor to fried eggs fixed to your taste. Sound an extra flavor-note by adding capers to the sauce.

FLUFFY OMELET
Good news for those who think omelets are difficult. The new Tabasco recipe booklet has a never-fail method for an extra-tasty, extra-fluffy triumph of an omelet. (Flavor secret: that ¼ teaspoon Tabasco.)

WESTERN SCRAMBLED EGGS
Tabasco adds exciting new flavor to the familiar favorite . . . eggs, chopped ham, onions, green pepper, salt. Serve with piping hot biscuits.

GLAMORIZED BOILED EGGS
Breakfast eggs wake up when you add a dash of Tabasco—and a dash of thyme, or a teaspoon of sherry. Spread toast strips with a blend of butter and herbs, such as chives, parsley or thyme—and a dash of Tabasco.

YOUR FAVORITE RESTAURANT knows many exciting ways to prepare eggs, using Tabasco. Look for them on the menu.

Tabasco*... the liquid pepper seasoning

NEW 40-PAGE BOOKLET—dozens of exciting recipes. Send inside flap from Tabasco carton or 10c to Tabasco, Dept. LH-3, Avery Island, Louisiana.

"Tabasco" is also available in Canada.

Copyright 1960, McIlhenny Co., Avery Island, La.

Corinne Griffith's COOKBOOK

I PIETRO

"Wherever we traveled, I gathered recipes."

Another in a series of her round-the-world favorites.

On his return to the United States after he Revolutionary War, the Marquis de Lafayette called on Mary Washington, nother of George Washington, to pay his espects. She was living at her home in Fredericksburg, Virginia. He found her in he garden, in a short gown, petticoat and ap, raking leaves. Unaffectedly she greeted im and together they went into the house, where she made a cool mint drink. With it he served spiced ginger cake. Listening with pleased attention to the Frenchman's praises of her son, her reply was, "George was always a good boy."

The recipe for the Lafayette Ginger Cake erved to me was in an old, worn cookery ook. Here is an up-to-date version:

LAFAYETTE GINGER CAKE

Heat together 1 cup dark molasses and 1½ up each butter, brown sugar, milk and trong coffee. Remove from heat when utter is melted and sugar dissolved. Sift ogether 3 cups flour, 2 tablespoons owdered ginger and 1 teaspoon each innamon, mace, nutmeg and cream of artar. Beat 3 eggs until thick and lemon-olored as for spongecake. Fold the dry in-redients into the molasses mixture alter-ately with the beaten eggs. Add 1 teaspoon aking soda to the last addition of flour nd fold in also. Next add ½ cup orange uice and the grated rind from 1 orange. our batter into a waxed-paper-lined 3″ x 9″ x 2″ pan. Sprinkle with ½ cup nely chopped candied ginger. Bake bout 40 minutes in a moderate oven, 50° F. Can be served warm or cold, with - without the strawberry-cheese topping.

Strawberry-Cheese Topping: Moisten a 8-ounce package cream cheese with a ttle cream or commercial sour cream. lend in 2 teaspoons brown sugar. Spread ½ cup strawberry jam over cake. Cover ith the cream-cheese mixture. Serve im-ediately.

●

Lemon, apple and dried plums flavor this electable dish from far-off Finland.

PLUMSIARD PORKKARI

(Finnish Pork Pot Roast)

ub a 3½-pound pork shoulder roast, hich has been boned and tied, with the ice of 1 lemon. Soak 6 large prunes in 2 ps hot water for 10 minutes; remove ts and reserve the liquid. Peel and core apple and cut into 6 wedges. In 2 rows ake 12 slits in the roast and fill them, ternately, with prunes and apple wedges. he fruit should be barely visible. Place a roasting pan, add the liquid from the unes, ½ teaspoon salt and ¼ teaspoon ch black pepper and spice Parisienne erb-spice blend). Place meat thermome-r in roast with bulb in center of thickest rt and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., until temperature reaches 185° F.—about 3 hours. Baste frequently. Add 2 cups chicken stock to the pan after the first hour. When roast is done, remove strings and place on a hot platter. Skim excess fat from gravy and thicken with flour-and-water paste. Glaze roast with a small amount of gravy and pass the rest separately. Makes 8 servings.

●

Anchovy salad is my choice with crisp fried chicken. Add hot Italian bread and a pale yellow cheese. Dessert should be fruit—plus strong black coffee.

ANCHOVY SALAD

Marinate overnight in ½ cup white wine vinegar a 2-ounce can anchovy fillets which have been drained and cut into 1″ lengths and 1 small onion, peeled and sliced. Also add to the marinade 1 thin slice lemon. (If you prefer, ½ cup white wine may be used instead of the vinegar.) The next day, prepare a salad of romaine, chicory, lettuce and parsley. About 1 quart greens will be sufficient. Drain the anchovies and onion, discarding the marinade. Add to the salad and toss lightly with the following dressing: mix together ¼ cup salad oil and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. For the final touch sprinkle with coarsely ground black pepper. Makes 4 servings.

●

For a sure-fire buffet supper attraction, I often serve

CHICKEN BRUNSWICK

Place a 5-pound stewing hen in a large kettle with 1 quart water, 1 tablespoon salt and a few celery leaves. Simmer, covered, for several hours until tender. Allow to cool in broth. Skim fat from broth. Remove chicken from bones and cut into bite-sized pieces. Prepare a cream sauce using 3 tablespoons butter, 3 tablespoons flour, 1½ cups chicken broth and 1 cup light cream. Cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Add 2 cups grated sharp yellow cheese and continue cooking until sauce is smooth. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate and a dash of pepper. In a large bowl mix the chicken with the cream sauce. Add 1 pound mushrooms which have been sliced and sautéed in butter, 1 cup cooked rice, 1 cup slivered blanched almonds and 1 tablespoon minced onion. Pour into a 2-quart casserole. Sprinkle with a few chopped almonds and bake for 40 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F., until lightly golden and bubbly. Makes 6 servings.

Editors' Note: Corinne Griffith, the motion-picture star, has collected recipes in many countries—from famous hosts and hostesses and from obscure (but superb) cooks.

pyright, 1955, by Corinne Griffith. Corinne Grif-h's cookbook, Eggs I Have Known, is published by rrar, Straus and Cudahy, New York.

It's "Cream of Wheat" weather . . . so guard your family with enriched "Cream of Wheat".

A full day's supply of iron in every hot, healthy bowl—more iron than even beef liver gives. Plenty of energy-making protein, vitamins, other minerals, too. Delicious!

"CREAM OF WHEAT" AND CHEF REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. ©1960, THE "CREAM OF WHEAT" CORP.

One simple change will make a remarkable difference in these bunwiches...cross out "salad dressing"...specify

MIRACLE WHIP

Actually, Miracle Whip is more than just a "salad dressing." It is a truly different and distinctive dressing, luxuriously smooth . . . and simply wonderful tasting.

To make Miracle Whip, Kraft not only uses more expensive ingredients, but more of them, too —plenty of good country eggs and the very best salad oil.

And Kraft combines these fine ingredients in a special way that gives the creamiest, smoothest texture imaginable.

But it is Miracle Whip's flavor that's really exciting. A uniquely delicious flavor no one has ever been able to copy. That's where Miracle Whip makes such a difference in your sandwiches . . . that flavor plus its extra richness.

Try it! You'll see why Miracle Whip Salad Dressing is America's favorite by far.

Journal about town

What we do
Where we go
Whom we meet

EDITED BY EILEEN SHARPE

Before the first robin: a poster.

50 years ago in the Journal

In March, 1910, John D. Rockefeller, Sr., tried to give the U.S. Government $100,000,000 for "general humanitarian purposes" and was turned down. William Jennings Bryan celebrated his fiftieth birthday near Lincoln, Nebraska, and Alexander Graham Bell, sixty-three this month, was working full time on a new invention—a flying machine. The lovely song "Girl of My Dreams" was written, and the first self-starter appeared in automobiles.

In the March, 1910, JOURNAL, Editor Bok criticizes two new dances, the Firefly Dance and the Moonlight Dance, during which ballroom lights are dimmed. "The suggestiveness of dancing amid surroundings of semi-darkness by young people is, to say the least, not wholesome and is redolent of lurking dangers. Parents, beware."

In a new department called Life Stories as told by the men and women who have lived them, the JOURNAL presents in this issue "Why I Am a Life Prisoner in Sing-Sing Prison" and "What It Means to be a Chorus Girl."

"Olga: Thin, nervous girls are sometimes advised to eat one grape a minute for an hour at a time, several times a day, eating little else except dry bread. Disordered digestions are frequently restored by such a routine, known in Germany as the grape cure."

Fashion: "At fourteen, a girl's skirts should be halfway down the calf of her leg. At fifteen, they should cover the calf. At sixteen they should come to the tops of her shoes and at seventeen to her ankles. At eighteen she is a young lady and can make up her own mind; but if she is wise, her skirts will be no higher than four inches from the ground."

"I am engaged to a young woman whose table manners show little lapses," writes Carter. "For instance, when passing her plate for seconds, she holds her fork and knife in her fists until her plate is returned. I hope she reads this in the JOURNAL, as I don't want her to be criticized." Comments Mrs. Kingsland, "Commendable thoughtfulness!"

Home note: "Simply made black dresses of mohair with pretty frilly aprons are the most useful and becoming uniforms for maids. Above all else, the aprons should at all times be spotless."

Spring comes early to our town as the International Flower Show opens. Over 200,000 plant fanciers, 80 per cent of them women, will see the fierce tiger lily lie down with the gentle marigold. But all is not quiet on the floral front. The fight for a national flower goes on. We just heard from the Florists' Telegraph Delivery Association: "A million Americans voted—and it's the rose by a nose." Runners-up were carnation and chrysanthemum. Grass finished eighteenth. Our own Joyce Posson was watching the corn tassel—it came in nineteenth—and sped off a consoling note to a reader. "She's been writing us passionately for years, asking, 'Did the Pilgrims find hothouse flowers when they landed? No!'"

More poetry news this month: among the 52,000 poems Elizabeth McFarland reads a year, a steady sender has been Janet Henry, of Cleveland Heights, Ohio. Her verse about the cat-and-doggerel days with four children is now in a book called "This Side of Sanity." She calls it a part-time handbook for full-time mothers and says half the poems appeared in the JOURNAL. Profits are earmarked "for something practical. To quote my book: 'We don't buy figurines with fancy labels—just ones to fit the scratches on the tables!'"

Politics being in the air, writer Margaret Parton has been busy interviewing headline men, while we kept our ear to the ground at a recent party powwow to hear what their wives were saying. On housing: "Governors' mansions are hard work except for the honor of it—one has a single bathroom and it's on the third floor." On social life: "It's impossible to get politicians together at a dinner table—they all stand in corners and confer." Mrs. Hubert Humphrey at a recent tea party wistfully summed up the domestic problem: "To have dinner with your husband, you make an 'appointment' on his calendar."

Query received by our awed colleague Peter Briggs: "Would you be interested in an article on Eskimos, psychosomatic medicine, curry dinners or Yugoslavia, from a woman's point of view?"

One of the people we've often met in our elevators is Betsy Palmer en route to her television work. Our photographer Joe Di Pietro always noted her as pretty, never knew she could cook, until he and Homemaking Editor Margaret Davidson went to her kitchen to sample savory artichokes, spaghetti al dente, homemade pasta. Our man, a specialist in Italian cooking himself, was won. There are two sequels to this. "Unforgettable Kitchens" starts on page 64. Gourmets Joe and Betsy now exchange recipes while the elevator man, we and the other passengers all take notes.

Incredible: you can look like our cover girl for under $5. Pattern Editor Nora O'Leary had to spell it out for us. This month's cover is Vogue Pattern No. 9966. Allowing $3.75 for cotton or gingham, 75 cents for pattern, 30 cents for zipper, 10 cents for thread, it turns out to be the surprise of the year—checked and double-checked.

Your husband won't believe it.

On-the-go Grahams and Glenn (center) debate.

What a writer needs besides a pencil is endurance. When Glenn White interviewed dynamo millionaire Bill Graham (see page 176), "We golfed, trapshot, boated, water-skied, hiked, rode horses, fished, frog-hunted, played tennis." Glenn also wrote, averaged four hours' sleep a night. When Bill came back from Africa all viewed his trophies, including a fifteen-foot snakeskin. What use? "Make a satchel for liniment," suggested Glenn. Marge Graham was tempted, but had her own ideas—"Bags and shoes!"

a Country Tale

by Isak Dinesen

There was a wood path running along the stone fence at the western edge of a wood. Outside the fence the open landscape lay calm and golden, already marked by the hand of autumn. The large fields were empty, the harvest was gathered in and only the rakings were left, set up here and there in low stacks. Some way off, on a field road, a last cartload was rolling toward the barn in a cloud of golden dust. The distant woods to the north and south were brownish-green, gently and gravely gilt or rusted by the sun of long summer days. The woods to the west were deep blue; from time to time a faint blue tinged the fields as well, where a flight of wood pigeons rose from the stubble. Along the fence the last honeysuckle, upon limp stalks, was giving out its farewell fragrance, and the bramble already had scarlet leaves and black, ripe berries. But the depth of the forest was still green, a summer vault, and where the beam of the afternoon sun fell through the verdure it became luminous and filled with promise, like May foliage. The path wound in and out and up and down the forest slopes. It swerved toward the fence, as if it meant to unite the wood world with the open country, then shrank back again as if in fear of giving away a secret.

A young man, bareheaded, in a riding coat, and a young lady came walking along the path. Her frock, with the belt just below the breasts, trailed lightly on the ground and, as she walked on, rolled a dry beechnut of last year along, as a wavelet plays with a pebble on the beach. She let her dark eyes under long lashes glide lovingly and happily over the forest scenery, like a young housewife going through her house and finding everything in good order.

They walked along slowly and easily; they were at home in the wood and belonged to it. Their clothes and carriage told that they were a young squire and squire's lady of the fair, rich green isle.

Where the path took off and ran over the fence toward the fields she stood still and gazed out into the distance. To her companion, who stopped with her, it was as if he did not himself see the landscape before them, but only through her knew that it existed, and what it meant. It became infinitely lovely within her eyes and mind, lovelier than itself, a silent poem. She did not turn toward him; she rarely did so, and very rarely on her own offered a caress. Her form and color, the fall of her rich dark hair and the lines of her shoulders, her long hands and slim knees, in themselves were caresses; her entire being and nature was to enchant, and she craved for nothing else in life. On his way to the wood he had pondered the problem of the vocation of man; now he thought, The vocation of a rose is to exhale scent; for that reason do we plant roses in our garden. But a rose on its own exhales a sweeter scent than we could ever demand of it. It craves for nothing else in life.

"What are you thinking of now that you tell me not?" she asked. He did not answer at once, and she CONTINUED ON PAGE 160

© 1957 BY ISAK DINESEN. A COUNTRY TALE IS TAKEN FROM THE COLLECTION "LAST TALES" RECENTLY PUBLISHED BY RANDOM HOUS

"Women," he told himself, "have another kind of happiness and another kind of truth." But there were five women in the problem before him. Which one—and which truth—should he believe?

THE DUKE A

THE GIRL

Could this be the duke who had launched a hundred debs? Mathilda wondered. Was the wan look on his face from love—or from hunger?

By DOROTHY BLACK

Efficiency was the keynote of the office. Keep it snappy. Impact, said Bill, that was the idea. He carried it to all lengths. He had not asked Mathilda to marry him the previous evening. He had kissed her—with impact—somewhere around midnight, and told her she was going to. Bill was the editor, bulldozing his way to the top and fame. Everyone said so, and his superiors thought very highly of him.

Mathilda couldn't be certain she wanted to marry him. She was a girl who found it difficult to make up her mind, even when she saw a good opportunity. There was a soft side to her, in spite of the two years she had worked on the magazine with Bill. She had secret longings for something gentler. With lace on it.

Because they were all working on a women's magazine, love was, so to speak, always with them. No desk but was littered with photographs of bouncing babes and all their artless ways. It made you feel it would be fun to have a try at it yourself, instead of just writing about it. And, since Mathilda was a businesswoman, it did not elude her that if an A.D.C. can marry the general's daughter, or a woman reporter her editor—well, it doesn't exactly do her any harm.

Another point was, Bill wanted to marry her, and no one else had asked her. Still, last night had not been a howling success. Mathilda was not sure she wanted all that brisk impact in her private life all the time, because of the strange yearnings a girl got when she saw a golden sunset, or smelled the scent of roses on a summer's evening, or the fragrance of mignonette from an old-fashioned flower bed in some ancestral home she was writing up.

Another thing. The subeditorship was coming vacant and why, Bill had said, not a husband-and-wife act? "It's fashionable nowadays," he pointed out. "It's well worth thinking about."

Bill knew she had not responded quite as he had hoped. Maybe he sensed he had overdone the heartiness, for this morning he had brought her a bunch of violets.

"And look at this. Right up your street."

She peered over his shoulder at the paper he had spread out, but could see nothing CONTINUED ON PAGE 159

THE YELLOW BRICK ROAD

By ELIZABETH CADELL

She did not remember what had happened, and now she was afraid to retrace the steps that led backward into darkness.

The girl sitting at the dressing table finished combing her hair. On the whole, she mused, she didn't look too bad. Her color had come back. The odd, frightened stare that had confronted her when she had looked at herself two days ago was gone.

What had happened was over; the doctor, who had just paid his last visit, had paused at the door to tell her emphatically that the sooner she forgot about the incident, the better it would be. The thing to do was to go back to her job without any of these uneasy, over-the-shoulder glances he had noticed. She must, he insisted, rid herself of her absurd suspicions that there had been anything sinister connected with the affair. Nothing of the kind. She had fallen down a flight of stairs; she had been found and picked up and restored to consciousness and brought home and put to bed for a couple of days—and now she could get up and take up things where she had left them, and be more careful in future, and good morning to you.

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE IN-ONE ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

She was better. Her reflection proved it. She was ready to go back to work. And the sooner she got downstairs, the sooner her sister, Estelle, could stop carrying trays up and down. There was enough work in the house without that.

She walked out of the room into a long, low corridor and went through a door that led to a gallery. Here she paused to look at the beautiful hall below, with its gray, immensely thick stone walls, its high Gothic windows, its decorated ceiling. It was easy to understand her brother-in-law's pride as he led parents of prospective pupils across the smooth lawns separating the school from his house, and ushered them into this lovely old hall. She had heard often enough their admiring exclamations, and Michael's replies, given in his calmest, coolest, most headmasterlike manner, to questions on period and style. Twelfth-century foundations —— —— and twelfth-century amenities, reflected Jody Hern, going down the wide, shallow, shining uncarpeted stairs. There were two pictures presented to the world, and both were out of focus. Strangers saw the headmaster, thirty-five, tall, handsome, urbane, playing host in the historic library and dropping the names

CONTINUED ON PAGE 98

She had come back to consciousness filled with a nameless dread.

Caroline, two, gets a rare treat. Most of Jack and Jacqueline Kennedy's time is spent campaigning these days. "No effort is too great for the presidency," Kennedy says, "but I will not accept the vice presidential nomination under any circumstances."

JACK KENNEDY

Democratic Dynamo

By JOAN YOUNGER PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Tall, dark and handsome, Senator John Fitzgerald Kennedy of Massachusetts walked down the hall of the Senate Office Building, and all along the way people stopped to watch him pass.

"The uncrowned prince of politics," a reporter said. "The All-American boy grown to glory."

"He's very capable," said the congressman with him.

"I think he's just plain cute," said the teenage visitor. "Do you think he will give me his autograph?"

For almost four years now Kennedy has moved in this aura of wary excitement, approval and charmed delight. Ever since he was catapulted to national notice by the 1956 battle for the Democratic vice-presidential nomination, he has been heralded as the party's obvious choice for the presidency, and his good looks and pleasing personality have been treated as his major political assets. Fortunately for Jack Kennedy, however, behind that façade of easy victory lie other characteristics he can draw on now as the

Much of his mail comes from teenagers.

of decision draws near—for, as well as being a charmer, he is a long-range planner, a thoughtful fighter, and a man whose drive and stamina are rooted in the simple declaration, "I love my work."

"He's never been taken in by his publicity," a politician said. "He cut himself a three-piece pattern to get the nomination some time ago, and he's never forgotten it. He's out to make a record in the Senate—get acquainted nationally—and win delegates politically. And he juggles all three at one time."

"He can put in a full day at the Senate, fly to Cleveland, say, make a speech, fly back, snatch a little sleep, hold a breakfast conference and then show up on the floor, fit as a fiddle and as wound strung," one colleague said. Said his secretary: "I get in here before nine, and often he's already here—and I never plan to leave before seven-thirty." Said an old friend: "He's got the secret of youth. He loves politics, but he's not emotional about it. He's got a great ability to grasp both the big picture and the meaningful detail. And somehow he manages to separate his personal life from his political life. No matter how demanding his work has been, when he's through with it, he relaxes with the same concentration with which he works." Said an aide: "He's not a man to look back. He's on to the next thing. It's deep waters run fast in his case." Said a newsman: "He's beautifully disciplined. Behind that generous smile is a cool, calculating machine that is constantly saying, 'What's in it for me?'"

"I cannot bear to be away from Caroline long," Jacqueline says.

As a writer, Kennedy is a serious speaker. His fall's trip covered 100,000 miles, 20 states, 173 lunches: he spoke "almost constantly!" This is Southern Illinois stop.

Jacqueline would prefer a quieter life," Kennedy says, but both like to walk, swim, sail, travel and work. Dog and house are neighbor's at Hyannis Port, Massachusetts.

Said his wife, Jacqueline: "Sometimes you have a man of ideas, sometimes a man of action; not often both in one, which is a kind of greatness. To me Jack's not boyish, as some people think, nor even very youthful. To me he's a mature man with an incredible mind who's enormously energetic."

Factually speaking, Jack Kennedy will be forty-three this May twenty-ninth, is six feet tall, and weighs 160 pounds. His hair is a dark chestnut with some gray in it; his eyes are blue with slanted lids, and, when he is not in motion, he likes to sit with his arms folded. He has a bachelor degree cum laude, and an honorary doctorate from Harvard, and sits on its board of overseers as an alumni representative. He has written two books of historical interest, one of which was a Pulitzer-prize winner, and more than twenty articles. Like many men of wealth, he rarely carries cash; and like many inveterate readers, he sometimes forgets he is talking to someone and picks up a paper which interests him. In college he played football, was on the swimming team, and he has sailed various kinds of boats since he was a

CONTINUED ON PAGE 145

The cup

By MARGARET RUSSELL

Elaine loved
her husband madly,
and didn't mean
to neglect him.
But why couldn't
George understand
that their poor, unfortunate neighbors
needed her too? . . .

Desperately!

u're trying to make me responsible
, no, dear," said Elaine.
couldn't if you wanted."

They stood in the bedroom in a patch of morning sunlight. He was tall, straight, gloomy of mien and ouserless. She was short, bent, cheerful of exterior, and engaged in the ocess of attaching a button to the front of his shirt.

He said, his eyes fixed on a point in mid-air, "I suppose you know we're ly one step away from complete dissolution."

She winced. Oh, well, she thought, it was my day yesterday.

She said mildly, "Now, George, don't be cross. You know it's catching."

"Just one clean, complete shirt daily," George growled. "That's all I k. Really, Elaine, you should budget your time."

That's the way it goes, Elaine reminded herself. One day the cup overflows, d the next there's only a teaspoonful in it.

"Darling," she said, "if I ever get a minute I will."

A gleam pierced the gloom of George's countenance. He said, seizing on what he considered to be a very fine opening, "You'd have plenty of inutes if you'd stop wet-nursing all the freaks in the neighborhood."

Elaine's fingers tightened on her needle. Now that, she thought, is going o far. The quarrel was progressing from the cocktail to the roast-beef stage.

"And I think you," Elaine said, deciding to help it along, "would be ise not to speak to anybody mornings. Sometimes not afternoons either."

"I get so eternally tired," George said, ignoring the comment, "of the way you —— Yi!" It was a bass roar of pain. "You did that on purpose!"

"Darling," Elaine protested, "I never would."

"It'll probably bleed," George predicted, and he stared down at his chest, waiting for the enormous, spreading blossom to appear.

Elaine's tousled head moved under his nose. She bit thread. "There!" she said. "All done. Is there anything else I can do for you, dear?"

Her hair brushed George's face, and his expression softened. And hardened again. "I know what you're up to," he declared, jerking away. "You're trying to make me feel guilty because you didn't have my shirt ready. Well, it won't work. I refuse to be responsible for your shortcomings."

He donned his trousers violently.

"Dear, you couldn't if you wanted," Elaine said. "Don't worry about it."

Pauline ran into the room, black eyes snapping with excitement.

"Look, mamma! Look, daddy!" She held up a tooth. "It came out. Peter pulled it. Do I get a dime?"

Elaine smiled down at her daughter. "Of course you do. Put it under your pillow tonight."

Peter appeared in the doorway, grinning broadly. "I get half," he said.

"You didn't knock," George told Pauline, frowning. "Two cents off your allowance."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 186

ILLUSTRATED BY TOM LOVELL

Who is Doctor

What kind of baby was Dr. Spock? How did his mother influence his life? The story of America's most loved baby doctor—

By HILDEGARDE DOLSON

Little Benny, oldest of the six Spock children, was born at home. His mother, now 80, has never been in a hospital.

In a photograph of the Yale crew that made a splash by winning in the 1924 Olympics, there's a handsome young man six feet four, with a wide, warm grin, and brown hair parted and slicked like a Scott Fitzgerald hero's. He had decided to be a doctor instead of an architect, and it's rather intriguing to speculate now on what kind of buildings Benjamin Spock might have designed. It's safe to guess that none of them could have had quite so colossal and homey an impact as his book on baby and child care. Since the paperback edition was published in 1946, it has outsold any other book in this country except the Bible and some plays by an actor named Shakespeare. Around the world, mothers cry for it in sixteen languages, including Japanese and Finnish. A few months ago Spock explained to a visitor, "I don't think of myself as an author, because I think of an author as somebody who makes things up."

At the time he finished the book, he was forty-two, the father of two boys, and a New York pediatrician with years of enormously varied practical experience to draw on. He felt no qualms about sending chapters to experts in the field to get their criticism. "But I showed it to my mother with trepidation," he says.

His mother, a large, firm-minded woman as upright as a New England steeple, had brought up six children under what a family friend has described as "a tight curb rein,"

Young Benjamin McLane Spock all dressed u his first birthday picture. Dr. Spock says his bringing was "strict, careful, but not rig Spock?

A serious consultation between doctor and patient—which both seem to enjoy equally. Dr. Spock now has a red-haired, year-old grandson, who is being brought up by guess whose book.

HAROLD CRANE

Summers find Dr. Spock and his pretty wife, Jane, ai ng off Cape Cod in their twenty-three-foot sloop, The 'u le. Younger son, John, and a friend, Mrs. John Heroy te shirt), accompany them.

w Haven, Connecticut. Spock's father, a lawyer, was as devoted e children as his wife, but it was she who was "the spokesman ur upbringing," her oldest son says.

s mother's only comment after reading Baby and Child Care was: y, Benny, it's really quite sensible."

r son says, "I was relieved. I took that as high praise."

has said modestly that in an era when young couples are often ated from their families, his book of common-sense advice was t as "a substitute for grandmother." Not all grandmothers take is kindly. One wrote Doctor Spock in ink flavored with bile: "You to have a great deal of influence with my daughter. I wish you d write at once and tell her to put more clothes on her child."

ock, recounting this to a visitor in his office at Cleveland's West- Reserve University Medical School, where he's been Professor of l Development since 1955, gave a great, joyous guffaw. "Can't ust see me?" he said. "Sending that poor young mother an ulti- um: 'Madam, you're to put more clothes on your child at once.'"

He was 21 years old, 6′4″ tall, and weighed 180 pounds when he rowed on the Yale crew in the 1924 Olympics. He weighs only five pounds more today.

When he thinks something is funny, especially a joke on himself, he roars with laughter, and often bends over nearly double. Seated, he winds his long legs around a chair, tilts back, and gives the impression of a man as relaxed as a cracker-barrel regular. At the age of fifty-six, he weighs only four or five pounds more than when he rowed on the Yale crew—180—but his hair is gray and crew-cut now, and his face bears no resemblance to the smooth, unlived-in face of that boy. It's lined, weathered and far more attractive, with humor, strength, compassion and an unspoiled, friendly directness. His wife told an acquaintance this year,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 135

Unforgettable Kitchens

INTERIORS: F

Ten pages of kitchens as glamorous as living rooms begin here. With style and grace, these kitchens demonstrate brilliantly how rooms as functio as these can be beautiful as well. They contain many individual ideas inspiring to all who plan kitchens.

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

Spacious divider has oven and counter at one side, and (right) holds old and amusing chicken collection.

COLOR PHOTOGRAPHS BY WESLEY BALZ

DI PIETRO

The bishop and his wife enjoy quiet afternoon. Music is his hobby; home houses many records.

Living room has pewter collection and a half-round hunt table for dinners or Sunday teas. Special receptions are held here too.

"Our old weathered wood is a joy."

In their East Hampton, Long Island, summer home, Bishop Pardue, of Pittsburgh, and his wife visioned the superb effect of using weathered wood—"The kind you can't duplicate, but can find in many overlooked houses and barns." For their house, architect Alfred Scheffer selected boards and beams from two buildings over 130 years old. The wood with its pearly patina is fashioned into cabinets and work areas. Stainless-steel gas oven and cook top fit well into this peaceful mood, as do the vinyl-cork floor, and walls of muted melon color.

The divider, notable because it in no way interferes with the rhythm of the beams, faces the breakfast table—of pine—with a view of ducks flocking to a nearby lake. The serenity is due to the way this divider screens cooking from dining.

While the effect is mellow, a closer glance shows comforts for the cook—a ventilator set in above the burners, big wood chopping block, and impeccable work space. "It fits our lives, and encourages the kind of living that we enjoy," says Mrs. Pardue, summing up the philosophy of kitchens today.

Herb paper and curtains of hand-loomed Mexican cotton show fine detail everywhere.

Indoor-Outdoor

Fresh fruit, greenery, torch lights add romance to the evening meal.

The kitchen, with turquoise cabinets (surprisingly weather-resistant), charcoal ceramic tile and bright shrimp-colored utensils, is built up against the wall of the house. It faces a round fireplace that, when topped, is used as a convenient center server. Ione Thompson makes much use of her gas grill and rotisserie. Even on rainy days, steaks and chickens are grilled outdoors—to be eaten inside.

"We do our entertaining in a tropical setting."

The William Thompsons' terrace kitchen in Whittier, California, demonstrates what can be done with taste and a beneficent climate. From the matted roof that filters the sun's rays (and affords protection from rain) to the smooth floors that are perfect for evening dances, it denotes festive and gracious living.

The whole area as shown is reached from the kitchen door at one end, and is a step from the living room. Directly outside the living room is a pool with restfully splashing fountain. Ione Thompson has grown tropical plants and trimmed the area with a Hawaiian theme. Rattan furniture and straw accessories heighten the eye-appealing effect.

's a complete kitchen right indoors too. Its gas oven and refrigerator sed for salad making and baking that cannot be done outside.

Preparing for a teen luau, young Dave tends grill as 8-year-old Sue Ann helps.

A Look of Sunshine

The bright yellow kitchen of Dr. Vincent Merendino and his wife, TV actress Betsy Palmer, reflects creative lives. Their New Jersey home lies within easy distance of New York City, where he has his medical practice and she does her work. It's difficult to imagine that when the Merendinos first saw this fifty-one-year-old house last year, this airy, open room was darkly partitioned off into three small areas. But they knew the potential beauty in an old house. Walls were ripped down, pantries opened, color added. Multihued yellow tiles now abound on the center worktable, on the counter and around the oven. Appliances were selected to fit compactly into the key areas. Result: a refreshing feeling of space plus all modern conveniences. The fragrance of garlic and herbs hung in the air as Betsy made dinner. "It's no secret," she said, "that my husband and I enjoy Italian cuisine—especially the spicy Sicilian kind."

Slim-lined refrigerator has freezer below. At counter, Betsy draws up to telephone or makes market list.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WESLEY BALZ

Sparkling new gas oven is set into bulky tiled chimney where old coal stove stood.

"My favorite place is the long center worktable—a marvelous island of convenience, with four burners on either end for luxurious, lavish cooking. For our type of cooking you need room to spread out in."

Betsy Palmer's kitchen reflects her radiant personality. Here she prepares artichokes a favorite way.

Color Radiance

"It took three years to plan," says Lila Martin, in Arlington, Virginia, "and it works like a charm." Singing colors of sky blue and lilac set the theme. Husband Billy is a restaurateur with astute ideas of his own about appliances. "I'd seen one sink bottleneck work too often. So we have two." And there are two refrigerators side by side with freezers below, of the kind that never frost up. The oven is double too. A blue-ribbon kitchen, it can turn out snacks or formal dinners without a fuss.

A sense of space is here with gala island counter of white but practical plastic, where a big buffet dinner can be set out with no hint of crowding. Salads can be tossed and cakes cooled at the sparkling counters. Also seen here: Lila's planning desk, the blue vinyl floor and curtains with hard-candy designs.

"I'd change nothing."

"I have everything I want," says delighted Mrs. Martin. First specification was a "garage" for the wheeled cart; it's under the center work space. Next, the Martins wanted a kitchen to store ample silver, china and crystal, and it does, without relying on dining room or extra pantries. The third need was for space nearby where the children could play and have toy lockers. It was all solved as you see here by kitchen planner Dick Voell and late architect Horace W. Peaslee, who fitted in appliances with precision. The kitchen has polish, poise and confidence in meeting any and all social obligations.

four daughters of the house—Lila, 11; anie, 8; Michelle, 4; Kimberley, 3—have r own little table in a playroom close by. A nd sink, set diagonally between stainless ters, is seen at right. Here children can or their mother take advantage of the room to stem berries or pot prize flowers.

Why should not kitchens have the quality of fine furniture? The room you see here, lustrous with teak and sweeping in line, is the result the G. H. Hawkses worked out with designer Tage Frid. A sense of artisanship is everywhere. Mrs. Hawks' list of essentials was long, and every need was met. As a busy hostess, she asked for a ten-foot-long counter, always lighted. It extends from the refrigerator (not shown) to the high oven of silvery stainless metal. Windows light it by day, fixtures in the cabinets above by night. Another personal touch: the room has a skylight, ingeniously placed to bring in light plus a sight of sky and trees. A typical day begins when a timer starts coffee water automatically, and Mrs. Hawks sets out breakfast makings on a heated electric tray at the buffet pass-through. Each family member and guest serves himself. Breakfast ends at 8:30 and the teak-fronted dishwasher goes to work.

All through the day the kitchen functions smoothly—and stays in apple-pie order, for there is a place for everything: spices fit behind sliding panels at the rear of the counter; cutting and pastry boards slide from under the work top; supplies are shelved behind sliding doors; utensils hang on pull-out panels near the cook top. Even little things like rice bowls and chopsticks have a place, for Chinese dinners are traditional here on special family occasions.

A gracious entertainer, Mrs. Hawks always has tea service ready for visitors.

Exciting corner has new ideas worked sk fully into its plan. The furniture look exte to cart and sofa. Cart is of teak with leaves four sides that can be raised to serve four; other times it wheels and serves. An uph stered bench is comfortable for seating a converts to a bed when maid stays overnig

Modern Tempo

tr is teak pass-through has ndsome storage for table dishes.

"Our goal was a kitchen as inviting as a sitting room." Kitchen has a deep sense of dimension to and fro.

Handsomely designed cabinets fit under counter. At far end are more counter and tray space, and under colorful storage panels the laundry. An entertaining use of fabric and handcraft makes for interest on every hand.

TEENAGE SECRE

In their rush to grow up, do teenagers see marriage as "some sort of magic that will make them grown-up overnight"?

By BETTY COE SPICER

Modern Catalina High School is part of one of Tucson, Arizona's plus-$10,0 a-year-income neighborhoods. Often called the "Blueblood High," it is jus proud of its staff, its high scholastic standing and its supervised school activiti

Its active, alert P.T.A. has more than doubled attendance at meetings by int ducing sharp, informed forum discussions of school problems.

So the problem recently given to one P.T.A. study group was doubly startling.
concerned an epidemic of secret high-school elopements.

From Principal R. T. Gridley and other school authorities the group learned tails. Twenty girl students at Catalina had married in the single four-month peri from December to April. Some were only fifteen years old. Few had parental p mission. "At least three quarters" of the marriages were secret, across-the-bor ceremonies performed in Mexico, sixty-five miles to the south. In most cases pare were not being told until the girl's pregnancy—or the young couple's fright

MARRIAGE EPIDEMIC

BOB TOWERS

...lizing the seriousness of what they had done—made it impossible ... keep the secret any longer. Some such marriages perhaps are still ... admitted.

Parents in the group looked at one another with shocked eyes.

Like parents all over the country, they were aware of the trend to ...uthful marriages. And they knew that Tucson's closeness to the ...rder presented special problems. Bordertown Nogales (called ... oggie" by high-schoolers), in the state of Sonora, Mexico, has al... ys been an exciting lure for teenagers. Unchaperoned trips to ...gales were strictly forbidden by nearly all parents.

Local newspapers sometimes carried stories of narcotic smug... ng across the border. Now and then groups of teenage boys drove ... Nogales, drank too much and got into fights. There were whispers of "dare" visits by high-school boys to Nogales houses of prostitution. (Prostitution is legalized and controlled in Mexico.) One worried mother quoted her son as saying that the boys had been approached by solicitors who waited near the Tucson schools to suggest these visits.

To most parents, such stories had always seemed to involve "other teenagers. That small percentage of real juvenile delinquents who are as much concern to good teenagers as they are to adults."

But this outbreak of secret, across-the-border marriages among their own teenagers cast a new light on the border situation. It was now a frightening problem.

A committee was appointed by the P.T.A. members to try to find the facts in the midst of cloudy rumor. CONTINUED ON PAGE 155

Shoulders wide—yet feminine

FASHIONS to love in the SPRING

By WILHELA CUSHMAN

The hollyhock-pink coat of featherweight wool, nylon and mohair, by Hattie Carnegie.

The colors—violet, very pale grey, very pale green and pink

GARDEN PHOTOGRAPHS BY GOTTSCHO-SCHLEISSER

Knitted suit with new importance:
hand-loomed wool, brilliant yellow-green, by Traina Norell.

* GOLD BRACELETS AND GOLD-AND-DIAMOND PIN BY S. G. BARNETT

ebrilliant hand-loomed knit — news for spring

For spring—hand-loomed knitted wool bound in navy blue by Traina Norell.
As timeless as it is beautiful.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

The wing sleeve is the new

FASHIONS to love in the SPRING

Coat with the wing sleeves in mint-green tweed by Pauline Trigere. Tiny pillbox hat to match.

Prints are like flower gardens

The fashion of giant flowers— a printed silk taffeta by Larry Aldrich.

Pale violet suit, linen mixture, printed silk blouse. By Ben Zuckerman.

Suit with its own blouse — Number One fashion

The cosmopolitan checked suit with tulip red in the blouse, by Traina Norell.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

GARDEN PHOTOGRAPHS BY GOTTSCHO-SCHLEISNER

The fashion of the princess silhouette, of a printed silk dress with its own coat lined with print by Ben Zuckerman.

Princess-line in the newest coat

We have searched the fashion market for you and have triple-starred these five fashions, related to each other in a wardrobe that goes anywhere.

By RUTH MARY PACKARD

Think of a spring coat in a flower color—pale violet wool. Around $89.95, by Dan Millstein.

THE JOURNAL'S FIVE-STAR

Imported Scotch tweed for your important casual—by Ellen Brooks, around $120.00. Wear the skirt with sweaters or shirts; the cardigan as an extra jacket.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELM CUSHMAN

The flower-printed silk is also a dress and jacket to wear anywh from luncheon on. Beautiful under the violet coat, wonderfu all summer long. Around $69.95, by Abe Shraeder. Carry a flower-color straw bag.

The fashions on all these pages are presen you because they show you the trends of the and serve as a guide as you shop. You wi many of them in stores throughout the nation. ever, if you do not find identical styles in you shops, we believe similar ones will be ava Warp-printed silk-taffeta dinner dress, round $59.95, by Jay Stanley. Now under the violet coat and on through summer.

WARDROBE

If you love the dress-and-jacket fashion that has the everywhere look, this pale gray Dacron-and-worsted flannel can be one of your favorite essentials.

Suitlike with its jacket, the simple dress with a thousand uses. About $55.00, by Andrew Arkin. Accessory changes, according to your color schemes, shades of white, violet, blue, yellow.

"WHEN I SEE IT IN THE JOURNAL

From Long Island to Los Angeles our readers share with us their fun in sewing (as well as their problems). Of the six young women shown here, each might be the girl next door or the woman across the street. All were "discovered" in this year's crop of reader mail.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

Vivacious Joan Zobel is a sophomore at the University of Texas. Already she has been sewing for "years." Joan loves to adapt patterns to suit her own original ideas. Here she is wearing a silk scarf print which is Vogue Design No. 9963.

... I make it for myself"

Patty Carol Powell (Mrs. Wilson Powell) is the mother of three small children and lives in Connecticut. She finds sewing relaxing after they are tucked in bed. She also finds it easy on the budget. Her polka-dot dress with new width at the shoulder is Vogue Design No. 9958.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY LEOMBRUNO-BODI

Lovely "Dee" Gilliland (Mrs. R. A. Gilliland, Edgemont, South Dakota) is a sewing perfectionist—and doesn't mind spending hours on fine details. Her coat and dress are Vogue Design No. 209.

Petite Jean Owens (Mrs. Warren Owens, of Haddonfield, New Jersey) says that since she started sewing her fitting problems have been solved forever. Her turquoise silk print is Vogue Design No. 9949. Her sweater is trimmed with flowers from the print.

Mrs. Fred Kirchhoff, of Long Island, has two small daughters. Margaret makes her own clothes and adores to sew for her little girls. Her striped shirtwaist dress, Vogue Design No. 9967.

Shirley Howser, of Los Angeles, started sewing four years ago. Inspired by not being able to afford to buy a dress she longed for, she now considers sewing her favorite hobby. Last season, the dress that brought her the most compliments cost less than $5. Her black-and-white costume is Vogue Design No. 4096.

For Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 178 ... by Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns are sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 10c additional for each pattern ordered.

© Vogue

A great deal of marriage difficulty always follows when two basically immature and insecure people begin insisting on their "rights" in marriage. The most trivial detail may be magnified and used as an excuse for fighting. In this month's case from the files of the American Institute of Family Relations, Rita and Jack use picayune financial differences as weapons to perpetuate unspoken grievances. Only after counseling do they begin to comprehend that the only helpful "right" in marriage is the right to put aside one's own self-needs in the interest of understanding and pleasing the other partner. This is the way to the security and happiness they are so desperately seeking. . . . The counselor in this case was Mr. Keith Rholl. PAUL POPENOE, Sc.D., General Director

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

SHE: "It breaks my heart to live apart from Jack, but it will break my heart to live with him unless he changes. I want him to help with the housework, show me some affection, and stop behaving like a child."

HE: "Whenever Rita gets mad she runs to her parents, leaving me with an unkempt house, an unmade bed, an empty refrigerator. Last Monday I couldn't even find an egg or a slice of bacon for breakfast."

Rita tells her side: "My husband drives to work and I take the bus," said dark-haired, dark-eyed Rita indignantly. Twenty-one years old, she was of Spanish descent and of radiant Spanish beauty. "My office is two blocks—two short blocks—from the bank where Jack is an assistant cashier. Every morning he goes right past my building. Yet for six months he has refused to let me ride with him because I refuse to pay half the cost of gasoline, repairs and parking charges; he insists that is the only equitable arrangement. I offered to pay him the cost of bus fare, but he stubbornly declined that. Jack and I handle our own salary checks. We often disagree on the way to divide and spend our separate earnings.

"Last Monday morning it was pouring rain. I gave Jack every opportunity to invite me to ride downtown. I was too proud to ask. I got no invitation, even though Jack watched from the corner of his eye while I dashed around and hunted up my umbrella and rubbers. When I rushed out of the house in the downpour at seven-forty-five A.M. he was luxuriously dawdling over his shaving. An hour later, after two transfers and a five-mile trip, I arrived downtown. It was still pouring. Just as I climbed off the bus and ran for shelter, Jack shot by in his car. His back wheels splashed me from head to foot, though perhaps he didn't know it. I'm not sure he saw me.

"I was dripping and furious when I went in the office. My supervisor, a snobbish old maid who looks down on Spanish people and all other nationalities except the British and the Scandinavians, drew back her skirt as I passed her desk. That hurt my feelings, but I didn't let her see it. I loathe working for her. To tell the truth, I loathe working. When I dreamed of marriage as a little girl, I didn't see myself as a career wife. Jack picked out my present job for me right before our wedding a year ago. It was his idea—not mine—that I continue working.

"All day long I sat at my typewriter in damp clothes. By evening I had the sniffles, which was strictly Jack's fault. However, I decided to let bygones be bygones. On the way home from the bus stop I popped into a delicatessen and bought the groceries. Because he has the car, that is supposed to be Jack's job. It was a school evening—we both attend business-college CONTINUED ON PAGE 190

"When I walked into the house Jack was reading the evening paper. He didn't get up to help with my load of groceries. He didn't even say hello."

Testing time for talent

There's no such thing as a "no talent" boy or girl, says Pat Boone. "Any time you want to wipe out hard luck, just use hard work as an eraser."

PAT BOONE TALKS TO TEENAGERS

Today, as on most every other day, I pulled a batch of letters out of the mailbag and heaped 'em up on my desk at Cooga Mooga (my office). I hadn't opened many when I ran across one from a 'tween-gal named Kris, who cheerfully announces that she is "mixed up in a maze."

"There are so many things I can do and so many futures to choose from that I can't make up my mind!" she writes.

I know how she feels, investigating like mad, poking around in all the winding passages and not even minding the dead ends. It's like going through the House of Mirrors at an amusement park. You meet yourself coming and going, but you can hardly wait to take the next turn and see which one finally leads you to the happy ending.

The letter goes on: "I mean there's teaching. Teaching fascinates me (especially if I could get a nice class of senior boys for history). I like to date (tall, brunets preferred). I like sports (basketball for me, baseball for the L.A. Dodgers), singing (glee club, no solos), animals (horses and St. Bernards top priority; is there such a thing as a woman veterinarian?). I love cooking and even baby-sitting—you meet such interesting people! And, of course, writing. I'd love to be a foreign correspondent; you know, the kind that wear trench coats and solve crimes. I also love my family, even if they do take up a lot of time and almost drive me crazy sometimes. (Just kidding.)

"Really, Pat, I've read your book and your articles and I wondered if you ever had this problem. I mean I've got to make up my mind pretty soon about what to do with my life. Right now, I'm just mixed up in a maze. Can you help? Your friend, Kris."

I get the message, Kris. You're having fun in the maze, but you're beginning to realize that you can't go prancing around investigating bypaths all your life. You're about due for some decisions as to which exact turns will bring you out most happily into the big world of your future.

Was I ever there? I was. I sho 'nuff was. At fifteen, I popped around in that maze like popcorn CONTINUED ON PAGE 193

From a problem skin to "How Pretty

A year ago young Suzanne Gillespie's potentially pretty face was marred by a profusion of pimples, bumps and blackheads—a condition medically classified as acne vulgaris. Today, thanks to the most modern methods of treating troubled skin, Suzanne's acne is almost completely healed. Her skin continues to improve in texture and clarity. With make-up delicately applied, her complexion seems near flawless. Suzanne's prescription for beauty, as outlined by her dermatologist, is surprisingly simple. It includes internal medication, external care and proper diet.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN, Beauty Editor

"The pretty changes in my photographs, which are unretouched, only half express the wonderful changes that have taken place in my life," Suzanne says. "For the first time I'm comfortably self-confident. I no longer have to let the condition of my skin decide whether I will or won't accept social invitations. Even my wardrobe has brightened, now that I'm braver about wearing colorful things, and being noticed!"

A bonus aspect of Suzanne's successful skin clearing concerns her young brother. David is seventeen and just beginning to have a touch of skin trouble. But with a case-history sister living right in his own home, he knows what to do—what not to do.

Eating too much chocolate and constantly fussing with her face—squeezing pimples in a hopeless effort to make them disappear—were Suzanne's major wrongdoings. And she would have avoided a lot of high-school misery if she had consulted a doctor about her skin earlier. "But through my experience at least David has learned," Suzanne says philosophically. "Happily, he won't have to suffer the agonies of acne."

HERE ARE SUZANNE'S THREE STEPS TO A PRETTIER SKIN

First: internal medication. Up-to-date dermatologists agree that acne is fundamentally influenced by endocrine factors. Temporary overactivity of some glands is normal for young people and often corrects itself without treatment. In stubborn cases, thyroid extract or estrogenic hormone may be prescribed.

To get rid of harmful bacteria that have lodged deeply in the affected skin, an antibiotic is often prescribed. Its immediate usefulness is to help combat active infection, while the accumulative effects gradually build up lasting protection. Suzanne was told to take one antibiotic capsule after each meal for three days, then CONTINUED ON PAGE 142

Here is a candid, medical close-up of Suzanne taken on the day before she began her skin treatments. See the heavy concentration of blemishes on cheek, chin and forehead.

One year later, worlds of improvement. Blemishes are considerably reduced, angry-looking redness of skin has almost disappeared. Since this photo, Suzanne's skin has increased in clarity.

MARTIN HAGGETT

"How pretty you look!" is a phrase often directed to Suzanne these days, and, as she says, "One I thought I'd never hear." This photo shows Suzanne wearing her hypoallergenic make-up, which brightens her appearance without causing "breakouts." This photograph has not been retouched in any way.

DRESS BY MOLLIE SI
JEWELRY BY HAZEL CARN
PHOTOGRAPH BY ROGER PR

You Look!"

Before, basically elegant room looks drab, with paint in bad repair and furniture poorly arranged.

HAROLD FOWLER

m now shows off its best features in a cheerful country at-Slip covers are all washable, both the violet corduroy and the hintz. The curtain fabric, a white-on-white stripe, is drip-dry.

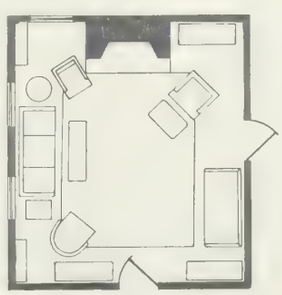
A COMPLETELY NEW LOOK

. . . and it cost only $354.20

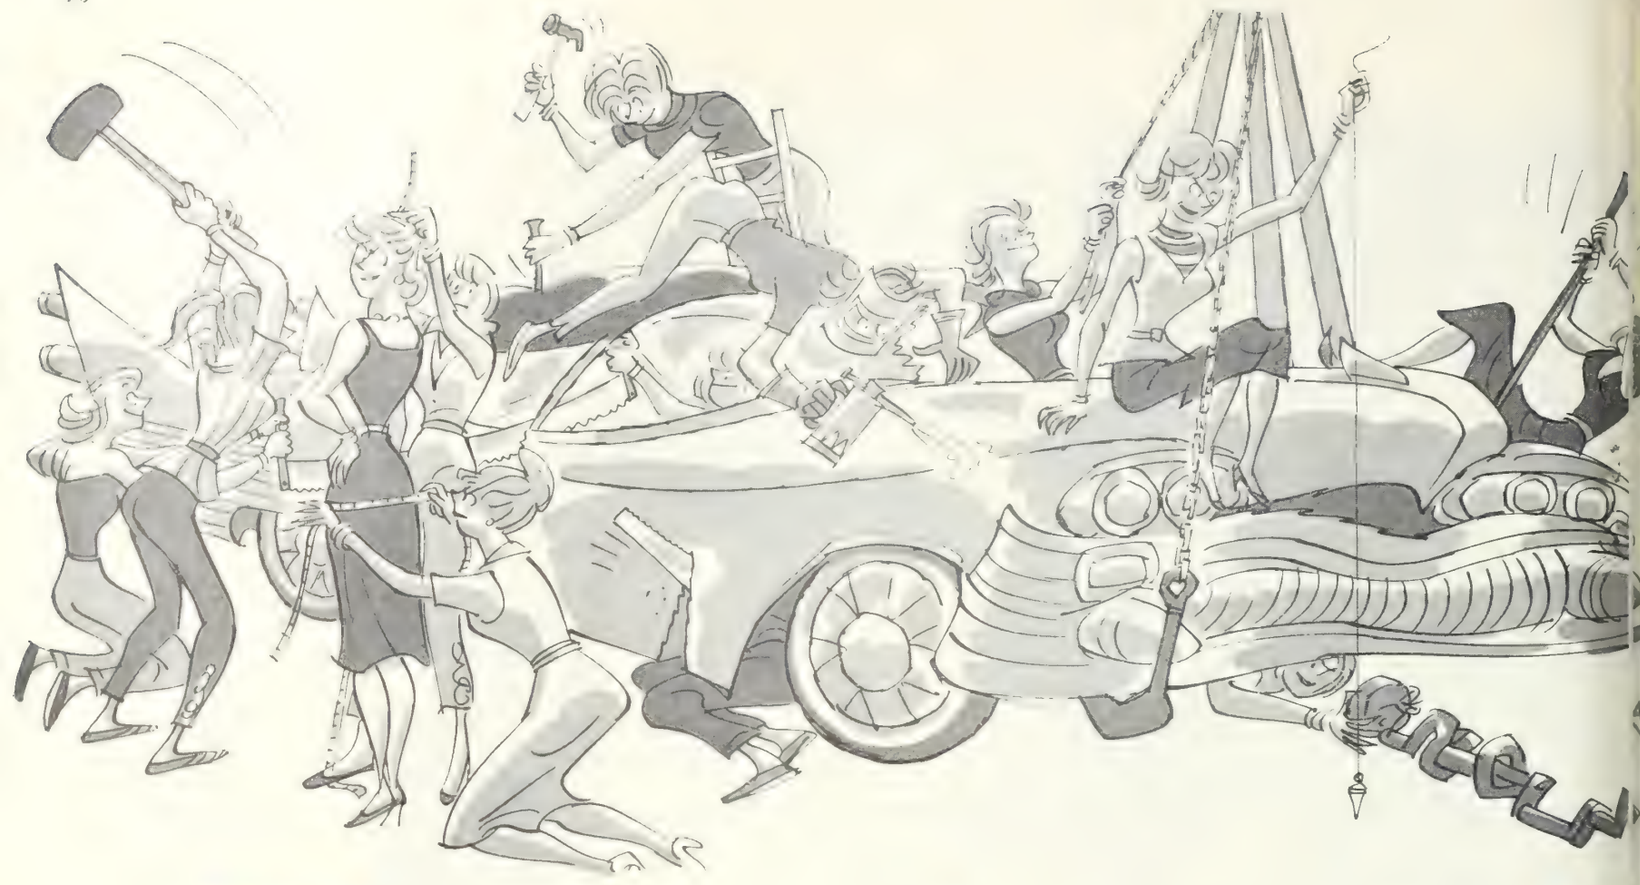
By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor

This living room, which had been the gay and inviting meeting place for the family, suddenly seemed shabby and tired. Peeling paint and worn furniture gave it a cheerless, dingy air in spite of the high ceilings, beautiful woodwork and elegant proportions of the room.

Our friend, whose room this is, was afraid of the cost of redoing, but chanced upon this heavenly cotton chintz priced at $1.55 a yard. A pale blue wall color was chosen to lighten the room, and white to set off the handsome mantel and delicate woodwork around the windows. Inspired by the magical change of just slip covers and a new paint job, it wasn't long before she had planned a whole new scheme, pointing up the colors of the fabric in chair cover and rug. Bright pink velveteen complements the chintz and is used to cover another chair in the room. She made the simple white cotton draperies herself; added the big brass rosettes for elegance.



COSTS FOR OTHER WORK AND MATERIALS ARE SHOWN BELOW.



Slip covers:

Sofa $55.00
Chair and ottoman $35.00
Club chair $27.50
Tub chair (not shown) $25.00

Other:

Rug (9′ x 12′ sisal) $39.95
Lamp $12.95
Marble-topped chest (secondhand) $55.00
4 yds. pink velveteen $8.64
18 yds. white cotton $27.36
36 yds. flowered chintz $55.80
10 yds. violet corduroy $12.00

When is a dream Car!

(On guard, Detroit—the ladies are not amused!)

You men
In Detroit
Have been very Adroit
At devising
Magnificent fins—
But
The girls had Enough
Of your Chromium stuff,
And so
Their rebellion Begins!

Though not always Mental,
The girls
Have been Kind—Diplomatically
Gentle,
They've hidden.
You'll find,
The talent
For mayhem
They've had
In their mind.
But
They're itching
To scrap
All the cars
You've designed.

So
Hear this,
Designers—
And you,
Engineers—
This female
Uprising
Is stripping
Your gears.
Here's the Word
From your feminine
Jury of peers.

OPEN YOUR EARS!

A girl
Is not
An acrobat—
She wants a car
That's tall,
Not flat.
It's not
The wheel base
That concerns her—
But her own—
And so
It burns her
When
She has to Crouch
Or hurdle—
Just to Park
Her pelvic girdle.

Women are Longing for Autos that fit—
To wit:
A car
Provided with
A coffee bar,
And
One-way glass
Without a glare,
Through which
A passer
Cannot stare—
A level floor,
Electric grill
And TV
To ignore
At will—
Automatic
Window wipers—
A folding shelf
For changing diapers.
A fully stocked
Refrigerator—
And a Soundproof Elevator
For the children
And
Their sitters, Whom,
Before you get
The jitters,
You can raise
From sight
And sound,
Forgetting
That they're still Around—
Relaxing
At a button's
Touch,
When
Motherhood demands
Too much.
(And when Another car Comes near—
Lots of Radar
In the Rear.)

Anything that's Automatic
Tends to make
A girl
Ecstatic.
Though a gadget
May confuse 'em—
Give them buttons
And they'll Use 'em.
This is what
The survey Shows—
Women actively Oppose
A ration
Of automation.

They demand
Their parking rights—
Sideways!
(And with sideway lights)
In whatever place
At hand—
AU-TO-MAT-I-CAL Planned.

A changer
Letting down
A spare
That,
Come what may,
Is always there—

An arm
That feeds
The parking meter
An Automatic
Clutter eater.
A sympathetic
Morning heater
Anticipating
They'll be there—
And waiting
With a Toasty chair.

A door
That moves
To swing

The seat—
The top
Pops up—
They exit
Neat.

A map
That tells them
Where they are—
A counter
Telling them
How far—
And telling it
In voices clear—
So children
In the rear
Can hear
And stop
Bedeviling
"Mommy dear."

And traffic
On a radar
Track—
With headlights
That
Can answer
Back.

The girls
INSIST—They Don't just Wish—
A car
That's planned—
TRANSISTORISH.

Don't rock
Your drafting Boards
With laughter—
The women
Know
What they Are after—
Not
Just one more car
That's new—
But their DREAM CAR
That's Overdue.

The cars
You're rolling
Off your line
Are labeled
"HIS."
(For him they're fine.)
The girls
Don't want
The car
That was—
At long last
They want
One
Marked
"HERS."

So
Get to work
Men—
Try to Sell 'em
A car
That doesn't Underwhelm.

Detroit,
If you are Really wise You'll
Park your cars
And Memorize—
Before you Take Another ride—
These Memos
From the Distaff side.

An engine oughta
Need no water
And, please,
No antifreeze.

A place
For cosmetics
That's dandy,
Ideal
Is Right where It's handy—
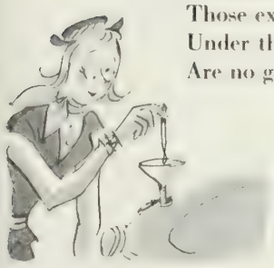
The steering wheel.



WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ABNER DEAN

Twenty-two horses
To give us
More speed
Is twenty-one more
Than it makes sense
To feed.
Those extra horses
Under the hood
Are no good.

A battery Should have
A spare—
Another one
That wouldn't dare
To run down
While it
Idles there.

Menu

FILET OF BEEF BÉARNAISE

STRAW POTATOES AND PEAS

CARROTS WITH SEEDED GREEN GRAPES

RAINBOW FRUIT TART

"Rainbow Fruit Tart is a work of art!" Spiced pastry encloses a creamy filling, jeweled with bright fruits.

STUART HEINTER

PHILIP O. STEA

"When I Entertain"

Mrs. Rockefeller entertains at tea Lady Corea, wife of Sir Claude Corea, of the United Nations, and Mrs. Suleiman Sukkar, president of the National Council of the Y.W.C.A. of Jordan.

"My husband likes the filet of beef served medium rare, with béarnaise sauce, and crisp potatoes, green peas."

Mrs. Laurance Rockefeller tells her philosophy of entertaining to Nancy Crawford Wood

"Filet of beef with béarnaise sauce is a perennial favorite of my husband's," says Mrs. Laurance Rockefeller, "and appears on our table many times when we are entertaining. For our private dinner parties, eighteen people is usually the maximum number, and I like to keep them even smaller, if possible, so that conversation can be general. Another pet dinner-party menu includes Duckling Bigarade, and a dessert of green grapes tossed with sour cream and brown sugar. We give buffet parties only for the children—as many as thirty people or so before a dance—and they love a big hot casserole of chicken and rice, a salad of stuffed CONTINUED ON PAGE 152

PÉTE
TRES-SEC

Menu

TOMATO-MUSHROOM BISQUE
POT ROAST BONNE FEMME
MRS. APPLEYARD'S PATRICIAN POTATOES
NEW ENGLAND JOHNNYCAKE
GREEN SALAD WITH HOT BACON DRESSING
MUSTARD PICKLE
CHERRY-APPLE PIE OR APPLESAUCE WITH COOKIES

SET BY POUGH

Appleyard Family Favorites

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

"In the hands of an inspired cook, the most familiar foods are endlessly delicious!" says Mrs. Appleyard.

Her spicy beef pot roast, glistening with rich brown gravy, is a true masterpiece. Try her creamy casserole of potatoes, whipped with sour cream and cottage cheese; New England johnnycake, and apple-cherry pie!

In March my mother, Mrs. Appleyard, seems to give up cooking in favor of studying seed catalogues. In her winter kitchen, I find her in a sort of flowery trance, surrounded by pictures of petunias as big as Easter lilies. "Broccoli," she murmurs, "with a border of zinnias. I'm surrounding the asparagus bed with sunflowers and morning-glories. Let's plan a wonderful dinner to celebrate the vernal equinox! Or, rather, you plan it, darling, while I decide where to put the tomato seedlings."

Feeling runs high at our house as we try to choose the menu for this meal, which, we have decided, will consist of all the Appleyard family's very favorite dishes. A succulent pot roast with vegetables, that noblest of meats, wins the first prize, hands down, as main course. Mother's delicious, creamy mushroom-tomato bisque will start us off. The discussion of potatoes is vigorous; we finally decide on a casserole of mashed potatoes, fluffy as clouds inside, crusty brown on top. My son Tommy's vote is for a salad of greens tossed with hot bacon dressing. It almost goes without saying that we shall have New England johnnycake, which comes to all traditional Vermont tables this time of year, hot and buttery—when the new syrup crop is ready, it will be accompanied by a pitcher of that liquid sunshine. On the subject of dessert there are two strong factions among the children, so vehement in their preference that there is nothing for it but to have both. One group votes for apple-cherry pie, and the other for cold applesauce and cookies.

Appleyard Family Favorites

CONTINUED

The children and I go over to mother's house early in the day to start things. In the kitchen a cloud of fragrance fills the room as Camilla and Laura lift the lid of the pot roast to add some tender, jewel-green peas. The potato casserole is approaching its moment of perfection as I peer at the cherry pie cooling in the cellarway. "Something smells good," cries Mrs. Appleyard, pausing on the kitchen threshold, "quite a few somethings! What a wonderful party!"

The lengthening days give us blue skies and sunny afternoons.

Tomato-Mushroom Bisque

8 cups canned tomatoes
1 large onion, peeled and finely chopped
6 dried red Mexican peppers, crushed
6 cloves
4 bay leaves, crumbled
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
1 tablespoon sugar
Scant ¼ teaspoon saffron
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 pound mushrooms, wiped with clean damp cloth and finely chopped
1 cup butter
1 cup chicken broth
2 tablespoons flour
¾ cup plus 2 tablespoons light cream
1 cup tiny cubes white bread, about ¼" square
2 teaspoons each salt and sugar
Good pinch baking soda

Into a 3-quart saucepan or kettle put tomatoes, onion, red peppers, cloves, bay leaves, garlic, sugar, saffron and pepper. Boil, uncovered, 10 minutes. Cover and simmer gently for 30 minutes more. Press through a strainer. Transfer to the top of a 2½-quart double boiler. Cook mushrooms in ¼ cup butter for 5 to 10 minutes; do not allow to brown. Add chicken broth and simmer until mushrooms are tender. Purée through a food mill or buzz in a blender. Make a cream sauce using 2 tablespoons butter, flour and light cream. Add mushroom purée and mix well. Half an hour before serving time, sauté cubes of bread in ½ cup butter until golden. Drain on paper toweling. Reheat tomato purée in the double boiler. Also reheat mushroom-cream sauce over low heat. When both are hot, add salt, sugar and baking soda to tomato purée. Add mushroom-cream sauce, a little at a time, beating vigorously all the while. Serve immediately. Sprinkle surface with golden croutons. Makes about 8 cups soup.

Pot Roast Bonne Femme

5-pound boneless pot roast of beef—choose from top, bottom or eye round, chuck or rump.
4 cups condensed beef consommé
8 cloves
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon pepper
8 whole carrots, peeled or scraped
8 small whole onions, peeled
4 medium-size turnips, peeled and quartered
4 stalks celery, cut into 2" pieces
1 package frozen peas
Flour
Salt and pepper

Brown meat on all sides in a heavy kettle over high heat. Use no extra fat if there is plenty on the meat. Turn meat frequently to ensure even browning. This should take about ½ hour. Drain off all fat. Place a trivet or rack on the bottom of the kettle. The trivet should be of such height that the liquid comes about ½" up the meat. Replace meat. Add consommé, cloves, cinnamon and pepper. Cover and simmer for 3 hours. Now add carrots, onions, turnips and celery. Continue simmering for another hour, when vegetables and meat should be fork-tender. Cook frozen peas according to package directions. Add peas and liquid to meat and vegetables 2–3 minutes before the end of the last hour of cooking. Transfer meat to a large warm platter. Remove strings. Drain vegetables, reserving broth. Arrange vegetables around meat. Cover and keep warm. Skim fat from broth. Reheat and thicken with a thin flour-and-water paste. Cook 2–3 minutes. Taste for salt and pepper. (Makes about 6 cups gravy.) Glaze the meat and vegetables with some of the gravy. Serve the remainder in a gravy boat. Ample for 8 servings with plenty left for second helpings.

Mrs. Appleyard's Patrician Potatoes

4 cups freshly cooked mashed potatoes—about 6 medium-size potatoes cooked with 2 teaspoons salt
3 cups cream-style cottage cheese
¾ cup commercial sour cream
1½ tablespoons finely grated onion
2½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon white pepper
Melted butter
½ cup chopped toasted almonds

Mash potatoes thoroughly—add no milk or butter. Press cottage cheese through a sieve, or buzz in a blender. Mix together warm mashed potatoes and cheese. Add sour cream, onion, salt and pepper. Mix well. Spoon into a shallow, buttered 2-quart casserole. Brush the surface with melted butter. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for ½ hour. Place under broiler for a few minutes to brown the surface lightly. Sprinkle with almonds. 8 servings.

Green Salad with Hot Bacon Dressing

2 heads Boston lettuce
12 radishes, thinly sliced
10 slices bacon
2 teaspoons sugar
½ cup red wine vinegar
½ teaspoon prepared horse-radish
¼ teaspoon pepper
12 scallions, coarsely chopped, including some of the green stems
Hard-cooked egg yolk, sieved

Wash and dry lettuce. Crisp in refrige
Just before serving time, break up lettuce i salad bowl and add radishes. Refrigerate you prepare dressing. Cook bacon in a s until crisp. Remove, drain on paper towelin crumble. To the bacon fat in the skillet add vinegar, horse-radish and pepper. Mix wel scallions. Heat until bubbling. Pour im ately over lettuce and radishes. Toss well bacon. Sprinkle with egg yolk. Makes 8 ser

Mustard Pickle

2 large cauliflowers
4 medium-size cucumbers, washed, seeded and chopped medium fine (include peel)
8 green peppers, washed, seeded and chopped medium fine
4 cups very small white pickling onions, peeled ¾ cup salt
2 quarts cold water
1 cup flour
2 cups sugar
6 tablespoons powdered mustard
1 tablespoon turmeric
2 quarts vinegar

Remove all leaves from cauliflowers. Break into small cauliflowerets and wash
Place all prepared vegetables in a large bowl. Dissolve salt in water and add to veget Cover and allow to stand overnight in the refrigerator. The next day, transfer the con of the bowl to a large kettle. Bring just to a boil. Remove and drain immediately. In arate saucepan mix together flour, sugar, mustard and turmeric. Add vinegar, a littl time, stirring to obtain a smooth, thin mixture. Bring to a boil, stirring constantly, and stir until smooth and thick. Add vegetables and continue simmering until veget are just heated through. Do not allow to overcook: they should be still crisp. Ladl sterilized preserving jars. Seal at once. Store in a cool room. Makes 8 pints.

Cherry-Apple Pie

Pastry for a 2-crust 10" pie
1 one-pound can water-packed pitted red sour cherries
1 cup sugar
¼ cup quick-cooking tapioca
1 teaspoon almond extract
¼ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon nutmeg
3–4 drops red food coloring
1 medium-size tart cooking apple, peeled, cored and thinly sliced

Wrap pastry in waxed paper and chill whil make the filling. Drain and measure syrup canned cherries. Add water to make ¾ cu cherries and syrup into a bowl and add tapioca, almond extract, salt, nutmeg, coloring and sliced apple. Stir gently. I pastry in half. Roll ⅛" thick and line pie Fill with cherry-apple mixture. Cover comp with remaining pastry, or make a lattice cr you use a closed crust, be sure you have s well-opened steam slits. Bake in a very hot 425° F., about 45 minutes or until golden.
warm. Makes 8 servings.

New England Johnnycake

1 cup flour
1 tablespoon baking powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 cup yellow corn meal
¼ cup melted butter
2 tablespoons dark molasses
1 egg, slightly beaten
1¼ cups milk

Sift together flour, baking powder and salt
the remaining ingredients. Beat the mixtur smooth. Pour into a well-greased 8"-square pan. Bake in a moderately hot oven, 375° F
30 minutes, or until a cake tester comes out Turn out upside down on a cake rack. Al cool a minute or two. Cut into 16 square serve immediately. Makes 16 two-inch sq

NEW SOUPS FROM 2 SOUPS

Add new exciting flavor to simple buffet suppers

Good things begin to happen when you plan a meal around a good hot soup. More time for Mother – souper suppers are so easy to fix. More fun for the family – soup tastes so good, soup feels so good, it just naturally cheers a hungry crowd.

Sometimes it's fun to make a new soup–by combining two great Campbell favorites. Try the new soups suggested here, or make up your own. There's good nutrition in Campbell's Soups – vitamins, proteins, minerals!

And when you make a new soup, you're on the way to being known for the most delicious buffet suppers in town!

Once a day . . . every day . . .
enjoy Campbell's Soups

NEW SOUP: CELERY-BEAN

1 can Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup,
1 can Campbell's Bean with Bacon Soup,
1½ soup cans water. 4 servings.

WITH IT: HOT DOGS, FRESH FRUIT

NEW SOUP: TOMATO-VEGETABLE

1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup,
2 cans Campbell's Vegetable Soup,
2 soup cans water. 6 to 8 servings.

WITH IT: SWISS CHEESE, RYE BREAD

NEW SOUP: CHICKEN-MUSHROOM

1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup,
1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup,
1½ soup cans water. 4 servings.

WITH IT: APPLE-NUT SALAD, SALTINES

NEW SOUP: VEGETABLE-NOODLE

1 can Campbell's Vegetable Beef Soup,
1 can Campbell's Beef Noodle Soup,
1½ soup cans water. 4 servings.

WITH IT: TOMATO SALAD, HOT ROLLS

NEW SOUP: BEEF-TOMATO

1 can Campbell's Beef Soup,
1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup,
2 soup cans water. 4 to 6 servings.

WITH IT: GREEN SALAD, FRENCH BREAD

BEST START FOR Beautiful Rooms...

Treat yourself to this big, 32-page full-color book of smart, adaptable window decorating ideas. All styles, for every shape window.

Also shows you how to make curtains and draperies for your home, including cafes. PLUS money-saving hints and tips of the experts, and including a unique Color Selector Kit which enables you to build correct color harmonies.

Send 50¢ today for your copy!

Kirsch
DRAPERY HARDWARE

Kirsch Company, 161 Prospect, Sturgis, Michigan
Gentlemen: Enclosed is 50¢; please send one copy of "Window Decorating Made Easy—by Kirsch."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

make a wish upon a mood

in ONTARIO
—Canada's variety vacationland

Ontario's velvet nights spin a holiday world specially made for festivities or reflection. Her sun-splashed days last long, for zestful holiday fun. 250,000 lakes, sandy beaches, beautiful woodland and varied resort facilities . . . you'll find the vacation area your family wants in Ontario. Shop for woolens and exclusive dinnerware in fine stores just across the Great Lakes—friendly border crossing formalities take only minutes.

Send for your free copy of "Royal Welcome" and plan your vacation mood soon.

Province of Ontario, Department of Travel and Publicity, Room 1095, Parliament Buildings, Toronto 2.

Please send me your new, full-colour book of vacation ideas, "Royal Welcome."

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....STATE.....

THE YELLOW BRICK ROAD

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 57

of titled pupils casually into the conversation—but Jody knew that though his words expressed concern for the well-being of the boys, his mind ran solely upon fees. His wife, Estelle, looked competent enough in the vast, outdated kitchen, with its spit large enough to roast an ox, a fireplace built to burn whole trees, and a trestle table long enough to accommodate twenty scullions—but Jody knew that Estelle's mind was not on meals, but on music. On these foundations rested Broome Abbey, an establishment of eighty small boys, ten masters and two matrons, with the addition of the headmaster's own family of twin boys of seven and a girl of five.

Jody opened the kitchen door. At the far end of the table Estelle stood absent-mindedly pouring milk onto the contents of a ready-mix cake packet. As Jody entered, she looked up.

"Jody! What made you come down?"

"I don't have to stay in bed indefinitely just because I got a crack on the head. How've you been getting on?"

There was no need to ask. Looking round, she could see a number of uneaten dishes, three burned saucepans, and evidence of several recipes attempted and abandoned.

Her eyes rested on a gap between two enormous, old-fashioned cupboards. "Estelle, what's become of the fridge?"

Estelle's face, pale, oval, Madonnalike, lost a little of its habitual calm. "It looked so terribly out of place, Jody," she pleaded.

Jody had nothing to say. Four years ago, at the age of twenty, she had answered Michael Page's appeal to leave London and come down to Broome to help to run his house. Servants, easily obtained for the school, with its modernized buildings and its up-to-date equipment, would not work for a day in Estelle's archaic kitchen, and Estelle herself, though eager and energetic, was incapable of organization. She planned meals, knitted for her husband and the children, cut out dresses for her daughter, joined every organization run by the school or the nearby village of Broome. But the meals were never cooked, the knitting and needlework never finished; committees and the needy waited in vain. Only in one sphere did she achieve proficiency: she was a brilliant pianist, and her drawing room had become the center of the musical society of the district.

Jody now lived at Broome and worked in London as one of a team of girls who visited clients in their homes and gave them the famous and expensive Hortense Beauty Treatment. She combined her two jobs—in London and at Broome—with calm, unflurried efficiency.

From time to time Jody installed laborsaving devices; Estelle, appalled by their brash modernity, threw them out again. This was the fourth; the washing machine had gone, and then the spin dryer and then the electric range.

"It looked so wrong, Jody," she pleaded. "It looked so terribly out of place."

Jody's eyes rested on her in amusement. "So do you," she commented.

"When you were in bed," Estelle said, "I made up my mind that it's time I stopped letting you keep this household together. I wanted to prove that I could take over."

"Well, you haven't proved it," said Jody. She took an apron and tied it round her waist. "Anything I can use for lunch?"

Estelle peered into cupboards and produced some tins.

"You've forgotten to put on your engagement ring again," she said.

Jody glanced down at her hand. "So I have. Funny; you'd think I'd remember, wouldn't you, after four months? Has Charles rung up yet?"

"He was here this morning."

"Then why on earth didn't he come up and see me?"

"The doctor was with you, so he waited. And while he was waiting, Michael came in and they—they had a talk."

"You mean they had another quarrel!"

"Yes."

Jody frowned. "Why can't Michael see that other men can be as pigheaded as he is? He knows that nobody can push Charles around."

"Yes, he knows . . . but Jody, he needs that money so badly. It isn't a loan he wants—he's offering Charles a share in the school and——"

"—— and Charles doesn't want it. All Charles wants is to save up enough to give up teaching. He's doing a lot of extra coaching—which he loathes—solely in order to be able to put money aside; he isn't doing it to give Michael a chance to enlarge the school. Charles doesn't care a hoot for the school, apart from drawing his salary every term."

"Michael knows that, but he thought he'd have one last try. And Charles got angry and went off in a rage."

Jody grinned. Charles—dark, stocky, strong and not blessed with patience—could very easily go off in a rage. He was the science master at the school. During the term, she saw him on most evenings—but now that the summer holidays were in progress, they met less frequently. He lived on his boat, Gazelle, which he kept at Marcove, a tiny harbor about three miles from the school. Science was his living, but sailing was his passion. He owned a shabby little car in which he drove to Brighton or Eastbourne or London, sometimes staying away for a night or even a weekend in order to give extra lessons. He was a brilliant teacher, but his only desire was to get out of classrooms forever. Michael wanted a partner, but Charles wanted only to be free.

Anger turns the mind out-of-doors and blocks the entrance.

PLUTARCH

Jody did not dwell on the subject. "I suppose he'll be back when he's cooled down," she said. "Did the boys go off to camp all right? Were they excited?"

"Madly."

"And Fenella?"

As usual, mention of her daughter brought a baffled look to Estelle's eyes. "She—she took it awfully badly, Jody."

"I said she would. It's the first time she's been separated from the twins. Where is she?"

"Out in the garden," Estelle told her. "She's been in a furious temper all yesterday and all today."

Jody laughed. "I'll go and fetch her in when lunch is ready," she said. "Poor little sweet. She's lonely, and she can't understand why she couldn't go camping with the boys."

She was at the sink, and Estelle stood by her drying the plates. Then, characteristically, she forgot what she was doing, put down the cloth and began to peer absent-mindedly into the saucepans that Jody had set on the stove.

"Who's still at the school?" asked Jody.

"Only the professor and Miss Bishop. And the major."

Jody glanced over her shoulder in surprise. The music professor, she knew, always stayed during the school holidays. He occupied one of the three staff cottages; being a refugee, he had no home to go to. Miss Bishop, his assistant on the staff, lived in the cottage next to his, and spent the holidays cooking and cleaning for him. But Major Miller was not a member of the staff, and had a cottage of his own, perched on the cliffs above Marcove.

"He's keeping the grounds in order while the gardeners are away," explained Estelle. "The third cottage was empty, and Michael agreed to let him live in it for three weeks."

"Cozy little colony," commented Jody. "The professor and his cello, Miss Bishop and her viola, and the major and his violin. That means music every evening, I suppose?"

"Yes. Beginning this evening," said Estelle.

"Well, I shan't be here," said Jody. "I'm going to London, to see Aunt Essie. I'll spend the night with her, and go straight to work in the morning."

"You really feel quite well again? No more of those peculiar dreams?"

Jody opened her mouth to reply, closed it again. "No more dreams," she said levelly at last.

"I'm so glad." Estelle sounded relieved. "Oh, Aunt Essie rang up while the doctor was here, and asked about you. She said she couldn't get down here to see you."

They both smiled, aware that it would take a major disaster to make their aunt overcome her dislike of Michael Page sufficiently to allow her to come to his house.

The sound of a car brought Jody back to the present. "That's Charles," she said.

She met him in the hall, and felt the peculiar satisfaction that the sight of him always brought her. He was less tall, less handsome than her brother-in-law, but he had a solidity and strength that Michael lacked. He was unusually dark, with thick black brows and a sailor's keen, deep-set eyes. They were vividly blue, and looked striking against his dark tanned face. His manner was somewhat abrupt and he was impatient of social graces.

Sometimes Jody wondered how much she loved him. She felt none of the stirrings of passion, none of the turbulence she had associated with the state of being in love—but Charles satisfied her, and she was happy in his company; that, she felt, was enough.

He saw a girl slender, rather small, not beautiful like Estelle, but with something better than beauty: a look of intelligence, of humor and of sensitiveness. Her nose was small, her mouth rather large; her greatest attraction lay in her dark, laughing, slant-set eyes.

"Better?" he asked.

"Yes." She put up her face for his kiss. "Come with me; I'm going to look for Fenella."

"What's the matter with Fenella?"

"Her life's blasted," Jody told him. "The twins went camping, and she couldn't go. She's taking it hard."

They found Fenella hunched on a tree stump near the shrubbery. She vouchsafed no reply to their greetings; she wished, she said, to be alone. No, she did not want lunch. No she did not wish to come indoors. For the moment, she would prefer not to meet her parents, who had demonstrated only too clearly that they cared only for the welfare of their sons and nothing at all for the happiness of their daughter.

"Well, that's that," said Charles as they walked away. "Time heals all, I dare say."

"You'll stay to lunch?"

"Anything you say. Will you come down to the boat afterward?"

"I can't. I'm going up to see Aunt Essie. I thought I'd take a suitcase and stay the night with her and go straight to work tomorrow morning."

"You really feel up to going back to the job?"

"Of course. What's a bump on the head?"

"Nothing . . . unless it leaves you with those peculiar notions you were airing yesterday. Sure they're gone?"

She remembered his face, white and anxious, when he had hurried over to see her after the accident. She had no desire to bring back that look to his eyes.

"They've gone," she said quietly.

She saw his relief, and realized that nothing in her recent accident had caused so much anxiety as her attempts to reconstruct its details.

"Will you drive me to the station after lunch?" she asked.

"Of course."

He took her there, and they sat on a bench on the little platform, hand in hand, saying little. The train came in, and Charles put her into an empty compartment and she was borne away. She leaned back and closed her eyes. Now, at last, she could think.

She found, to her dismay, that she did not want to think. She was afraid to look too deeply into the fog that obscured the details connected with her accident. She had come back to consciousness filled with a nameless dread, and though it had lessened, it had not gone away. She was afraid—and she did not know what she was afraid of.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

Captain Tom's Fish Bake

with Hunt's, it's a dish—instead of "just fish"

Plain-old-fish for dinner? Not when you fix it this way. Rich, red Hunt's Tomato Sauce, bubbling over fillets nested on a bed of green vegetables, turns fish into company fare. Gives it a spicy tomato twist that perks up the delicate fish and herb flavors.

And it's so easy. You make it, bake it, and serve it—all in the same dish.

The one "must" in this recipe is the Hunt's Tomato Sauce. You can use almost any kind of fish fillets, fresh or frozen. But only Hunt's has the deep tomato goodness that really makes this dish.

That's because Hunt's is all tomato. No fillers or thickening to hide the flavor. Each of its spices is blended in at the exact moment to heighten the tangy goodness of the sauce.

And then, we kettle-simmer it to a rich consistency that's made to order for your cooking.

Try it with meat loaf, hamburger, roasts, casseroles, leftovers. And be sure to serve Captain Tom's Fish Bake. (Once you do, you'll probably want Hunt's Tomato Sauce handy all the time!)

- 1 cup chopped onion
- ½ cup chopped celery and tops
- ½ cup chopped parsley
- 2 lbs. fish fillets*
- 1 teasp. salt
- ⅛ teasp. pepper
- ¼ cup pure vegetable oil, such as Wesson Oil
- ¾ teasp. paprika
- 2 8-oz. cans Hunt's Tomato Sauce

Fresh or frozen fillets may be used. If frozen fillets are used, sauce will be thinner.*

Combine onion, celery and parsley. Arrange in large shallow greased baking dish. Place fish in overlapping layers over the vegetables. Season with salt and pepper.

Drizzle oil over top. Sprinkle with paprika. Bake in moderately hot oven (375°F.) 10 minutes. Pour over Hunt's Tomato Sauce. Bake 30 to 35 minutes longer, or until fish is flaky and sauce bubbles. Baste fish frequently with sauce. Makes 6 servings.

Hunt-for the best

HELPFUL RECIPES on every can. Also, write for FREE Recipe Booklet, "21 New Ways to Serve Hamburger." Hunt Foods, Dept. K-3. P.O. Box 5, Fullerton, California. In Canada: Hunt Foods, Tilbury, Ontario.*

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 98

She reached London and made her way to her aunt's home in Knightsbridge. Clarice opened the door and led her into the drawing room, and Jody stood looking round the familiar furnishings.

The door opened, and she turned. Her aunt came into the room, and they greeted each other with genuine affection.

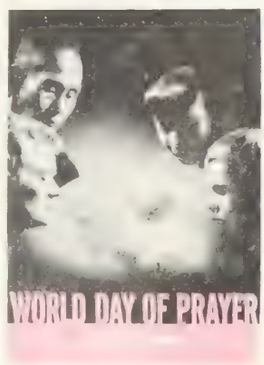
Lady Cleeve was about fifty, tall, thin and inexpressibly elegant. Jody had seldom seen her shaken out of her composure. She was a genuine man hater; at no time in her life had she lacked admirers, but she had only one passion: for orderliness. She loved to surround herself with beautiful things of a fragile and feminine kind, and in the type of home she had created, men had no place.

She pitied, deeply and sincerely, her married friends. They had been lured into marriage by strange biological urges, and there they were, stuck with husbands. Not for them the delicious little salads of asparagus flanked by two halves of tomato; not for them the charm of quiet evenings passed in satisfying solitude!

For her two nieces Lady Cleeve had deep affection, but Estelle exasperated her, and between herself and Michael Page there had long been open war. She had never liked him, but she had ceased to visit them since he had persuaded Jody to give up her rooms in London and go down to live at Broome.

She put her hands on Jody's shoulders and studied her.

"Darling, let me look at you," she said. "I worried about you, but Estelle said it was nothing more than a bump on the head. Does it still hurt?"



"No. It wasn't very bad."

"I've just sent Clarice out. Come into the kitchen and we'll make some tea and you shall tell me how it happened." She led the way, talking as she went. "You went to give somebody one of the usual beauty treatments, and you fell downstairs and you were found lying in a pool of blood."

"Practically no blood," Jody said. "And I didn't give the treatment because I never got to the client."

"Who was she?"

"I don't know. At least, all I know is her name and the number of the apartment. I'd given one treatment, and I had an eleven-thirty appointment with Mme. Latour at number four Dorset Court. The lift was out of order, so I must have walked upstairs. Number four was only one flight up. I was found by the man who came to mend the lift."

"How long had you been lying there?"

"It couldn't have been long. The appointment was for eleven-thirty and the last thing I remember was arriving at Dorset Court and checking the time. It was twenty past eleven."

"I see." Lady Cleeve gave her a brief, searching glance. "Those are the facts, and you've come up here to tell me that you're still seeing things quite unconnected with lifts or staircases or clocks."

"Who told you?"

"Estelle said something about it when I telephoned this morning. Take the tray into the drawing room and then you can begin at the beginning."

She poured the tea, handed a cup to Jody and sat beside her on the sofa.

Jody hesitated. "The things I see—they're not hallucinations. If you dream things, or imagine things, you don't get the clear, vivid pictures I've got in my mind."

She stopped as Lady Cleeve raised a long, white, authoritative hand.

"Suppose you go back to where it all began. Now. You're a young woman employed by a firm of beauty specialists known as Hortense. You go out every day as a qualified member of the staff, giving treatments to rich old women. Three days ago, you looked in your little appointment book and said, 'This morning I go to Mme. le Brun and ——'"

"Mme. Latour."

"You set out with your little box of preparations—but you never get to madame's. Is that correct so far?"

Jody frowned. "I obviously got near her flat," she said, "because I was found just at the foot of the stone stairs which lead down from Mme. Latour's apartment. When I came round, I told them who I was and they rang up home, and Estelle told them where to find Michael—he was at his tailor's in town. So they got hold of him and he drove me home."

"As I picture it, you got there, felt giddy, found the lift wasn't working, got to the staircase, fainted, fell down the stairs and hit your head on the floor at the bottom."

"I've never fainted in my life."

"There's always a first time. My dear Jody, consider: You work all day at a job that keeps you on the run; you go home every night on a crowded train, standing most of the way; when you get home, you cook and clean and see that the children get to bed, and you make coffee for all those musical people who gather every night in the drawing room, and you go to bed exhausted. So one day you feel faint—what's surprising about that?"

"All right." Jody spoke calmly. "So I faint. And when I recover, I can remember nothing of my movements from the moment of arriving at the main entrance of I... Court. But instead of a blank, which I... understand, my mind's full of —— I'm ... frightened, Aunt Essie."

"Frightened?"

"Yes. I don't know why. Everybody ... it's natural for me to have been left wit... fused impressions. But these impre... aren't confused. They're absolutely clea...

"What did you think you saw, Jody?"

"It was a street," Jody began slowl... quiet, small street."

"A London street?"

"Yes. I'm almost sure of that. I saw a ... rather small houses—small, but not sh... not mean houses. The whole street ... trim, like the better parts of Chelsea."

"All these are only impressions. ... said ——"

"I'm coming to the clear part. There ... man. I saw him as plainly as I'm seeing ... only he wasn't as close as you are. H... some distance away, and I watched him ... ing closer."

"A young man?"

"Yes. A man of about thirty, I think. ... with red hair—the coppery kind."

"Did you watch him for long?"

"No. Because he didn't take more t... few steps, and he was pulling this ... and ——"

"Goat?"

"You said Estelle told you."

"I didn't think she'd got it right. L... street, man with goat . . . it didn't make ... She also said something about a door."

"Yes. A yellow door. At least"—Jod... tated, and the color rose in her cheek ... least, the top half was yellow and the ... half was black."

Lady Cleeve stared at her for a fe... ments. Then she replaced her cup on th... folded her hands on her lap and spoke th... fully. "I'm keeping an open mind, Jod... what you're telling me sounds ——"

"Crazy. Don't I know? I know it all s... fantastic—but I also know that I saw it. ... real."

In Just 15 Days You Will See How Wonderfully

"Ice" Helps Improve Touchy Skins That Break Out*

—without costly facials, "lights", hormone creams or any other complicated skin treatments

New York, N. Y. (Special)—Skin scientists have now developed an invisible pharmaceutical ice—Ice-O-Derm—that promises miraculous new-looking complexions. Ice-O-Derm actually gives time table results of changes you can see.

Ice-O-Derm replaces present ordinary methods. Fortified by proper nutrition, good circulation and facial cleanliness, it will give you positive results—time-table results or your money back.

$1 plus tax

* Due to overactive oil glands in skin.

Here is Your 15-Day Complexion Timetable

1st 5 days: Ingredient number one helps free pores of blackheads, pasty fat and impurities not removed by soap and water—helps prevent pimple infection from spreading. Result: Clearer, fresher skin!

2nd 5 days: Ingredient number two holds moisture in, shields it from sun, winds, steam heat that dry out and wrinkle skin. Result: Softer, moister, skin!

3rd 5 days: Ingredient number three stimulates and improves skin circulation, tightens pores and helps build up resistance against surface infection. Result: Firmer, healthier looking skin!

AT DRUG AND DEPARTMENT STORES

©1960 Shulton, Inc., Pharmaceutical Div., Clifton, N. J.

"...o you." Lady Cleeve picked up Jody's for...tten cup of tea, passed it to her and spo... calmly. "I know that you wouldn't bu... up situations out of nothing. But you we... unconscious for about forty minutes, I un...stand, and I think it's only natural that you should have been left with a lot of fus... and picturesque impressions. And if ou... work had something to do with it—which I'm ...ure it has—you would be left with a fantas...or two on your mind."

"...antasy?"

"...ut because you believe that you saw so...thing real, telling you that you didn't do...t help you. So we'll telephone for a taxi an... we'll go to Dorset Court and we'll drive rig... round the block looking for ——"

"...he yellow door?"

"...es. If we find the yellow door, I'll swallow... he man and the goat," Lady Cleeve told her... "Shall we do that?"

...dy's face answered for her; she was on her fee... and at the telephone, ringing up for a taxi.

...t there was no yellow door. They left the taxi... and walked round the four streets that enc...osed the great, modern block of apartments. The streets were wide, busy, traffic-fill...; the buildings along them were offices or br...antly lit shops. There were side streets, an... they walked down them—but even the side streets were broad and busy. There was no ...uiet street with a row of small houses. ...nd there was no yellow-and-black door.

...oing back to work after her three days' abs..., Jody determined to put the accident out of...er mind. But less than a week later she ha... occasion to remember.

...e was at Broome, and when she had prepa...d the dinner she went into the drawing ro... to tidy it, for after dinner there was to be ...usic. The string trio: Professor Joichim, M... Bishop and her cousin, Major Miller, we... to play one of the professor's new compo...ions. They would come, as usual, about nin... o'clock, and Jody would make coffee for th... before going up to bed. She seldom stay...d to listen; she liked music, but not the pr...essor's kind of music, which seemed to her to ...ve no recognizable form or tune. Music cri...s on the serious newspapers, however, we... beginning to accord his works great respect.

...e professor had come to the school from H...rogate, where he had founded the small an... struggling Joichim Conservatoire. Arriving unheralded and uninvited, he had asked Mi...ael to give him a place, however humble, o... the music staff. The school's head music m...ter had just been fatally injured in a car cr...h, and although it was generally supposed th... the vacant post would go to Miss Bishop, M...ael realized that Professor Joichim would m...e a far greater impression on parents.

...o the professor was appointed. Miss B...op's position had become awkward. Certa... of her appointment as head of the music s..., she had asked the headmaster if he w...ld consider appointing in a junior capa...ty a cousin of hers named Major Miller. Sh... had often spoken of him, and so everybo...y knew him to be about forty, handsome, w...ld-traveled and a first-class violinist.

...o written answer came from the major, bu... a week after Miss Bishop had posted her pr...posal he arrived by sea, sailing into Marc... in a trim little boat named Ballerina. He m...le his way up to the school, only to learn th... there was no post for him.

...hat was more than a year ago, but the m...or was still at Broome, as familiar a figure as...ny member of the staff. He played the violi... with the trio, and did a number of useful th...s about the school and its grounds.

...dy liked him, but certain things about hi... seemed inconsistent. Having come in appa...ent haste to take a junior post, he had st...ed on with no post at all. If he had needed m...ey, how could he have lived for the past ye... and more without earning any? In his descr...ptions of his travels, she noted discrepanc... of dates and events. What seemed strangest of all was the fact that though he showed t...ard Miss Bishop no trace of rancor for her p...mature summons, her attitude toward him w... one of unvarying coolness. Jody had once put these points before Charles, and he had laughed at her.

"What are you worrying about?" he had asked. "He's handy about the place, and everybody likes him."

"But if he can live without working, why did he consider a junior post and ——"

"Music. He likes to play his fiddle, and now he's a member of the trio and gets all the music he wants. What're you trying to do? Find a sinister reason for all this?"

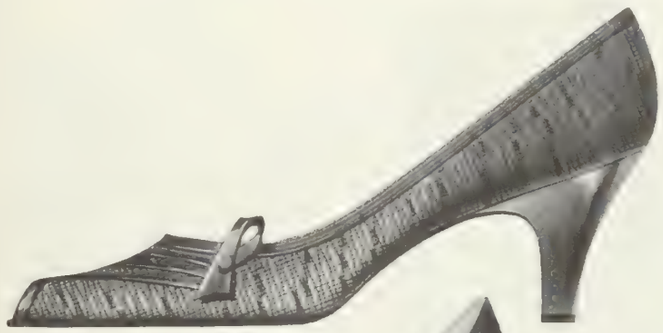
"No. Not sinister. Just sensible. Once I heard them quarreling."

"They're related—let them have rows if they want to," he said lightly.

Between Miss Bishop and the professor all was friendly. His childlike blue eyes peered shortsightedly round to find her whenever she left him for long. She did his shopping, saw to his linen and generally mothered him. They made an odd pair: he was tall and thin and stooping, and her figure was like an old drawing of a trapeze artist—small waist, billowing hips and bosom, and hair arranged in a loose, old-fashioned style over her brow. Like the professor, she was about fifty; like him, she looked a good deal more.

Tonight the drawing room had an intimate air. Estelle sat listening, silent and absorbed, and the trio played. Jody waited for an interval and then carried in the coffee. The professor came across to speak to her, his mild blue eyes beaming with pleasure.

"What is this they tell me?" he asked, in his stumbling English. "You haf fallen somewhere?"



"It was nothing," Jody told him. " I fell down some stairs."

"Ah!" The sound was soft, distressed, sympathetic. "I do not hear before; I was away at my conservatoire, playing to them my last composition. You are quite, quite well now?"

"Quite, thank you. Wasn't that a new composition you were playing just now?"

"New, yes. Now I am finishing a muñeira."

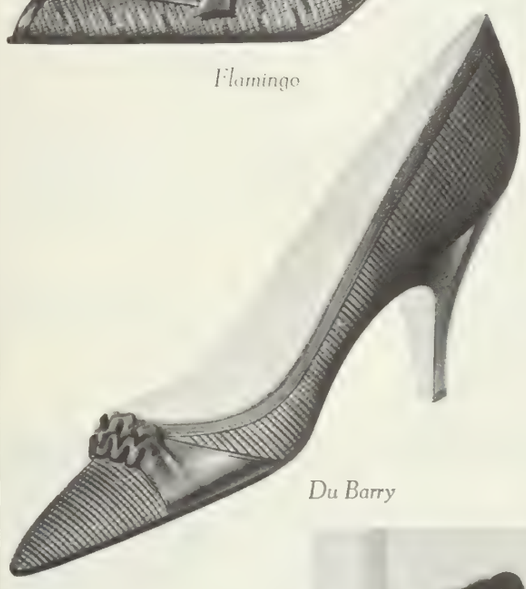
Fashion...with an unforgettable feeling of comfort



Flamingo

Air-spun flattery . . . in the caressing, loveliness of woven nylon. So brightly accented with gleaming leathers . . . so smartly styled on fashion's newest lines. Just four from the beautiful Selby collection now at your retailers. All with the famous Arch Preserver comfort features you love.

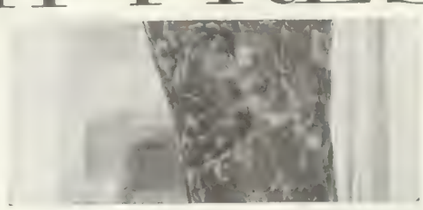
Taba



Du Barry

Madrid

Selby ARCH PRESERVER Shoes

Styles from $16.95 to $18.95

FOR NAME OF YOUR NEAREST SELBY ARCH PRESERVER RETAILER WRITE TO SELBY ARCH PRESERVER DIVISION, THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO.

"Spanish dance," Miss Bishop explained, in her pleasant but abrupt way. "Spanish dance, popular in Galicia. Compound duple time, ta, ta ra-ta ra-ta ta ta. Interesting. The professor thinks the boys will enjoy it next term."

Jody felt that the boys would have been much happier with a percussion band, but did not say so.

"You're looking much better," went on Miss Bishop. "Lost that peaked look. Trouble with falls is that you can't say how long the effects are going to last. What happened, exactly?"

"It sounds rather silly," said Jody. "I was found at the bottom of a flight of stairs."

"Absurd part of it," observed Miss Bishop, "is that I was up in London that morning, seeing the school printers. If only your sister had remembered when they rang her up, I could have hopped into a taxi and been with you in two shakes. Pity."

"The, headmaster was in town," explained Jody. "He brought me home. Professor, some more coffee?"

"No, thank you," said the professor. "Thank you, but it is time that we play again, I think."

He carried his cup to the tray, a signal that the interval was over. Jody gathered the empty cups and carried the tray to the kitchen. As she walked across the hall, she caught the telephone's shrill summons. She picked up the receiver and heard her aunt's voice.

"Is that you, Jody?"

"Yes, Aunt Essie."

"It may be nothing; absolutely nothing." Lady Cleeve sounded slightly bewildered. "I may be making an absolute fool of myself—and of you. But I had to ring you up and tell you."

"Tell me what?"

"Well, I've just got back from London Airport; I went to see a friend off to America. On the airport coach I sat next to a woman whose two friends were sitting behind us. She spent the entire time talking to them, and can't help overhearing somebody's conve tion if most of it is being screamed into y ear. She was talking about another wo called Nancy," went on Lady Cleeve. " suddenly one of her friends from the seat hind said, 'Oh, by the way, how's the goat ting on?'"

"The—the goat?" echoed Jody.

"Yes. Don't interrupt, just listen.
woman next to me said 'What goat?' and other woman said, 'Don't tell me that Nan got a goat!' And the first woman said 'Yes' the other woman said 'You're joking! I di know anyone could keep a goat successf right in the middle of London.' I gathered Nancy—whoever Nancy is—has a large den that stretches much farther than yo think just by looking at her house. It down as far as Waverley Square."

"Waverley Square?"

"You don't know where it is? Neither di
So I looked it up. It's two streets away fi Dorset Court. It can't just be coincide Jody."

"But I couldn't have ——"

"—— seen a goat in Waverley Squar you weren't in Waverley Square? Why not sume that you had a sort of blackout wandered for five or ten minutes?
cross the road at the entrance to Dorset C and you walk up that main street and then turn into Waverley Place."

"No, Aunt Essie."

"How do you know? Get your treatm done in a hurry tomorrow morning, have early lunch with me, and after lunch both go to Waverley Square and see if th a yellow door. If there is, there's your planation."

"Do you think it would make me feel better to know I'd been wandering round streets in a daze?"

"It would make me feel better. A black isn't pleasant, but it's something you can with. Nameless fears are something again—far more unpleasant. Come with tomorrow and we'll find your yellow d and then all those fears of yours will vani

But Jody, after all, lunched alone. I Cleeve telephoned during the morning; would have to give up the expedition to verley Square. Would Jody wait, or go alo

Jody went alone. Getting off the bus o site the largest of the four entrances to Dc Court, she stood for a moment looking at great block of flats, fighting an inexplic panic that welled up and threatened to en her. She had got out of the bus on that m ing not so long ago, and she had walked u
the entrance . . . and then?

She crossed the road and walked d Waverley Place. The distance was not gr barely five minutes elapsed before she reac
the corner and turned into Waverley Squ

She saw at once that it was not the stree had seen, or imagined she had seen. On sides stood tall houses; near the place which she was standing green branches c hung a high wall behind which childr voices sounded, bringing a comfortable gestion of safe, enclosed gardens. There nothing here that she could dread—and was certainly not the street she had com seek. This was a sober square, even a n square; nobody would have presume paint any of these dignified doorways frivolous shade of yellow.

She turned to go back to the bus st and then froze in her tracks. From the c side of the wall, loud and prolonged an sistent, came the bleat of a goat.

Jody's next movements were automatic walked forward and came to a low, wo door in the wall. She pushed it open, ent the garden and stood staring at a small, w tethered goat.

She was in a long, narrow garden. Imm
ately before her was the row of low, sir storied houses to which the gardens belon beyond, towering, she saw the massive si ture of Dorset Court. Staring at the en row of windows, she realized that from or them she could have seen this goat. This c have been the house to which the goat wa ing led; she was looking at the side of it faced the garden, but if she walked roun

Now! Change your colors as easily as you change your mind!

1. Rit lets your washer do the work!

2. Rit Gold—such cheer, such charm!

Just push the button on your washer ...RIT COLOR will do the rest!

3. Rit Cardinal Red makes a chic change!

4. Rit Peacock Blue—so pretty and practical!

Rit is designed for washer dyeing. So safe, so sure, it's recommended by leading washer manufacturers!

Imagine! You can change your bathroom color (and personality!) in a few hours just by using some vibrant, luscious Rit Color. Pop your towels, bath mat, curtains, plastic shower curtain right in your washer. Rit will give them the smoothest, evenest new color you ever wished for!

No boiling, no stirring—your washer does the work. And only Rit gives you such rich tones of dark colors in your washer—thanks to the exclusive Rit washer formula.

Use Rit for all your washables—(except for glass and mineral fibers, and taffeta or waterproofed bathroom finery). Each of the 35 Rit Colors works wonders in your washer or washbasin.

We're so sure you're going to love Rit we make this promise: if you follow directions to the letter and you're not delighted with the results, send us the article and we'll re-dye it at our own expense.

New! Rit Color Remover and Nylon Whitener—to change dark colors to light, nylon "grey" to white that's bright again!

You're so Bright when you use RIT® COLOR ont, perhaps there would be a yellow-lack door.

Something moved. Jody turned and, with ing abruptness, came back to the pres-he was trespassing in a stranger's gar-Vorse, she had blundered into what she aw to be a kindergarten: ten or more children seated in a semicircle round a in, elderly woman who had risen from air and was now bearing down on Jody utrage written plainly upon her face.
dy eyed her uneasily. Beyond her, she see the pupils' heads turned in her direcn aged gardener paused in his weeding ked a watery but suspicious glance on baby, lying against embroidered piln something too regal to be termed a rested wide blue eyes on the intruder.
tall woman halted before Jody. "May I what you are doing here?"
struggled to pull herself together.
orry. It was a mistake. I only wanted to
t ——" u are not a friend of Lady Wigram's?"
he elderly woman abruptly.
dy Wigram? No, I'm afraid not. But,
, I heard the goat and ——"
haps you will kindly explain it to Lady n," suggested the woman coldly. "She ing now."
turned. A woman of about thirty—pretty, plump and with an expression of ood humor—had come out of the house.
ttle boys detached themselves from the children and ran to meet her, and she to pet them and to shoo them back to t in clanging fights and desper-marches only is heroism to be oked for, but on every railroad idge and fireproof building that going up today. On freight trains, the decks of vessels, in cattle

rds, in mines, on lumber rafts, ong the firemen and the police-n, the demand for courage is cessant and the supply never ls. WILLIAM JAMES

laces. Then she had come up to Jody s looking at her with a faint smile.
sorry to have burst in so rudely," Jody
I was out there in Waverley Square, eard the goat. I didn't mean to trespass, ut I had a rather special reason for g to see it."
Wigram laughed. "It sounds intri-She turned to the elderly woman. "It's t, Miss Bond. Please go on with the lt it my duty to make inquiries," said ond, directing a stern look at Jody. She stiff bow and went back to her pupils, dy Wigram looked at Jody.

n't you come into the house?" she
"I have to go out in about twenty mint perhaps you could explain about the on't stay, thank you," said Jody. "I sed, and it's more than kind of you to me—but I have a job and I ought to be back to it. If you would allow me to his evening ——" free from six to seven. Could you hen?"

. Thank you," said Jody. "There'll be tell you the whole story—but it won't very sensible."
had turned and were walking toward e.
l you know Betsy before we got her?"
. But . . . I saw a goat when . . . you aunt rang up last night, and ——"
's the previous owner of Betsy?"
, no. She lives in Knightsbridge—the t house in the district, and I don't think could fit ——" She stopped. "It's a involved story," she ended.
!"—Lady Wigram had opened the gar-or, but was obviously interested and nt to let Jody go—"you have seen Betsy
?"
on't know. That's what I hope to find night. I think I saw her about a week ago when I went to give a beauty treatment to somebody living in Dorset Court. I was on my way to Mme. Latour's flat, and I must have seen the goat from a window nearby and ——"

Her voice faltered and died away. On Lady Wigram's face there had appeared suddenly an odd expression. Friendliness, warmth, interest had vanished. The look on her face was only too plain: she thought Jody a liar.

There was a short, dreadful silence, during which Jody burned with bewilderment and humiliation. Then Lady Wigram opened the door wide.

"Good-by, Miss ——"

"Hern. I ——"

"Good-by, Miss Hern. I'm so sorry I shan't be at home this evening; I've just remembered an engagement."

The words were followed by the sound of the door closing. Jody was outside, in Waverley Square, engulfed in shame. She had no means of knowing what had changed Lady Wigram's attitude; one moment she had been speaking with laughing familiarity—and the next, had stared with disbelief.

On an impulse, Jody crossed over to a telephone kiosk and rang up Estelle: she would, she said, stay with her aunt tonight and go home tomorrow, Saturday morning.

When she got to the house in Knightsbridge that evening, Lady Cleeve was out. Clarice, leading Jody to the drawing room, said that she would be in soon, and offered to make tea. Jody refused, and sat alone in the quiet, restful room and found the events of the past week rushing back at her with almost overwhelming force.

She was afraid. And now she knew that the fear had its roots in the things she had remembered, and which others said that she had imagined: the man, the goat, the yellow-and-black door. This morning she had been happy; this evening she was in her aunt's drawing room trembling and wringing her hands like a heroine in a melodrama. It was absurd. No, it was not absurd; it was dangerous. She would have to forget. Man, goat, door; from this moment, she swore to herself, she would leave them where they were: in the dark places of her mind. There must be no more looking back. The decision taken, she felt better.

She got up as she heard sounds on the steps, and went to open the door to save her aunt the trouble of using her key.

She had uttered the first word of greeting when she saw that it was not her aunt who stood on the steps. It was the man who had been leading the goat.

For a few blank seconds she could only stare, panic gripping her. She put out a hand to grope for the door, and saw the man take a step forward. She made a desperate effort to thrust him from her; and then she was falling, falling. She knew, as blackness closed round her, that she was falling into his arms.

She opened her eyes to find herself lying on the drawing-room sofa. Two people were bending over her: Lady Cleeve, and the man who had been standing on the steps. In the background hovered Clarice, wide-eyed with worry. For some moments nobody spoke, then Lady Cleeve's voice came anxiously.

"How do you feel, Jody?"

Jody sat up slowly. She looked up at the man. She had remembered him as angry-looking, and he was frowning now, watching her with brown, intent eyes. Once more Lady Cleeve spoke, this time in bewilderment.

"Do you two know each other?"

It was the man who answered. "I don't think so." He straightened, and his bulk seemed to fill the room. He was over six feet tall, and broad-shouldered, and his hands and feet looked enormous. "I was just about to ring the bell when the door opened and ——"

"I thought it was you," Jody told her aunt.

"Why should that make you faint?" Lady Cleeve paused. "Jody, you don't mean that he's—that he's the man you ——"

"Yes," said Jody.

The stranger looked from one to the other. "I've never been thought handsome, but I've never realized that my appearance could frighten a girl into fainting."

"It's all rather involved," broke in Lady Cleeve, "and we'd better begin at the beginning." She sat down, and spoke in her usual calm way. "Since you were coming to visit me," she began, "I presume that you know who I am." As his embarrassed air proved that he did not, she told him, and he bowed.

"I'm sorry to have come without warning in this way," he said. "I came looking for Miss Hern."

"This is my niece, Joanna Hern."

He looked at Jody. "You told my sister this afternoon that your aunt lived in a very small house in Knightsbridge—a house too small to hold a goat. I took a chance and came to this one."

"I went to Waverley Square after lunch," Jody explained to her aunt. "And I heard a goat bleat. It was in a garden near where I was standing, and before I knew what I was doing I'd walked in."

The strange young man took up the tale. "And you talked to my sister, and here I am," he said.

"And may I ask who you are?" inquired Lady Cleeve.

"I'm sorry. Huntley. Desmond Huntley. Lieutenant commander, Royal Navy, on a month's leave after service in the East, and staying with my sister in Waverley Mews." He hesitated. "If it isn't asking too much, perhaps you'd tell me why I frightened your niece?"

Approved by more doctors

The outstanding favorite of all medications for children's fever and pain.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMERS' SERVICE BUREAU PARENTS' MAGAZINE

...trusted by more mothers than all other children's aspirins combined!

When you insist on St. Joseph Aspirin For Children you get the aspirin that more doctors approve because of these three "firsts":

FIRST with the little 1¼ grain tablets (one-fourth adult dose) that doctors recommend for accuracy.

FIRST with the pure orange flavored, creamy-textured tablet that children overwhelmingly prefer for taste.

FIRST with the special safety cap (see right) that health authorities now insist on for safety.

Remember, when your child's health is at stake, "second best" won't do. Give your child the aspirin that's first in accuracy, taste, safety—St. Joseph Aspirin For Children! The original children's aspirin, it's approved by more doctors, trusted by more mothers than all others combined! Never accept a substitute.

SAFETY CAP PIONEERED

by St. Joseph Aspirin For Children helps prevent unwanted opening by children. Opens easily for you!

(In Canada, ask for St. Joseph Bebetine For Children.)

Starts to work FASTER than other leading pain relief tablets!

FOR ADULTS
St.Joseph ASPIRIN
100 TABLETS
59¢

Why pay for costlier aspirin, expensive buffering or "combination" pain relief drugs? Laboratory tests prove St. Joseph Aspirin disintegrates faster, is ready to go to work faster than all three other leading pain relief tablets. Get regular St. Joseph Aspirin for adults; for children get specialized St. Joseph Aspirin For Children (above). Get this "Family Aspirin Pair."

"I think it would be better," said Lady Cleeve, "to begin at the beginning."

In a few sentences, she told him of Jody's accident and subsequent conviction that she had seen a man and a goat. She told him of the conversation overheard in the airline coach—and then Desmond Huntley took up the tale.

"Nancy is my sister, Lady Wigram," he explained. "She's got two little boys, and a baby of six months. The baby was ordered goat's milk, and when I came home on leave about ten days ago, I told her I'd see whether I could induce a goat to come and live in town, and I found one—name of Betsy." He looked at Jody. "And you must have seen me the day I installed it."

"You were pulling the goat along—but there was a yellow door ——"

"That's my sister's front door."

"But it was black and yellow."

There was a momentary look of bewilderment on his face, and then he put his head back, laughing.

"You're quite right—it was black and yellow," he said at last, sobering. "My sister was painting it. She does a lot of amateur decorating, but she can only do the upper half of the doors while the children are around. When they've gone to bed, she does the lower half." He looked at Jody. "Where were you when you saw me with the goat?"

"I don't know." She paused for a moment and then looked directly at him. "Will you tell me what I said or did this afternoon to offend your sister?"

"Offend?" repeated Lady Cleeve in surprise.

He hesitated, and seemed to be choosing his words carefully. "Something you said made her feel that you weren't as—as frank as you appeared to be."

"But what did I say?"

"You told her that you saw the goat from a window near Mme. Latour's flat."

"Why should that upset her?"

"Because she knows Mme. Latour, and visits her frequently. And she knows that her flat is on the other side of the building, quite away from any windows overlooking Waverley Mews. So for a moment my sister lost her nerve and remembered that wicked people sometimes use charming young girls to get into gardens and kidnap babies. Her own baby was in the garden, to say nothing of half a dozen children belonging to neighbors of high degree; they were all in her charge and so ——"

"—— and so she pushed me out," finished Jody. "But I was going to Mme. Latour's and I was found at the bottom of her staircase."

He frowned. He was sitting forward in a chair, his attitude easy and relaxed. Something in his air, however, told the two women that he was turning something over in his mind.

"It would be interesting," he said at last, "to know just what happened that morning."

"You mean that if she wasn't near Mme. Latour's flat, where was she?" asked Lady Cleeve.

"Something like that," he said. "You wouldn't," he asked them, "care to drive round with me to Dorset Court and try to relate time and place?"

"I don't quite understand," Jody said.

"It's perfectly simple." Desmond smiled. "You know what time you got to Dorset Court that morning. You know what time you were found at the bottom of the stairs. It would be interesting to see how far you could have got in between." He glanced at his watch. "There's time before dinner."

"I won't go, thank you," Lady Cleeve said.

He looked at Jody. "How about it?"

She hesitated, then she heard her aunt's dry tones. "You'd better go, Jody, and get the thing cleared up if you can." And get this overlarge man removed, her glance added.

"Your aunt," Desmond told Jody as he put her into his car, "is rather formidable."

"She doesn't like men very much."

He glanced at her engagement ring. "And does she give your fiancé the fish-eye when he comes to see you?"

Jody smiled. "I don't live here. I live with my sister at a place called Broome, in Sussex. My brother-in-law is the headmaster of the boys' school there, and my fiancé's the science master."

"Wouldn't you rather live nearer London?"

"In winter, perhaps," acknowledged Jody. "This is a nice car," she commented.

He grinned. "I brought Betsy to town in the back seat. Incidentally"—he paused at the traffic lights and glanced at Jody—"my sister wants to apologize. She said that the moment you'd gone she was sorry she'd had a moment's doubt about you. You were too obviously all right to have had sinister intentions—and besides, your story was so lame."

"Why did you follow it up?" Jody asked curiously.

"Because she told me you were the most attractive girl she'd ever seen," he answered calmly.

ON WAITING FOR THE BIRTH OF A CHILD

By NORMAN LEVINE

The rain stopped.
The all-night street light was on.
I heard the first train go by in the hollow.
It was still and dark.
Then a bird sang somewhere near
And another one answered
And in between it was still and dark.

It was a Thursday morning the end of March
And the birds were singing
As I suppose they do every morning
Only never have I heard them
as sharp and clear.
I sat in the next room by a table
Trying to read a book by Camus.
And listening
To the short cry, now regular, sear high-pitched through
From the other side of the wall.

I sat there and listened to the suffering in a human voice,
And watched the sky become a lighter blue
Until the houses stopped being black, and I could see windows.
And then, out of nowhere, a small black toy thing, a bird
Fell against the blue sky, caught the telephone wire
Outside my window, balanced itself, and broke into song.

She found nothing to say to this. There was silence until they reached Dorset Court and Desmond had drawn up before the great block of flats. He walked round to help her out, and together they went toward the rather ornate north entrance. Then Jody halted.

"Not this way," she said.

"But this is the entrance which leads to Mme. Latour's flat. I'll take you there now, and I'll prove to you that you couldn't possibly have seen me or the goat from that side of the block—not unless you were looking through several intervening flats. Come on."

He took her arm and led her toward the short flight of steps that led to the north entrance—and then he felt her resisting.

"I didn't come this way. I'm absolutely certain I didn't," she said.

Something in her voice halted him. "If all this is bothering you," he said slowly at last, "we'll skip it. You sound frightened."

"I'm not frightened. At least ——"

"I'm sorry I've upset you," he said. "But I was interested in the story my sister told me, and wanted to know exactly what lay behind your desire to see the goat. And having found out, it seemed to me that there are one or two loose strings to tie up. But since we left your aunt's house, you've changed. You've got a scared look in your eyes—and if that's what playing about with loose threads is going to do for you, we'll just cut them and go back and pick up your aunt and go out to dinner somewhere, if you'll both come, and we'll give up this idea of poking into the past. Agreed?"

Jody, opening her mouth to give a heartfelt agreement, found to her dismay that no words came. Instead, she stared at Desmond, and the look in her eyes made him reach out and take her hand in a firm clasp.

"Jody." He spoke earnestly. "There's nothing to be frightened about. Nothing. Don't—please don't look like that. We'll drop the whole thing, now and forever. Yes?"

"No." The word was out before she could stop it. "I'll have to go in—just to get rid of this feeling of fear. I suppose it's like having a swimming accident—if you don't go into the water straightway and overcome your fear, you're left with it all your life."

"What exactly are you afraid of?"

"I don't know. I only know it's connected—or was connected—with what I saw: you and the goat."

"And the connection between yourself and myself is in there, inside Dorset Court, and so you're scared to go in."

"Yes. But I want to go in. If you'd forgive me for being stupid, and if you'd be patient and take me in and—and let me hang on to you if this panic comes on, I'll"—her eyes, wide and clear, stared into his—"I'll be grateful to you as long as I live."

He had taken her other hand; now the two lay in his own, and he looked down at them.

"See those?" he said. "My vast paws and your absurd little ones? Hang on—and don't let go."

Then they were walking once more toward the building.

"Now," said Desmond, when they had entered the hall, "pay attention. You say that Mme. Latour's on that side, and I say she's on this." They were in the lift, and he pressed the first-floor button. "It's only one flight," he said. "Now we're on Mme. Latour's floor—and here, at the end of this little corridor, is Mme. Latour's flat. There."

He stopped before a door. Jody stared at the number upon it, and opened her mouth to speak. Desmond put up a hand.

"Don't say anything yet," he ordered. "Come here. You see where you are? You're standing in a corridor a few yards long and there's one flat and one flat only before you: Mme. Latour's. And in the corridor—observe—is one window and one window only. Look out of it and what do you see?"

Jody looked out.

"You see?" he asked. "Not a sign of Waverley Mews."

"I didn't need to look," she said. "Because I was never here. This flat is number seven."

"You said Mme. Latour's."

"I know I did. But I must have made a mistake, because I thought her flat was number ——" She stopped, and fear flickered in her eyes. "I've—I've forgotten."

"It would be easy to check, wouldn't it? You must have her letter—or did she telephone and ask for an appointment?"

"She wrote."

"If we're going to clear this up, it's important to know which number you went to. Come on back to the car; you can direct me to your office."

The caretaker let them in, and Jody led Desmond to the desk she used. She walked to a filing cabinet, drew out a file, found a letter and stood staring at it.

"Well?" he asked.

"It's number four!"

He took the letter from her and looked at it. "Seven," he said.

"That's a four!"

"It's like a four, but it isn't a four. Because why? Because Mme. Latour is a Frenchwoman, and the French, for reasons of their own, insist on making ones look like sevens—they put a little dash through them. Then, just to make it more difficult, they mak sevens look like fours. When they use a pe like Mme. Latour's, the whole thing gets ou of hand."

She was staring at him. "And so that why ——"

"That's why," he said. "Come on. Th time, we're going to number four, and I thin we shall prove three things: one, that it's a co ner flat, at the end of a short corridor; two that from the window of the corridor, as yo waited for somebody to open the door, ye would have had a grandstand view of me tr ing to get the goat along to its new hom three—well, if the door opened and you sa something that frightened you ——" H paused and looked down at her, trying t weigh up her reactions. "You don't rememb anything?"

"Nothing."

They drove to Dorset Court once more, a this time Desmond led her to the south e trance. They went up a single flight in the li and then they got out and found themselv in a corridor which corresponded in eve detail to that leading to Mme. Latour's apar ment. Only the view was different. From th window she could see clearly the quiet litt road, the trim houses, the yellow door.

"You see?" came Desmond's voice quietl "You'd ring the bell, and as you waited f somebody to answer it, you'd turn natural to look out the window. And you'd see n trying to get Betsy along. And after that . well, what? If the door opened and somethi frightened you, wouldn't you turn and r back along this corridor and make for t stairs? You go down them faster than y meant to, and they find you at the bottom, u conscious."

"But ——"

"Wait a minute. All we have to do now is ring the bell of number four and see wheth Frankenstein answers the door. If he doesn and if somebody normal-looking answers we merely ask whether you called on them the morning of . . . what date was it?"

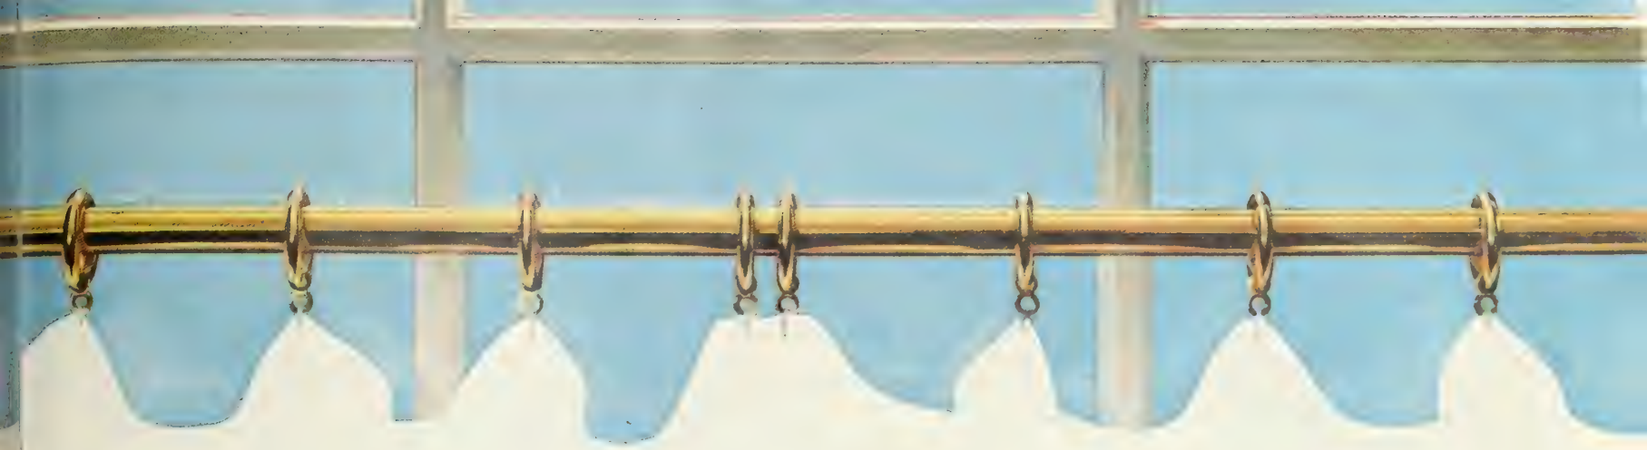
"Tuesday the fifteenth."

The questions were soon answered. Nu ber four was empty. A new tenant was shor to move in.

When Desmond inquired at the recepti desk, the clerk remembered that the previc tenants, a Mr. and Mrs. Grierson, had left something of a hurry. They had been call away urgently, he said, and had left the bui ing at about one o'clock, less than an ho after Mrs. Grierson had come down to t him that they were leaving. He had sent t stairs for their luggage. Mrs. Grierson h left in a taxi; Mr. Grierson, she said, had go on ahead to his bank. Their address —— Y here it was. Very difficult to pronounce; son where in Kenya. Desmond asked:

"What date did they leave?"

The clerk consulted the ledger once mc "The tenants left," he said, "on the morn of Tuesday the fifteenth."



It was, argued Desmond, taking Jody's a and moving her out of earshot of the clerk was pure coincidence. People didn't take th furnished apartments forever. They moved they moved out.

"Which was the coincidence?" she ask "My going to see them about an hour bef they left, or my being found at the bottom their stairs about an hour before they le Or the fact that I was left with a feeling panic after seeing them? Because you kn something? I'm certain that I did see them."

"You could have. You go to the wrong You ring the bell. This Grierson answers sees a pretty girl on his doorstep and says does something to frighten you. Being a se ble girl, you run for it. He feels fairly cert that you'll lodge a complaint downstairs, he alerts his wife and they pack up and p off. Not because they fear your complain itself, but because the fellow was probably of the maniacs you read about who'd been for similar offenses before. Won't you acc that as a sound reconstruction?"

"I'll have to." Jody moved away from counter. "Investigation over—but thank all the same."

CONTINUED ON PAGE

These curtains were washed in blue Cheer*

 When curtains are this white, you know your whole wash is perfect.*
Try Cheer with the Blue Magic Whitener. See the difference in whiteness yourself.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

He followed her outside. "I'm sorry. I hoped it would kill that bogey."

"Oh—but it has!"

"You mean you're not frightened any more?" he asked.

"Perhaps I am," she said. "But if the fear's still there, then fear is a much less strong emotion than curiosity. You've removed panic and left me feeling like the girl reporter who didn't get her scoop."

"I'm curious, too," he said. He stopped. A man had come down the steps of the main entrance and was hurrying toward the car.

"Ah—I'm not too late," he said. "The reception clerk told me that you had been making inquiries about Mr. and Mrs. Grierson. I am Mr. Kennedy, the reception manager, and I came out to ask whether you were by any chance friends of theirs."

"We didn't even know their names," explained Desmond, "until we checked up on apartment number four. This lady"—he indicated Jody—"had a slight accident on the morning the Griersons left, and doesn't remember much about what happened—but we thought that she might have gone by mistake to number four. Since the Griersons have left, there doesn't seem much hope of clearing up the point."

"I see." Mr. Kennedy stared at them out of keen, hard, intelligent little black eyes. "I'm sorry we haven't been able to help you. We knew very little about them. In fact, I would not have come out here to see you if I had not been able to add one small item of information to the little the clerk gave you."

"What is it?" asked Jody.

"It doesn't amount to much," confessed Mr. Kennedy, "but you might be helped by knowing that Mrs. Grierson's name is Laurie. She is young and remarkably handsome; she has naturally fair hair."

"Well, that ought to help," said Desmond dryly. "She's a blonde and they call her Laurie. Is Mr. Grierson a blond too?"

"That," said Mr. Kennedy, "I cannot tell you. The apartment was taken by Mrs. Grierson, for—she said—her husband and herself. She entertained a great deal, and from time to time"—he glanced apologetically at Jody—"there were evidences that somebody had stayed in the apartment for a night or two. But no one on the staff can state who the elusive Mr. Grierson was, or what he looked like. All this, of course, was known to the Reception Department; we did not intend to renew the lease when it came to an end."

"She was a blonde, and she was called Laurie, and any one of several visiting gentlemen could have been her husband—right?" asked Desmond.

"It doesn't sound much," said Mr. Kennedy regretfully, "but it may help you. I hope it does."

There was an odd note in his voice, and Jody stared at him. "Are you anxious to find them too?"

"Anxious? Perhaps. I would find it interesting," said Mr. Kennedy, "to discover why there was a small trace of blood on the drawing-room carpet of number four."

He gave a slight bow, and without further speech turned and walked away.

Desmond spoke thoughtfully. "Well, what exactly do you make of all that?"

"Obviously, it was my blood. Obviously, Mr. Grierson dragged me into the drawing room and attacked me. Then I escaped—and fell downstairs. When I recovered, I remembered the man and the goat, and naturally thought that the goat had butted me down the stairs—and all my life, when I see a goat, or a red-haired man, I shall give a loud scream and faint."

He grinned at her. "All right," he said. "Where do we go now?"

"We follow the yellow brick road."

"And where does that lead us?" he wanted to know.

"Nobody knows. But there's supposed to be a wizard at the end of it, and he might be able to tell us something."

"And along this yellow brick road, we find Laurie?"

"We might."

Desmond started the engine and the car moved smoothly out into the road. "Anyhow, I've enjoyed it and I hope you'll let me go on trying to work something out."

"You said you had time on your hands. But I haven't. I do two jobs—one here in London, and the other at home in Broome."

"Nancy's husband has a cottage in Sussex and is always trying to induce her to go and spend a few weeks in it," Desmond told her. "If she did, I could see something of you—and try to solve one more mystery."

"What mystery?"

"Whether your fiancé knows what a prize he's drawn."

He brought the car to a halt outside her aunt's house and turned to look at her. "When do I see you again?"

"I'm sorry," said Jody, "but ——"

"Look." His tone was reasonable. "You can't just throw me out of your life. I don't want to upset your fiancé or your family, but couldn't you explain to them that we're trying to find out how you got hurt that morning? We found a clue—don't you want to follow it up?"

"I don't think there's the smallest hope of ever finding the Griersons."

"Don't you want to try?"

"How could we begin?" she asked at last. "I'm busy all day and busy every evening. You're on leave and you ought to be making the most of it having fun."

"This is fun. What about that yellow brick road you talked about?"

He came round to help her out of the car and stood waiting for her answer.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I'm grateful—more grateful than I can say—but ——"

"No detective work?"

"I'm afraid not."

"And that means that you and Betsy and I were brought together for nothing?" He was in the car once more, and he switched on the engine. "You think Fate takes all that trouble—for nothing?"

"Good-by," said Jody.

"Nonsense," said Desmond Huntley, and drove away.

Jody gave her aunt a full account of what had happened, telling the story in serial form as they went from the drawing room to the dining room and then, dinner over, back to the drawing room once more. At the end of the story, Lady Cleeve sat silent and thoughtful, pouring out the coffee and turning over the new developments in her mind.

"It's very hard," she said, "to see you as the heroine of a melodrama. You're not at all the kind of girl who fits into anything spectacular, you know. You could have lived here with me, and you elected to go down to Estelle's and turn yourself into a Hausfrau. You could have met some extremely eligible men in town, but you preferred to accept the first science master who proposed to you. And there," she ended, "is where I think the real trouble lies."

"I don't understand."

"Well, let me enlighten you. For four years you've been leading a completely unnatural life—that is, you've been living Estelle's life, and her husband's life, and not your own. And now you've got engaged to a man who won't make you happy."

"Charles is all right."

"If you marry him, you'll spend your life sitting on the quay at Marcove with his lunch or his dinner in a little basket, waiting for him to bring his boat into harbor." She paused. "Does he talk about a home for you when you marry? No. All he wants is a bigger and better boat."

"I like sailing. I like sailing with him."

"When you're married to him, you'll have as much of it as you want. It won't work, Jody. He's a man with no desire for a settled home—and you're a girl who needs one. The life he's offering you isn't the life you want, and I think that, subconsciously, you know it. But because you refuse to face it, you're running into trouble of the psychological kind."

"I didn't imagine all this, Aunt Essie. It happened."

Lady Cleeve made no answer. She was thinking of Desmond Huntley. He and Jody had gone out as strangers, and in less than an hour had seemed to have got on to easy, friendly terms. But Jody was the faithful kind; she had chosen her science master and she would stick to him. It was a pity.

"If you take my advice," she said, "you'll keep this evening's little adventure to yourself."

"I won't tell Estelle or Michael, but I'll have to tell Charles."

"If you do, you'll make him angry—and you'll worry him. Keep it between yourself and Lieutenant Commander Huntley."

She was amazed at her own subtlety. There was nothing so cozy as a secret shared. This massive young naval man, with his rugged look, his quiet, relaxed, easy manner, was the kind of husband she had sketched in her mind for Jody—but Jody had not waited for him. Jody had met Charles Vaughan, whose idea of a courtship seemed to lie in keeping her waiting for hours on the quay at Marcove for him to bring his boat into harbor, and then helping him to clean it and cooking his meals. Things had gone far too smoothly for him, and there was a great deal of satisfaction in trying to make them more difficult. Soon, perhaps, there would be two yachtsmen coming into Marcove with eyes searching the shore for Jody's small figure. It was a situation which met with her entire approval.

Keeping Estelle and Michael in ignorance, Jody found when she returned to Broome on Saturday morning, was easy. Both were out for the day.

She packed a basket of food and went across to Miss Bishop's cottage to see if she could beg a lift to Marcove. There was no sign of her or the car, however, and Jody decided that she would walk. When she reached Marcove, she stood on the clifftop and looked down at the tiny harbor below. Gazelle was not there. The school's two dinghies bobbed between two fishing boats; on Ballerina's deck she could see the major, and although she could not hear him, she knew that he was singing, for he sang most of the time.

She walked down to the harbor. Looking out to sea, she saw Gazelle coming in, and stood watching her dance her way to the shore. She could see Charles busy with the ropes, and understood how stifling he found the long hours spent in classrooms.

The major, from Ballerina's deck, turned a professional glance on the rapidly approaching Gazelle. "You should be out with hi Jody," he said. "Wonderful day for a sa Take you myself, if you'll come. As we go ro ing, over the rolling, over the rolling sea," caroled.

Jody looked at him with a smile. She h never, she thought, met a Jack-of-all-trad until the major had come to Broome. Once soldier, now a first-class sailor. A good mu cian, an expert gardener, a handy carpent He seemed to have traveled everywhere a seen everything, and he was as adaptable a chameleon: neat and serious in Estelle's dra ing room, playing the professor's intric compositions, and now in patched blue tro sers and faded blue shirt, gay and carefree a filling the air with music-hall memories.

"'Twas a June afternoon, and a sentimenta coon Stood alone in the shadow of the trees," he sang, and broke off once more. "Miss you after the practice the other night. Y didn't fall down any more flights of stairs? that is, if you really did fall."

"You think someone pushed me?"

"No, not pushed. But I said to myself wh I heard about it, 'Funny thing that; s scores of people come scores of croppers do scores of flights of stairs, but never saw end up with a bump on the back of the he Never. Sprained arm, yes; broken leg, may scraped elbow, perhaps; all-over bruises, c tainly.' You have any bruises?"

Jody hesitated, and depression crept o her. He was taking the sunshine out of the d "No," she said at last.

"Well, who said you fell downstairs? A body see you go down?"

"No."

"A chap comes to mend the lift and s you lying at the foot of the stairs and says himself, 'Hello, young lady fallen downsta And he tells that to the management and t take it for a fact. Myself, I think you di fall down those stairs. Myself, I think you a nice little maidenly swoon at the bottom them and in falling gave your head a wh on the concrete. That way, no bumps, bruises, no fractures. See what I mean?"

"Yes."

She turned to watch Charles coming in, her mind was full of the major's theory. I was right, if she had fainted before going the stairs, the Griersons—Laurie and her h band—could be ruled out. There was noth to show that she had ever been to their ap ment. There was no reason to suppose that accident had any connection with their hur departure from Dorset Court.

Looking at last night's events in this c air, and with the major's sensible words in ears, Mr. Kennedy and his mysterious h and his talk of blood and blondes seeme ridiculous, so ludicrous that she felt he growing hot with shame for having ta them for a moment seriously.

She stepped aboard Gazelle. Charles t her chin and dropped a light kiss on mouth.

"Long time no see," he said. "Why did stay up in town last night?"

What had she been about to say before major brought her back to her senses? W met the man with the goat, and he thinks Mr. Grierson chased me down the stairs, then he and his wife—she's a natural blonde awfully attractive—packed up and fle Kenya, leaving blood on the drawing-room pet.

"I stayed to dinner with Aunt Essie," said.

"Clear soup, steamed sole and coffee."

"Quite right."

"That woman —— What's in the bask he broke off to ask.

"What did you want in the basket?"

"Cold beef sandwiches with plenty of tard; a chicken bone to chew on; a hun cheese, Stilton for preference; and any that's going, cherries for choice."

"I read your mind."

When they had eaten, Charles stret himself along the deck and rested his hea Jody's lap and gave a sigh of pleasure.

CONTINUED ON PAGE

WILD WHITE BEACH PLUM

By DIONIS COFFIN RIGGS

Smooth lawns
That lead down to the harbor,
Box hedges swathed
In winter clothes of burlap.
Tulips, bright along the inner wall,
Against white-painted houses.
But someone has left,
Beside the gate,
A wild, white beach plum
blooming.

Trimmed grass
Around the gravestones,
Myrtle and arborvitae,
Geraniums in earthen pots,
And hothouse flowers
In jars half-filled with water.
But someone has left,
Beside an old gray stone,
A wild, white beach plum growing.

Veal Victoire . . . easy yet epicurean, with herbs and the full, natural flavor of Del Monte Peas

Special-occasion flavor goes hand in hand with everyday convenience in this savory combination—you cook veal with tender, tempting DEL MONTE Early Garden Peas, liquid and all!

And isn't it pleasant to find so much garden flavor in peas already perfectly cooked and ready for you to enjoy? That's the DEL MONTE blend—the tastiest, tenderest peas of all the most flavorful sizes, packed together. You get the sweetness of the smaller peas with the richness of the larger, the way you do in fresh peas.

No two ways about it, DEL MONTE Early Garden Peas are in a class by themselves. Taste them!

VEAL VICTOIRE

- 1½ lb. veal steak (¾" thick) or cutlets or chops to serve 4
- 3 tablesp. butter or margarine
- ½ small onion, chopped
- 2 teasp. minced parsley
- ¼ teasp. each: crumbled thyme, crumbled rosemary, garlic salt
- Dash of pepper
- ¼ cup pimiento strips
- 1 teasp. grated lemon peel
- 1 can (17 oz.) DEL MONTE Brand Early Garden Peas
- 1 tablesp. cornstarch
- 2 tablesp. water
- 1 teasp. lemon juice

Brown meat on both sides in the butter. Add onion; sauté till onion is tender. Sprinkle parsley, thyme, rosemary, garlic salt, pepper, pimiento and lemon peel over meat, and pour on liquid from peas. Cover; simmer till meat is tender, about 30 min. At serving time add peas and heat, covered, till peas are hot. Thicken with cornstarch mixed with water; stir in lemon juice, serve immediately. Serves 4.

Del Monte® Peas

An urgent message to parents about...

POLIO

Take a long hard look at this picture.

Though next summer's polio season may seem a long way off, remember it takes months to build up a child's resistance to polio.

If "shots" against this disease are started now, you may spare yourself needless worry later on. If your child has had no "shots," go to your physician or clinic as soon as possible.

Any time around three months of age, the first of these essential polio injections can be given. The second injection is given a month later—and the third one, about seven months after the second injection.

And if you have a youngster who has had all three "shots," ask his physician when a fourth, or booster dose, should be given.

This protection can be given alone or in a combined vaccine which protects against polio, whooping cough, tetanus and diphtheria.

What about your own polio protection? You, too, should be vaccinated. When polio does strike an adult, it is usually severe.

Vaccine is plentiful throughout our country. And it's the only defense we have against paralytic polio.

Strike your blow against polio today!

COUPON MAY BE PASTED ON POSTCARD

THE LIGHT THAT NEVER FAILS

Metropolitan Life

INSURANCE COMPANY©

A MUTUAL COMPANY

Metropolitan Life (Dept. A)
1 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10, N.Y.

Please send me the free booklet, "ABC's of Childhood Disease," 3-60-J

Name (PLEASE PRINT)

Street

City & Zone State

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 106

"This is the life—isn't it?"

"Does it bring in any money?"

"This time next year we'll be living on yours. Do you love me?"

She smiled down at him. "I think so. Couldn't we live on your money too?"

"We'll be doing that—quite literally. I'm buying Ballerina. At least, I think so. The major wants to sell her."

"Have you ——"

"—— come to a definite agreement? No. But I'm taking her across to St. Malo the day after tomorrow; trial trip. If I like the way she behaves, I'll buy her. Then we could get married and live on her for the rest of the summer."

Jody, examining this proposal, felt that it lacked something, both in matter and in manner. In the silence that followed, she recalled some of her brother-in-law's more high-handed actions and wondered whether she and Estelle were too easygoing; they both, she reflected, let their men get away with a great deal.

He drew her down beside him and put his arms round her. "One day," he said musingly, "one day we'll get away from classrooms and kitchens, and ——"

"—— out to sea?"

"Why not? Wouldn't you like to live on Ballerina?"

"Would there be room for the children?"

He peered at her. "You mean you want to produce a brood of infants?"

"A quartet. Don't you want a family?"

"Dunno. Babies falling over themselves all over the deck?"

"It's more than a possibility, once we're married."

"Let's sail," he said suddenly.

"So long as we get back early," said Jody. "Estelle and Michael and Fenella were out for the day—I'd like to have a nice dinner waiting for them."

Charles said nothing. They had fought this battle before, and he had lost. Sitting hunched against the railing, he took a packet of cigarettes from his pocket and lit one.

"What," he inquired coldly after a time Estelle going to do when you marry You've spent enough time running M house for him."

"If I hadn't wanted to run the house you think I would have done it for so lo

"Yes, I do. I think you're the self-sacrifi type."

"Then you're wrong. If I'd thought it to ——"

"For Pete's sake don't start it all again begged. He took her chin in his hand and and rubbed his nose gently against hers. going sailing; are you coming?"

"No."

"Have it your own way. What time do want me to show up for dinner?"

"About eight, if you can."

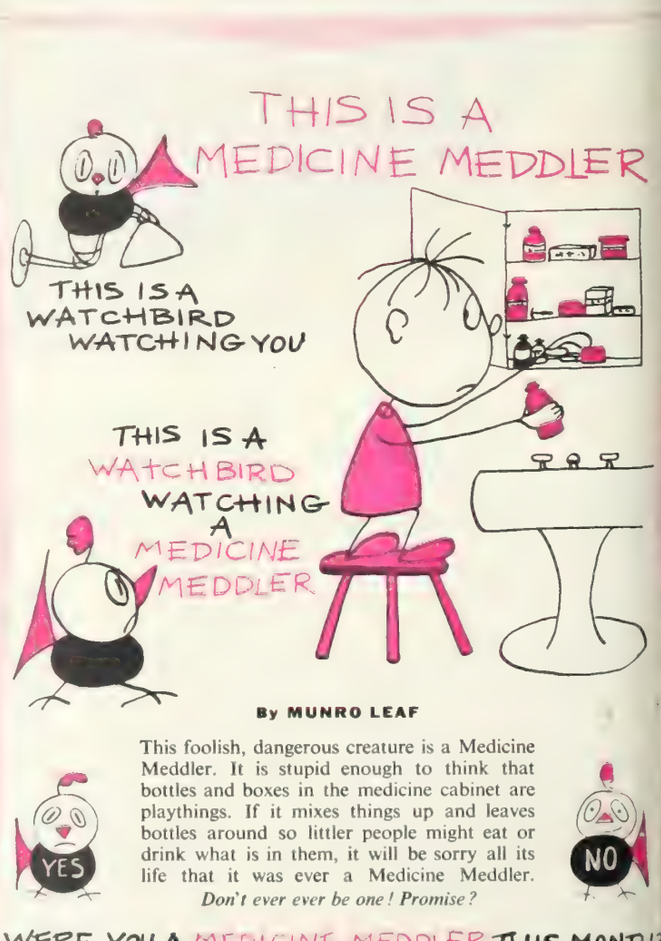
He did not come, and Jody was not prised. They had agreed early in their ass tion that, given perfect conditions at sea body could be expected to leave them an tend purposeless functions on land. In sp his absence, dinner was very gay. Michae Estelle had driven almost all day, and had lunch and tea with friends. Best o Michael had bought Fenella a very small and this was now erected in the gallery, a it—or half in it—was Fenella's mattress on the mattress lay Fenella, not yet asleep blissfully happy in the thought of being camp of her own.

She was still awake when Jody wen stairs. "I'm sleeping in a camp," she cr "Can I have my breakfast in the tent to row?"

"Why not? If you're camping, you're ing."

She sat cross-legged on the blanket M had spread outside the tent, and glanced letters she had picked up from the hall and not yet had time to read.

"Read them to me," commanded Fene



"There's nothing to read. A bill, a and an invitation."

"An' what's in the parcel?"

"A pair of earrings I sent to be mende

"Oh. Then tell me a story."

"In camp," said Jody firmly, "people tell people stories."

is seemed sense to Fenella. She lay down
, and presently the toes ceased to wriggle ecame still. Jody stripped the wrapping the package, and gently unrolled the paper. But it was not a pair of earrings dropped into her palm. For some mos she sat motionless, looking at the tiny t she was holding.
t more than an inch in height, beautifully d and colored, it was a miniature of the named Betsy.

dy Cleeve found that to scheme was one
; to become entangled in the schemes was another. So a week later, driven by cirtances beyond her control, she paid a o Broome.
dy greeted her aunt with undisguised asnment. "This is a great surprise—but a one," she said, kissing her. "Have you to lunch?"
o," Lady Cleeve told her. "I'm on my ome; I spent the night with poor old ed Eaton at Eastbourne. But that wasn't I came to talk about." She folded her on her lap and regarded her niece ly. "Jody, you've got to do something this young man."
is . . . young man?"
is naval man you produced from no-
. I can't, I really cannot stand any more
. My dear girl, the man has all but taken sidence. He calls daily, he sits in my ng room and completely ignores polite or broad hints. He's impervious to
. I sit waiting for him to go away, and he ds not to notice; he merely goes on g as though I were entranced by his any. You must, you really must put a o it."
it ——"
e only reason for it, of course, is that oping to meet you again. He won't come here, because most unfortunately I told n the first evening that I had advised say nothing of your having met him."
used. "Did you say anything?"
."
long silence ensued. Jody, staring at the carefully counted from middle C to the ve it . . . seven notes. Seven goats. Seven presentations of Betsy, all in wood, all ainted. One a day, beginning last Satur-o word; simply a goat.
hat can I do?"
u can come up tomorrow, confront him
e appears and tell him with my complito go away and stay away."
t ——" re's Estelle. I can't discuss it any more.
e to my car when I leave."
elle came in a moment later, slim and in a wide-skirted cotton dress. She kissed nt and sat beside her on the sofa.
so sorry Michael couldn't come in ne," she began. "He had an appoint-with a parent."
titled one, of course?"
nt Essie!" protested Jody. "You're beit harsh, aren't you?"
's coming," said Estelle, her eyes on the
w. "And he's bringing the parent with m."
heard footsteps in the hall, and tried pose her countenance, but the smile on her lips—for the woman he was ng in was Lady Wigram.

elle"—Michael spoke in the voice he d for parents: slow, calm, casual—s Lady Wigram."
come and sit down," said Estelle. "This unt, Lady Cleeve, and this is my sister-
——."
!" Lady Wigram, having bowed to dy aunt, was now standing before Jody, g delighted. "How nice to see you u've met before?" asked Michael.
ss Hern came into my garden to see my Lady Wigram told him. "Wasn't it odd e should have seen it without knowing it was?"
y odd indeed," said Michael.
d wasn't it extraordinary that my r should have found her at Lady
's house?"
raordinary," said Michael.

"My husband and I own a cottage down here in Sussex—about six miles away," went on Lady Wigram. "We don't often use it, because we have so much to do in London, but my brother is home on leave—he's in the navy. I suppose your sister-in-law told you?"

"No. No, she didn't mention it," said Michael.

"He's persuaded me to come and spend the rest of the summer at the cottage. He's got a boat, and he's going to do a lot of sailing." She turned to Estelle. "When we're settled, I do hope you'll all come to see us. And then we can arrange all the details about when the boys are to come." And then she had made her farewells and was being escorted by her host and hostess to the car.

"What did I tell you?" said Lady Cleeve, when the door had closed behind them. "This lieutenant commander is a resourceful young man. Incidentally, how is Charles?"

"He went across to St. Malo; he's trying out a new boat. He should be back soon."

They walked in silence to the front door; the car circled to meet them; the chauffeur assisted his passenger in. Lady Cleeve settled herself against the cushions and then leaned out to say a last word to Jody.

"I don't think the young man will be troubling me again. I pass him over to Estelle, with my love. Don't let Michael bully you. Good-by." She was borne away.

Jody, making a detour to avoid meeting Estelle and Michael, ran straight into them round the corner of the house, and complied meekly with her brother-in-law's request to accompany them to the house.

"Don't you," he asked when they were once more indoors, "owe us some sort of explanation?"

"Of course she doesn't," said Estelle. "Don't be so pompous. But Jody, you pig, fancy not telling me."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 111

SWIFT'S
Meats for Babies
$25,000
"Protein Age" SWEEPSTAKES

Imagine how wonderful it would be to win one of Swift's big cash prizes! Think of the many things all that money could buy for your baby! Or you may win one of 490 other exciting prizes!

It's easy! And here's a little game to make it fun. On the jars pictured in this ad, four of the labels aren't correct. But TWO labels are correct—just as they appear on your store's shelf.

See if you can identify the two correct labels by number, as they appear in this ad. (See spaces for answers below.)

P.S. The Protein Age is the time of your baby's most rapid growth. It's the first year of life, when the complete, high-quality protein of meat does most to give your baby a healthy start. It's the time to trust Swift, the meat specialist!

The two most trusted words in meat. Our 105th year.

Swift's Premium

500 BIG PRIZES! NOTHING TO BUY!

Cash prizes to help you buy everything baby needs! Every winner receives a famous Cosco Nylon Playpen! ($24.95 Value)

FIRST PRIZE!
$3,000.00 in cash AND a Cosco Nylon Playpen!

Second Prize
$2,000.00 in cash AND a Cosco Nylon Playpen!

Third Through Tenth Prizes
Each . . . $1,000.00 in cash AND a Cosco Nylon Playpen!

Next 490 Prizes
Each...Cosco Nylon Playpen!

I believe the two correct Swift's labels pictured in this ad are:

No. ☐ No. ☐

(It is not necessary to identify the correct labels to enter the Sweepstakes)

Nothing To Buy! Enter Now!

Sweepstakes Rules

1. Write your name and address on the entry blank in this ad or on entry blanks available at your favorite food store. Or, if you prefer, use one side of a post card. Mail to: SWIFT'S "PROTEIN AGE" SWEEPSTAKES, Box 5133, Chicago 77, Illinois.

2. Entries must be postmarked before midnight April 16 and received no later than midnight April 20. All winners will be notified by mail promptly upon completion of the drawing. List of winners will be mailed on request.

3. Winners will be selected by drawing from the total of all names received within the designated time limits. The drawings will be conducted under full legal supervision of a nationally known company.

4. This Sweepstakes void in Wisconsin, Florida, Nebraska, New Jersey, and any other state or locality where prohibited, taxed or restricted by law. Otherwise, all persons in the United States, its territories and possessions may enter except employees of Swift & Company, its advertising agencies, and their families.

Mail to:
SWIFT'S "PROTEIN AGE" SWEEPSTAKES
Box 5133, Chicago 77, Illinois

Please enter my name and address in Swift's "Protein Age" Sweepstakes.

NAME_____
(Please print plainly)

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ZONE____STATE_____

Big-appetite sandwich: Kraft DeLuxe Slices, mayonnaise, mustard, teamed with ham and pickles

MORE CHEESE FLAVOR PER BITE!

HIGH PROTEIN POWER PER SLICE!

Pan-fry Kraft DeLuxe cheese sandwiches in melted Parkay Margarine for a great family lunch

Kraft DeLuxe Slices

give you extra goodness

Sure you can buy cheaper cheese slices than Kraft's. But not with the extra rich cheese flavor that comes from the truly fine natural cheeses Kraft uses.

And Kraft's are big, full-ounce slices that pack important protein power into every sandwich you make. What's more, only Kraft can use the special method that makes these slices taste so extra good and separate so beautifully. That's why they're called Kraft DeLuxe Slices.

KRAFT AMERICAN • OLD ENGLISH Brand • SWISS • BRICK

PASTEURIZED PROCESS CHEESES

NTINUED FROM PAGE 109

ld you please tell us what happened?"
chael.
told the story of her aunt's informad her subsequent visit to Waverley
She told them of her entry into the and Desmond Huntley's visit to her ouse that evening.
er subsequent visit to Dorset Court smond Huntley she said nothing. She l time to ponder, and had concluded visit had been a mistake. Mr. Kennedy n melodramatic, and she had been to allow herself to set out on a road ld lead nowhere.
el turned in wonder to his wife. "She vn some stairs, she's told it would be forget the whole thing—and what do? She goes roaming round London for goats. She walks into a total
's garden, and then she gets involved aval fellow with too much time on his nd now ——"
you've got two new pupils," Estelle d him. "What are you complaining much of this did you tell Charles?"

n't tell him anything."
, don't." Michael spoke in his most nanner. "If you want to preserve the en keep quiet. I'll keep an eye on this fellow, and if he shows any signs of bove himself, I'll deal with him."
's coming to live in the cottage with er," pointed out Estelle, "they're o come here, and Charles will have to no he is."
:," said Michael reasonably, "I don't actly how Lady Wigram came to de-she'd send her two sons here. If she uenced by her brother, and if her is fixing the school angle with a view g Jody at closer quarters, we don't worry about it yet—or worry Charles yet. I want the two boys, and I won't if we start a movement to keep Lady s brother off the premises. Jody's old to deal with anybody who tries to ices. If she wants any help, she can me—but if we make a start by getting back up, I can say good-by to the . Does that make sense?"
ight make sense, but it also makes bit difficult for Jody, doesn't it?"
telle. "She's engaged to Charles."
el began to speak, thought better of alked out of the room. Estelle's eyes oughtfully on her sister.
ve been odd lately. Is everything all did not answer for a time. She was by the piano, absently picking out an one finger. Her expression was sober, rooding.

ing much," she said. "Just a sort of I've got that Charles and Michael around."
ael wasn't pushing you around just was just suggesting that we needn't uble halfway, that's all. What's really you is that Charles has gone off to
."
been before, and he'll go again, and I to go. It's just that he doesn't seem to h thought to anything but sailing, and nd his hope of getting out of the profession and living in the open. He ce asked me what I'd like to do. And stood here just now and calmly out what we were all going to do, once asking me what I thought of d Huntley. There's no danger of my anything at all about him—but it's e asked."

sat on the arm of a chair and spoke ully. "You've known Charles since fourteen; you ought to have come to conclusions about him before now—agreed to marry him and now's the lear up any doubts you may have."
aid nothing. Sitting on alone when ad gone, her thoughts went to Des-untley. He would be living nearby, ould be a visitor; perhaps a frequent Lady Cleeve had testified to his stay-
rs. Deep down, she felt the stirrings of fear. Desmond's interest lay, she felt sure, only partly in herself. He was home on leave, he had time to spare, and he had touched the fringes of a mystery; she could not blame him for wanting to probe further.

She was recalled to the present when the telephone rang. To her astonishment, her aunt's voice came to her ears.

"I've just got home. Can you come?" There was something strained in her aunt's voice, and Jody's heart began to beat fast.

"Has something happened?"

"Yes," said Lady Cleeve.

"What ——"

There was no point in finishing the question. Lady Cleeve had rung off.

An hour and a half later, Jody stood in the drawing room of the house at Knightsbridge and looked slowly round her. The scene was one of devastation. Chairs and sofas had been pushed aside, drawers pulled out and their contents scattered. Ornaments lay on the carpet, books lay in heaps.

Jody drew a long breath. "What's missing, Aunt Essie?"

AND BE NOT THERE

By RICHARD F. ARMKNECHT

To dream, and be not there . . .
Nor time nor space
Permitting that loved face
My sight to share.
Only with eyelids tight,
And then but dim,
To sense her flashing limb
In rhythmic flight.
Only with stoppered ears
To hear her note,
Tenuous and remote
But lovely beyond tears.
Only to smooth that hair—
That sun-bright skein—
Within my errant brain:
This is despair—
To dream, and be not there!

"Everything," answered Lady Cleeve, "that related to you."

Jody, in a fog of bewilderment, waited for her aunt to speak again, and presently Lady Cleeve walked across the room and lifted a sheaf of papers from the littered desk.

"You see these?" she asked. "They all relate to you and Estelle. Copies of your father's will and your mother's will. School bills. Bills incurred by you both after you'd left school. In the safe were details of the stocks you and Estelle hold. Everything connected with Estelle is still where it was. Everything to do with you has vanished."

"But"—Jody frowned—"are you absolutely certain that ——"

"I didn't realize it at first, of course; when I saw that the silver and ornaments were intact, I thought they had been looking for money. I didn't have much in the house, but what there was was untouched. No jewels were missing. If I'd been a woman with a shady past I would have thought that somebody was looking for an incriminating letter of some kind; having no complications of that kind to worry me, I began to wonder exactly which papers had gone. And you can see for yourself; everything with your name on it. Vanished."

Jody turned to study the older woman. "You came home and found everything like this?"

"Yes."

"But—but weren't you frightened? You were alone, and they might have been hiding somewhere."

"I used to think that people who heard thieves in the night and seized a poker and went looking for them were rather brave—but now I know that they were simply acting from instinct. I wasn't frightened. I was just sick with anger. I walked into every room, searching, hoping to find whoever it was who had done it. I didn't even have the poker. I had my bare hands, and a horrible, primitive desire to use them."

"Aren't you going to ring up the police?"

Lady Cleeve hesitated. "Once I've called in the police, they'll begin questioning you. From here they'll go down to Broome and then we shall have real trouble."

"You needn't go on," said Jody. "I know. If any scandal threatened the school, Michael would never forgive me. Nor would Estelle."

"And that's why I didn't call the police. Once they began to probe, who knows where they'd stop? Before we knew where we were, they would have been harking back to your accident and trying to prove that this was in some way connected with it."

"Well, isn't it?" asked Jody.

"What do you mean?"

"What else could it be? There's no mystery about any of us—or there wasn't until I fell down those stairs at Dorset Court."

"But why should they come to this house to look for papers connected with you? Why wouldn't they go down to Broome, where you live?"

Jody raised frightened eyes to her aunt's. "Perhaps they will," she said.

Lady Cleeve's gaze went round the room. "They had a whole night and a whole morning to find what they were looking for. They had time to look slowly and systematically. So why all this mess—have you stopped to think why?"

"They must have come this morning and done the job in a hurry."

"Perhaps. But I don't think they were in a hurry. I think—I think they left the place like this on purpose, to frighten somebody. And as I don't think they have any interest in me, they can only have done it to frighten you."

"Because I—because I went back to Dorset Court and found out that I'd called at the wrong flat?"

"What else?"

In silence they began to set the house to rights again; in silence they made tea; they drank it saying little, each absorbed in thought. But when Jody announced her intention of staying the night, her aunt would not hear of it.

"No. I've been thinking it over," she said. "It's quite obvious that nobody's interested in anything of mine. Go home and say nothing, and let me know at once if trouble follows you down to Estelle's."

"But I can't let you sleep in the house alone!"

"You're going home," said Lady Cleeve firmly, "and you're going to put this out of your mind, if you can, and go on with your life as though nothing had happened."

Jody went home. When she got there, she found cars assembled in the drive, and brought her mind with difficulty to the present. Cars: concert; audience. Memory returning, she felt sorry for the audience, for tonight the professor's longest and, in Jody's opinion, most dreary work was to be performed: Variations on a Theme by Bach.

Miss Bishop, in the drawing room, made a swift count and took the result to Jody. "Thirty-five," she told her. "Quite a good number, don't you think?" She handed Jody a cash box. "That's the collection I took at the door for charity."

"What do I do with late-comers?"

"Oh, I don't think any more people will come," said Miss Bishop, on her way out. "I'm sure you can close the front door now."

Jody, going out a few moments later to close it, found herself brought up abruptly by a massive form, and looked up. "Oh," she said.

Desmond Huntley smiled at her, and proffered a small green ticket. "My sister couldn't come, and sends her apologies," he said. "I've come instead."

"Ah," said Jody.

"You're very talkative tonight."

photographers, tires, window screens, laundries, bicycles, sewing machines

whatever you need—

Advertisers displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

"I was wondering where I could find you a seat," she said coldly.

She was glad to see him lose a little of his confidence. Through the open door of the drawing room could be seen the audience, sober and intent. The trio, bows poised, awaited the professor's signal, and then the music began.

"All seats full," Desmond said, satisfaction in his voice.

"I can find room for you," said Jody. "There's a chair there, between Mrs. Birks and General Beddington."

He followed her, whispering hoarse appeals as he came. "Look, I only came to —— I mean, I'm not —— You see, this isn't quite my kind of music, and ——"

Bending, whispering, apologizing, she waved him along the row to the vacant seat, and stood watching his stumbling progress. He knocked the vicar's wife's handbag off her lap, plunged to retrieve it and caused a minor earthquake in the row in front. Proceeding, he stood upon the vicar's foot, mumbled an apology, brought an angry series of Sh-h's from the disturbed listeners, and fell awkwardly into the seat allotted to him.

Satisfied, Jody went back to the kitchen and prepared coffee. That would teach people to flood the mailbags with goats.

He came to her, pale and wild-eyed, in the interval. She was behind a large table in the hall, serving coffee and biscuits, and he pushed his way slowly to her side.

He looked round and spoke cautiously. "How much does one have to pay to get out?"

"You're not musical?"

"That's just it; I am. Do you have much of this kind of thing?"

"Haven't you heard of Professor Joichim's String Trio?"

"Is that who they were? Is the professor the cellist? Yes, of course he is," he answered himself. "And the violinist is the fellow who owns Ballerina. Versatile, isn't he?"

Michael, who missed nothing, was walking into the hall and toward the coffee table. "I think," he said at once to Desmond, "you must be Lady Wigram's brother."

"Yes. How d'you do?"

"You must meet my wife; she's just coming. Estelle," he went on, as she came up, "this is the fellow who was responsible for Jody's goat complex. Lieutenant Commander Huntley—my wife."

"You gave us a lot of trouble, Commander Huntley," said Estelle. "We thought you were hallucinations."

Michael's glance flickered calculatingly over Desmond's bulky form. "Pity Charles isn't here; he would have liked to meet you. Charles," he added easily, "is my sister's fiancé."

FIGHT HEART DISEASE · GIVE HEART FUND

"I've missed him twice." Desmond's tone sounded almost genuinely regretful. "He wasn't down at Marcove this morning, when I was making arrangements to leave my boat there."

"You're leaving your boat there?" inquired Michael politely.

"Yes. When I can make arrangements for her. Cheaper than Newhaven, and nearer to this cottage of my sister's."

"I see."

There was a slight pause. Michael, a very tall man, had to look up an inch or two, but the eyes of the two men met for a long and unmoving moment. Then there was a stir, and the sound of instruments being tuned, and Michael spoke.

"Back to business, I think," he said.

The hall was emptying. Jody waited for Desmond to follow the last stragglers into the drawing room, only to find that he was stacking cups and saucers.

"Will you please put those things down?" she requested. "You're a member of the audience and ——"

"I was. I quit. Where's the kitchen?"

He made four journeys to and fro, and then took off his jacket and turned up his sleeves.

"Please," protested Jody, "will you ——"

"No, I won't. If I wash, you'll have to dry, and then I shall be able to talk to you—and I want to talk very seriously to you."

"If you're trying to make me start off on a wild-goose chase looking for somebody called Laurie," said Jody, "I'm afraid you'll be wasting your time."

"I never waste time. Look at me now."

She looked at him. Elbow-deep in suds, he was handling the slippery china with surprising skill. He looked completely at home.

"The person I'd really like to see," he told Jody, "is your fiancé. Did you tell him about Laurie?"

"No," she said reluctantly.

"I needn't have asked. If you'd told him, he wouldn't be at St. Malo."

"Look, Lieutenant Commander ——"

"Good heavens!" he ejaculated in sheer astonishment. "Haven't we progressed beyond that stage? What's a Christian name between friends? It doesn't mean anything—it's just a way round awkward phrases like Lieutenant Commander Huntley. You were saying?"

"I was saying that there's no reason why you shouldn't go on spending your time building up a slight accident into something important, but ——"

"I don't understand you," he said. "You or your family. Letting well alone is a fine principle, and I'm all for it. But when things aren't well, when there are circumstances about that accident of yours that cry to heaven to be investigated ——"

"—— then we'll still leave well alone," she ended.

"I see." He took a pile of crockery from the table and placed it in the sink. "But hasn't you told them that we found a lead, that we had a good chance of finding out ——"

"No. All I told my sister and my brother-in-law was that I'd traced you and the goat. Can imagine how it sounds in cold blood: the goat with the goat turned up and we found the people whose flat I went to by mistake fled to Kenya, and one of them was a bride and there was blood on the carpet. If one of your friends or relations came to you with a story like that," she said, "would you take it seriously?"

"It would depend who told the story," he told her. "If a sane, coolheaded girl like you said anything, I'd give it my attention." He placed the last piece of china on the drainboard and dried his hands thoughtfully. "But as far as you and your sister and brother-in-law and fiancé are concerned, we leave it just where it is?"

"Does it matter much?" asked Jody.

Something in her voice checked him. He was about to answer. He took her arm and turned her slowly to the light.

"Something's happened since I last saw you," he said slowly. "You're keeping something back. What is it?"

"Somebody broke into my aunt's place and ransacked it."

He stared at her. "Thieves?"

"The maid was away, and my aunt spent the night with a friend. When she got home she found that someone had entered the house—with a key; they didn't break in, and they didn't steal anything except papers—every paper concerning me. That's all."

"When did this happen?"

"Last night or this morning."

"And"—his voice was incredulous—"you said nothing about it to your brother-in-law?"

"No. Can't you see why? No, perhaps you can't; you didn't see my aunt's house looking as I saw it today. Everything thrown about, her lovely things ——" Her voice trem-

One wonderful dish makes the meal!

There's nothing plain-Jane about Macaroni and Cheese Supreme—mushrooms nestled in curls of macaroni in a bubbly sauce, rosy tomato and melted cheese. Yet it's so simple! As easy as cubes of cheese in PET Milk, a nip of seasoning for the best cheese sauce ever. Recipe nd e paused to steady it. "That's what hapene to her, and that's what might happen to Este . And I think it happened because you nd went to Dorset Court and asked quesion: And I'm frightened. I don't think I'm righ ned for myself, but I'm frightened of nvo ng other people—people I love. You lon' now what this school means to Michael.

He b ght it ten years ago as a dying concern, nd 's built it up all by himself, and you can ee at would happen if the police came oun How could Charles go on getting jobs s a utor if people got to know we were nixe up with the police?"

"' ixed up with the police.' . . . You make nem ound like undesirables who've got to be ept ay at all costs. Jody, don't you want to now hat really happened?"

He answer came unwillingly at last. "For nyse—entirely for myself—I'd like to know.
ut' ere's no way of finding out without ragg g other people in, and so I'm going to eave ings as they are."

He aid no more. Presently he went away nd e went slowly upstairs to her room.
he pt badly. Going down to prepare reak st, she found the drawing room in dis-rder nd tidied it; the task took longer than he a cipated, and she had to snatch a hasty reak st and hurry away to the bus stop. She ause in the hall to extract the letters from he b , take her own mail and drop the rest n th all table. Then she was hurrying along he la that led to the crossroads.

Th wo letters, thrust hastily into her hand-ag, mained there, forgotten, until she had t g he bus and was waiting for the train.
he t k them out and glanced at them; one as a ceipt, the other a plain envelope with typ address and a London postmark.

She pened it in the train. The message was tef, d typewritten. It read:

"Co e Alone. Merlin Bar. Marble Arch.
th P.M."

To / was the 28th.

Th ughout the day she worked automatilly, e same question shuttling to and fro in her mind: to go, or not to go. And at five minutes to seven she found herself at Marble Arch, outside the Merlin Bar.

Inside, she glanced round. Nobody seemed to be taking any interest in her arrival. She saw a vacant stool, threaded her way toward it, and perched herself on its scarlet, slippery leather surface.

She ordered sherry, and noted that she was not the only woman who had come unattended. Escorts came in, waved over intervening heads and joined the women they had come to meet; new groups entered, others broke up and dispersed—and Jody sat unregarded.

Then she looked up and saw Desmond Huntley. Jody stared at him, her mind seething with conjecture. The Merlin Bar was not a place that would attract him. If he was here, it was because he—like herself—had been told to come.

The next moment he had turned and seen her.

Only astonishment showed for the first few seconds on his face. He stared at her across the restless groups that separated them, and shouldered his way to her side. "What in heaven's name are you doing here?"

"I got a letter telling me to come. An anonymous letter. Just a typed message, telling me to come—alone."

"You must be out of your mind," he said.

"Did you get a letter too?"

"Yes. But that was different," he told her. "You ——"

They stared at each other—a long, level, measuring gaze. But before Jody could voice the questions that sprang to her lips, something drew her eyes from his face. Standing just inside one of the entrances was a woman: young, fair, slender. Even if her beauty had not set her apart, she would have been conspicuous in that company. In that room of bleached heads and imitation furs and paste jewelry, her honey-colored hair, subdued make-up and unadorned dress drew all eyes.

"And that," Desmond said slowly, "must be Laurie."

Jody got down from the high stool. She had no clear idea what she meant to do, but she wanted to reach the woman standing in the doorway. She took a step forward, and found Desmond's hand gripping her arm and holding her prisoner.

"Stay where you are," he said.

"Let me go! I want to talk to her."

"I'll do the talking—if it is Laurie. You'll stay here," said Desmond grimly. "You're going to keep out of this."

He was too late. The woman had turned. A man had opened the great plate-glass door and was ushering her outside. He led her to a large black car, handed her in, took his place beside her and drove away.

They had gone—but not before the two watching them had recognized the man who had made so brief an appearance.

"Our friend Mr. Kennedy," Desmond said.

Anger and disappointment welled up in Jody. "If you'd let me go to her ——" she began.

"We're getting out of here," he said. "Come on."

They did not speak until they had reached his car, parked on a quiet side street. He put her in, and they drove the few hundred yards that separated them from the park and entered its gates. Then he pulled up, switched off the engine and turned to confront her.

"Now," he said. "What do you mean by taking a crazy risk like that?"

"What were you doing there?"

"Exactly what you were. Answering an anonymous summons."

For an instant doubt leaped into her mind. She reminded herself of how little she knew about this man seated beside her.He had been anxious to form a company of two, advancing upon this unknown path they had named the yellow brick road. But he had appeared on the stroke of seven at the Merlin Bar—and the woman called Laurie had entered only a few seconds after him.

"You don't believe me," he challenged her.

"I think I do," said Jody steadily, "but ——"

"But you're not sure. Thank God," he said fervently, "that you're really learning—at last. Thank God you're looking for reasons—and for traps."

"I only hesitated because ——"

"—— because for a moment you had doubts about me. And why not? We met in peculiar circumstances and you knew—you still know—nothing whatsoever about me. But try and bring yourself to trust me. We both got

FROM OUR COVER

Vogue Design No. 9966. "Easy to Make" one-piece dress, cummerbund and petticoat; 10–18 (31–38). 75 cents. Version shown requires 4⅞ yards of 35" fabric without nap, size14.

nd double-rich PET makes the dish delicious

e in while you find them. Recipes for dishes so good you th n again and again . . . dishes that need only the simplest .en for memorable meals. These are that kind. Make them s! nd make them always with PET, the milk with country n every drop. "Thin" milk just won't do . . . it takes the es of PET in every one of the fourteen recipes above. ev would good cooks do without PET!

The meat-and-potato man's special! That famous PET Milk meat loaf, juicy and smooth-slicing, bakes right on top of sliced potatoes for a perfect all-in-one dish, Beef and Potato Loaf. PET Milk binds the loaf (without an egg) and blends the savory seasonings with the good meat juices. Recipe No. 6.

Pork chops browned and oven-simmered in a creamy gravy swirled with the rich pan-juices of the meat . . . a recipe that will take its place among your family's favorites! The gravy is superb—and failproof! Just smooth-blending PET and a can of cream soup (chicken or mushroom). Try Gravy-Baked Pork Chops. Recipe No. 9.

"PET"—Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. Copr., 1960, Pet Milk Co.

anonymous letters—and now we've got to try and decide why they, whoever they are, wanted us to go to the Merlin Bar."

"Could Laurie have sent the message?"

"Why send it and make no effort to see if we were there? She came in; she went out. End of scene."

"She went there to meet ——"

"Kennedy. Yes."

"Could he have driven her round to Dorset Court?"

"After leaving the Merlin? We can find out."

He switched on the engine, and in silence they drove to the block of flats. The clerk on duty was the one who had answered their questions about the tenants of number four. Could they, asked Desmond, speak to Mr. Kennedy?

There was at first a little confusion, but when the clerk understood the inquiry, he dealt with it clearly and intelligently. Nobody called Kennedy, he told them, had ever worked in the Reception Department or in any other capacity at Dorset Court.

On the following day Jody lunched with her aunt. She found the house restored to its former immaculateness and its owner her normal, poised self.

"Why couldn't you come to dinner with me tonight, as I asked you?" Lady Cleeve asked. "Lunch gives us no time to chat."

"I wanted to get home in good time. Estelle and Michael and I are going down to Marcove after dinner to arrange about a berth for Desmond's boat."

"I see. How much," inquired Lady Cleeve, "do Estelle and her husband know about him—and you?"

Jody laughed. "Everything's all right. When Charles comes back, he and Desmond Huntley and I are going to look into every detail of that accident of mine and really face facts instead of trying to dodge them. The accident, and the Griersons, and Laurie and the mysterious Mr. Kennedy . . . and an anonymous letter and a visit to a place called the Merlin Bar."

Lady Cleeve listened to the details in silence. Jody thought she turned pale, but she did not interrupt the story. When Jody had done, she sat looking at her for a few moments.

"You're not frightened?" she asked at last.

"No. I'm tired of nibbling at the edge of a puzzle. If I get a chance to bite off a bit more, I'm going to take it. Flanked, of course, by Charles and Desmond. Would you like to run into either of them when they were in a fighting mood?"

"Frankly, no. Jody . . . be careful."

"Of course!" Jody came round the table and dropped a kiss on her aunt's cheek. "Of course I'll be careful."

As always, when she sat between Estelle and Michael at the long gleaming table in the dining room and looked at her brother-in-law's handsome head silhouetted against the lovely windows, Jody felt a sense of pleasure and pride.

Tonight, Desmond Huntley sat opposite her instead of Charles. Michael, who could at dinner be withdrawn, depressed or brooding, according to the day's effect upon him, tonight elected to be friendly.

"How long have you been running the school?" asked Desmond.

"Ten and a half years," Michael told him. "I always liked the place. The school itself was once an abbey."

"And according to one bright pupil's essay," said Estelle, "it dissolved in 1536. All that didn't dissolve were the four walls."

"That was when this house was built—on the foundations of an older one," said Michael. "They used a lot of stone from the dissolved abbey. Then the abbey rose again as a priests' college, and in time fell into disrepair again, and was eventually rebuilt and turned into a school. I don't suppose I would have bought it if my wife hadn't fallen in love with this house."

Desmond was looking across the lawns. "Why are those three cottages so close to the house?" he asked.

"Wartime erections. I'm growing a few trees to keep them out of sight, but as you see, trees have a hard job to get a start here; we're so exposed that the young ones either get blown down or uprooted. The major's giving his mind to the problem."

"How long has he been here?" asked Desmond.

"About a year," Michael told him. "He seems to be getting a bit restless again; he's like the trees: can't get his roots down. Jody, that was a nice dinner. But if my guess is correct, we're not going to get out to Marcove. Rain."

She looked out with an unexpectedly sharp feeling of disappointment creeping over her. She had been looking forward to going, she hardly knew why.

"So what?" asked Michael. "Game of bridge?"

Desmond looked at Estelle. "Perhaps you'd play for us."

They went into the drawing room. Estelle played, at first for the others and then, forgetting them, for herself. Michael rose and wandered away to his study, and Jody and Desmond sat on in their deep chairs, saying nothing, listening or half listening to the music.

When the rain stopped, it was too late to go to Marcove. Desmond took his leave, and Jody walked out into the hall to see him off. The door, as always on summer evenir stood open, and in the half-light the sod lawns looked black.

"It looks like an abbey now," he said.

"It always does in this light. It's nice ghosty."

"You like ghosts?"

"Ghosts of monks; yes. One of them's s posed to walk up and down the terrace the other side of the building."

"Let's look. He might have come out sniff the nice washed air."

She laughed, and they walked by wet pa across to the school and through an archv to its far side. Here all was open, treeless, posed, and at intervals could be heard thunder of surf. The wind was still rising, Jody's hair was blown wildly round her fa

"No monk," she said, "would want to w in this."

They turned to face the wind, and fou their way back to the archway; then they sto to regain their breath.

"Storm?" she asked.

"Yes. Hang on to me, and we'll make the front door again. No we won't," he c rected himself, "we'll wait for this showe stop."

The shower did not stop for some time, neither of them was in a hurry; both were joying the wild weather. In time the rain sened to a light fall; laughing, hand in ha they chose a moment between gusts of w and ran toward the house. Then he s good-by to her and drove away, and locked the front door and walked slowly stairs. Then she paused, wondering if her were deceiving her, for she felt sure that had heard the sound of a car's engine start

Her first thought was that Desmond returned, failed to see her and was g

Pessimism is only cowardice reduced to a system. JOHN BAILEY away again. But as she turned once mor the window she saw, moving very slowly, outline of a car—and it was not Desmond'

The next few moments were never clea her mind. She was running downstairs; had opened the front door and was spee across the grass, as she or Estelle had sp hundred times to stop Michael's car, Charles', to give a forgotten message or h in a forgotten article. A short cut took ther a point farther down the drive; if they s lucky, they reached it seconds before the

She was too late. As she emerged, pant from the bushes bordering the drive, the went by. Its speed had quickened, anc lights were on. A moment, and it had vanis round another corner.

But she had seen, in that moment, what had come to see. The man in the car was Kennedy.

"You're absolutely certain?" asked D mond.

"Absolutely. When the car had gone, I back to the house and knocked on Este door. I think they thought I was out of mind. I was wet, and I must have loo crazy."

"And they didn't know anything ab him?"

"Not a thing. I said I'd seen a man ca Kennedy driving away. They waited; were both quite blank-looking and I'm c certain neither of them had the slightest who or what I was talking about."

"And then?"

"And then Michael looked at his watch saw what the time was and realized that I walking about, wet, in their bedroom tal about people in cars, when it was obvious anybody, whether I knew them or not, c have been calling on the professor or the m or Miss Bishop. I went away feeling I'd be fool not to have waited until the morn but—but I'm certain that I wasn't mista about the man in the car. It was Mr. K nedy."

CONTINUED ON PAGE

So young, tender and tasty

You know they're Stokely's Finest

Delicate sweet peas with the garden-fresh sweetness you love and plump, firm "Alaska" peas, with a deliciousness all their own . . . you can always depend on Stokely's Finest Peas to be extra-green and extra-fresh tasting. You'll be proud to serve Stokely's Finest Peas just as they come from the can.

Peas by Stokely-Van Camp

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

They were lunching together; she had telephoned during the morning and they had met in order to talk over the new development.

"When I decided to become a detective," said Desmond, "I imagined myself sifting the evidence for six seconds and then coming out with a masterly piece of deduction."

"So did I."

"But what can anybody do with evidence of this kind? I didn't notice anything beyond the fact that Kennedy was short and fat and out of condition. He said he was a reception manager and that's what he looked like. I suppose I ought to have taken a closer look when he started throwing out hints about blood—but how was anybody to know that he wasn't a reception manager and had nothing to do with Dorset Court and knew perfectly well where to find Laurie and ——"

"Not necessarily. Why couldn't he have sent those anonymous letters himself? He gets us to the Merlin Bar and we see him with Laurie; that might have been his way of letting us know that he'd found her."

"All right; so he's found her. So who steals papers from your aunt's flat? And why does Kennedy drive away from the school at midnight?"

"The next thing is to ask the professor and the major and Miss Bishop if they know a man called Kennedy," said Jody. "They're coming over tonight for a practice. Why don't you come? I could ask them and you could watch to see if any of them tried to be evasive."

Desmond looked apprehensive. "They'd be playing that music again, wouldn't they?"

"Yes. It's good music."

"It's murder. But I'll come. And we'll ask the trio if they know Kennedy."

They got home that night to find Miss Bishop alone in the drawing room. "We all had an early dinner," she said, "and then I came over to get this last piece of music copied out for the professor."

"I saw Mr. Kennedy driving away from the cottages last night," said Jody. "I had no idea he knew anybody down here. Was it you he had been to see?"

Miss Bishop, pen poised, raised her sensible brown eyes to Jody's. She seemed to hesitate before speaking, but her answer was calm enough.

"Mr. Kennedy? I don't think I know anybody called Kennedy," she said. "Certainly nobody came to see me last night."

She seemed about to say more, but the door opened and the major entered, in one hand his violin case and in the other a large basket of vegetables. Having put down the violin, he followed Jody out to the kitchen.

"You don't," she asked, "happen to know anybody called Kennedy?"

When she had had more experience as an investigator, she reflected, she would know better than to put a leading question to somebody who had his back turned toward her and who had ample time, before opening the kitchen door, to conceal any emotions the question might have raised.

"Kennedy? Kennedy?" The major turned from the door and, head on one side, considered the question. "Yes. Know two Kennedys, as a matter of fact. One out in Rhodesia; nice chap. Married a French girl. C. W. Kennedy, he was. That the one you mean?"

"Well, I thought I saw a Mr. Kennedy driving away last night and ——"

"Couldn't have been C. W. Know for a fact he's still out there. Only other Kennedy I know is old Freddy Kennedy, who runs a sort of fruit farm down in Kent."

"I only thought that perhaps Mr. Kennedy—the Mr. Kennedy I know—had been visiting you last night."

"Visiting me? Not me," said the major. "Well, I'll leave you; I know you're anxious to get dinner ready."

The professor arrived at the same time as Michael and Estelle and Fenella, who had been out.

"Sorry we're late, Jody." Estelle turned to smile at Desmond. "We did an afternoon's shopping, and then we went to call on your sister," she told him.

"If I'd known, Jody and I would have looked in on our way back," he said.

"He's staying to dinner, Estelle. Is that all right?" asked Jody.

"That's lovely." Estelle turned him toward the door. "Go with the professor to the drawing room and when Jody and I are ready, we'll come in and then we can all have a drink."

"I like that 'Jody and I' touch," commented Jody, when they had gone. "You made it sound as though you really worked."

"Well, give me a job."

"You can make the salad."

Estelle began the preparations, forgot what she was doing and sat on the edge of the table to talk.

"I like those Wigrams, Jody. Nancy was asking me about you. She said you're the first girl she's ever seen her brother take a real interest in, and she wishes he'd met you sooner." She paused. "In a way, so do I. Oh, and Charles rang up."

"What did he say?"

"He said the weather reports are good, and he's coming back with the Cadmans to Newhaven."

"Why Newhaven?"

"That's where they keep their boat. He's bought it."

"Bought it?" echoed Jody in surpri
"Not Ballerina?"

"No. He'll sail Ballerina back to Marc when he's fixed up all the business with Cadmans."

"I see. When does he expect to get back

"With luck, he says, the day after tom row, early in the morning. . . . Didn't you g me a job to do?"

"The salad."

When Jody went, some time later, to drawing room, Estelle was seated at the pia and playing softly, preparations for dinner gotten. Jody walked up to her and lea against the instrument, listening and watch the beautiful hands moving on the keyboa

"Nice," said Jody at last. "Debussy?"

"Yes. But I meant to help you."

"It's all done. Where's everybody?"

"The professor's with Miss Bishop in study," Estelle told her. "The major w back to fetch his music. Michael and Desm walked over to look at the cottages—and h they come."

"And Fenella?"

"Fenella? Oh!" Estelle rose and gazed tractedly round the room. "She went to hid
I was supposed to count twenty and then and find her."

A wild shriek from Fenella and a serie
Indian war cries from Miss Bishop indica that somebody else had been found for

ONE'S OWN CHILD IN A RECITAL

By VIRGINIA SCOTT MINER

Amid the sparrows, flash of wings—
Among the starlings, one lark sings game. The door burst open and Fe rushed into the room, followed by Bishop, and the two circled the sofa at speed.

"Hey!" Michael caught his daughter u his arms. "Hey there. Time for Miss Bisho have a drink. Where's the professor?"

"He's trying over a piece of music in study," said Miss Bishop. "I don't thin wants a drink."

"He won't refuse a brandy," said Mic pouring it out and handing the glass to J

Jody carried it to the study and Miss Bi went with her. The professor, cello bet his knees and the sheet of music laid on a by his side, was plucking softly at the st and peering shortsightedly at the notes.

"Brandy—from the headmaster," s
Jody, handing him the glass.

"Oh! How kind! That is so kind!" the fessor waved the glass gently under his
"Ah! It is good!"

"Come and have it with the rest of us i drawing room," urged Jody.

The professor, unwilling, protesting, shepherded to the door. As Miss B walked ahead, Jody found time to ask question. She had to ask it more than when at last he understood what she w to know, he told her that he knew no nedys. He said that he had not heard the before, asked how it was spelled, and th that he had once met some English called Kendy. On the other hand, he mig mistaking them for a German family h once met; they were called Kondi. No, n so stupid; the Kondis were not German
They were ——

With relief, Jody entered the drawing and the professor was claimed by Estelle.
mond drew her to the window, where he speak to her without being overheard others.

CONTINUED ON PAG

UNBU...beggar child of mystery

Nothing is known about Unbu. In India, names have a meaning and her name means "love" but she has never had any. She was found in a small village down on the plains in Coonoor, South India, in the early morning, with a coconut shell which she used for begging in her hands. She was sobbing and no one knew how she came to the village. She had evidently been dropped there deliberately by someone during the night, as she had not been there the day before.

She explained the long gash in the side of her head by saying she was torn by the claws of a dog which had knocked her down to take the few scraps of food someone had put in her coconut shell. She shook her head when asked about her mother and father and said she never had any.

She did not know the place she came from but said it was big. She seemed to think she had always been on the streets alone. She had never eaten a regular meal, just scraps put in her shell or some cooked rice or vegetable she bought for a few annas (an anna is worth about two U. S. pennies) when she was lucky enough to be given any. She had never been in a house, she always slept on the streets, and her stomach always hurt.

There are thousands of little Unbus in India—hungry, sick, homeless and friendless. CCF cares for as many as funds permit in CCF affiliated orphanages. In Calcutta alone, thousands live on the streets with families staking out bits of the curb. Here they sit, sleep, wash their clothing, cook their skimpy messes over a fire made from the shreds of dung picked up from the tracks of the skinny sacred wandering cows.

Indian children can be "adopted" and admitted to CCF's 12 affiliated Indian orphanages. The cost is the same in India as in all countries listed, $10.00 a month.

COUNTRIES
Africa (Central), Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Borneo, Brazil, Burma, Canada, Chile, England, Finland, France, Greece, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Iran, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Korea, Lapland, Lebanon, Macao, Malaya, Mexico, Okinawa, Pakistan, Philippines, Puerto Rico, Syria, Taiwan (Formosa), Thailand, United States, Vietnam, Western Germany, American Indians or greatest need.

Christian Children's Fund, incorporated in 1938, with its 317 affiliated orphanage schools in 38 countries, is the largest Protestant orphanage organization in the world. It serves 30 million meals a year. It is registered with the Advisory Committee on Voluntary Foreign Aid of the International Cooperation Administration of the United States Government. It is experienced, efficient, economical and conscientious.

For Information write: Dr. J. Calvitt Clarke

CHRISTIAN CHILDREN'S FUND, INC.
Richmond 4, Virginia

I wish to "adopt" a boy ☐ girl ☐ for one year in.....
(Name Country)
I will pay $10 a month ($120 a year). Enclosed is payment for the full year ☐ first month ☐. Please send me the child's name, story, address and picture. I understand that I can correspond with the child. Also, that there is no obligation to continue the adoption.

I cannot "adopt" a child but want to help by giving $.....
☐ Please send me further information.

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
CITY .....ZONE.....
STATE .....

Gifts of any amount are welcome. Gifts are deductible from income tax.

Amazing new formula Mum®

LETS YOUR SKIN "BREATHE"

It's the only leading deodorant that stops odor without "stopping up" pores

Leading medical authorities say that oxygen, carbon dioxide, fluids and other substances pass in and out of the skin. This is what we mean when we say the skin "breathes." All other leading deodorants interfere with the natural "breathing out" process. New Mum works in a different way.

Unlike other leading deodorants—cream or spray, ball-types or pads—new Mum does not interfere with the natural function of the skin. New formula Mum keeps your underarms wonderfully sweet and odor-free without "smothering" your pores. It gives you more natural protection.

New More natural protection . . . for the woman who wants to feel free as ... can as air! In new formula Mum, Bristol-Myers gives you a way to stop or ithout "stopping up" pores. Remarkable new Mum does not depend on um um salts. It contains no harsh chemicals. Instead Mum works with hexa-lor hene. So gentle, yet it destroys the active cause of odor more effectively.

New formula Mum lets your skin "breathe" freely, naturally. Nature never intended the pores of the skin to be "stopped up." Yet all other leading deodorants "smother" the normal "breathing out" action of the pores (Illustration A). But new formula Mum stops odor without "stopping up" pores (Illustration B).

Protects you every minute of the day! Even when you're on the go from morning to midnight, new Mum cream keeps on working—doesn't let you down. Effective as it is, new Mum is so safe for normal skin even a "beginning" teen-ager can use it daily. Mum is gentle to delicate underarm tissue—won't cause redness, itching or irritation.

So much softer, fluffier, whiter, new Mum is a pleasure to use. It vanishes the moment you smooth it on. Won't harm delicate fabrics—even cashmere or chiffon.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 124

"I asked your brother-in-law to show me those three cottages; I thought I might be able to see footprints—and see where they led. But whoever came last night walked unswervingly along the paths."

"From what I've seen of Mr. Kennedy," said Jody thoughtfully, "he wouldn't be so obliging as to strew clues around. But whether his footprints were there or not—he was."

Fenella scrambled by, her game with Miss Bishop renewed. The two went out of the room and were heard chasing each other round and round the hall.

"Jody—dinner, I think," said Estelle.

"One more drink," said Michael.

Jody smiled at him as she went to the door. "I'm going to see to the dinner, but there's heaps of time."

"I'm coming with you," said Desmond. "I'm the best disher-upper in the county."

They went toward the kitchen. "Tell me again," said Jody, "about the footprints that you were looking for."

Her words and her steps came to an abrupt halt. Leaning against one of the long windows stood Miss Bishop. One hand was held against her heart, and her face was deathly white.

"What is it? What is it, Miss Bishop?" Jody put an arm round her shoulders and attempted to lead her toward the drawing room, only to find Miss Bishop resisting strongly.

"No . . . no!" The words came in a gasp. "I'm . . . I'll be . . . right. I ——"

Jody supported the stout, sh form as well as she could, and in moments, to her relief, saw a color return to the ashen cheek

"If you'll—if you'll let me g the kitchen with you while I —

Between them, they supporte to the kitchen and put her into a Jody knelt beside her, holdin trembling hands and chafing gently. Gradually the trem ceased. Then Miss Bishop drew breath, looked from one to the and spoke shakily.

"Thank you. I was very fool was forgetting my years." She wavering smile. "Please," she Jody, "go on with whatever to do. I'll sit here quietly."

"But I can't leave you and —

"Please! It's just what I need, Bishop said. "Please just go though I were not here."

Estelle's voice was heard and Miss Bishop turned to Jod eyes full of appeal. "You wo anything, will you?" she whis

"Of course I won't."

Estelle came in and sniffed. "L I'm starving," she said. "Oh- Bishop! The professor's been for you."

"I'll go to him. I've been get Jody's way, I'm afraid."

She went out, and the othe to the dining room. Michael w ing for them, and Jody saw h resting speculatively upon h then moving to Desmond. S able to guess the trend of his th by the fact that he mono Desmond for the rest of the e He gave him little chance to anybody else, took him off study to look at hunting prin dinner, and when the momen for Desmond to leave, accom him to the door and saw him

"I like him," said Estelle, as rejoined his wife and sister-i the hall.

"You do? So does somebod said Michael.

Jody, already halfway up th threw him a smile and went o room.

Estelle came in later to sa night and to return a necklace borrowed.

"Miss Bishop had a sort o Jody told her. "She played to hide-and-seek with Fenella."

"Was that why she was si the kitchen?"

"Yes. If you see Fenella t talk her into another hide-a session, you might tactfully off."

"I will. Poor old Bishop. S like to feel she's past a rom yawned luxuriously and wen door. "Michael was out tod had three lots of parents round the school."

"Any probables?"

"Two, with luck. The third didn't listen to a word I s didn't look at a thing I poi and then she went away and bring her husband. But I Michael missed her."

"Why?"

"Because he would have it. Very attractive—and a blonde. I had a good loo wasn't a bleached job."

She was closing the doo her before Jody spoke. "W her name?"

"She was a Mrs. Griers Estelle.

For the first time in her knew what it was to lie

T&C shoes $8.95 to $14.95
Town & Country Shoes
Ambassador Bldg., St. Louis 1, Mo.

ughout the night. She reached the office at once telephoned to Desmond Huntley. I've got to see you," she said. "It's terribly ortant. It's about Laurie. She came to the ool."

She . . . what?" His tone was incredulous. She came yesterday. Desmond, I'd like to about it, if you're free."

Any time, anyplace."

I can't be there before six. Do you know little road that runs off Regent Street be- n a big travel agent and a sort of fur ? There's a little coffee bar halfway down d it's always quiet in the evenings."

Six o'clock, coffee bar in unknown road een unknown travel agent and unknown tore. I'll be there."

nd when Jody was making her way there, aw Mr. Kennedy, stepping out of a taxi. dy did not know that she had moved, but ound herself on the opposite side of the , facing a shabby shop whose window d as a mirror and gave her a view of Mr. edy's actions. He did not, as she ex- d, pay off the taxi; instead, he said a word e driver, lit a cigarette, offered one to the and then began to pace slowly to and fro. He vas meeting somebody, and he had ar- at the rendezvous first.

dy turned, and with deliberate steps ed the street. She came up behind him poke his name.

swung round. The movement was swift, st catlike, and she knew that she had him unawares—but there was not more

Man is only called upon to act in the present. GOETHE

a flicker of expression in his eyes before became the hard little black stones she mbered.

iss Hern!" He gave her a slight bow, miled. "This is a very pleasant surprise."

like to talk to you, please," said Jody.

gave her a brief, measuring glance, and hing in her bearing seemed to decide e shall talk—but not here," he said. He her arm and led her to the taxi, gave a ion and handed her in.

ew minutes later, they were seated upon ools at the Merlin Bar. "It was there"— nodded toward the doors—"that Mrs. on came in."

nd I came in a car and I took her away— ou saw me."

d you send me that anonymous letter?" ked.

ook his drink from a waiter, and poured coffee out of its tiny plated pot. e were two letters, were there not?"

you know that, you must have written t necessarily." His black eyes rested atively upon her. "Have you become a ve?"

idn't want to. When you pretended to reception manager and came out to out Mrs. Grierson, I hadn't the least to get mixed up in anything to do with r with you. But there's a point beyond it's just silly to ignore signs."

d there's a point," said Mr. Kennedy "beyond which it's just silly not to."

on't understand you."

spoke slowly and soberly. "I will be with you, Miss Hern. When I spoke to d to Lieutenant Commander Huntley, because I did not know either of you. I, I would have said nothing."

you did say something, and you did ose anonymous letters, and you did go o the school. Nobody can look on in- ly while people make sinister moves all them. Especially when the moves in- friends and relations."

u are referring to Lieutenant Com- r Huntley?"

referring to my aunt, Lady Cleeve. n't look like a housebreaker, Mr. Ken- but somebody entered her house in sbridge and ——"

"But nothing was stolen," Mr. Kennedy stated calmly.

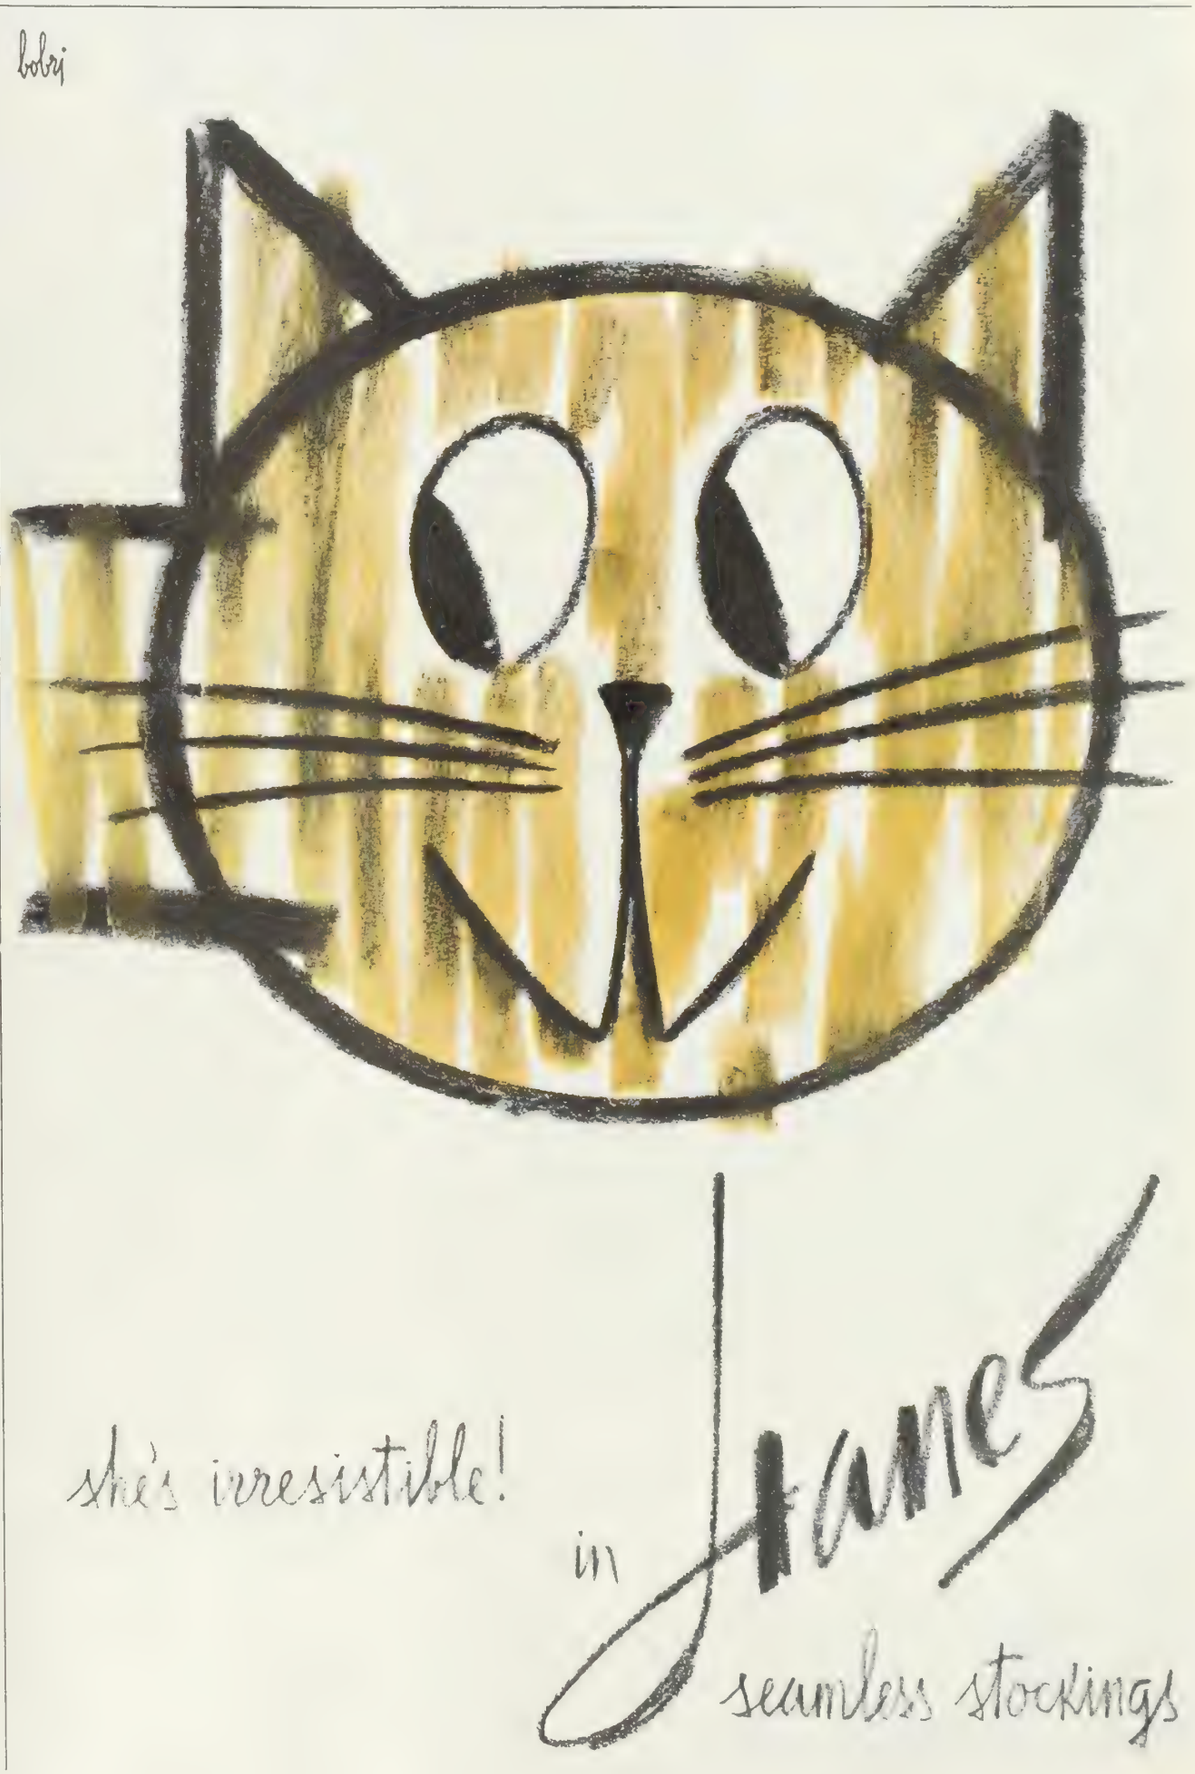
She stared at him, anger rising slowly and showing in her cheeks. "Then it was you?"

"I—and others." He twisted himself round to face her, and spoke abruptly. "Look, Miss Hern, I will tell you why I acted as I did—and then your mind will be set at rest. First: it was necessary for me to find Laurie. I was at Dorset Court, inquiring for her—and I learned that two young people had also been making inquiries. People who inquire for the Lauries of this world do so because they are her friends and wish to find her—or because they are not her friends and wish to find her. So I went out and spoke to you. And I made certain investigations in order to assure myself that you had had no previous connection with her."

"But when you came here to the Merlin ——"

"I had already located Laurie," he told her. "But I still could not be certain whether you and the lieutenant commander knew her or not. She came in—and it was quite clear that neither of you had ever seen her before. And so I regretted my action, and I resolved that in future my dealings with Laurie would not involve you."

"But your visit to the school—was that connected with Laurie?"



"The one place I would not look for Laurie," he said, "would be in Sussex."

"But she was there. She was at the school yesterday."

Instantly she regretted the words. For Mr. Kennedy, one moment casual, smooth, paternal, had the next instant frozen into immobility and was staring at her out of eyes that had suddenly become terrifying. "You are mistaken."

"I'm not mistaken."

Mr. Kennedy sat for one moment more in the curiously still pose. "You will forgive me," he said quietly to Jody, "but I have remembered an important appointment.

Perhaps you will allow me to drop you wherever you wish to go?"

"I'm going to see Lady Cleeve," she said. "If you wouldn't mind calling a taxi for me —"

He put her into a taxi and himself gave Lady Cleeve's address; she was being driven away without any knowledge of why the mention of Laurie's visit to the school should have brought to an abrupt termination her talk with Mr. Kennedy. She leaned forward and spoke to the driver—and then the taxi had turned and was taking her to the coffee bar at which she had arranged to meet Desmond Huntley.

He was waiting at the door. "I'm late; I'm sorry," she brought out breathlessly. "I couldn't help it, but . . . we've got to hurry. Where's your car?"

"Just there." He was leading her to it, putting her in without words and hurrying round to take his place at the wheel.

"Can you drive as fast as possible?"

"If you'll give me sensible directions. What's the hurry?"

She told him. By the time they had drawn near to the mews at which she had seen Mr. Kennedy, Desmond was in command of the situation.

"You think he'll go back?"

"I'm sure he will. He was waiting to meet somebody."

"That's a long time ago."

"No, it isn't. We weren't long at the Merlin. Why are you stopping?"

"Because here he comes," said Desmond.

Jody stared. Mr. Kennedy was stepping out of a taxi, looking this way and that. He turned, and Jody felt Desmond jerk her back from the window.

"Nobody's there to meet him," she whispered.

"Wait," said Desmond. "He's just making sure that you're not around again, that's all."

They looked cautiously. Mr. Kennedy had walked to the house at the end of the row and given a sign. From the small archway that led to the side door, Jody saw a man emerge and walk forward to join him.

It was her brother-in-law, Michael Page.

It seemed a long time before Jody heard Desmond's voice. "You're trembling."

She felt his hands on her shoulders, steadying her, and she was grateful, for once again they were watching, as they had watched before, Mr. Kennedy driving away with someone they had recognized, leaving them puzzled and helpless.

"There's no reason to look like that," Desmond said gently, after a time. "Your brother-in-law was probably the next on the list for an anonymous letter from our friend Kennedy."

"Could it have been . . . because of me? Desmond, I'm frightened."

"I can see you are," he said gently. "But aren't you reading too much into this?"

"You and I agreed to try to find out what it was that I'd got involved in. Now I find that it involves another member of my family. What do I do? Go home and wait for Michael to explain what he was doing with Kennedy?"

"Wait." His calm voice stopped her. "All we do is drive down to Broome and ask him for a straight answer to a straight question: what he was doing in Kennedy's company. But first, we'll go somewhere and I'll put a good, strong drink into you."

"What I'd like is to—to go to Aunt Essie's and have some strong coffee."

It was Lady Cleeve who answered the door, and something in her white, strained look made Jody reach out and take her hands in a firm grasp.

"Aunt Essie—what's the matter?" She moved her aunt gently aside, came in with Desmond and signaled to him to close the door behind them. "What's happened, Aunt Essie?"

"Nothing." Lady Cleeve's voice was quiet, but it was clear that she was struggling for self-control. "Nothing has happened." She paused.

Jody's eyes were on a large, open envelope that lay on the table beside her aunt, some papers half out of it. She picked it up. "These . . . came back?" she asked slowly.

"Yes."

"Kennedy?" asked Desmond.

"Yes," said Lady Cleeve. "When you rang the bell, I thought—I wondered if he had come back."

"He said something to frighten you," said Jody.

"Yes." Lady Cleeve's eyes rested quietly upon her. "He told me that you are in danger."

There was a long, breathless silence. It was broken by Lady Cleeve's deliberately quiet voice.

"He brought the papers and returned them to me with apologies. He told me that Jody is in danger—grave danger—and that I must take her abroad with me for a little while. That was all." She turned suddenly and spoke in a voice very different from the calm, cold one she had been using. "Jody, you will come, won't you?"

"No," said Jody.

"If you'll listen to good advice, Jody," Desmond said, "you'll go away with your aunt."

"The only reason he wants me out of the way," said Jody, "is because I've begun to frighten him. I don't know how, but I've got in his way. And he doesn't want me in his way."

"And doesn't that put you in danger?" asked Desmond.

"Please listen to me," Jody said quietly. "I don't want anything to happen to me. But if I go away with Aunt Essie, I shall go quite slowly and quite quietly crazy. I shall wake up in the night screaming—and all the screams will be questions. Who is Mr. Kennedy, and why? Who is Laurie, and why? Who—and why? Why—and who?"

"You've made your point," said Desmond. "You won't go away, and that's crazy too. And now I'm going to take you home and we're going to talk to your brother-in-law."

They drove home in silence, and Jody leaned back and gave herself up to the feeling of moving swiftly, silently toward—what? She didn't know—but seated beside Desmond, she knew that she was traveling, at last, without fear. The struggle was over. She knew at last that her state of mind during the past few days had been caused only partly by the inexplicable events that had followed her accident. Beyond, below, there had been the knowledge that she had come to a turning point in her life.

She heard Desmond's voice. "Good weather," he pointed out. "That means that Charles will be back."

"He's due tomorrow morning."

"I'm sorry," said Desmond at last.

She made no reply. After a brief silence, he began to speak in a slow, almost absent tone.

"I'm sorry," he said, "because from the very first I had a feeling—about you and me. Perhaps when a girl begins by falling into your arms, you begin at the wrong end—but it wasn't only that. It was a feeling that you and I . . . fitted. There were no preliminaries, and no need for any. I didn't even have to ask myself if I was in love with you. I just was; finish. Nobody seemed to have any real connection with us—perhaps because Betsy had linked us together and given us a tie that shut everyone else out. I loved you, and I didn't even worry that things couldn't go on for long as they were. The world had to come back. Charles had to come back. But I'm sorry."

"So am I," said Jody quietly.

For a moment she thought that he had not heard. Then she found the car drawing off the road and coming to a halt. He switched off the engine and turned to look at her.

"Say that again," he said slowly.

"I said I'm sorry."

"Sorry that—that Charles is coming back?" he asked.

"Yes."

"You mean—you mean you ——"

"Yes," said Jody.

He sat without moving for a few moments, and then he drew a long, difficult breath. "You know what you're saying?"

"Yes." She gave a tremulous laugh. "I'm only thankful that you—that you said it first."

He put a hand under her chin and raised her face until he looked into her eyes. "I said I loved you," he told her slowly. "Do you know what I meant? Do you understand how I feel? Do you know that every moment of the day I think about you? Do you know that I go to sleep at night with you in my mind, and wake up in the morning remembering you, what you look like, what you sound like? Do you know what I've been longing to do?"

He put his arms round her and drew her close. His lips came down on hers, and stayed there, warm and firm and seeking. He kissed her mouth, her eyes; his lips strayed round her face, and came to rest once more upon her mouth. She closed her eyes and let peace and warmth steal over her, and then her arms went up and clasped themselves round his neck, to draw him closer.

"Jody," he whispered. "Are you sure—quite, quite sure?"

"Quite sure," she said.

They drew away from each other.

"I—I love you," he said slowly. "I love you so much, Jody. I hate the feeling that I've taken you away from another man, but ——"

"There was never anything like this," she said, "between Charles and myself."

It was almost midnight when they reached the house. Desmond walked with her to the front door and stood looking down at her.

"Jody—won't you think over what your aunt said?"

"I'm not going away, Desmond. I'm not frightened of Mr. Kennedy."

He said nothing more. She stood watching him as he drove away, and then she turned and went slowly into the house, closing the front door behind her and drawing the heavy bolts.

She turned and went slowly toward the staircase, her mind full of love and thankfulness. Desmond—large, awkward, strong, gentle ——

She heard a cautious knock, and turned with a smile. He had forgotten to say something—or he had returned to feel her close to him once more, as she longed to feel him.

She walked to the door and drew back the bolts and opened it, the smile still on her lips. On the threshold stood the woman called Laurie.

Laurie was the first to speak. "You know who I am? Our friend Mr. Kennedy has spoken to you about me?"

Jody did not reply for a moment. She w studying the woman standing before her, a finding her as beautiful as on the evening s had seen her at the Merlin Bar. The light fr the hall shone on her, making her lo younger, less hard than she had looked th evening. Her skin, Jody saw, was like hair—natural, untouched and of silken beau

"We can't talk here," she said quiet
"Won't you ——"

"No. I am not coming in. I have only co to say something to you."

"What is it?"

"You must go away—at once," Laurie sa

Her voice was quiet, but it held such dea menace that Jody's hands crept up her ar until she seemed to be hugging herself i curious attitude of protection.

"If you tell me why ——" she began he tatingly.

"I will tell you nothing—except to go. Sh
I tell you what will happen if you do not g

There was a short, deadly silence, out which Jody heard her own voice. "If I sa will go, can't you tell me what happened t morning? Nothing was my fault. The wh thing was a mistake. I'd never heard of yo didn't mean to go to number four. But I go there—and what happened to me?" Jod voice was urgent. "Nothing's worse than knowing—nothing."

Laurie studied her curiously. "Very wel shall tell you what happened to you on t morning. It will not take long. You came to building. You were seen; you were rec nized."

"By whom?"

"Wait. I said that I would tell you, an will." Laurie's voice was mocking. "You be ——"

There was a sharp, cracking noise and words became a low gurgling sound. Jo numb with terror, saw the woman standing front of her sway, put out groping hands then fall in a heap at her feet.

Staring down at her, Jody could h sounds—screams, loud and repeated, footsteps, and then voices. From upst came Estelle. From the garage came Mich running swiftly. From the cottages came major, stumbling in his haste; behind him, professor, groping blindly without his glas and fumbling with the cord of his dress gown; Miss Bishop, still fully dressed. T came and stood round Jody, but the scre went on and on—and then Michael raise hand and Jody felt the sting of it as it str hard at her cheek, and the screaming stop abruptly and she realized that it had b coming from herself.

She felt Estelle's arms round her, and Michael stooping to look at the woman l at their feet. Then he straightened and loo slowly round the circle of faces.

"She's dead."

The professor spoke slowly. "Then it w shot. I was asleep, but . . . I have awake before to that sound. I could not mistake
He pressed his hands together in a curi kneading gesture, and looked at Michael.

"Nobody must touch her." Michael's v was calm. "The police will have to see her as she is." He was at the telephone, dial and they waited in silence as the words, credible in the quiet, dim hall, were spok accident, fatal; woman shot dead;
through the back.

Estelle's eyes, wide and unbelieving, re on her husband as he put down the receiv

"Murder," she breathed. "Oh,
chael ——"

"It's all right." He spoke steadily, but face was ghastly. "It's all right. The po will be here in a little while."

The next few hours passed, for Jody, dream. In the hall, the police asked quest and noted down the answers. Jody told story. She tried to recall the words Laurie spoken, and her own replies. She had beer the verge of learning something—but La had died with a name on her lips, killed bullet that came out of the dark.

Michael had been in London, he said.
had returned late. He had put away his and was walking toward the house whe

CONTINUED ON PAGE

PLEASE USE YOUR POSTAL ZONE NUMBER!

To improve service and speed delivery of mail, the Post Office asks that you always include your postal zone number in your address.

We want to co-operate in every way we can—but we need your help. By giving us your zone number, you'll be assuring speedy delivery of your magazines.

Help yourself to better service. Use your Postal Zone Number—always!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

ne of the most exciting women in the world: Meg Westergren

STOCKHOLM

EGWESTERGREN, elfin, exquisite—busy! A hard-working trs, she is also a devoted wife and the mother of two el young children . . . "I'm often tired, but I must never show it." She uses Pond's Cold Cream to deep-cleanse and moisturize, to ease away tension lines . . . "Pond's leaves my skin so clean, keeps it beautifully soft and smooth."

SHE'S BUSY . . . YET SHE'S BEAUTIFUL . . . SHE USES POND'S

CW! POND'S COLD CREAM IN BOTH CREAM AND NEW FLOWING FORM

w-for you who love lotions—Pond's Flowing Cold ea , a wonderful new form of Pond's Cold Cream! is exclusive new flowing cleanser is creamy-rich as ly ue cold cream can be . . . never strips your skin e in drying liquids. Pond's, in cream or flowing form, beautifies as it cleanses. Moisturizes to soften and smooth . . . "plumps up" skin cells so tired lines fade, tension vanishes. Use Pond's to beauty-cleanse at night, to moisturize under make-up all day. With Pond's you need never be too busy to be beautiful!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 129

heard the shot, and came round the corner of the house to see a woman falling.

Miss Bishop had been reading, and had gone into the kitchen to make herself a hot drink. She had been pouring it out when she heard the shot; she had dropped the saucepan and broken the cup—and come running.

The major had fallen asleep in his chair. He had been awakened, he said, not by the shot but by the sound of the professor running out of his house. He had followed him, and they had heard Miss Bishop coming out of her cottage and calling to them, but they had not waited to answer her. The professor could only repeat that the sound of the shot had awakened him.

At about half past four, Jody went into the kitchen to make some coffee. She heard the door open, and turned to see Michael coming in, and at the sight of his face she felt her heart give a leap of fear. He looked deathly pale, and his strong figure seemed to sag. He walked across the room and stood looking down unseeingly at the water heating on the stove.

"Did you"—Jody hesitated—"did you tell the police you'd seen Kennedy?"

"Who told you I'd seen Kennedy?"

"Desmond and I saw you."

"He told me that you were in danger. And I told him I hadn't the slightest influence with you and wouldn't be able to induce you to go away. And so he went to see Lady Cleeve. And I," he ended slowly, "I went to see Laurie."

"You . . . went to see her!"

"I went to try and see her," he amended. "The address Kennedy gave me was in Brook Street. I went there. A woman came to the door and said that a Mrs. Grierson had been staying there, but had left that day. Then I went into a café and bought some sandwiches and ate them in the car on the way home. It doesn't make a very convincing story for the police."

He walked to the door and then looked back at her.

"I'm sorry about the beginning of all this," he said. "You wanted to talk—but nobody would listen. I wish to heaven ——" He stopped and then spoke more quietly. "Charles is on his way back. The police checked. He left St. Malo about sixteen hours ago and he ought to make Newhaven this morning."

"The police checked? But—but why?"

"Because Laurie was shot with his gun. They found it on the grass between here and the cottages. So the police checked—and found that if Charles had fired the shot, he would have had to do it from the middle of the Channel, because that's where he was."

"But Charles doesn't keep the gun ——"

"Here? I know that. Somebody took it off Gazelle. And the only person who goes regularly between here and Marcove is the major."

"Michael ——" She stopped. He had gone out and closed the door behind him.

Jody, left alone, went on performing mechanically tasks that were normal and everyday and entirely unconnected with mystery and death and horror. She forced herself to concentrate on what she was doing. She was making coffee; so many people, so many measures; so many cups; get out the coffee sugar, heat milk for those who like it, fill the cream jug. Get out some glasses and the brandy; people would need it. Miss Bishop looked ill, the major looked exhausted, the professor looked dazed.

And then the door opened and Estelle was standing in the doorway, swaying. Jody led her to a chair and placed her in it and poured a cup of hot coffee.

"Drink that," she ordered. "You're faint, and no wonder. Go on—drink it."

"Michael," brought out Estelle in a choked voice. "They've taken him away—the police. They've taken him away. In a car. With the major. They've taken them both, and Miss Bishop ——"

"Taken all three?"

"No. Miss Bishop has—I think she's fainted. The professor's looking after her and I came—I came ——"

"Drink that coffee—do you hear?" Jody said. She poured a liberal amount of brandy into the hot liquid. "Before you say another word—drink that."

With shaking hands, Estelle lifted the cup. She finished it, and put down the cup.

"Now," said Jody. "Can you tell me what happened?"

"The police told me they wouldn't want me any more. Or Miss Bishop, or the professor. But they would have to take away the major and—and Michael."

"For what?"

"For—for further questioning. And Michael left a message for you. Go to Marcove, Michael says, and intercept Charles. Tell him what's happened. Jody"—her voice was agonized—"what'll they do to Michael? They—they arrested him, Jody."

Once more Jody succeeded in calming her. She led Estelle upstairs and made her lie down, saw that Fenella still slept and went down to the drawing room.

Miss Bishop was unconscious, lying in an untidy heap beside the fireplace. Beside her knelt the professor, holding one of her hands and muttering soft, meaningless phrases in German. He relinquished his charge with open relief to Jody, and hurried hither and thither obeying orders, bringing brandy, pushing up the sofa and helping to lift onto it the reviving Miss Bishop.

She lay quietly, her eyes on Jody. When she spoke at last, it was in a voice almost dead with despair.

"They—they took him away," she said, and Jody knew that she did not mean Michael.

"Only for questioning." Jody put all the comfort she could into the words.

"It's no use." Miss Bishop's voice was calm. "They know. He tried to hide it from them, but they knew. They knew before he told them."

"What did they know?"

"That my cousin had been in prison. They knew. When he came to the school, I didn't

THE WINNING LOOK of ORLON® acrylic fiber

Slacks shown, 70% "Orlon" acrylic fiber, 30% worsted wool.

In slacks, boys like the comfortable, yet neat look of "Orlon"* acrylic fiber. "Orlon" lets boys be boys, yet keeps them looking their best . . . keeps clothes neat and well pressed through active fun. This is The Winning Look all boys like. And, of course, so do their mothers. That's why you'll make extra sure his next pair of slacks contains "Orlon"!

DU PONT

TAYLORED SLACKS OF HOLLYWOOD

know. He had been in prison for—for two years. False pretenses, he said. He wanted to stay at the school and he said he wouldn't give any trouble."

The professor's gentle, admonishing voice broke into the tumbling sentences. "You must not speak any more," he said. His long white hand reached out and patted Miss Bishop's shoulder. "Close your eyes and be patient and this thing will come the right way soon."

Miss Bishop's eyes closed; her breathing became slow and heavy, but Jody sat on unmoving. Her mind felt dull; only one thing came back with more and more force and clarity: her need to see, to speak to Desmond. She wanted him. She longed for his presence, longed to hear his voice, longed to feel his hands on her own. In all her life she could not remember yearning for anything with this singleness and intensity.

She looked up to find Estelle coming into the room. She was fully dressed, and to Jody's relief quiet and calm.

"As soon as you feel it's reasonable time," she told Jody, "I'm going to drive to Nancy Wigram's. I want to leave Fenella with her for today."

"That is a good idea," said the professor. "Why do you not stay there yourself?"

"No. I want to be near my husband, if they—if they'll let me. But I'll have to take the car," she told him, "and Jody has to go to Marcove. If you could let her use your car ——"

"If I may offer myself, I shall be happy to drive you," the professor told Jody.

When sorrow reaches its climax,
joy is not far away.

YUGOSLAV PROVERB

Jody, remembering his appalling driving and longing to refuse, changed her mind and said nothing. For a short while, at any rate, she reflected, fears for her own safety would drive out all other thoughts.

She went out into the hall, and to the telephone. It was not, now, too early to speak to Desmond. She heard Lady Wigram's voice, and apologized for the early call. She said nothing of the night's happenings, stating simply that Estelle was anxious to bring Fenella over and leave her for the day. And finally she asked was Desmond up? She would like a word with him.

"Desmond?" His sister sounded surprised. "Desmond isn't here. He rang up and said he'd decided to spend the night at his club."

"Rang up? What time?"

"I can't quite remember. It was late," recalled Lady Wigram. "It was just before midnight, I think."

"He didn't say ——"

"He didn't say any more than that. I was just going to ask you if you knew where he'd gone off to."

"No. No, I don't," said Jody.

She put down the receiver and stood still. He had not gone home. He had left her, and he had gone straight to call his sister. He had gone—where?—without a word. He had kissed her—and he had gone away.

She heard the professor's voice, and saw him at the front door. "I am ready," he told her. "My car is here."

Jody, not as a rule a nervous passenger, found herself alternately clenching her fists tightly in her lap and clinging to the stuffing that protruded from the cushions. This proving an inadequate support, she braced her feet against imaginary brakes, and pressed them as oncoming traffic bore down upon them and missed them by inches. The professor stared straight ahead, lips compressed, his knuckles white with the tenseness of his grip on the steering wheel.

He did not speak until they were nearing the cove. Then: "You think," he asked, "that already Charles will be here?"

"I don't know. If he isn't, he'll be near. When I see him, I'll take Gazelle out and meet him."

"But why should you go to meet him?"

"I'm going to stop him from going to Newhaven."

"Gazelle is not too big for you to take?"

"No. I can manage."

"You cannot go alone." The professor's voice quavered. "If you wish to go out to Charles, I shall come with you."

Jody knew what the offer must have cost him. His fear of boats, of the sea was well known. She saw that even the possibility of venturing on the water had made him as pale as death.

"It's very kind of you," she said firmly, "but I'll manage by myself. I know how you hate the sea. I'll be all right."

"No. Other days, yes. But today you have received a shock," said the professor. "Today is different."

But when they reached Marcove and stood at the clifftop looking down at the little harbor, the day did not look different from other days. All trace of the recent storm had gone; the water was as calm as it had been on countless other summer mornings when she had come down here with Charles, to sail with him or to see him off.

Shading her eyes, Jody let them move along the surface of the sea, looking for Ballerina's familiar lines.

"There she is."

She began to walk down the steep slope, and the professor stumbled along by her side. When they reached Gazelle, she glanced at him and saw that he was white with fear.

"You mustn't come with me," she said firmly. "I shall be quite all right by myself."

"No. I am very afraid," he confessed, "but I shall come. Please do not notice me; I shall not give you trouble. But if I let you go alone, I shall not feel that I am doing what is right."

"We should reach Ballerina in half an hour—Charles will see us and come to meet us. The sea's dead calm."

Dead . . . and calm. Dead, like the woman who had fallen at her feet on the steps. Calm,

Great Idea! Do it with ARM & HAMMER SODA

(BAKING SODA)
BICARBONATE

MEETS ALL REQUIREMENTS OF U.S. PHARMACOPOEIA

CLEANSE AND SWEETEN REFRIGERATOR—Soda is the cleaner recommended by refrigerator manufacturers. It sweetens as it cleans. Just sprinkle Arm & Hammer bicarbonate of soda—commonly called baking soda—on damp cloth and wipe all surfaces. Soda cuts film without scouring, without grit, without leaving suds. Wash ice trays, food boxes, etc. with solution of 3 tablespoons soda to quart water. Buy Arm & Hammer soda at food stores.

CLEAN AND PURIFY BABY BOTTLES Soda gives them fresh fragrance and extra-clean sparkle. No sour odor or bottle film. Add ½ teaspoon of soda to each bottle (glass or plastic) and fill with warm water. Then shake, rinse and sterilize.

QUICK WAY TO CLEAN BRUSHES AND COMBS—Just let them stand several minutes in basin of warm water to which has been added 2 tablespoons soda. Soda cuts film, leaves them sweet and clean. Keep Arm & Hammer soda in your bathroom.

In certain areas, such as metropolitan New York, the same high quality soda is sold under the name COW BRAND

ARM & HAMMER SODA
BICARBONATE

SO PURE it meets all requirements of the United States Pharmacopoeia, which sets standards of quality and efficacy for pharmaceuticals and drugs.

SO PURE it is recommended as a dentifrice by dentists everywhere.

SO PURE it is prescribed and administered by physicians for many medical conditions.

SO PURE it is used in numerous hospitals for injection, internal administration, and application.

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., INC., 70 Pine Street, New York 5, N. Y.

like Laurie, lying in a mortuary. The sea's calm would be succeeded by movement—but Laurie would still be dead . . . dead, forever unmoving.

Her mind went to Desmond, and once more the longing for him swept over her. With an effort, she brought her mind to the professor, and helped him aboard and prepared to take Gazelle to sea.

She would see Charles—and she would have to tell him not only the terrible news of the night that was just gone, but the whole of the events leading up to it. She would tell him about Desmond, and of her feelings for Desmond.

She glanced at the professor, and was relieved to find that he was no longer crouching fearfully against the rail. He was standing and watching, as she was watching, the approach of Ballerina. The two boats neared each other; she could see Charles busy with ropes, and she waited for his attention to become disengaged so that she could call to him. Far away were isolated fishing boats. Beyond them, a large liner moved lazily; nearer at hand, a small naval patrol vessel sped swiftly, leaving a lacy white train trailing in the water.

Jody took a firm grip on the helm, waiting for Charles' order.

And then she felt the grip of two hands closing over her throat.

The sea vanished, and became the sky. Her hands, torn from the wheel, waved wildly, helplessly, and then fastened on the hands that gripped her, and she tore and clawed at them and knew that she could not move them. Their grip was tightening . . . tightening ——

Thought ceased, and instinct took its place. Her feet, lifted off the deck, flailed and found something against which to press. The hands were jerked away, and she was falling—and then for one moment she lay and saw the professor's face swooping down, his hands, like talons, tensed to grip once more.

The professor, and his long, white hands. The professor, with blue eyes no longer mild, but hard with the hardness and glaze of china. The professor's fingers round her throat, pressing, pressing ——

Once more she had torn herself free, only to be brought down with brutal force on the deck. She fought, and knew that the struggle would be brief; Charles was near, but not near enough. Air . . . there was no air. There was no sky.

She made a last desperate effort to free herself—and then she saw that the darkness was moving and breaking up and parting as a shape, large and growing larger, appeared between Gazelle and the sun, hung for an instant over the little ship and then swept by. Gazelle, left rocking wildly in a boiling sea, plunged, dipped and then heeled over, and a cry from Jody ended in a gasp as she was hurled into the sea.

As she hit the water and went under, she knew that she was safe from the professor. Kicking her way to the surface, she told herself that Charles had chosen the swiftest, the surest way to save her: he had driven Ballerina into Gazelle.

And then, surfacing, she shook the water from her eyes and realized that Ballerina was nowhere to be seen. Close to her, Gazelle lay on her side, her sails trailing in the sea. Some distance beyond, the professor was struggling desperately in the water. And turning in a half circle of bubbling white froth was the naval patrol vessel—and as it bore down upon them Jody over its wake saw Ballerina, and upon Ballerina's deck Charles.

Charles, watching. Charles, listening to her cries and disregarding them. Charles, motionless upon the deck of Ballerina, watching dispassionately the professor fighting for life a rope's length away.

As she began to swim toward the professor, a man dived from the naval vessel, swimming strongly toward Jody. He reached her, put out a strong arm and gathered her to him and held her, but she twisted herself out of his hold.

"Desmond—the professor! He can't swim! He ——"

"It's all right, Jody. Charles is near and ——"

"No!" The sound was a wail of despair. "No, he—he isn't going to ——"

She saw Desmond turn in the water and look back. The professor was no longer struggling.

"Go to him—I'm all right. Oh, go to him," Jody begged.

She saw Desmond swimming away from her, swimming strongly and swiftly, but she knew that he would not be able to reach the professor in time. And Charles, who had been near, who could have saved him—Charles had watched and had done nothing. He had watched a man ——

She half swam, half drifted to Gazelle and hung there, her eyes closed. When she opened them, there was no sign of the professor. Desmond, after a time, swam back to her. She saw the patrol vessel coming nearer; she saw Ballerina moving away, not in the direction of Newhaven, not in the direction of Marcove, but out to sea.

She was in Desmond's arms. So much she knew, but no more.

NEXT MONTH

"I'm in the big, big league, Ginny," he said. "I meet a lot of people and I don't think there are more than three or four who wouldn't change with me in one minute."

The Weldons had been married ten years and Ginny, at thirty, was prettier than ever. They had three children, a beautiful suburban home and an income of $23,500. Suddenly, unexpectedly, three things happened and Ben and Ginny Weldon realized their marriage faced a crisis. More than a crisis!

John D. MacDonald tells this challenging, contemporary story in

THE TRAP OF SOLID GOLD

condensed novel complete in the APRIL JOURNAL

It was very quiet in the room. It was a strange room, and Jody was glad, for familiar things brought to her mind memories which she could not yet face.

"If you would rather hear some of it at some other time ——" began Mr. Kennedy.

"No."

"I brought you here because I felt that we could talk better alone. The others know all there is to know, but you were not well enough to ——"

"Please go on."

"I shall never forgive myself," he said, "for not having told you who I was. But it seemed to me then that what I did was right."

Jody waited.

"I was acting in the dark," went on Mr. Kennedy. "You and Huntley came to Dorset Court. I was there from the C.I.D. to see if the man we'd placed there had learned anything. The Griersons had left no trace, and nothing more had been learned about them. Then I saw two young people who had come inquiring about a woman with a shady record in more than one country. You might have been straight—but I had to be sure."

"And so you searched my aunt's house for ——"

"Yes. That told us little, but when I located Laurie, I decided to make sure about you. You and the lieutenant commander both came to the Merlin, and I arranged to meet Laurie there. Two police officers kept you under observation when she came in, and from their report it was clear that you had had no previous connection with her. And then . . . I began to worry about you."

He paused, and pushed toward her the drink she had put down on the desk.

"When you went that morning to Dorset Court, the professor was there. On his visits to his conservatoire at Harrogate, he always called at Dorset Court—number four. He saw in what direction you were going, and he realized that by some extraordinary error you were going to number four. He had at all costs to stop you. He crept up behind you as you looked through the window in the corridor, and he hit you. Then he carried you into the apartment and ——"

"So that was my blood on the carpet."

"Yes. You were there for only a few moments, while he discussed what should be done with you. Then you were carried to the foot of the stairs and left there. The manager reported the matter to the police in a purely routine way—but when I saw the report, I went to Dorset Court. By that time the Griersons had vanished, and so had our link with an international gang of smugglers."

"Smugglers?"

"Yes. They operated," said Mr. Kennedy, "on the grand scale. Watches. Hundreds, thousands of watches pouring in from the Continent and finding their way into this country—undetected. We didn't know how they came in. All we knew at first was that they were distributed from the Joichim Conservatoire at Harrogate."

"Laurie ——"

"She had been working in France, living with one of the members of the organization. He was caught by the French police, and convicted, and Laurie crossed the Channel. And so, for the first time, we had a tie-up between the Continental gang and the gang here in England. Laurie went straight up to Harrogate, and that was when the Joichim Conservatoire first came to our notice. But for some time we couldn't get any further.

"Then one day," went on Mr. Kennedy, "there was a car smash in Sussex, and two men were killed—two men who had been working for the professor. Their deaths left him without two key men—and he decided to take the place of one of them, the man who had been the music master at Broome Abbey.

"He brought Laurie as far as London, and put her into a flat in Dorset Court, with strict orders that she was never on any pretext whatsoever to venture into Sussex. She agreed, and she stuck to the agreement—until you came into the picture. You came by accident, and you brought disaster."

"I don't ——"

"You don't yet see why. I shall tell you. Number four Dorset Court had become a link in the chain that stretched from Harrogate to Broome, and your accident forced the professor to give up the apartment; he was afraid that an investigation might take place and bring him too close to the police. The apartment was vacated, and Laurie was left homeless. And . . . she decided to go south.

"I didn't know she had called at the school until I spoke to you at the Merlin after you had seen me at the rendezvous that I had made with your brother-in-law."

"Why did you ——"

"Why did I want to see him? I sent for your brother-in-law because Miss Bishop had gone to the police with some important information."

"Miss Bishop!"

"She played a game of hide-and-seek with your little niece, Fenella. Miss Bishop found Fenella in the professor's empty cello case. Little girls playing a game are not very careful how they handle things; the case had been subjected to some rather rough treatment, and when Miss Bishop found Fenella, she also found the resting place of several hundred matches."

"And that is why she ——"

"—— was taken ill? Yes. When she recovered, she went first to her cousin, Major Miller, certain that he had something to do with what was going on. The major denied all knowledge of the matter and Miss Bishop decided to tell the police. When I heard her story, I telephoned your brother-in-law, but before I could see him I saw you, and learned that Laurie had visited the school. And when I heard that, I knew that you were the reason for her going there, and I knew that she would do at nothing to get you out of the way."

"But—but why? Why?"

"Please be patient; you will learn in a moment. Miss Bishop's discovery told the police nothing that they had not known before. We already knew that the professor was the head of the organization, receiving the watches and carrying them up to Harrogate. What we didn't know for certain was: who was bringing them to Broome? The night before Miss Bishop saw the cello case, I had been down to have a talk with Major Miller. My visit frightened him, Miss Bishop's discovery frightened him still more, and so the next time he went to Marcove, he brought back the gun that Charles Vaughan had left on Gazelle."

"But he ——"

"No, he didn't shoot Laurie. When Laurie knocked on your door, the major was asleep in his chair. But the professor was awake. He went out of the cottage and saw, through the uncurtained window of the major's sitting room, that the major was asleep. He went in and took the gun, and what woke the major was the sound of the shot.

"With Laurie's death," resumed Mr. Kennedy after a time, "we knew that the professor was finished. But we wanted him to lead us to the man who had brought the supplies into the country. We had to have more than theories—we had to have proof."

Jody's eyes were fixed unseeingly on the neat papers on the desk.

"As I told you, two people died in that car smash. The music master, and one other. That other was a man vital to the organization, because he was the man responsible for getting the goods into England. He had to be a splendid seaman. He had to own a boat and he had to sail out in all seasons and in all weathers to meet, off Newhaven, the cross-Channel steamer—the Newhaven-Dieppe steamer. On the steamer, a man would come up on deck, identify the little boat, and with apparent carelessness throw overboard a bundle of what looked like rubbish. And if anyone happened to be sailing by, why should they be suspicious if they saw a man in a small boat picking up something from the sea? You can understand, can you not, the importance of this man to the professor? Without him, the organization could not operate.

"I think that at first the professor must have considered approaching the major. But the major was a weak man—and the organization had no use for weak men. And so the professor . . . went to Charles Vaughan."

The little clock on the desk ticked in the silence. Jody did not move.

"He invited Charles to the flat in Dorset Court—and Charles and Laurie met. She fell in love with him, and he—he loved you, but men are only men, and as you saw, she was beautiful.

"And then, by an extraordinary turn of fate, you went to the apartment on a day when he was there. The professor knew that if you went to number four and rang the bell, the door would be opened by your fiancé.

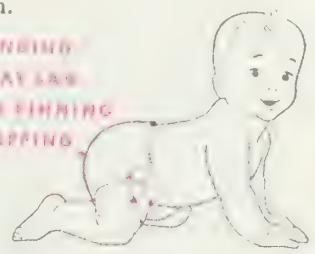
"So the professor acted—and in the confusion that followed, Laurie learned that Charles was engaged to you. She was sick of London, sick of the organization, sick of the professor. She wanted only one thing: Charles Vaughan. And so she ignored the professor's warning, and she went to Sussex, and that is why she died.

"Afterward, the professor went out with you to meet Charles Vaughan and then he decided to kill you." He paused, went on slowly, "I didn't think of the sea approach. It was Huntley who thought of that. When you took him to Lady Cleeve's and she told you about my visit, he knew that she was keeping something back. So when he left you, he drove straight back to London and roused your aunt from her bed and asked for the truth—and she told him all that I had told her. And what I had told her was that it was almost certain that the professor's accomplice was Charles Vaughan.

"Huntley got hold of a naval friend of his who commands a fast patrol boat. They went on an unofficial trip. Before he went, he told Lady Cleeve to get in touch with me and tell me what he was doing, and when I knew, I went out on a police launch and got aboard

CONTINUED ON PAGE 135

New Curity



S-T-R-E-T-C-H WEAVE GAUZE

DIAPERS

It's New Born . . . the revolutionary new Curity Gauze diaper with the stretch-and-return weave that gets stretchier with washing. Never before an all cotton weave to equal this.

Stretches with stomach to eliminate binding due to "after feeding" tummy expansion. Means smoother fit, neater appearance for babies of all sizes.

Extra Protection, Less Bulk. Fold-lines adjust diaper more easily to all size babies . . . no hems to irritate tender baby skin.

Curity diapers are softer and smoother, even after countless launderings, when washed in quality products like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Don't forget Curity dress-up diapers and double duty night diapers, too. At leading stores and diaper services.

All Curity Diapers

DRY FASTER
Indoors or out

WASH EASIER
Stains disappear like magic

ABSORB MORE
Thirsty surgical weave works wonders

WEAR LONGER
Last entire diaper period and longer

PAT. APPLIED FOR

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Kendall Mills Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. J30

Enclosed is 25c for a new Curity Stretch Weave Gauze Diaper.

Send coins only and print clearly. Only one diaper to a family.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Good in Continental United States and Hawaii

ook what you can do
that's new:

CHOCOLATE WAFFLES

Shake up Aunt Jemima batter according to waffle recipe on package, using chocolate milk in place of milk.

Pour out on griddle and bake as directed for a wonderful treat the whole family will like any time!

if you like waffles–sure a shakin' they're Aunt Jemim

Don't the best days start with Aunt Jemimas?

Hooray—Waffles today! For more than 60 years, Aunt Jemima has been America's favorite way to say "Good morning!" An now, with the easy Aunt Jemima Shaker Method, perfect waffles (as well as pancakes) are just ten shakes off your shel the patrol boat. Huntley didn't want me. His idea was to contact Charles Vaughan on Ballerina and give him a chance to get out—if he wanted to. But . . . that wasn't quite how things worked out. I leave you to imagine what I felt when we neared Gazelle and saw ——" Once again he stopped. Silence fell, and it was a long time before Jody broke it.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 133

"Ballerina ——" she began.

" —— was found and brought home by the naval authorities," said Mr. Kennedy. "There was nobody aboard her." His voice deepened. "Perhaps it was as well, Jody. There was not much for Charles Vaughan to come home to."

Italy was hot, Spain an inferno. Lady Cleeve, who liked always to be cool, bore the discomfort for her niece's sake, but she was greatly and openly relieved when Jody, at the end of August, proposed returning home.

"But we haven't been to Granada," pointed out her aunt conscientiously. "Or Córdoba."

"I know. Let's go home," said Jody.

They arrived on the day before Jody's birthday.

"Stay with me and have it here," begged her aunt.

So Jody stayed at the house in Knightsbridge.

When she awoke next morning, the table in her room was gay with brightly colored parcels. There were boxes of flowers, there were letters and telegrams. Gifts from Estelle and Michael and the children, a posy from the major, a hand-knitted scarf from Miss Bishop.

But there was nothing from Desmond Huntley.

She went up to her room before lunch, having waited in vain for a sign. Standing in the middle of the room, she pressed her hands together and told herself that the navy was a busy life, and ——

She heard her aunt's footsteps and went to the door. Lady Cleeve stood on the threshold, on her face a look difficult for Jody to analyze.

"Somebody wants to see you," she told Jody.

Jody's heart leaped. "Downstairs?"

"Outside. He says you're to look out of the window."

The window opened onto the street. Jody walked to it and looked out.

Down in the heart of Knightsbridge, a small and attentive crowd watched a very large man trying to lead a very small, very white and reluctant goat up to the little house. The goat wore a huge pink bow round its neck and round its middle was a pink sash on which was emblazoned the words Betsy II.

"Happy birthday." He wagged a finger at Betsy. "For you. Shall I bring her up?"

Jody waited until she could speak steadily. "No. I'm coming down," she said.

WHO IS DOCTOR SPOCK?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

"Somehow I never quite realize that Ben is famous. When you've known somebody from the time he was young, you don't think of him as a public figure."

Spock was a Yale student when he met the beautiful black-haired seventeen-year-old Jane Cheney at Black Point, Connecticut, where her family owned a summer home. They waltzed in a moonlit gazebo, and he proposed the next night. "I've never had any trouble making up my mind about things," he says now, "even when I only knew by instinct."

Jane, whose family owned the Cheney silk mills, was equally positive. They were married in 1927, and their first years in New York, while Spock finished medical school and interned, were cheerfully sparse. A friend remembers, "Jane was the only girl in our crowd who was doing all her husband's laundry, and she told us, 'Ben's so wonderful—he only expects me to iron the parts of his shirts that show.'"

Spock, a superb dancer, and a man who has always been ingenious in getting what he wants, formed the Don't Tread on Me Club, or Dr. Spock's Dancing Academy, which met regularly in a hired hall, with an orchestra, at $1.50 a couple. In between, their friends often danced to a phonograph in the Spocks' big one-room basement apartment at 170th Street, with the curtained-off bed at one end.

When their first son, Michael, was born, in 1933, Spock had already interned in medicine and pediatrics, and was finishing a year's psychiatric residency at New York Hospital. Discussing himself as a new father, he now remarks wryly, "Jane says I was pretty rigid, but I thought of myself as sort of enlightened from the start."

His wife says, "First he was a little stricter than I was. Then for a while perhaps he was a little too permissive."

It must have been during this latter phase when an observer walking a dog in Central Park saw the small Michael sitting placidly in a large mud puddle, while his father waited beside him in a stance of I'll-be-patient-if-it-kills-me. An ex-Yale roommate remembers going to the Spocks' for cocktails about that time. "As a bachelor, I of course had clear ideas on how a child should be brought up. Michael was allowed to wander around among the guests, and when he picked up an empty glass and acted as if he were drinking, I took a pretty dim view. I thought to myself, 'If Ben lets his own child do that, he won't have much of a future as a child specialist.' Well, that shows you how much I knew." Bachelor or not, he noticed that Spock was much more easy and companionable with his young son than most other fathers. The two went sled riding and roller skating, and they built a raised platform around the wall in the boy's playroom, for the electric train, so that it even went over the bed. They also built a runway along the baseboard for Michael's pet white mice, but this was less successful. When Michael decided sadly that the mice weren't at all friendly, his father whisked them off to the lab at New York Hospital, where he was a staff pediatrician.

A colleague of those days said, "Nothing was ever too much trouble for Ben. Once I saw him spend twenty minutes teaching a nervous young mother how to read a thermometer. There was another woman who came to the clinic who drove the rest of us crazy, because she yak-yakked on and on, about her child. But Ben would sit patiently and let her spill out everything on her mind. He said, 'I like them to talk. It helps both of us.'"

Spock had started private practice in 1933, renting space in an obstetrician's office, and it took him two years to make expenses. A pediatrician who shared an office with him in the early 1940's said, "Ben spent so much time discussing psychological aspects with the parents that he always ran late on appointments. But even under pressure, he never lost his humor. One patient came in with a rambunctious three-year-old, and she was expecting another child. I heard Spock tell the nurse, 'Be especially kind to her. She has a touch of pregnancy.'"

When the city's Department of Health launched a training program for its staff in child psychology, Spock, as their consultant in pediatrics, talked to doctors, nurses and social workers. "He got a list made of the questions young mothers asked oftenest. It was a broad training laboratory, and I think it made him more flexible, more inclined to trust mothers' instincts." This same doctor said, "In meetings, if there was a deadlock, suddenly that laugh of Ben's would crash through the tension, and in no time he'd have the holdouts won over."

> Goodness is the only investment that never fails.
>
> THOREAU

In the accounts of his zooming success and his crammed schedule, there's a trace of "the shoemaker's children go barefoot." Spock almost never got home before his son's bedtime. His wife remembers, "Mike and I would often go with him in the car on his Sunday calls, and Mike would play on the sidewalk while Ben was inside seeing a patient. Sometimes that was the only way Ben could be with Mike all week long."

When his younger son, John, was born, in 1944, Spock was then stationed in Washington, a lieutenant commander in the Navy, doing psychiatric work with severe disciplinary cases. "As soon as I got word that Jane was in labor, I caught the next train for New York, and I got there in time." The setback came when he dashed eagerly into the sixth-floor nursery of New York Hospital, to look at his brand-new son close to. As a staff pediatrician he'd been going into and out of that room for years. But now the head nurse advanced implacably. "Get out!" she said. "You're not a doctor now—you're a father. Get out!" Spock says that as he slunk out of there, to go and peer distantly at his son from the other side of the glass partition, "I realized just how useless fathers are made to feel."

It was because he had first been turned down by the Navy—he'd had a bad back and three sieges of pneumonia—that he decided he had time to write the book on child care, which Donald Geddes of Pocket Books had requested. The idea of a 25-cent paperback edition that could reach more mothers appealed to him as a real public service. He started it in the summer of 1943, vacationing in the Adirondacks, and dictated to his wife to give it an easy, informal tone. "We worked three hours every afternoon and every evening," she says. "I took it down straight on the typewriter, because he dictated slowly in those days. And I triple-spaced, to leave room for corrections."

Back in New York, they went on with it four evenings a week, continuing after Spock was inducted, belatedly, into the Navy and assigned for a while to nearby St. Albans Hospital. His wife had worked with a doctor in Presbyterian Hospital, taking genetic studies of entire families, and this training made her especially helpful in doing research for the book in medical libraries. She also checked on formula tables, and as her husband has written in Acknowledgments, "contributed endless time, work, patience, much of the practicality in the detailed directions in the book, and wonderful judgment."

At least one expert who read chapters of the manuscript criticized the writing style as "too slangy." Spock, who was determined to keep it natural, ignored this, but accepted other suggestions gratefully.

When his Navy orders came to leave for the West Coast, he turned down the publishers' pleadings to let them get the index done by an editorial professional. He thought he'd have a better idea of what things mothers would look for, as indeed he did. On a troop train going from New York to San Francisco, with a beer party roaring nonstop at the other end of his Pullman, Lieutenant Commander Spock sat with a lapful of galleys sliding around like oversize spaghetti, and patiently indexed 1500 entries: Adenoids . . . Aggressiveness . . . Biting Humans . . . Bubbling . . . Buntings—and on down to Weaning . . . Working Mothers . . . Worms . . . Zweiback.

One of the advance copies of the book went to a young friend of the Spocks' who was in a West Coast maternity hospital with a just-born daughter. Her obstetrician picked up the book from her bedside table and stared at the jacket: THE COMMON SENSE BOOK OF BABY AND CHILD CARE, by Benjamin Spock, M.D. "Who's Spock? What's this thing?" he asked. He leafed through it briskly, then said in a respectful tone, "I looked up green stool in the index as a test case, and it's there all right. Three kinds. This guy Spock seems to have done a good job. I guess you can trust him."

In the entire history of publishing, there has probably never been such overwhelming trust placed in an author. The country was ripe for Spock, literally, mentally, emotionally. The postwar baby boom was already on, and young parents were ready for a new, nonrigid

"But it's a deep scratch! I thought Unguentine was only for burns."

For years, doctors have known that Unguentine is most effective for treating burns. Now...science demonstrates...

UNGUENTINE® TAKES OVER AS NO PLAIN ANTISEPTIC CAN

to give instant aid to injured skin!

Instantly—the moment it touches the skin—Unguentine fights germs, relieves pain, starts healing and forms a protective dressing as no cream or liquid can! Nothing's safer for children—the whole family! And it's painless and stainless! Great for all kinds of skin injuries—cuts, scrapes, scratches, bruises, burns—also chapped hands and lips.

UNGUENTINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Play it safe—let Unguentine take over!

"The shine is the sign it's really clean!"

says PRUDENCE POTTS, the Pan Inspector

Only
Brillo Soap Pads
contain special soap with Jeweler's Polish to get pans shining clean!

Firmer, sturdier pads
A Brillo Soap Pad just has to clean lots more pots. It's the only pad that's tightly knit with firm "hemmed" edges to hold together longer.

Richer, livelier lather
Foams up faster—each pad is packed with soap clear through. Brillo with its exclusive polishing soap cleans faster, shines brighter.

Thriftier, more pads
5, 12, 20 pad boxes! Only Brillo gives you so many pads, such long-lasting pads, plus special soap with Jeweler's Polish.

Nothing shines aluminum like BRILLO

Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.; Toronto, Canada

technique of bringing up baby. The pendulum had swung, perhaps too fast and far, from Doctor Watson's stern edicts of the twenties, in his book Infant and Child Care, which featured such flinty commands as, "Never kiss your child. Never hold it on your lap. Never rock its carriage."

Watson and his sort had browbeaten parents, but Spock reassured them, from his now-famous opening sentence, "You know more than you think you do." An anxious, quivering mother could begin to breathe more easily, reading, "Don't be overawed by what the experts say. . . . We know for a fact that the natural loving care that kindly parents give to their children is a hundred times more valuable. . . ."

The book was an instant success, and reporters came flocking to get the views of the new authority on child care. There is a story that may be apocryphal, about a lady feature writer who called on the celebrated new author early one evening, at the Spock apartment. The interview was somewhat colored by the sounds of a baby screaming bloody murder—Spock's younger son. Every time a fresh scream rose piercingly, daddy's forehead was wet with perspiration. When the talk got around to children climbing out of their cribs at night, the interviewer asked, "Do you have that problem with your own child, doctor?" Spock said yes. "And what do you do about it, doctor?" It is alleged that Spock said casually, "I tie a tennis net over the top of the crib."

He doesn't agree with the charge sometimes leveled: that his book encourages parents to let children get away with too much. To back up his case, he pointed out, "My own children were brought up strictly, in that they're polite and considerate. From the time the boys were very young, people who came to the house would remark on what delightful companions Mike and John were—interesting to talk to. And I think they are. They call me Ben, and I have arguments about that with European friends who don't approve of it, but I like it."

His face split into a rueful grin, as he mentioned that every now and then somebody tells him, "There's a perfectly horrible child down the street from us, and the mother says she's bringing it up entirely by your book." He said, "People can read into it what they want to find. Even in the original edition, there was much emphasis on controls. I didn't want to encourage permissiveness, but to relax rigidity."

In the new, much enlarged paperback edition (50 cents) which came out in 1957, he has added a great deal more on discipline, and on the rights of parents. He wrote, "Nowadays there seems to be more chance of a conscientious parent's getting into trouble with permissiveness than with strictness."

He is frankly resentful of the theory that he veered too much toward permissiveness, at first, because he himself was brought up too rigidly. "It was a strict, careful upbringing, but not rigid." He feels that it's proof of his parents' interest in their children's welfare and education, that five out of the six Spock offspring—four girls, two boys—went into either teaching or psychiatry. He agrees that as the oldest child, he probably got the brunt of a strictness that eased as his younger brothers and sisters came along. Asked if it was a loving, affectionate family, he said carefully, "There was complete solidarity. And my parents devoted their lives to their children. They felt that that's what you did. It was the natural thing."

He was born in May, 1903, and christened Benjamin McLane Spock. His father, a descendant of Hudson River Dutch settlers, was general counsel for the New Haven Railroad, a great admirer of Calvin Coolidge, and is said to have resembled him. (Mr. Spock died 28 years ago.) His oldest son said, "It's interesting, when I talk to my sisters, to find how differently we saw our father. I would have described him as 'deliberate, grave, fair-minded.' But my sisters remember him as 'darling, delightful.'"

Spock's parents hardly ever went out in the evenings when the children were young, and he mentioned that although his mother adored playing cards, "She wouldn't indulge herself and play until all her children were grown. She was a strong-minded woman, and still is."

The elder Mrs. Spock, now in her eighties, "has been leading the doctors a merry chase," her son explained. "She refuses to take their medicines, and she refuses to go to a hospital because she's never been in one yet. All her children were born at home."

They were also doctored at home, in a do-it-yourself way, whenever possible. His mother bought a medical book, and looked up symptoms briskly. "Once she took three of us to the doctor and informed him she'd checked with the book and thought we had malaria." The doctor was openly skeptical of the idea. "So mother took us to a lab for a blood test and by golly, it turned out we had malaria."

The Spocks lived in a pleasant, unelaborate house on Cold Spring Street, and schoolmates remember the atmosphere there as "friendly but not relaxing." One said, "There was always a big pot of oatmeal on the stove, and

"Junior will be so pleased. He's been looking everywhere for them."

I think that's the reason Ben's never advocated shoving oatmeal down baby's gullet."

The children slept on an unheated screened porch, and their education was sometimes even more Spartan. "My mother had a theory children shouldn't go to school till they were seven," Spock said. "I don't know where she arrived at that idea, but it's interesting that some modern educators think along the same line, at least to the extent that they don't believe children should be drilled intensively their first year in school. The summer I was seven, when we were at Cushings Island in Maine, mother decided to tutor me, in preparation. Maybe she'd begun to have qualms. I remember that after one coaching session, she grabbed me by the hair and shook me and said, 'How can you be so stupid?'" He added gently, "She wasn't really cut out to be a teacher."

The next two years, his schooling consisted of lessons with the governess of a small friend. "She taught five or six of us, but I'm not at all sure she'd had any teaching training. I remember she gave us long-division problems. I was eight, and when she told us about the trial divisor, I thought I was finished. I felt utter hopelessness."

Things improved considerably when he was installed in the third grade of Worthington Hooker Grammar School. "Suddenly I was part of a big class, twenty or thirty children, and I enjoyed the feeling that I was one of a team, and for an unassertive character, that seemed to me a triumph."

Asked about a report that until Andover he was "timid and running away from things," Spock looked rather hurt. "I don't think Chunky Robbins, who lived next door to us, would have called me timid." He thought for a while. "I was shy. I wasn't a scrapper. One time when I was around nine a group of older toughs came by and yelled, 'Who ya lookin' at?'" Spock, who is a brilliant mimic, thrust out his jaw belligerently. His high forehead seemed to come down and bulge threateningly over slitted eyes. His long, slender fingers balled themselves into thuggish fists. "'Wanna fight?' When I heard that, I took off and ran for two miles without stopping."

His long-legged runs for the glory of the Andover team were on a more affirmative plane, but he still felt behind in some ways. "I'd listen to other boys talking about how they took a girl out on the town, to dinner, then on to another place dancing, and I'd think, 'Is that possible?' I couldn't imagine any boy having that much money to spend. And I couldn't imagine any nice girl being allowed to go."

When he entered Yale, in 1921, "I was no great shakes at first, from a social viewpoint. I remember watching Stuart Symington—he was an upperclassman then—and marveling how smooth he was, what a man of the world. I envied him. But when I made the crew, that led to a feeling of success that was heady. I developed more assurance."

To earn spending money for football games and proms, he worked every summer at a camp for crippled children, as a counselor. "When I saw the doctors there, and what they did for the children, I wanted to be like them. And you could say I went into medicine to be a pediatrician."

Another summer job had no such influence on his future, but it toughened his muscles. He worked on a railroad section gang in Canada,

AT LONG LAST

By KAY OWENS

The advent of the drip-dry suit
Now gives to men the nod,
Conferring on them equal rights
To the shower-curtain rod.

Make Easter Gayer, Brighter

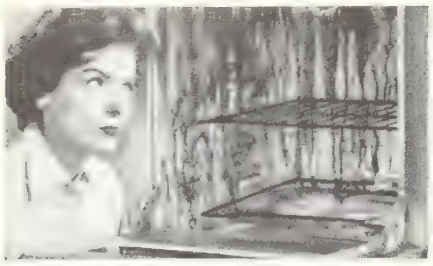
this Popular, Colorful Way!

"McCormick-Schilling Food Colors dye Easter Eggs perfectly, quickly!"

Why have so many women switched to McCormick-Schilling Food Colors to dye their Easter Eggs? The main reason is that they get perfect results every time. Such bright, gay, glowing colors! And all you do is add 1 teaspoon vinegar to ½-¾ cup boiling water. Then add about 20 drops (¼ teaspoon) of color desired. To blend shades follow chart on package. And, of course, you use these popular food colors to add eye and appetite appeal to your Easter desserts.

"I put 'The Magic-Spoonful'® of Vanilla in every cake I make!"

Put that Magic-Spoonful of McCormick-Schilling Vanilla in all your cakes and cookies, especially in your ready-mix cakes. Made from the choicest vanilla beans the world provides, processed by experts, the richer, finer, true Vanilla flavor is wholly preserved. So do what so many housewives are doing — buy McCormick or Schilling Vanilla the next time you shop!



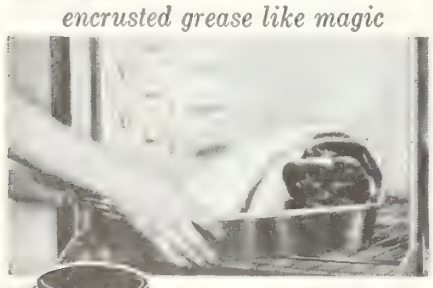
McCORMICK
Schilling
ONE FAMOUS EMBLEM – TWO GREAT BRANDS

©1960 McCormick & Co., Inc.

McCORMICK · The House of Flavor · SCHILLING

Dirtiest Ovens
SPARKLE

IN LESS TIME...WITH LESS WORK
this quick EASY-OFF Way!



DOES YOUR OVEN LOOK LIKE THIS?
Greasy-grimy . . . can smoke and cause a dangerous fire

APPLY EASY-OFF OVEN CLEANER and let set . . . then . . .

JUST WIPE...EASY-OFF cuts black encrusted grease like magic

A clean oven bakes better, roasts better . . . makes you a better cook

Depend on ®EASY-OFF
OVEN CLEANER

BRUSH MEATS Before Cooking with GRAVY MASTER
DOES THINGS FOR THE MEAT and YOUR APPETITE, TOO

in marshy inland muskeg country, and slept in boxcars in makeshift wooden bunks. "We worked for thirty cents an hour and paid the railroad a dollar a day for board. And we weren't paid when it rained, so I averaged eleven dollars net a week."

Most of the men were new immigrants, and Spock had been hired with the understanding that he would teach these co-workers English every evening. But after working a twelve-hour day, the men didn't seem to feel a burning desire for knowledge, and their tutor was in no shape to press the point.

As a Yale freshman, his own burning desire had been to live at school "in a room of my own," but his parents insisted on his eating and sleeping at home. He cites this as an example of "our family solidarity, and my parents' belief in not spending money unnecessarily."

After he made the crew, in his sophomore year, he convinced his father that he had to eat at the training table, "or I wouldn't be strong enough. And I finally got a room at school." He also became a member of the most coveted senior society, Keys. A classmate, recalling Mrs. Spock's strict supervision, said, "I always had the feeling Ben was able to cope with the situation."

Another remembers gratefully that Mrs. Spock was "extraordinarily motherly" and let him park his visiting girls there for prom weekends. The girls themselves were less grateful, because they weren't allowed to sleep in the morning after a dance. "Breakfast was at a set hour, and everybody had to be there." Spock, who was already passionately fond of dancing, seemed ebullient and fresh as a long-stemmed daisy on these mornings after. He wasn't, as yet, much of a scholar. His average grade was C plus.

A crewmate who took the trip to Paris in 1924, when Yale rowed to victory on the Seine, said, "Ben didn't stay on with us afterward. But I don't know whether it was because of his not wanting to spend the money, or his parents thinking he wasn't old enough to be loose in Paris."

Observers describe the lanky New Englander as "a perfectly beautiful oar," one of the best Yale ever produced.

Spock says modestly a lot of the credit should go to their coach, Ed Leader, a burly rough-diamond type who had come to Yale from a West Coast college. Spock's clearest memory of that Paris trip is Leader lecturing them daily against temptation. "He always wound up, 'And whatever you do, stay away from women.'"

Most of the crew followed instructions meekly, in the week before the event, with naps every day after lunch. But their captain, a dignified young man named James Stillman Rockefeller, now president of the First National City Bank, had been bitten by love on the boat going over to France, and used to sneak out during naptime to meet the girl, Nancy Carnegie, whom he later married. Mrs. Carnegie chaperoned the couple, and their outings were highly respectable. "But one day Rockefeller was late getting back," Spock recounts gleefully. "The rest of us had leaped up from our naps and were already sitting out front in an open-top bathtublike bus. But where was our captain? Suddenly we spotted him down the street, saying good-by to Nancy, while Mrs. Carnegie sat in the taxicab waiting. Our coach took one look and let out a bellow. 'Rockefeller!' he roared. 'You ought to be ashamed. What kind of a thing is this for a captain of the crew—standin' on a street corner talkin' to a woman.'"

Back home, Spock himself was talkin' to a woman—very freely. Jane Cheney was then in Bryn Mawr, and she had been doing volunteer work in a child-guidance clinic in Hartford. Spock remembers that soon after they were engaged, she told him about some interesting psychological theories. "Jane said she'd heard that the first two years of a child's life were the most important in forming his personality. And I told her, 'That is absolute nonsense.'"

Considering the way his own thinking veered later, it seems probable that his fiancée's influence was potent. After two years of Yale Medical School, Spock told his father it was too distracting to study in New Haven—"I don't know if father really swallowed that line"—and announced he'd like to finish his training at Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons. He then added hurriedly that he wanted to get married and take Jane along to New York. "Father asked me, 'But what would you live on?' and I was just trying to get up my nerve to say 'On you, father,' when mother rushed to my support. She convinced father that if Jane and I knew our own minds, we should be encouraged and helped to get married and not have to wait." He pointed out that this proves his mother wasn't a possessive, domineering parent.

Spock graduated at the top of his class at Columbia, but he thinks an important part of his education was gleaned on the subway. "In those days, before Medical Center was built, we traveled all over the city to various classes, and we'd have bull sessions en route, about politics and modern psychology and so on. I'd thought psychology was the stupidest course I had in Yale—it was a stupid course—but now I began to get an idea of the possibilities. And it was quite an eye-opener for me to learn that Coolidge wasn't necessarily the greatest President, as my father had assured me." (As a sign of emancipation, Spock voted for Al Smith in 1928.)

In spite of these revelations, he was still pulled by tradition and, at times, almost Victorian convention. He astounded a friend who had invited the young Spocks for a Long Island weekend by insisting that his wife wear long black stockings when she went in swimming. "That was 1929 or 1930," their ex-host recalls. "And Jane was the only girl on the entire beach in black stockings. I was embarrassed for her, but I must say she did it very matter-of-factly. If Ben wanted her to do it, that was enough."

> The shortest way to do anything is to do only one thing at a time.
>
> MARTIN LUTHER

By the time the young intern finished his year in pediatrics (at New York Nursery and Children's Hospital), he was convinced that the ramrod techniques of bringing up children needed a drastic reshaping. He spent the year in psychiatric residency. "Those were painful learning years," he said. "I was convinced there was some connection, but the problem was to apply this psychiatric knowledge when I started practice."

Spock, his wife, and many other people close to him at that period, think that an educational psychologist named Caroline Zachry, whom he met at the Psychoanalytic Institute when they were both taking a seminar course, had the broadest, deepest influence on his thinking. (She was director of child guidance for New York City schools at the time of her death in the mid-forties.) One of the group says now, "She was a wonderful woman with great vision and insight, and Ben sat at her feet like a disciple. It was an exciting time, with a brilliant crop of youngsters all exploding with new ideas. Margaret Mead and Lawrence Frank were two of them."

Spock, with his infectious enthusiasm, and his gift for putting complicated ideas into direct, simple words, was one of the trail blazers who could make listeners catch fire. When the Progressive Education Association asked Caroline Zachry to head up a training center, the Institute of Personality Development, for professions concerned with children, she and Spock did most of the lecturing; he talked to teachers on emotional psychology. Another of his extracurricular jobs was physician to a private girls' school. "I learned a tremendous amount then about how much a good teacher knows about a child. She sees a child against the background of a whole class, as a pediatrician never does. They'd come to me for consultations, but they taught me so much, over the years."

All this experience was grist for his book later, but the actual roots of it, so far as writing went, were in a fifty-page pamphlet he collaborated on with a psychiatrist: Psychological Aspects of Pediatric Practice, which appeared in the Practitioner's Library of Medicine and Surgery. His collaborator says, "Ben was a slow starter, and then he put on a last-minute spurt for deadline. I remember he wanted to include a discussion of the Oedipus complex, and I said no, pediatricians weren't ready for that, but he went ahead and did it anyway, and did it so simply and well. We were pleased because a doctor who read the article said, 'It's fine—it's earthy.'"

Spock's down-to-earth style is oddly at variance with the rather attenuated-sounding research he did when he first left pediatric practice, the year after his book appeared. He became associate professor of psychiatry at the University of Minnesota, and joined the staffs of the Rochester Child Health Institute and the Mayo Clinic. He explains seriously that one of the research projects was to study newborn babies' features, to determine which sex they were. (It occurred to one listener that there's a quicker way to find out.) Another project was to study babies during their first three days, and try to gauge their temperament from physical traits. "The data was never worked over carefully, but enough to show we weren't hitting the nail on the head." He sounded much more enthusiastic telling how Michael, in Rochester High School, became state swimming champion in the backstroke.

Some of his colleagues claim that Spock isn't at his best in research, that he's apt to get carried away on thin evidence, and that his real value and brilliance lie in interpreting the findings and educating the public. One said, "He's done more for parent education than anybody else in the last thirty-five years."

In 1951, Spock went to the University of Pittsburgh Medical School to organize a training program in child psychiatry and child development. He feels that he accomplished what he set out to do there, but he felt hamstrung by the endless administrative work the job entailed. As an antidote, he appeared, without fee, on a television series beamed at mothers from Pittsburgh's small, lively, educational station WQED. He had already turned down at least seven lucrative television offers, but after he moved to Western Reserve, in Cleveland, he accepted a weekly half-hour show on a national network which ran for a year. A manufacturer of baby foods was the sponsor for half the shows, and on those Spock received a fee of $750. On alternate weeks, when the program was sustaining, the network paid him $500. It was called simply Dr. Spock, over his spirited protests. "He thought it sounded too self-advertising, I think," a network official has said. If Spock didn't get his way on the name, he made sure that the show itself was never a solo act. Each week he had parents as guest panelists, mostly mothers but sometimes fathers, with offpsring ranging from a few weeks old on up. "We had a nurse standing waiting in stocking feet, ready to grab a baby out of camera range when it screamed or spit up or worse," an ex-producer says. "A sitter presided over a play area for the older kids and suddenly the sound effects would include a loud crash of blocks, or thuds, shrieks and lamentations. Once five kids started throwing ice cream at each other, and a father went into shock."

This man, who remains a fervent admirer of Spock, thinks the doctor was "a natural" and that he did a wonderful job of drawing out the guests to give their views on such problems as Personality Differences in Children of Same Family, Toilet Training, and Adolescents' Dating. But viewers kept writing to complain, "We don't want to hear what those others think. We want to hear Doctor Spock."

The program appeared on Sunday afternoons, but was filmed ahead on a weekday in a Cleveland studio. The producer says, "Spock wanted to have his weekends free to spend with his family." Spock, hearing this remark, snorted. It evidently came under the heading of what he calls "syrupy." He says, "That wasn't the only reason. I wanted

CONTINUED ON PAGE

LOOK! Something new for breakfast! At last, one sure new way to perk up bored morning appetites; two strips of crisp bacon, crumbled over a mound of snowy cottage cheese, and served with a golden peach half, heated in the bacon drippings.

LOOK! Delightful low-calory lunch! Arrange a glowing wreath of cling peach slices in cottage cheese, and top with shimmery cubes of rosy gelatin. You'll find the plump, pretty shape and sunny color of cling peaches makes a spectacular salad every time.

LOOK! A two-in-one dish for dinner! Here's how to make Peach Melba Salad, the salad-dessert that's equally wonderful served with or following your main course: set one cling peach half in a bed of creamy cottage cheese, crown with raspberry jam.

Look what you can do with cling peaches and cottage cheese!

A cling peach and cottage cheese salad is always an All-American favorite—and for a very good reason: cling peaches and cottage cheese taste so good together. Just wonderful, in fact. A combination that's wonderfully easy on the "cook" too! But, never ones to leave well enough alone, we've dreamed up some new variations for all cling peach and cottage cheese fans . . . spring tonics for menus 'round the clock.* Of course, the combination of cling peaches, hot or cold, and cottage cheese is only one of many reasons why cling peaches have become America's favorite canned fruit. They garnish your meats, dress-up breakfast cereals, bake into terrific desserts. (You can count on clings to hold their juicy-sweet flavor, plump shape and golden color during baking). Cling peaches . . . the sunniest way to brighten any meal

Watching weight? These are for you, too.*

CLING PEACH ADVISORY BOARD

canned cling peaches from California

HERE'S THE EASIEST, CLEANEST WAY TO CHANGE DIAPERS EVER! Dennison Flush-Away Diaper Liners are quickly inserted in cloth diapers . . . easily, neatly removable . . . completely disposable. No soaking or scrubbing. All muss and fuss are flushed away. The coupon below with 50¢ brings you or a friend a full month's supply.

THEY HELP PREVENT DIAPER RASH! Dennison Flush-Away Diaper Liners are formulated to check rash-causing bacteria. Moreover, these soothingly soft, silky-smooth, lint-free liners do not wrinkle or cling to baby's tender skin. No wonder many doctors, nurses and hospitals recommend them! Mail coupon today.

DENNISON MANUFACTURING CO.
Dept. C-1, Framingham, Mass.

I am enclosing 50c to cover cost of mailing a box of 12 dozen Diaper Liners.
I am not now using them ☐.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

This offer good only [illegible]
Offer expires November 30, [illegible]

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 138

weekends free for selfish reasons too." His newest enthusiasm is fancy ice skating: he goes to a nearby rink on winter Sunday mornings. His wife says her ankles wobble on skates, so she spends that time playing tennis at an indoor court.

One weekend a month the Spocks get together with their son Michael, who is designing natural-history displays for museums (he taught during his last year as a student), and his wife Judy, and an exuberant, reddish-haired grandson born in the spring of 1959. Talking about his new role of grandfather, Spock stretched out his legs, tilted back in his chair, and said expansively, "I find it very satisfying." His daughter-in-law put Daniel on solid foods when he was six weeks old, as prescribed in a book grandpa wrote. "I wish they lived nearer so I could baby-sit oftener," Spock said rather wistfully.

The most absorbing passion of his life, on weekends and vacations, is sailing. Spring and fall, he and his wife and fifteen-year-old John head for nearby Pymatuning Lake almost every weekend in their station wagon, with a fifteen-foot keel boat and dinghy on a trailer cart wagging behind. Summers, they sail around Cape Cod, in a twenty-three-foot aluminum sloop christened The Turtle, "the cheapest boat three people could squeeze into and cruise," its owner says. Evenings on the boat, they read aloud; last summer it was Thurber's My Years With Ross.

Spock and John, who wants to be an architect, have built two eight-foot dinghies in the basement of their Cleveland Heights house, and their next project is a Sailfish. "You're likely to be dumped over at any moment on a Sailfish," Spock said. "So of course John thinks that's more interesting than an ordinary boat." He went on, "Jane and I have the usual husband-and-wife discussions on whether the weather is good enough to go sailing. The wife says, 'Dear, it looks as if there's a storm coming up. Why don't we just stay here where we're all so comfortable?' And he says, 'Dear, it's bound to clear any minute, so why don't we just get started?'"

His wife told an acquaintance, "I know when Ben retires, he'll want to retire on a boat, but I haven't quite faced that thought yet."

For a man who lives happily out of a duffel bag on board The Turtle, Spock takes lively pleasure and pride in their attractive stucco house. The big living room gives a feeling of airy space and freshness, with pale yellow walls spiked with brilliant modern paintings. "Ben doesn't like abstracts and I do, but I think he's coming around," his wife says. "Whatever I do to the house, he's really interested, and goes over everything with me. I wanted geranium red for the upholstery of these two chairs, and Ben wanted an orangey color. On our last trip to New York, Ben went in and out of fabric places with me, and when we found this geranium velvet, he agreed right away." Later she said thoughtfully, "Ben's sweet and outgoing in so many ways, but on some things he's stubborn, and he has terrific drive. He drives himself too much."

When you see Spock loping from one building to another at Western Reserve, he seems to be tacking with the wind. He usually gets to the hospital by 8 A.M., and has a full-time teaching schedule, with at least one evening seminar a week, and other meetings. "I teach family relationships, and doctor-and-patient relationships and child development. I came here because I think it's the most exciting medical school in the country, with whose basic principles I agree." He's especially enthusiastic about Western Reserve's system of having medical students work with patients from the first, instead of waiting until the third year. "The traditional curriculum encourages a new student to view the patient as a collection of cells depersonalized. And as a result, some of them never quite adjust to seeing their patients as human beings." Long before the current public howl for doctors more like the kindly old-fashioned G.P., Spock was stressing, in lectures, the need "to inspire the student to a discriminating sympathy with the patient." Now he's helping to put it into practice.

He turns down at least 500 lecture offers a year, and seldom accepts speaking dates now. An address he gave in Toronto in 1954, at the International Congress on Preventive Psychiatry, contained a few remarks that went off like giant firecrackers and are still discussed with rumbling resentment by some fellow experts. What Spock was saying, in essence, was that he thought some forms of parent education were harmful: "I mean particularly any approaches, however kindly, which leave parents feeling more guilty, and any approaches that increase parents' belief that experts know better than parents."

One listener said afterward, "It sounded as if Spock thought he was the only authority who knew how to tell parents anything."

A layman, reading the few offending paragraphs in the context of a long, essentially constructive speech, is struck by their saneness and humility. But the bitterness they aroused, partly because they were snatched up and bannered by newspapers in the spirit of Expert Bites Experts, must have dismayed Spock. He isn't a firebrand by nature; being an immensely likable, innately courteous man,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 142

NEXT MONTH

Can a Wife Be Too Comforting?

If your outlook on life is always smilingly sunny; if you work at practicing patience, reassurance, sweetness and light, you may be making Lynn's mistake. You may be sending your husband straight into the melancholy arms of another Margaret. "Can This Marriage Be Saved?", a regular JOURNAL counseling service.

They Call Him "The Governor"

"Surely our people know what is happening in the world today, don't they?" worries Adlai Stevenson. "I must tell them the truth as I see it. I can't lie—I've never lied in a campaign and I'm not going to begin now!" To his attractive daughter-in-law "the Gov is the most wonderful grandfather you could imagine." To a great many Democrats he is still the best man they've got. Margaret Parton reports upon her recent visit in "Adlai Stevenson."

One Emergency That Warns Before it Strikes

"My wife got this sudden awful pain, Doctor. She was lifting a basket of clothes when it hit her. I heard her scream clear out in back and was so scared I put her in the car and got her here as fast as I could." The doctor, by operating immediately, saved her life. As Dr. Schauffler explains in "Tell Me, Doctor," her condition was bizarre, but not so rare as one might suppose.

Should She Believe in the Strange Cornishman's Love?

Or was Connan TreMellyn's proposal to his daughter's governess part of the evil that brooded over the ancient manor? Not since Rebecca, by Daphne du Maurier, has so absorbing a Jane Eyre kind of novel come into our hands by a new author, writing under the nom de plume of Victoria Holt. "Mistress of Mellyn" is a haunting, sure-to-be-talked-about serial.

The Air Belongs to All the People

Since television channels are limited in number, our Government grants broadcasting rights to stations on the assumption that they will serve the public interest. Are your child's needs being considered by the programs aimed at him? Or do you belong to that growing multitude of deeply concerned parents? Dr. Spock makes some wise suggestions in his famous page of advice.

Also, "Complete Wedding for $500"; a springtime bonus from our Fashion, Beauty, and Food departments; "Two Women in the Life of Winston Churchill," with marvelous photographs; "Cottons With a Brilliant Future"; Pat Boone's own page; stories; recipes; and much, much more

IN THE APRIL JOURNAL

Why settle for automatic defrosting?

FRIGIDAIRE GUARANTEES FOODKEEPING WITHOUT FROST

in the only 1960 Refrigerators proved FROST-PROOF in over 200,000 homes!

Not just automatic defrosting! No frost at all! None in the freezer section. None in the refrigerator. Frost is stopped before it starts.

No messy defrosting! No pans to empty! No freezer walls to scrape. No frozen-together packages. No prying-out of ice trays. No frosted-in ice cubes.

No danger of defrost thawing! Foods stay frozen hard always.

Roll-to-You Shelves! Whisper-quiet. All aluminum. Removable. They bring you all-usable storage space.

New "Flowing Cold" Meat Tender. Keeps most fresh meats up to 7 days.

New Magnetic Door Seal. Gives a better, tighter seal all around on both doors.

Choose from 4 beautiful new 1960 models. Most in 5 Colors or White.

BUY ON PROOF!

Proof from over 200,000 homes!

There is only one genuine FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer that has been proved in over 200,000 homes. It is made only by Frigidaire. Why risk a substitute, when you can buy proved Foodkeeping without Frost —guaranteed by Frigidaire!

*The exclusive FROST-PROOF system will prevent build-up of frost inside the Frigidaire FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer. Without any cost to owner or user, at any time within one year from date of delivery, Frigidaire will make all necessary adjustments to the FROST-PROOF Refrigerator-Freezer to prevent accumulation of frost.

Feel like a Queen with Foodkeeping without Frost... guaranteed.*

First and only from Frigidaire. Thrill to the new 1960 beauty of the Sculptured Sheer Look! It's for your kitchen! Model FPI-13T-60 shown above in Sunny Yellow.

FRIGIDAIRE

Product of General Motors

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

ADVANCED APPLIANCES DESIGNED WITH YOU IN MIND

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

he is hypersensitive to glares, and to the idea that he'd set himself up as a holier-than-thou. At the same time, he must say what he believes, and go right on saying it. In a later speech to an audience of professionals concerned with parent education, he said, "I got myself into trouble last summer. . . . I guess I am running the same risk again today." But he tried to make even clearer that he included himself as a target: "I confess that one of the ways that I've learned what's dubious is by practicing it myself at one time or another. The first thing I would question is those long lists of the ideal qualities that parents are meant to have . . . love that is wholehearted and unlimited, understanding, patience not only at the beginning of the day but through the afternoon into the evening, companionship, etc. . . . These are the things that children need, at least in reasonable amounts from their parents. . . . But it seems to me an entirely different matter to push such lists at parents. We overwhelm parents by making them think they ought to be superhuman."

He thinks that fear and guilt breed uncertainty, "and people who are too uncertain can't be good parents." Discussing this recently, he said, "I think it's harder for parents to be sure of the verities now. It was still a relatively stable period in my childhood, but the upheaval since then has come from three or four directions. Suddenly nutritionists were bringing out revolutionary new ideas on vitamins and so on. And educators were explaining that children like to learn, that they learn more by doing than by parrot recitals of facts, and they learn better if you get them to cooperate, instead of pushing too hard. There came the startling discoveries of Freud. On top of all these radical new theories, there was the discovery of the hydrogen bomb, and a rising barometer of anxiety all over the world. It's no wonder parents worry."

When young mothers write him, "You sound as if you thought I could do it. . . . You aren't scolding and you talk as if I had sense. . . . You make me feel reassured," the recipient of these letters is beamish. "I love this kind of fan mail," he said, "I lap it up."

The Spocks go to the symphony on Thursday nights, see friends Friday or Saturday, and keep most week nights free for his work. He writes two or three nights a week, until almost midnight. Then he and his wife read in bed until 1 A.M., and are up at 7. Spock says he rewrites so much he uses up an eraser a night, "and every morning the floor is covered with shredded stubs."

At this rate, it took him years to complete the revised, longer version of the book. The publisher says, "He told us he wasn't an author and we'd just have to wait until he could fit it into his schedule with his real work." They waited, prayerfully.

> I like a Highland friend who will stand by me, not only when I am in the right, but when I am a little in the wrong.
>
> SIR WALTER SCOTT

So far, the paperback edition, old and new versions, has sold 12,000,000 copies. The hard-cover book, published by Duell, Sloan & Pearce, has sold around 200,000. When a reporter asked rather nervously if Spock would mind giving even a general idea of the money he'd made on his books, Spock said promptly, "I'll give you all the figures you want, and I'd be glad if you'd publish them. A lot of people seem to think that just because my book has sold in the millions, I'm a millionaire, and that I'm a tightwad because we live relatively simply." Counting all foreign rights, he has averaged $17,500 a year from publishers over the past twelve years. At least two thirds of this is from the paperback edition, whose publisher says, "Ben's pretty sharp about money, but with him money is never the first consideration."

Spock was strongly against including advertising in the new edition of his book. When his lawyer told him there was no legal way to prevent it, he wrote the publisher and said, in effect, "Either I see every word of advertising copy before it appears, or I'll raise the biggest stink you ever smelled." He now has the right to approve all ads, and as a result burbling superlatives have been pretty well scratched.

Most of the people who've had dealings with Spock mention his stubborn persistence: "When he wants something, he never gives up."

On top of this a visitor was rather surprised to have Spock say sunnily, "People have told me I don't assert myself enough. But I tell them not to worry, that I've done what I wanted and gone where I wanted to go."

His reputation has gone so far that it sometimes gets in other doctors' hair, or gives them a psychosomatic pain in the neck. This was summed up in a cartoon in the A.M.A. Journal, showing an irate doctor addressing a young mother:

"Let's get one thing straight. Am I your pediatrician or is Dr. Spock?"

Spock, speaking to pediatricians at a banquet, told them apologetically he was afraid they must find it a nuisance when patients quote him as authority from on high. "They gave a roar of agreement," he says with a grin. "But afterward quite a few of them came up and told me my book helped them and helped their patients. I was pleased to hear it."

He had a different kind of testimonial a few years ago, when 100 Vassar students, taking a course in child care and using guess-what as a textbook, filed prettily into the school's amphitheater to hear what their professor had announced as "a little talk by a visiting doctor." As an eyewitness described it later, "There they sat, a hundred pairs of pink bare knees in Bermuda shorts, waiting politely. Then the professor said, 'Now I want to introduce our guest, Dr. Benjamin Spock.' At that, there was a stunned hush—you could have heard a safety pin drop. Then the whole class let out a squeal the likes of which you've never heard before. I guess Spock hadn't either. He turned absolutely scarlet. But he's not the man to let down a hundred young girls who may someday be somebody's mother. For forty minutes he acted all over that platform. He was baby, father, mother—the works. He was the greatest one-man show those girls had ever seen, and they adored him. I think he got quite a kick out of it."

"HOW PRETTY YOU LOOK!"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

to skip two weeks, then resume the three-day schedule, following this pattern throughout.

Her doctor also prescribed vitamin A to improve the fundamental quality of her skin, and also to build general body resistance to infection. Again, specific amounts were prescribed for Suzanne. Self-medication should be avoided.

Effectiveness of and tolerance to vitamins, as well as drugs, vary with each individual. Suzanne's doctor stressed the importance of her returning for regular checkups, so that he could determine her progress with the medication. In this way he could increase or decrease dosage whenever a change might be indicated.

Next, the right diet! With the exception of eating too much chocolate, Suzanne followed a general diet that was perfectly sound. For this reason, her doctor did not set up any rigid rules.

"Naturally," he says, "Suzanne had to learn not to eat the foods which aggravate acne. Chocolate, nuts, bacon, rich sauces and gravies, fried and greasy foods are real offenders. When a patient already is eating sensibly, however, we doctors don't feel justified in handing her a strict diet just for the sake of prescribing something. Suzanne's only real eating error was all that chocolate!

"In the old days my office was filled with diet lists. But I've long since discarded them in favor of just talking over good food habits with each patient. Young people with acne are often tense to begin with. Inflicting unnecessary rules and restrictions only increases the tension.

"I've known some youngsters who were so overly conscientious about cutting out foods—some essential for good nutrition—that they became anemic. In such a run-down condition, their skin got worse, not better. Knowing which foods should be avoided and using common sense about a well-balanced diet are the important things."

Suzanne adds, "I'd say the biggest improvement in my diet, aside from cutting out chocolate, is that I'm now eating a good breakfast. Fruit juice, cereal, toast and milk. I used to run out of the house in the morning after having no more than a hastily gulped glass of milk and a bite of toast. By lunchtime I was starved, and easily tempted by all sorts of rich, filling foods. Nowadays I'm not ravenous at lunchtime, and fresh fruit has become a favorite midday dessert."

Third step: external care. Vitally important to any person who wishes to clear up acne is the simple business of keeping skin immaculately clean. Suzanne's doctor recommended using a soap substitute. This is a bland, neutral product intended especially for problem skins. Sometimes abrasive soaps or soaps containing an antiseptic are advisable.

With the soap substitute and water as hot as she can comfortably stand it, Suzanne washes her face four times a day. She gently rubs her face and neck (using a clean, soft facecloth), then rinses with clear warm water, and follows with a splash of cold water to close pores. Afterward she pats her skin dry with a clean towel. (Harsh rubbing is irritating to infected skin and should be avoided.)

On occasions when blemishes reached the "breaking point" Suzanne was told she could help, provided she applied pressure gently and carefully. To do this, she uses sterile cotton wrung out in clear hot water to press against the pimple at the sides. When matter is released, she then gently dries the area, and covers it with a healing lotion. Absolutely out, however, is picking or squeezing before the areas come to a head, since to do so only spreads infection.

Two skin lotions for healing purposes were prescribed for Suzanne. One is a tinted lotion which she can wear, unnoticed, during the day. The other is a white lotion (lotio alba in a strength suited to Suzanne's needs) reserved for use before bedtime. Both lotions have an astringent effect, dry out excessive oiliness and perform a mild and beneficial peeling of the skin.

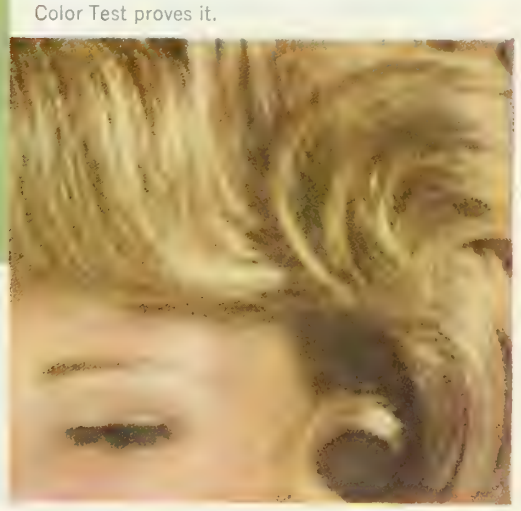
Daily exposure to an ultraviolet sun lamp was also prescribed for its tonic and healing effect. Suzanne takes her "sun" after dinner each evening, being careful to follow her doctor's directions about exposure time. (Extra caution must be used to avoid being burned.)

Outside of using lipstick and the tinted lotion, Suzanne keeps her face make-up free most of the time. For special occasions, she has found she can wear hypoallergenic cosmetics without breaking out. These preparations include a wide variety of make-up from eye shadow to powder base, to rouge and lipstick.

With justifiable optimism, Suzanne's doctor declares, "Her complexion problems will soon be a thing of the past!" And the patient patient adds, "I've never been happier!"

HAPPY ENDING FOR ALL

Though Suzanne suffered agonies over her complexion, there are other people with much more severe acne. Fortunately, for them, there are stronger treatments which can be used in addition to those described for Suzanne. One is the use of wet-sulphur packs to heal tough stubborn cases. Another, which skin specialists assure us is perfectly safe when skillfully performed by a qualified doctor, is the use of X rays. A leading dermatologist says, "In selected cases, when milder methods fail to help a bad case of acne, X-ray treatment is often the only answer to healing—the only guard against disfiguring scars." So for all acne patients there is help as well as hope.



Naturally, exciting red... Ogilvie Magic Color rekindles the glow of your own special red...or creates the one you've always wanted. Free Color Test assures it.

Naturally beautiful brunettes...Ogilvie Magic Color revives the dark locks of youth...makes salt-and-pepper hair one warm, spicy tone all over. Free Color Test proves it.

Naturally romantic blondes...Ogilvie Magic Color lights up any blonde with a new glow of youth... Free Color Test shows you the shade before application.

*If you prefer another shade, just return the large, un-

NATURALLY YOUNGER HAIR COLOR created by the Ogilvie Sisters, world's foremost specialists in hair care for 50 years. This advanced Ogilvie Magic Color is the only permanent coloring that conditions as it colors . . . leaves hair softer, brighter, more gloriously alive. Goes on in minutes, lasts till hair grows out, may be quickly and conveniently retouched.

The only hair color you can try before you apply!

FREE do it yourself COLOR TEST

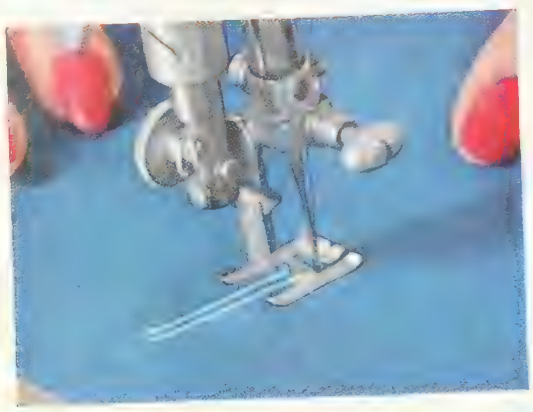
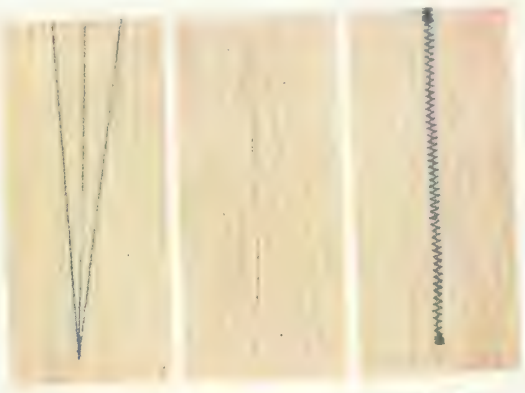
The first home hair color that lets you try the shade on a lock of your own before you apply it all. Free strand tester in each box assures the exact shade you want* and the Ogilvie label promises you the loveliest hair of your lifetime. Ogilvie Magic Color conditions as it colors, gives new radiance and softness. Try it today to cover gray, or brighten a fading shade. $1.50. Or for beautiful hair color temporarily, try one of the 6 new shades of Ogilvie Magic Rinse.



NEW OGILVIE MAGIC COLOR

The wonderful new permanent hair color from Dorothy Gray

Hours of "handwork" done in minutes on the SLANT-O-MATIC machine



Overcasting—only minutes per seam! Switch instantly from SINGER-perfect straight stitch to overcasting by dialing . . . no attachments.

6 Buttonholes in 6 minutes! No fuss to get machine ready . . . dial stitch for buttonholes and you make perfect buttonholes. End of that bugaboo!

2 Buttons a minute! Now you can use buttons galore for startling effects and sew them on by the dozen with this special button-sewing foot.

Interfacing—1 minute a dart! Tailoring secret: for interfacing dart without bulk, cut away material, pin to sheer backing. Sew with zigzag stitch.

Attach binding to hem—3 minutes! Professional touch: attach binding to skirt hem with narrow zigzag stitch that "gives" so thread doesn't draw and break. (Same technique keeps long seams, like draperies, from pulling and puckering!)

Endless designs at the turn of a knob! You can sit right down at the SLANT-O-MATIC* Machine and do decorative work. Soon you get exciting ideas for combination patterns and create original fashions that make heads turn for second looks!

Never before has sewing been so easy . . . so much fun! Try the SLANT-O-MATIC and its sister slant-needle machines at your nearby SINGER SEWING CENTER, or in your home for three days free. Get all the advantages of a SINGER* machine . . . famous sewing course . . . lifetime dependability and "everywhere" service. Made in America by American craftsmen.

SINGER has a machine for every purse and purpose. Prices start at $59.50 for the SPARTAN* model. Budget Plan available.

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

Also Headquarters for SINGER* Vacuum Cleaners

Listed in the phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHINE COMPANY

*A Trademark of the

JACK KENNEDY: DEMOCRATIC DYNAMO

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

freckle-faced boy. During the war he was a lieutenant in charge of a PT boat and was awarded the Navy and Marine Corps medal for "extremely heroic conduct." He likes to keep a golf club in his office to swing when he's tense, and on the wall facing the desk is a stunning sailfish almost ten feet long that he caught on his honeymoon at Acapulco. There are three pictures of his child and eleven of his wife, from girlhood on, around the room, and a lot of sharp cartoons about his political activities. His secretaries are allowed to keep a coffeepot going and take off their shoes if they want to, but are expected to work late whenever the need arises. The door to his office is always open, and he is readily available to his friends and to the press—if they can catch up with him.

He has been in Congress for thirteen years, six of which he spent in the House before coming to the Senate in 1953. When he first entered the House in 1947 he was mistaken for a page boy, and when he took his place in the Senate he excited the envy of his colleagues because of his thick swatch of hair. But when first session wound up, his fellow senators went on the record with compliments for his patience and forbearance" and his "studious propensities."

His wife, Jacqueline, is younger than he is, twenty-nine this year, with the looks of a chic model, a fine education here and abroad, the talents of an artist, and a wifely wish both to help her husband achieve his goals and to see that he gets some of the simpler pleasures of life. Like her husband, she was born with a large monogrammed silver spoon in her mouth and grew up in a big family by whom such delights as seashore houses, boats, horses, servants and travel were taken for granted as necessary adjuncts to wholesome, well-rounded living—but, unlike Jack, she has reflective quietness and would prefer a calm, well-ordered life to a whirl of activity.

After a two-year courtship which she describes as "erratic, but serene" when he was a freshman senator and she was working on a Washington paper, she and Jack were married in 1953. Old friends of both brought them together and have been very pleased with the results: Jack, they say, is infinitely more relaxed, and Jacqueline is more down to earth. "Being the wife of a politician is a dog's life, but Jacqueline sees the purpose of it and enjoys it," they report. "She's turned her artistic talents toward housekeeping, and while she has enough personal interests to keep her busy when Jack's working or campaigning, they're not so consuming that she isn't completely receptive to him when he's with her."

They have one child: blond, curly-haired and sweet-talking Caroline Kennedy, a three-year-old beauty who, if her parents get what they want, will be the first toddler to claim the White House nursery as her very own.

And there is no question that this is what both Kennedys—not to mention all the other Kennedys—want. Unlike many suspected candidates, Jack Kennedy has been neither backward nor bashful about his ambitions. Ever since 1956 he has been using 90 per cent of his spare time and all his spare money campaigning for this year's presidential nomination. One of his staff estimates that during the past few years he has made more than 1000 speeches, garnered invitations for 10,000 more, and it is a recorded fact that he has visited all these fifty united states at least once and many of them several times in his ceaseless traveling from coast to coast and island to pole. "How many people he's met I despair of counting—it's millions," the staffer said. "Jack's good at remembering faces, not so good at names, and indefatigable when it comes to meeting and greeting."

As well as talking publicly to civic groups, students, women's clubs and party get-togethers, there have also been private talks with party officials and potential convention delegates. The timing of an official announcement of candidacy is a tricky thing, but as Kennedy admitted to friends for some time before his formal announcement in January: "The opportunity is there, and if pursuing it vigorously will help—well, I don't like to see things go by default."

Behind him and around him others have been pursuing it for him vigorously too. Jacqueline has been out campaigning with him about a fourth of the time, and, although she still resists making speeches and winces when she is called "Jackie," she is getting quite adept at living out of one small suitcase, eating tepid lunches and smiling at strangers. She has not the stamina Jack has, and she cannot bear to be away from Caroline very long, so while Jack's span is five days on the road at a time, hers is three. "Campaigning took some getting used to," she says, "but it's about the only way I can see Jack these days."

There is also a more or less official campaign staff who handle invitations to speak, requests for information, and traveling arrangements. This group numbers about four men and as many secretaries, and for a year now they have occupied an office some distance from Kennedy's Senate office, but connected by direct phone. Pro-tem head of this preconvention office is lawyer Stephen E. Smith, sister Jean Kennedy's husband, while its chief decoration is a gigantic strategy map of the United States stuck with the proper varicolored pins to show, not only where Kennedy has been but, so far as is possible, where he is going.

And then there is the unofficial campaign staff, ready to swing into action at a moment's notice: the Kennedy family, who turned out in such force for Jack's first senatorial campaign that reporters declared his theme song was "All of Us—Why Not Take All of Us?" Robert F. Kennedy, Jack's next younger brother and recently resigned chief counsel for the Senate labor-rackets committee, is the head of this group, for, as well as being a doer in his own right, he is Jack's best friend, chief political confidant, and was the manager of his brother's Senate campaign. His cohorts include another brother—young Teddy, fresh out of the University of Virginia law school—sisters Eunice, Jean, Patricia and their respective husbands, and last, but not least, their father, the Honorable Joseph Patrick Kennedy, one-time ambassador to Britain, and their mother, Rose Kennedy, whose good looks are still such that at casual glance it is hard to tell her from her attractive daughters. At Christmastime the brothers and sisters chipped in to get Jack a specially equipped plane for his cross-country campaigns.

But for all this support, strategy and investment, Kennedy has no sense that victory will automatically be his. He is much more confident of being able to win if nominated—his vote-getting record in Massachusetts is astonishing—than he is of prying the nomination out of the party leaders who, when all is said and done, control the party's choice. For he suffers one political handicap that vim and vigor have little influence upon: he is a Roman Catholic, and the only time a Catholic was nominated for the presidency he was roundly defeated.

There are those who think the temper and the tolerance of the nation have changed since then. Today governors of three major states—California, Pennsylvania and Ohio—are members of the Roman Catholic Church, as is the mayor of New York City; but political bosses have long memories, like to bet on a sure thing, and do not like trouble. So, although thirty-two years have passed since the Al Smith campaign, there is now almost as vigorous a "stop Kennedy" movement in the Democratic Party as there is a "for Kennedy" movement.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 147

NEXT MONTH

"You are going to a strange house"—the young man dropped his lighthearted tone as he looked at Martha's hand—"a house full of shadows."

That would be Mount Mellyn, Martha knew, and an involuntary shiver shook her composure. Small omen it was, nothing to prepare her for the months ahead. For she had never before known murderers and, being only twenty-four, had little experience with love, and none with men whose love for her might cost her life itself.

This new book is written in the grand tradition of the English novel. To be serialized in five parts,

THE MISTRESS OF MELLYN

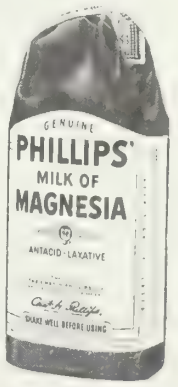
By VICTORIA HOLT

begins in the April JOURNAL

I took my doctor's advice, and now

MY CONSTIPATION WORRIES ARE OVER!

Doctors recommend Milk of Magnesia—the gentle laxative-antacid that gives complete but carefree relief.



THOUSANDS of doctors—general practitioners, pediatricians, obstetricians and surgeons, coast to coast, were asked: "Do you ever recommend Milk of Magnesia for your patients?" The overwhelming majority replied: "Yes!"

Yes, doctors consider Milk of Magnesia effective and gentle enough even for infants, maternity and surgical patients. And no wonder!

As a laxative, Phillips' works leisurely, thoroughly but comfortably, never forces the system.

As an antacid, Phillips' settles your stomach, relieves acid distresses accompanying constipation.

No single-purpose laxative can give such complete, yet gentle relief! Ask your doctor! No home should be without Phillips' Milk of Magnesia!

PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA

REGULAR OR MINT-FLAVORED

AVON'S CREAM SACHET WRAPS YOU IN FRAGRANCE

"AVON CALLING," at your home means a pleasant visit with your Avon Representative who will show you Avon's Cream Sachets and other delightful cosmetics.

YOU CREAM ON wonderful fragrance with Avon's beloved Cream Sachet. Applied to your skin this way, the scent lasts for hours, literally wrapping you in fragrance. How cherished you feel!

You choose from a vast and varied selection of fragrances including Persian Wood, Here's My Heart and—newest of all—Topaze, Avon's jewel of a perfume.

Avon's Cream Sachet . . . a lovely, lovely way to be fragrant all day.

© Avon cosmetics
RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

AVON COSMETICS FOR ALL THE FAMILY ARE BROUGHT TO YOUR HOME BY YOUR AVON REPRESENTATIVE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 145

Without denying his faith, Kennedy has tried to meet the challenge head on by stating that he adheres firmly to the American policy of the separation of church and state, but the religious issue continues to dominate discussion about his qualifications. It does not, however, haunt Kennedy himself. "It never hurt me in Massachusetts," he says, shrugging. And he has put his party on notice that if he wins his primary fights he and his followers cannot be bought off by the vice-presidential nomination. What does bring up one of his rare flashes of temper, however, is the antagonism to him shown by the liberal Democrats led by Mrs. Roosevelt. The former First Lady has criticized Kennedy several times on the grounds he was not among the Democrats seeking to censure McCarthy. Using the title of the Senator's book "Profiles of Courage" as a springboard, she epigrammed that the senator knew what courage was—but was not independent enough to have it.

Publicly, Kennedy has attempted to ignore her sharpness, but he agrees with many liberals that he is not one of their ilk. "I have never been comfortable with the A. D. A.," he has said, referring to the Americans for Democratic Action, a group in which Mrs. Roosevelt and other New Dealers play a prominent role. He also is aware that, just as he has inherited some of his father's fortune, he has also inherited some of his father's enemies. The senior Kennedy held several important New Deal positions, but he was no New Dealer. His work forming the Securities and Exchange Commission and in Lend-Lease was admired, but he was recalled as ambassador to London for criticizing the British war effort and thereafter ignored.

But Jack Kennedy is a hard man to daunt. He is used to criticism and thrives on competition, which he takes as his natural environment. He grew up that way: the brainy, bouncy Kennedy family was reared to compete fiercely with one another physically and mentally, but to close ranks when outside interference was threatened.

Until after World War II, the political dreams of the family were centered on Joseph Patrick Kennedy, the eldest, while Jack, the next in line, was considered the intellectual—the shy, retiring one who would rather read than talk, study than socialize. Both accepted their roles and enjoyed them: Jack looked up admiringly to Joe, competed with him largely to enhance his brother's victories and was never aware that in accepting his brother as his leader he was laying the foundation for a life that would fulfill Joe's youthful dreams, rather than his own.

For Jack's youthful dream was to be a writer, and until he was almost thirty he was satisfied with it. In college it was his senior thesis that was submitted to a publisher to become subsequently a best-seller book ("Why England Slept"—a study of England's prewar lack of preparedness). And it was Joe who, as a senior, was appointed a delegate to the Democratic National Convention (and who voted for Farley against Roosevelt). But the war intervened in both boys' dreams: friendly, extroverted Joe died a hero's death, blown up with his plane after he volunteered to help destroy German rocket bases, and his family, who have a warm, romantic love for one another, encouraged Jack's feeling that he must pick up the torch his brother had been forced to lay down.

Jack's memoir about his brother, written about this time, reveals the depth of this feeling. Here is not only Jack's love for his brother, but also his respect for his brother's goals and his brother's personality. Some of the phrases, for instance, could be used to describe Jack today: the "amazing intensity" Joe brought to everything; the sensation he gave "even when still of a force of motion visibly restrained, rooted in enthusiasm and in exceptional stamina"; and the "slight detachment" from others which served as a protective shell.

But such words could not have described Jack then. After only four months with Hearst, he was a restless and bored newspaperman. He had been sent to both the Potsdam conference and the San Francisco conference, but as what? a reporter, not a participant, and it galled him. He came from a family who did things, not just recorded their happenings. As well as his father and Joe, there had been Kennedys who had been ward leaders and state senators: on his mother's side, he had been named for Mayor John Fitzgerald of Boston, his grandfather, best known as "Honey Fitz" because of his melodious rendering of "Sweet Adeline."

"This is too passive for me," Jack told newsman Charles Bartlett in 1945 as he paced around his father's library in Palm Beach. "I want to go into politics."

His father helped him plan the strategy. Soon he had an apartment on Beacon Hill in Boston, an office staffed with imported friends, and the following spring he ran for the House of Representatives and won.

From 1947 to 1952 he served as a congressman, but his House activities were not distinguished. A lot of the time he was ill with malaria or away on speaking trips throughout Massachusetts. It was soon rumored that what he now wanted was a Senate seat, and in 1952 he filed to run against Henry Cabot Lodge.

Did he even then have his eye on the White House? It is likely. His father had once hoped to be President and doubtless there was considerable discussion at home about it, for the senior Kennedys liked to bring up political subjects for dinner-table debate. A safer route to the White House might have been to aim for the governorship—the Senate has produced few Presidents—but family ambition demanded first that Jack lick Lodge, whose famous grandfather had licked Grandfather Fitzgerald in his race for the Senate.

So Jack ran for the Senate in 1952 and won with a family-style campaign the like of which this country has never seen before—or since. While Jack roared through the state in a battered sedan on a split-second schedule with a Background for color:

A quick-in-the-making dress that doesn't look that way at all!
Mollie chooses Vogue's
"Very Easy to Make"
Design No. 9832, and for it a pale beige rayon and silk.
She adds a bright turquoise scarf at the waistline. The dress costs her less than $5.00.

For back view, sizes and price, see page 193

On a sunny day the coat is every bit as pretty. Here Mollie adds a beige veil, short white gloves.

Both Mollie's new coat and dress will be pretty with black, beige or navy accessories.
Here she chooses black . . .
and adds a bright blue ribbon to her pin.

SPRING FASHION $'s

POLKA-DOT JACKET DRESS (from February)	$24.95
BLUE JERSEY COAT	25.00
BEIGE DRESS TO MAKE	4.60
BEIGE VEIL	2.00
TOTAL	$56.55

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!

Color . . . is a sure sign of spring. Mollie Farnham chooses blue—perfect, she thinks, for her second and important investment, a coat. Typically Barbara J., it's as practical as it is pretty. The coat is waterproofed, and weather—fair or rainy—makes not a difference at all.

With two major investments behind her (a navy-and-white polka-dot jacket dress from last month), Mollie makes two smaller additions. They cost a minimum of fashion $'s, but with them she finds (only because of careful planning beforehand) she is all ready for spring! By BET HART

Mollie doesn't worry about a spring shower the first day she wears her new coat. The fabric, wool jersey, is waterproofed and sheds the rain. The collar and pockets are accented with four rows of stitching. Price of coat, $25.00.

husky friend to ward off overexcited bobby-soxers, his mother and three sisters rang doorbells in Boston and held kaffeeklatsches and get-togethers. Finally came a series of thirty-eight elegant teas in thirty-eight Massachusetts cities to which admission was by engraved invitation only. When the bill was in, the campaign had cost more than $300,000, but they considered it worth it: family honor was assuaged, and John Fitzgerald Kennedy was in the U.S. Senate, while Henry Cabot Lodge II was out.

The Kennedys could afford it. For when Joe Kennedy discovered back in the 'twenties—he was a movie magnate then—that he was making more money than a man could spend without devoting all his time to it, he set up a family trust fund for his children that would give each of them $1,000,000 when he or she was twenty-one. And then, to keep its management from being a lifework or a burden to any of them, he set up a central office to manage it—an office which today includes twenty-odd tax experts, bookkeepers and accountants.

The present size of the fund, and the individual incomes (probably about $70,000 annually) derived from it, is today one of the few secrets which the candid Kennedys keep to themselves. For though it is obvious that they enjoy the freedom from discomfort and involuntary drudgery that money can bring, and the gifts they give to their favorite charities, they hate to admit they are rich.

Jack, for instance, prides himself on the fact that his Senate check of $22,500 is banked separately and his household-running expenses are budgeted to keep within it. His private income is spent largely on his campaigns, but when he says he and Jacqueline live strictly on his salary he must, of mathematical necessity, be excluding several costly items from the family budget—perhaps the $70,000 which they paid for their handsome red-brick Georgetown house, the lengthy telephone calls he makes to his wife when he is away, and the airplane trips they make to the Cape.

For the Kennedys live in a strange mixture of simplicity and luxury. They do not give large parties, drink a lot, or collect knick-knacks, gadgets or jewels. Jacqueline's favorite dinner party is six people, "a colleague of Jack's, a newspaperman, so there can be some real conversation," and her favorite menu is "red meat, salad and ice cream—what Jack likes." She and Jack take an occasional daiquiri and an occasional smoke (he likes a cigar), but they so completely ignore the Washington party life that they believe "nobody" goes to parties there because "everybody" is as busy as they themselves are. Before Jack was campaigning as strenuously as he is now, they might go to New York to see the ballet (her favorite entertainment) or around the corner to a Western or Civil War movie (his favorite). They also buy lots of books and art objects. Jack is one of those people who are never without a book—he reads while tubbing, shaving, dressing, eating and just walking around—and Jacqueline is a collector of fine furniture, art books and art materials.

They both also love the seashore, and especially their small clapboard house at Hyannis Port on Nantucket Sound. It is just behind the big family house where Jack spent his summers as a boy and next door to the house where Bob and Ethel Kennedy summer with their now seven children, and during the summer most of the Kennedys spend as much time there as they can.

In Washington, their live-in servants include a cook, and a governess for Caroline, plus a daily maid who comes in and a gardener who comes by. The governess accompanies them to Hyannis Port, where a family butler is their chief servant, and when Jacqueline goes to Newport to visit her parents, the governess also goes along. "I am the housekeeper," says Jacqueline. "I work out all the menus, see that both houses are ready for ten—or no one, as the case may be—and stay prepared to join Jack at a moment's notice wherever he wants me."

When they are out on the road together, they take things as they come. Jacqueline, who began by taking "simply everything," now takes only three dresses, for morning, afternoon and evening, and one hat (for church), a traveling iron and a sewing kit. The evening dress usually has sleeves—"It's chilly in those halls"—but the pearls she wears with it are likely to be real. At seven Jack is up and she is awake; he is usually due to attend somewhere a breakfast of businessmen, to which she may or may not go. There are morning meetings which they attend together afterward and then a lunch, to which she goes unless there is a separate ladies' lunch. In the afternoons they may visit the nearest college—"Jack hates to skip a college"—or go through a factory. About 5:30 they get a chance to rest, and then there is a dinner. "It sounds endless, and it is, but it is also exhilarating. The first two days were the hardest—then I got into the rhythm of it," Jacqueline says. As well as the bands, the crowds and the applause, she also enjoys Jack's asides to her about the background of the communities they visit, and his speeches. "He's no cracker-barrel speaker, but the reception he gets with his serious talks is wonderful. Once I counted the references he made in a single speech—to Byron, Macaulay, Shakespeare, Tennyson and de Gaulle. I think people have an appreciation of his excellence—but he's not Olympian. He loves people." Their public day ends about eleven at night when Jack and his two or three traveling companions go into conference on this day's results and tomorrow's arrangements. Jack is the boss, the accountant, the decision maker—"There is a point in your life, finally, when you know your judgment is the only judgment for you," he says. He may listen to historian Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.—"He's my friend, and I respect his help, just as I do the help I get from other professors at Harvard"—or talk strategy with Abraham Ribicoff, governor of Connecticut, or make plans with Bob—"He's my right-hand man"—or go to his father when things go wrong—"He's always an optimist." But finally Jack Kennedy relies on Jack Kennedy. This makes him enemies, as well as friends, of course, and he knows it. (When Senator Lyndon Johnson said to him, "I'll get even with you at the convention," Jack laughed and said, "You'll have to get in line, Lyndon.") In crowds, however, his calm assurance, coupled with his warming smile, can be electric, and, as a New York Times commentator (James Reston) said once: "The effect he has on women voters is almost naughty." "I depend on the women in a campaign," Jack says. "They are the ones willing to hazard an effort without expecting any immediate return. They are more willing to commit themselves to an issue or a candidate than men—they are less committed to a straight party ticket."

As a bachelor Jack paid such little attention to household matters that an old friend says he didn't know "a slip cover from a curtain," and when he was asked to dinner, "he usually asked 'What's doing?' before he accepted." He has become much more discerning, however, and is now particularly impressed with the flexibility of his wife's studied and excellent taste. When they decorated their Georgetown house, for instance, Jacqueline spent months studying French antiques before she bought the Empire pieces that now give the place such a delightful mixture of beauty and comfort—but she would have none of them at Hyannis Port. There she surrounded her mother-in-law's nice collection of colorful old glass with early American pine, cozy chintz couches, and bright yellow-cushioned wicker chairs. "She's very efficient," Jack says.

She is not credited, however, with Jack's changed appearance. Before their marriage he was tousled, rumpled, and as often as not his coat did not go with his trousers. Today, however, his clothes are tailor-made, perfectly fitting, perfectly pressed, and he prefers a single-breasted blue pin stripe to the tweedy things he once wore. "It was his brother-in-law who brought him around to the tailor," a friend reports. "Jacqueline has never tried suggesting anything to Jack, but her sister's husband was so elegantly dressed Jack was impressed."

Jacqueline's clothes are only rarely bought from Paris couturiers, but they have that look, partly because she designs many of them herself, and partly because she frequents a small French dressmaker in Washington. Her sports clothes are vivid and informal: she likes bright-colored fancy pants at the Cape with contrasting shirts and scuffed sandals. And she shares one of Jack's more casual characteristics—her hair falls loosely around her face without benefit of professional care.

Relaxed though she appears, and casual, she is not at heart an easygoing sort of person; and until she faced them squarely, it was a struggle for her to accept cheerfully the stresses Jack's devotion to public life put upon their marriage. In 1956, for instance, she attended the Democratic convention in Chicago, despite the fact that she was seven months pregnant. But she stayed with Jack's sister, Eunice, and the only time she saw Jack was when he passed by their box on the convention floor. When the convention was over, he flew to the Riviera to see his father and discuss with him the loss of the vice-presidential nomination, while Jacqueline went up to Newport to visit her own parents. Four days later she suffered a miscarriage, and Jack, summoned by telephone, rushed to her side. She was in critical condition for about a week, and when she was out of danger Jack left again—this time to go off to campaign for the Stevenson-Kefauver ticket.

For a while thereafter she was depressed and came as near to feeling sorry for herself as her basically sturdy nature would permit her. But out of the suffering of that fall came her present philosophy of marriage and the strength to make it work. Until then she had described her life as "very lonely"—today, instead, she talks about the pleasure she gets in being with Jack on his campaigns, how often she flies here and there to meet him, and how much time at home with her and Caroline he manages to squeeze into his busy schedule.

When she was asked, "What is marriage?" she answered: "You do what your husband wants you to do." And then in her breathless, soft voice she added: "My life revolves around my husband, his life is my life. It is up to me to make his home a haven, a refuge, to arrange it so that he can see as much of me, and his child, as possible—but never to let the arrangements ruffle him, never let him see that it is work."

It was a hot summer day at Hyannis Port when we sat talking. Outside the blue refreshment of Nantucket Sound beckoned. Upstairs Caroline was taking her nap. And in Washington, Jack was pushing the labor bill through the Senate committee. Earlier in the week she had been down to see him; the following weekend it was expected he would be able to fly up. Meanwhile, in their Georgetown home, the maid was packing Jack's bag for a fast flight to San Francisco, and the cook was tidying up the remains of the lunch she had sent to the Hill office for the Senator to eat at his desk.

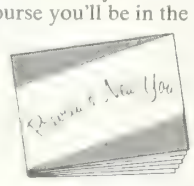
"Our way of living takes forethought and planning," Jacqueline went on, "but I want to

CONTINUED ON PAGE 150

When's the last time you had a good time?

You'll look better and feel better in a...

SPENCER



and have a lot more fun!

Are you too tired to see your friends at the end of the day? Is your figure keeping you in hiding? Do you hate to try on a new dress? You need a Spencer!

So many women tell us Spencer improves not only their looks, but their outlook on life as well! Spencer is the individually designed foundation and bra that is measured in your own home. Then Spencer is individually cut, sewn and finished for you alone.

If your tiredness and achey feeling come from fatiguing posture, Spencer gives you blessed relief. Spencer gently guides your body to your best posture to remove strains and pressures. Spencer smooths bumps, flattens bulges, trims your figure to new youthfulness. And Spencers are guaranteed not to lose their shape!

When you see how nice you look in your clothes, when you feel livelier than you have in some time—why, of course you'll be in the mood for some social life! And you'll enjoy it, in your Spencer! Take the first step, and mail the coupon right now. Or call your nearest Spencer corsetiere.

Write or Phone for FREE information today

Mail coupon now. Or telephone your Spencer Corsetiere. She is listed under "Spencer Corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop" in phone book. Or under "Corsets" in Classified.

Please send FREE 16-page booklet. I have [illegible] figure problem at right.

Uneven Breast Enlarge Backline Problem Posture

I would like to make money as a Spencer Corsetiere ☐

☐ ☐ ☐

Mrs.
Miss_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

MAIL SPENCER
141 Derby Ave., New Haven 7, Conn.
(In Canada: [illegible])

Spencer

foundations and bras designed individually for you

Among the real issues of 1960 are:

How to end or alter the burdensome arms race, where Soviet gains already threaten our very existence;

How to maintain freedom and order in the newly emerging nations;

How to rebuild the stature of American science and education;

How to prevent the collapse of our farm economy and the decay of our cities;

How to achieve, without further inflation or unemployment, expanded economic growth benefiting all Americans; and

How to give direction to our traditional moral purpose, awakening every American to the dangers and opportunities that confront us.

—from the campaign announcement of Senator Kennedy

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

4 ounces 60¢

THERE ARE THREE BRECK SHAMPOOS FOR THREE DIFFERENT HAIR CONDITIONS

The softness and lustre of your hair depends upon the care it receives. Frequent use of one of the Three Breck Shampoos will bring out the natural beauty and lustre of your hair. One Breck Shampoo is for dry hair. Another Breck Shampoo is for oily hair. A third Breck Shampoo is for normal hair. A Breck Shampoo cleans thoroughly, yet its gentle action is not drying to the hair. Select the Breck Shampoo for your individual hair condition – the correct shampoo to bring out the lustre and beauty of your hair.

The Three Breck Shampoos, available wherever cosmetics are sold, are color marked to help you select the correct type.

■ Red for Dry Hair ■ Yellow for Oily Hair ■ Blue for Normal Hair

JOY THE BRECK SUNDAY SHOWCASE, A SERIES OF DRAMATIC PROGRAMS, OVER THE NBC TELEVISION NETWORK

Copyright 1960 by John H. Breck Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 148

take such good care of my husband that whatever he is doing he can do it better because he has me. Not be pulled away from it. How awful that would be. His work is so important. And so exciting."

Then, leaning forward a little, she said with some asperity, "People say I know nothing about politics. And in a way it's true. Certainly my husband knows much, much more. But you learn an enormous amount just being around politicians. You get interested first in the personalities and then you get drawn into the work they are doing. And soon you are sharing it, something of it—and then the more you share with your husband, the richer your life."

When she was a child growing up in a Park Avenue apartment, spending her summers on Long Island, she never dreamed of being a senator's wife. Her sheltered, gilded world was bounded by the proper girls' school she attended in uniform, by her mother's treats to children's concerts and art museums. She was taught to play the piano—"but it didn't take"—and to dance—"I loved that. All my allowance went on ballet books for years." In the summers she learned to ride, to sail. Her mother was Janet Lee, of Long Island, her father was handsome Jack Bouvier, from whom Jacqueline inherited her long lashes, the smudges under her eyes, her cameo features. He had a seat on the Stock Exchange and was gay, rich, and proud of his aristocratic French lineage. Sometimes at dinner they spoke only French and if she or her sister, Caroline, forgot and spoke English, they had to forfeit a penny.

When Jacqueline was about ten, her parents were divorced, and a few years later her mother remarried, and she and Caroline went to live in McLean, Virginia, with her stepfather, Hugh D. Auchincloss, and his two children by a previous marriage. Jacqueline now went to a girls' school in Washington, and her summers were spent at Newport on the vast, but relaxed, Auchincloss dairy farm of seventy-five acres. Then, at fifteen, she was sent to boarding school at Farmington, Connecticut, not too far from Wallingford where, some years before, Jack had studied at Choate. "It was the kind of school that made you greedy for learning," Jacqueline says. "Every subject was interesting and exciting." After Farmington came Vassar, but after her second year there she joined the Smith College group for a year of study in France at Grenoble and the Sorbonne. In Paris she lived with a French family, friends of her own family, who had a girl her own age, and when she returned that fall the dormitory life of a girls' college seemed too isolated, too young for her to return to. So she lived at home in McLean and graduated at George Washington University instead. "That was wonderful in many ways. I got to know my new brother and sister that year. It is a tribute to my mother that, though our family is steps and halfs, we don't feel like it. We are very close."

After her degree, she wanted a newspaper job, and when the only one open was that of inquiring reporter she took it. It was sheer agony for her at first—"stopping perfect strangers to ask them silly questions, while the photographer bobbed around between us." But she not only stood up to the job; she conquered it. She learned photography so that she could go out alone; she sharpened up the questions so that people wanted to answer them; and she switched from street interviews to acquaintances—men at the garage where she kept her red convertible, waitresses in restaurants where she ate, people she knew from the university. Soon she was not only able to use her camera well, but she was also able to develop her own pictures and handle all her own copy. By the end of a year you would never have thought of her as a girl sheltered by riches, a debutante expected to confine her attentions to her partners at New York's Assembly dances. She was a person with a mind and a world of her own.

She first met Jack Kennedy when she was just back from the Sorbonne, and they were placed next to each other at a small Washington dinner. She was twenty then, and he thirty-four, and she had that kind of offbeat humor he liked, while he had a directness—"some people think he is too direct"—of conversation that drew her out of her shyness. For six months afterward, however, she didn't see him: she returned to Europe briefly, and he went off campaigning. Then, during her last year at George Washington University they started to go out together. "We knew, both of us, I think, it was serious, but we didn't talk about it then. We went to movies or saw Bob and Ethel, and when he was campaigning he'd call me from a pay phone with a great clinking of coins." When he returned in January of 1953, victorious, to Washington as senator and she was working, they began to see each other a lot, and by June they were engaged. Originally they intended their wedding to be a "small, family affair" (which was something of a contradiction in terms to begin with), but in no time it had snowballed into a regal gala with 800 guests inside the church and thousands outside, and all the big and little Auchinclosses and Kennedys in attendance. And then they went to Acapulco, Mexico, for three weeks of absolutely no politicking at all.

When they returned to Washington, they first bought a large, elegant country house in McLean, and for a while lived as country squires. But though on the surface their life seemed halcyon ("Could you move that flowering tree, please," Jack said to the caretaker. "I'd like to see it easily from the breakfast-room window."—"Well, it would cost a mint," said the caretaker—"I didn't ask you what it would cost. I'd like it moved.") it was not so glittering as it looked. Ever since he had played football at Harvard, Jack had had a back injury that was so bad that he was rejected twice by the Army and taken finally by the Navy after a show of physical abilities. His activities after his PT boat was cut in two by a submarine did not help: he rescued three men from drowning, walk miles over coral reefs to secure native help, and caught what rest he could on the damp, spiky terrain of the Solomon Islands. Add to this his campaign travels, and the games of touch football that were considered vital among the Kennedy family (the celebration game the day before his wedding was so rough that he had difficulty kneeling before the altar), and it is not surprising to learn that a metal plate put over his spine after the war had never healed over. "You could look in and see it," a friend said. By 1954 he had to admit he was in pain: he added an extra-long couch to his office so he could lie down to work, and when the Senate session was over he went by private plane to Hyannis Port to spend the summer resting.

YOU'LL PURR TOO! when you feel the softness and lightness of Paradise Kittens/Kitten-ettes, now in three wonderful heel heights. From $16 to $18. For store nearest you, write Brauer Bros. Shoe Co., Saint Louis, Missouri.

That fall it was agreed that, despite the fact that physicians told his family his chances of living through it were not certain, he must undergo surgery—on his back and in the kidney area. He had always been stoic; his family said they could tell whether he was ill only by looking at him, not by listening to him—but now a friend heard him admit he was suffering: "He said he'd take the chance of dying, he couldn't stand the pain any more."

He went into the New York Hospital for Special Surgery in October, 1954, and after the organic operation, never precisely described, double fusion was performed on his spine. For three months he stayed in the hospital and twice his family was called to his bedside because he was thought to be dying. But by Christmas he was out of danger entirely, and Jacqueline was able to take him by ambulance to the airport and then by private plane to his father's house in Palm Beach. He was then supposed to rest for several months, but he couldn't do it. "Doing nothing," he says, "is the hardest work." So instead he began working on an idea he had had for some time—a collection of stories about senators who had stood up for their principles. The Library of Congress, which says he is the Senate's more frequent book borrower, shipped him down the reference works he needed, his aides assisted him in the research, and first he dictated the copy and then he lay on the beach working it over by hand. "He wrote it because he wanted people to stop using the word 'politician' derogatorily," Jacqueline says. "He wanted to show how fine and admirable politicians often are." The result was the book "Profiles in Courage," which won a 1957 Pulitzer prize, was a best seller, and earned him more than $70,000. (The title was not so rewarding: out of it came, among others, the crack at Kennedy, "He has more profile than courage.")

Since the operation, Kennedy says he is completely free of pain, and the only concession he now makes to his fused spine is to ask for a bedboard to sleep on wherever he goes. He has taken up golf, once in a while plays touch football, and he has not had a bout of malaria for years. Today he has regular hospital checkups, takes a rest before official dinners (this also avoids the cocktail hour) and considers himself in "perfect health."

"I don't have an organized philosophy of life," he told me. "I just have my family and my work. I subscribe to the Greek idea of the 'full use of your powers along the ideas of excellence,' and I love politics. Other ways of living to me are challenge without substance—the way to function is by doing. Politics has for me what every other work has, and then some: it's interesting, worth while, useful, a means of doing things of tremendous importance.

"And in politics the center of action is the presidency. The force of events, our increasing population, our position in the world all make it so. Right now, running for the presidency demands an exacting course and a great effort; it's a tough, high climb. But, well ——"

He broke off and smiled—that smile of his, with its disarming mixture of confidence and modesty. The end of his sentence was too obvious to need to be said: Jack Kennedy thinks that a chance at being the President of the United States is worth all the effort he can muster. END

ASK ANY WOMAN

By MARCELENE COX

Until the male carries a handbag, the sexes will never be on an even footing.

It may not be possible to build a better mousetrap, but in this day of the well-stocked kitchen it certainly is possible to build a better mouse.

He is fifteen and he came home from a party and exclaimed, "I'm through with girls. Boy, did I meet a sweet one tonight!"

Driving to the family home on a recent holiday, the children said they were able to tell every house where the mother had chosen to cook the traditional dinner instead of being taken out: the kitchen windows were all steamed up.

A friend who owns an open sports car says she waves to almost everyone she meets because she'd rather be known as a flirt than a snob.

He's one of those men who, if given a shoestring, would own a shoe factory in no time.

Children who take after their parents may be driving too fast.

Try this truism on for size: The only way to help people be what they want to be is to accept them as they are.

One indication that the male is really more conceited than the female is that no one anywhere has ever heard a woman boast of being self-made.

Like a young horse, a young man has many potential lives: he may ride into battle, jog through the world alone, become an overburdened work horse, or trot happily through life with an understanding mate who pulls half (or more than half) of the load.

It is possible to tell when a hot-water bottle has been filled by a man: it always contains hot air.

A very young girl was taken out to have lunch. After she finished eating she climbed down from her chair and, with a napkin, began to clean up some crumbs on the floor. Amusedly a gentleman at the next table watched, then remarked, "Some unattached bachelor may take note of this."

The girl who lets her intellect show through is certain to be admired by a man; the girl with a happy disposition is sure to put him at ease; the girl he cannot win is guaranteed to have his adoration; but she who can cook and lets him sample her cooking is the one certain to win a marriage proposal.

No girl should wear her best frock at the following times:

When her mother has advised her to wear another.

When the occasion calls for a simple one.

When a man is dating her for the first time.

When a man is observing her cook a meal.

A NEW KIND OF STEAM VAPORIZER

when colds strike,

your child will sleep and so will you . . . if you use Steam-Dial . . . the new vaporizer that regulates steam volume for fast relief. Steam-Dial raises humidity . . . breaks up congestion, makes breathing easier. Ask your local druggist. DeVilbiss Steam-Dial—$9.95 . . . steams 'round the clock.

Since 1888 Physicians have used and prescribed DeVilbiss

THE DEVILBISS COMPANY, SOMERSET, PA. • BARRIE, ONT.

If your NAILS BREAK OR SPLIT

CORRECT THEM THIS MEDICALLY PROVED WAY. Just drink one daily envelope of Knox Unflavored Gelatine (115-120 grains, about 5¢) in fruit or vegetable juice, bouillon or water. Published clinical studies—using Knox, and Knox alone—show 7 out of 10 women have success. Mostly within 90 days. Avoid imitations. Your doctor will tell you.

PHYSICIANS: Reprints of all published medical studies on request.

© 1960 Knox Gelatine, Inc., Johnstown, N. Y.

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH STAINLESS

Campho-Phenique

(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON PIMPLES-ACNE

CAMPHO-PHENIQUE HELPS PREVENT THEIR SPREAD AND RE-INFECTION

It's wonderful, too, for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils, cuts and scratches, minor burns caused by book matches, hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam. Campho-Phenique relieves itching of insect bites, poison ivy, etc. Just apply Campho-Phenique next time and see how fast this pain-relieving antiseptic goes to work. And it doesn't stain the skin! Get a bottle today.

3 buttery-good frostings you make in minutes!

Your secret: Betty Crocker Frosting Mixes!

Buttery-good! A special shortening in our Betty Crocker Frosting Mixes blends perfectly—instantly—with the butter you add. In next to no time, you've made a perfect home-cooked frosting—without cooking! We guarantee a perfect* homemade frosting—every time!

Betty Crocker

Spiral Caramel Frosting!

Dandy-Candy Frosting! Chocolatey-good fudge frosting you make in minutes. Fill and frost cake. Draw fork across top; repeat design at right angles to first pattern. Trim with candy.

Birthday Frosting!

"When I Entertain"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 93

tomatoes, and ice cream and cake for dessert. Couldn't be easier!"

Mrs. Rockefeller, as chairman of the Y.W.C.A.'s World Service Council, entertains frequently at small luncheons for visiting staff and volunteers of Y.W.C.A.'s overseas. "We try to work across cultural barriers and through the Y.W.C.A. promote understanding among peoples of different countries," she says. A typical luncheon menu at the Rockefellers' might include Quiche Lorraine, served in wedges, as first course. Then a veal casserole, served with rice, and a platter of hot buttered green vegetables, whatever is in season. Orange soufflé makes a light, delicate dessert.

Filet of Beef

Two 2½-pound filets mignon, larded by your butcher
Salt and pepper
½ cup Burgundy if you like Water cress to garnish

